To the Right Honourable

THOMAS

Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery;
Baron Herbert of Caerdiff; Lord Roſſe, Par,
Marmion, St. Quintin and Shurland;
Lord Privy-Seal; Lord Lieutenant of the County of Wilts, and South-Wales; and One of his Majeſty's moſt Honourable Privy-Council.

My Lord,

IT having been uſual to dedicate Works of publick Uſe and Benefit to great Perſons, eminent for Vertue, Learning and Nobility, I think my ſelf happy under the Obligation of that Cuſtom; ſince it ſomewhat excuſes, as well as encourages my Preſumption, to lay this Performance at your Lordſhip's Feet.

I am ſure it could not be honoured with a more agreeable Name:

A Name ſo univerſally known, that all Men acknowledg your Lordſhip to be ſignally endued with thoſe excellent Qualities, which render you not only a great Maſter in the moſt uſeful Parts of Learning, but likewiſe incline you to a generous Encouragement of all thoſe who have any pretence to them. Which Favour, your Lordſhip having been pleaſed to confer on me, among ſeveral others of greater Merit, gives me the more Confidence to addreſs this firſt Volume of our Engliſh Hiſtory to your Lordſhip's Patronage: for as no Perſon hath been more converſant in things of this Nature than your ſelf; ſo I know none more able to make a right Judgment of them.

And tho I will not affirm this to be an Exact Hiſtory according to the ſtrict Rules of Art, yet if I were conſcious to my ſelf, that it was wholly unworthy your Acceptance, I ſhould derogate very much from that Reſpect which is ſo juſtly due to your Lordſhip's Character.

But if the not Writing any thing which I did not believe to be true, nor the concealing any thing uſeful to the World, that is ſo, might qualify me for an Hiſtorian, perhaps then I may have ſome pretence to that Title. However, your Lordſhip will here meet with a faithful Account of all the chief Actions and Revolutions, that have happened in this Kingdom down to the Norman William. As firſt, the Conqueſt the Romans made of that part of Britain we now call England; then their quitting it after a long Poſſeſſion, in order to ſecure their Empire at Home from the Inſults of ſo many barbarous Nations: after which followed the calling in of the Saxons to aſſiſt the Britains. And laſtly, from the formers quarrelling with the latter, enſued their total Expulſion out of the beſt and moſt fertile parts of this Iſland.

As for the Invaſions by the Danes under King Cnute, and by the Normans under King William, commonly called the Conqueror; though it muſt be granted, that theſe Princes were victorious by their Arms, yet was not this Nation ſubdued by either of them ſo entirely, as that its Submiſſions could properly be ſtiled Conqueſts, but rather Acquiſitions gained by thoſe Princes upon certain Compacts between them and the People of England; both Parties ſtanding obliged in ſolemn Oaths, mutually to perform their parts of the Agreement, as will be clearly ſeen in the Sequel of this Hiſtory.

Yet I doubt not but in theſe great Revolutions, your Lordſhip will take notice, that the People of this Kingdom were never overcome by Strangers, till their Luxury ſoftning their warlike Tempers, and producing a careleſs Adminiſtration of their Affairs, had made them an eaſy Prey to their Invaders: This I obſerve not to reproach, but to warn our Nation, leſt by the like Miſcarriages they ſhould incur the like Puniſhments.

I have now no more, but to beg your Lordſhip's Acceptance of this Dedication, as a Tribute juſtly yours, by reaſon of thoſe great Obligations, for your ſo freely communicating to me ſome part of your uncommon Knowledg, whenever I have had the Happineſs of your excellent Converſation;

An Honour, which engages me to own my ſelf, with the utmoſt Reſpect,

My LORD,

Your Lordſhip's moſt humble and moſt obedient Servant,

James Tyrrell.

THE PREFACE TO THE READER.

THO it hath been a general Complaint of the moſt Learned and Judicious Men of this Nation, that we have extreamly wanted an exact Body of Engliſh Hiſtory in our own Language, for the Inſtruction and Benefit of our Nobility and Gentry, together with others who would be glad to underſtand by it the Original Conſtitutions and Laws of their own Country; yet ſince perhaps ſome ordinary Readers may be inclined to think this Work unneceſſary, becauſe it hath been already performed by ſo many different Hands; I ſhall therefore in the firſt Place ſay ſomewhat to obviate and remove this ſeeming Objection.

THOSE that are any thing converſant in our Hiſtorians, do know that the Writers in Engliſh, eſpecially of this Period now publiſh'd, are not many. As for Caxton, Fabian, and others of leſs Note, (who are very ſhort, and now read but by few) I ſhall paſs them by, and only mention Grafton and Hollingſhead, the former of whom lived in the Reign of Henry VIII. and the latter in that of Queen Elizabeth. And of theſe I need not ſay much: for tho they contain a great deal of Matter, very curious and fit to be known, eſpecially relating to the Times wherein they lived, yet not only their dry and uncouth way of Writing, and dwelling ſo long on the exploded Fables of Geoffrey of Monmouth, but the ſtuffing of their Hiſtories with divers mean and trivial Relations unworthy the Dignity of their Subject, have rendred their Labours tedious, and in a great meaſure unuſeful to their Readers.

BUT as for Stow and Speed, who wrote in the time of King James the Firſt, 'tis true the former of them is not ſo long and tireſom in Geoffrey's Stories, as thoſe abovementioned; and it muſt be confeſſed that Mr. Speed was the firſt Engliſh Writer, who, ſlighting Geoffrey's Tales, immediately fell upon more ſolid Matter; giving us a large Account of the Hiſtory of this Iſland during the Time of the Roman Emperors, and Engliſh Saxon Kings; and had he not, by making his Reader follow thoſe Emperors in all their Foreign Wars and Expeditions, wherein Britain was no way concerned, he had rendred his Work leſs Irkſome, and more Profitable than now it is.

BUT notwithſtanding both theſe Writers had many choice Collections of Noble Manuſcripts relating to our Engliſh Hiſtory, and might have had the View of ſeveral others if they would have been at the Pains of ſeeking after ter them; yet it muſt be owned they did not make that Improvement of thoſe Opportunities as might have been expected from ſuch great Aſſiſtances; there being not much to be found material in either of them, but what was in the other Hiſtories before publiſhed: though this muſt be allowed in their Commendation, that they are both of them (eſpecially the former) commonly right in their Chronologies, and the latter has given us a choice Collection of the Antient Coins of the Roman Emperors, as well as of the Engliſh Saxon Kings; and has been alſo more exact than any other Writer, in his Account of their Wives and Iſſue.

AND as for thoſe who wrote in the Time of K. Charles the Firſt, viz. Mr. Daniel, and Sir Richard Baker; the Relations they have afforded us of thoſe Kings, are rather ſhort Abſtracts of their Reigns, than juſt Hiſtories, it not being their Deſign to write at large of that Period we here treat of.

BUT ſince the Reſtoration of K. Charles the Second, there are ſeveral who have undertaken this Province, the firſt of whom was Mr. Milton; and it muſt be acknowledged, that he wrote this Engliſh Saxon Hiſtory with Judgment, though not with that Diligence and Exactneſs as we may ſee he did his other Works of a different Nature; ſince either through want of Opportunity to conſult Antient Manuſcripts, (ſeveral of which have been publiſhed ſince he wrote) or elſe by not making uſe of thoſe Authors he might have had, and by confining himſelf too much to the relating of Military Matters, and almoſt wholly neglecting Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, or looking into thoſe things which he by way of Contempt called Cathedral Regiſters; as alſo by omitting the giving us any Account of the Antient Saxon Laws, and Original Conſtitutions of this Kingdom; he has thereby rendred that Work much more dry and imperfect than otherwiſe no doubt it would have been from ſuch a ^ Pen ~~as his~~.

THE next that ſucceeded him in this Labour was Mr. Sammes, who had a fair Opportunity of improving his Hiſtory, by amending Mr. Milton's Omiſſions; but inſtead of this, by indulging himſelf too much in the Relation of, and giving Credit to Geoffrey of Monmouth, and White (that called himſelf Baſingſtoke*) their old Stories, and by making long and unneceſſary Excurſions on the Antiquity and Original of the* Greeks, Romans and Saxons, as likewiſe of their Religion and Manners (things altogether foreign to this Subject) tho he hath ſhewn a great deal of Reading, yet having been all the while very ſhort in that which ought to have been the main Buſineſs of his Hiſtory, he hath thereby ſpoiled a Noble Deſign.

Phœnicians?

'TIS true, the Learned Dr. Howell, in the ſecond and third Volumes of his General Hiſtory, hath given us a faithful Account of the Affairs of Britain, from the Coming in of the Romans, as far as the Norman Conqueſt; and hath alſo a very elaborate Diſcourſe of their Civil Polity and Laws: and had that Work been done by it ſelf, and not involved in ſuch large Volumes, (but written in a more Chronological Method) and had he not laid the Hiſtory of each Kingdom of the Engliſh Saxon Heptarchy ſeparately and apart, which makes him often guilty of divers unneceſſary Repetitions; that Work would have proved much more uſeful than now it is: which being obſerved by many others beſides my ſelf, hath cauſed a certain Clergy-man (as I hear) to undertake the Epitomizing of that whole Work, which would be very uſeful to thoſe ordinary Readers who cannot well purchaſe theſe larger Volumes.

BUT ſince theſe Learned and Ingenious Authors have in ſome Point or other here mentioned been deficient in this Undertaking, I found it requiſite (for

(for the making a full and compleat Hiſtory of the Affairs contained in this Volume) rather wholly to erect a new Edifice, than to be at the Trouble of altering of theirs; and therefore have thought it neceſſary to draw this Work afreſh from the ſame Originals from which they had taken theirs. To which I have alſo added ſeveral other material Paſſages, that either they wanted the Happineſs of ſeeing, or elſe would not be at the Pains and Expence I have been at to peruſe; not but that I muſt own my ſelf much beholding to them for divers Choice Remarks and Obſervations; which, not to be thought guilty of Plagiary, I have noted in the Margin by the Initial Letters of their Names; and have likewiſe ſometimes taken their Tranſlations of a few diverting Legends or Stories, to ſpare my ſelf the Trouble of making them anew: and even theſe I have alſo compared with the Originals, and corrected the Stile, as well as the Senſe, in divers Places.

BUT I cannot here omit taking notice (among other Writers) of the firſt Part of Dr. Brady*'s compleat Hiſtory of* England, which, tho it comprehends the ſame Period of Time as this we now preſent you with; yet ſeeing he hath there rather choſen to give us an Account of the Political Government, and Laws of the German and Engliſh Saxons, than to write an Entire Hiſtory of thoſe Times; I beg his Pardon, if I do not take it as to that part for ſo compleat a Hiſtory as he is pleaſed to intitle it: however, it muſt be confeſſed he hath taken much Pains, and ſhewn a great deal of reading in that Volume; and I could have wiſhed I might have been able to ſay, he had been alſo as careful of the juſt Rights and Liberties of his Country, (which he has done all he can to depreſs) as he has been in aſſerting an Imaginary Right of Lineal Succeſſion in our Kings long before the Conqueſt; and that before that time as well as after, the Commons had no Repreſentatives in Parliament; both which Aſſertions we ſhall make bold to examine in our enſuing Introduction. And (tho I have otherwiſe a great Value for his Learning, yet) I hope neither he himſelf, nor any one elſe who has a real Concern for the publick Good, will take it amiſs if I differ from him, where the Truth of our Hiſtory, as well as our Antient Laws and Conſtitutions will juſtify me, in contradicting ſome Aſſertions, which he has with ſo great an Aſſurance publiſhed to the World.

AND thus having acquainted you with the Defects of theſe Writers in their ſeveral Undertakings, and the Reaſons why it was neceſſary to compile a new Hiſtory; I ſhall now ſhew you what Method I have followed, and what Authors I have made uſe of, in the Performance of it.

AS for the firſt Book, it is no other than an Epitome of Geoffrey of Monmouth*'s pretended* Britiſh Hiſtory; and if it had not been more for the Diverſion of the younger ſort of Readers, and that the Work would have been thought by ſome others to be imperfect without it, I ſhould have been much better ſatisfied in wholly omitting it; yet I hope it will neither prove tedious nor unuſeful, ſince it may ſometimes be of Advantage to know Legends as well as true Hiſtory; or elſe which way can one tell how to paſs a juſt Cenſure on them?

NOR can we poſitively affirm, that every thing contained in that Book of his is abſolutely falſe; for he, being a Perſon well verſ'd in the Hiſtory of his own Countrey, could not but give us all he knew concerning it, though interſperſed with ſo many notorious Fables of his own, which he ſeemeth to have interwoven, the better to connect thoſe broken Remains of old Times: But ſince no Man can eaſily at this diſtance diſtinguiſh Truth from Falſhood, he ought to be dealt with as we do with thoſe who would impoſe counterfeit Coin upon us; in refuſing the whole Sum, where the greateſt part of it is ſo plainly diſcernable to be falſe.

HERE by the way I muſt ingenuouſly own a ſmall Miſtake I have committed in the firſt Book of this Volume; where ſpeaking ſomewhat in Defence of this Author, that he was not the firſt Inventor of the Story of Brutus, it being alſo found in Nennius who lived long before him, and from whom I then ſuppoſed Henry of Huntingdon to have borrowed it; I now perceive upon better Information, that Geoffrey and H. Huntingdon were not only Cotemporaries, but the latter in that part of his Engliſh Hiſtory ſtill in Manuſcript, (viz. in the Second of his Epiſtle, dedicated to one Gwarin a Britiſh or Welſh Nobleman) confeſſes, that in his Journey to Rome, ſtaying ſome time by the Way at the Abbey of Bec, he there found a large Book of this Geoffrey's, (whom he alſo calls Arthur) who had copiouſly and diligently wrote the Britiſh Hiſtory; though in the common printed Copies we find no more, than that travelling to the Place abovementioned, he had there met with a certain Volume, in which were divers things relating to the Britiſh Hiſtory not before known, but yet without naming the Author.

THIS I thought good to advertiſe the Reader of, becauſe thoſe Sheets were wrought off before ever I was ſenſible of my Miſtake.

AS for my ſecond Book, I can only tell you it is a true and juſt Tranſlation of the Britiſh Hiſtory from all the Greek and Roman Authors I could meet with that have treated of it; from whom alſo I have given you a Deſcription of the Manners and Cuſtoms of the Antient Britains: and tho I grant this has been already attempted by one Daniel Rodgers, whoſe Papers are in the Cottonian Library, and is fully performed by Mr. Camden in his Introduction to his Britannia, and likewiſe by Mr. Speed before his Hiſtory; yet I have my ſelf compared them with the Originals, and added ſome Remarks, which I thought were further neceſſary to be known.

I have begun this Part with Cæſar's Relation, as I found it in his Commentaries concerning his two Expeditions into Britain; and have ended with the laſt of the Greek and Roman Hiſtorians, viz. Zoſimus, Oroſius, and Aurelius Victor.

AND whereas others who have undertaken this Province, have uſed the Liberty of Epitomizing or enlarging thoſe Paſſages they have cited from the Greek and Latin Authors; I have thought fit faithfully to tranſlate them, except in ſome of their long-winded Orations; which, to avoid Prolixity, I thought it better to abridg, as not believing thoſe Orations to have been deliver'd in thoſe Circumſtances in which they are now dreſs'd.

AND tho I do not pretend to have added much to what Mr. Camden and Mr. Milton have already collected from thoſe Writers relating to the Hiſtory of Britain; yet I hope I have from ſeveral Verſes of the Poet Claudian, as alſo by the Aſſiſtance of thoſe great Maſters in Antiquity, the Lord Primate Uſher, the Reverend Dr. Stillingfleet, now Lord Biſhop of Worceſter, and Dr. Lloyd, now Lord Biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield, not only illuſtrated, but ſettled divers things relating to that part of our Eccleſiaſtical, as well as Civil Affairs, not commonly taken notice of before.

IN the beginning of the third Book, I have from Mr. Sheringham's Treatiſe De Origine Gentis Anglorum, as alſo from other Authors, given you, in order to our Engliſh Saxon Hiſtory, a more Exact Account of the Original of thoſe Nations, which (when they came over into England) were com- prehended under the General Name of Saxons, than hath been hitherto publiſhed in our own Language.

AFTER which I have given you a Relation of the Manner of their coming over hither, and the Ground and Occaſion of their quarrelling with the Britains, from Gildas, Bede and Nennius.

BUT as for the Time of their erecting themſelves into an Heptarchy, ſince it is not to be learnt from Bede, who is wholly ſilent of what the Saxons did here from their firſt entrance to the Propagation of Chriſtianity, which he made it his Buſineſs chiefly to treat of; I have taken it from the Saxon Annals, as well as other later Authors that have mentioned any thing of it; though as to the whole Period of Time contained in this Book, it muſt be confeſſed it was when Letters were not in uſe amongſt them, and therefore could only be convey'd down by Tradition, which makes us here be beholding to the Annals abovementioned, or to ſome Antient Memoirs, which tho now loſt, were certainly ſeen by thoſe Writers, who have gathered from them.

INDEED I was ſomewhat perplexed what Method to take in digeſting the Hiſtory of ſeven concurring Kingdoms; ſince, which way ſo ever I engaged, I found it attended with ſome Inconveniences.

WILLIAM of Malmesbury, and ſeveral other Authors, as well in Latin as Engliſh, I know thought it beſt to give us this Hiſtory digeſted under each reſpective Kingdom apart; but then there is this Exception againſt that way of Writing, that without Chronological Tables, or frequent turning backward and forward, one cannot underſtand the Synchroniſms of the ſeveral Kings Reigns, or the Time wherein they lived, ſo as to compare them with others their Cotemporaries.

BESIDES which, there is alſo a neceſſity of an unneceſſary Repetition of the ſame Wars or Tranſactions, as well under the Hiſtory of the King that made, as of him who ſuffered that Invaſion; this appeareth in Speed, and Dr. Howel. 'Tis true, Mr. Speed thought of a good Method to help this, by ſuppoſing ſo many ſucceſſive Monarchs to have been always in England, from the Time of Hengeſt to K. Egbert, under whoſe ſeveral Reigns he alſo reduces whatſoever Actions happened in the reſt of all the other ſubordinate Kings then Regnant. This I confeſs had been a very good Expedient to avoid the Difficulties abovementioned, were it as juſt as it ſeems ſpecious: but upon Examination it will be found, that tho Bede as well as the Saxon Annals, have given us a Series of all thoſe Supream Kings, whom ſome of the Modern Writers are pleaſed to call Monarchs; yet, as I have ſufficiently ſhewn in this enſuing Hiſtory, they could by no means deſerve that Title; ſince it may be clearly ſeen by any one who will peruſe Mr. Speed, that there were ſometimes Intervals of ten or twenty Years, before ſuch a victorious Prince could make all the reſt by the Terror of his Arms ſubmit themſelves to him; which yet they never all did till the Reign of King Egbert, without preſerving entire all their Royal Rights and Prerogatives over their own Subjects.

AND beſides, this Power owing its Original wholly to Force, and not to a Lineal Succeſſion or Election over the reſt of thoſe Princes upon whom it was uſurped, was without any Juſt or Legal Right, and conſequently laſted no longer than the Succeſs, or at fartheſt the Life-time of ſuch a Conquering Prince; and then it was for a time Extinct, until ſome other of the Seven by the like ſucceſs of his Arms, could ſet up for the ſame Power and Greatneſs.

SO that at length we found, that the beſt way of Writing this Hiſtory was to follow the plain and natural Method of our Saxon Annals, not only as the moſt eaſy for our ſelves, but alſo for the Reader.

AND tho perhaps an Objection may be made againſt this Method, viz. That the crowding of ſo many different Actions done in ſeveral Places, and under ſeveral Kings, renders the Work perplexed and difficult to be remembred, which I grant is in part true; yet to obviate this, I have at the end of each of the enſuing Books (except the laſt) preſented you with exact Chronological Tables, not only of the Names of all the Kings contained under each Period, but alſo in what Year of our Lord they began and ended their Reigns; ſo that the Reader by caſting his Eye upon any one of them, may eaſily find what Kings lived and reigned together, and conſequently in which of their Reigns any Action related in the Hiſtory was performed. And now,

TO come to the fourth Book, Bede being the moſt antient Author that gives us an Account of what was done in this Period, and out of whom the Saxon Annals themſelves have borrowed almoſt the greateſt part of what they relate, concerning thoſe early Times of Chriſtianity; I have therefore wholly confined my ſelf to him, without having recourſe to theſe Annals, or any other, unleſs it be where I find they relate any Action of which he has been wholly ſilent. But in this Period, I cannot but mention Stephen Eddi, or Heddi, a Monk; who, as Bede tells, was one of the firſt Maſters for Singing in the Northumbrian Churches; and having been invited by Wilfred Archbiſhop of York out of Kent for that purpoſe, had ſo great a Veneration for his Memory, that he wrote his Life in Latin, in a Stile ſomewhat better than could be expected from that Age: this Treatiſe having continued in Manuſcript in the Library of Sir Jo. Cotton, and alſo of that of Salisbury, has lately been publiſhed by the Learned Dr. Gale, in his laſt Volume of Engliſh Writers; and to which I muſt own my ſelf beholding for many choice Paſſages relating to the Eccleſiaſtical, as well as Civil State in thoſe Times: this Author flouriſh'd cotemporary with Bede, in the Reign of Oſric King of Northumberland, and died about Anno Dom. 720.

BUT indeed as for the laſt forty Years, or thereabouts, viz. from the Time when Bede ceaſed to write, which was Anno Dom. 637. we have been forced to make uſe of the Annals, or elſe of thoſe of later Writers that have made any Additions to them.

WHICH Annals, ſince I found them the Store-houſe, or Repoſitory, from whence moſt (if not all) of our Latin Hiſtorians, as well thoſe that wrote before, as ſince the Conqueſt, have borrowed the earlieſt Accounts of our Engliſh Saxon Affairs; I have by the advice of Perſons of much greater Learning and Judgment than my ſelf, rather choſe to tranſlate and give you them almoſt entire, as I find them in the Edition lately publiſhed, than to (do as moſt other Writers) cite them at ſecond Hand; not that I have omitted ſetting down whatſoever any other Authors have added to theſe Annals by way of Improvement or Illuſtration.

WHEREFORE to avoid ſtuffing my Margins with unneceſſary Quotations, I deſire my Reader once for all, to obſerve, that whereſoever he ſhall find the Lines Comma'd, (unleſs they be before ſome Speeches or Laws) they always denote the Saxon Annals, whether expreſly mentioned or not, as alſo in all other places, tho not Comma'd, where no other Writer is cited.

BUT if ſome think I have inſerted too many Names of Authors into the Body of this Hiſtory, and that it had been better omitted there, and put into the Margin, or bottom of the Pages; to this I anſwer, that intending faithfully to tranſlate theſe Annals, and to make ſuch frequent uſe of them as I have done, there could be no way to diſtinguiſh them from other Writers, but either by Letters in the Margin, or elſe by ſetting them in a different Character.

racter. But as the former would have been a conſtant and unſightly clog to the Margin, ſo the other would have looked as unhandſome in the Body, and eſpecially at the latter end of the Work, where theſe Annals alone take up ſeveral whole Pages.

AND tho in my Citations of Authors I have ſeldom quoted the Page, yet having taken what I write from thoſe who have wrote in a Chronological Method, the Reader by turning to the Years of our Lord, may eaſily find what he looks for, making ſome ſmall allowance for different Accounts; and where other Authors have not taken that Courſe, I have there quoted the Chapter or Book, and in matters of greater Moment the very Page.

BUT that even the Annals themſelves do vary from each other in Account of Time, often one, and ſometimes two or three Years, that is to be aſcribed either to the fault of the ſeveral Amanuenſes, or elſe to the different Calculations of thoſe Monks, who drew them up in the Form we now have them, as any may eaſily perceive that will give himſelf the Trouble to compare the various Readings of the ſeveral Copies of theſe Annals, lately publiſhed at Oxford by the Ingenious Mr. Edmund Gibſon.

IN the fifth and ſixth Books, as I have endeavoured faithfully to tranſlate the ſame Annals, ſo I have alſo uſed that Liberty, as not ſlaviſhly to confine my ſelf to the very Words themſelves, when either the Obſcurity or Uncouthneſs of the Phraſe would not bear a literal Tranſlation, but I thought I could give them a better turn.

AND here, as alſo in the two preceding Books, I have often added by way of Illuſtration to the Text, the preſent proper Names of Places in a Parentheſis immediately after the obſolete Saxon ones, as alſo the Titles of the Ealdormen, or Earls, Biſhops and Abbots, out of Florence of Worceſter, and other Authors, where the Annals have only given their bare Names, without telling us to what Places they belonged; and here likewiſe I would note, That in all Saxon words, where the Letter (C) is made uſe of, it is always pronounced like (K), there being no K in that Language. And as for the Saxon Names of Men made uſe of in the Annals, I have as near as I could faithfully kept to the Saxon Original, tho they often differ very much in their way and manner of ſpelling them from that of thoſe Latin Authors that tranſlate them.

HAVING thus given you a ſhort Account of the ſeveral Books into which I have divided this Volume, I will now proceed to acquaint you with the reſt of my Authors from whom I have collected it; nor will I give you only their Names, which has been done by ſo many already, but a brief Cenſure of them and their Works, and in what Time they wrote, being ſuch as lived either before or after the Conqueſt: Of the former ſort there are but few, ſince from Bede to Aſſer. Menev. there flouriſh'd no general Hiſtorian; for William of Malmsbury himſelf confeſſes, that after Bede, all liberal Studies more and more declining, thoſe that followed ſpent their Lives in Idleneſs or Silence: yet during even that Period, there were ſome Writers of this kind, viz. certain Monks in the greater Monaſteries, whoſe buſineſs it was to ſet down in ſhort, by way of Annals, the moſt remarkable Paſſages of their own Times in their own Language; nay, Learning was in that King's Reign fallen to ſo low an Ebb, that even ~~King Alfred~~ tells us in his Preface to the Saxon Verſion of Gregory's Paſtoral, That "in the " beginning of his Reign, there were few on this ſide Humber who could " underſtand their own Prayers, much leſs turn a piece of Latin into Eng- " liſh, and where then were our ſuppoſed flouriſhing Univerſities?

AND I ſhall here begin with Aſſerius Menevenſis, who was ſo called becauſe he was a Monk of Menevia or St. Davids. This was he who being ſent for by King Alfred out of Wales, aſſiſted him in his Studies, and beſides taught his Children, and others of the Nobility, Latin: after this King Alfred ſent him with others to fetch Grimbald out of Flanders into England; and after the Schools were opened at Oxford, the latter there profeſſed Divinity, and the former Grammar and Rhetorick, as you may find in the Annals of Hyde, cited in the enſuing Hiſtory.

Vid. Gotcelin in vit. Grimbaldi.

THIS Monk, being Learned above the Age in which he lived, firſt wrote the Annals that go under his Name; which having long continued in the Cottonian and other Libraries in Manuſcript, have been lately publiſhed by the Learned Dr. Gale, in his laſt Volume of Hiſtorians printed at Oxon. After theſe Annals, it is certain Aſſer alſo wrote the whole Hiſtory of King Alfred's Life, under the Title of de Geſtis Regis Ælfredi, which were firſt publiſhed by the Reverend Arch-biſhop Parker, in Saxon Characters, according to the Copy now in the Cottonian Library, and was alſo again put out by Mr. Camden in another Edition at Frankford. But it muſt be confeſſed there is ſome difference between theſe two Copies concerning the Univerſity of Oxford, which is taken notice of in this Work in its proper Place; but that the Annals abovementioned were written before his Hiſtory of King Alfred's Life, is plain, for he there refers you to thoſe Annals, which he has alſo inſerted in the Life almoſt word for word. But tho the former of theſe is continued to the Death of King Alfred, and the latter as far as the 14th Year of the Reign of K. Edward the Elder: yet it is evident that he himſelf wrote neither the one nor the other after the Year 893, being the 45th of King Alfred's Age; and this appears from the Life it ſelf, in which the Author particularly mentions it, nor could he extend the Annals any farther, becauſe they were written before he wrote the Life. This I obſerve to let the Reader underſtand, that whatever he finds farther in the Annals or Life, (the Subſtance of both which I have given him in this Volume) were continued by ſome other Hand; and as for the Annals they ſufficiently declare it; for towards the latter end, under Anno Dom. 909. you may meet with this Paſſage, hoc Anno Aſſerius Epiſcopus Sciréburnenſis obiit, which was no other than our Author himſelf: yet this muſt be farther obſerved of him, that he was ſo extreamly negligent in his Account of Time, that he begins the firſt Year of King Alfred's Reign, ſometimes at one Year of our Lord, and ſometimes at another, ſo that no Man can tell by him when it commenced.

BUT why he left off Writing ſo many Years before King Alfred died, and never finiſh'd his Life though he ſurvived him nine Years, I confeſs I know not; unleſs being preferred, about the Time when he had finiſh'd it, to the Biſhoprick of Shireburne, he left the King's Service, and going to reſide at his own See had other Buſineſs on his Hands than Writing. And that the ſame Aſſer who taught King Alfred, was alſo by him made Biſhop of Shireburne, appears from this King's Preface to the Saxon Tranſlation of St. Gregorie's Paſtoral, in which he tells you, he was aſſiſted by Plegmund his Archbiſhop, and Aſſer his Biſhop, to whom the ſaid King in his Will, (after the Archbiſhop and ſome other Biſhops) bequeathed a 100 Marks, by the Title of Aſſer Biſhop of Shireburne: from whence it is manifeſt, that the ſame Perſon who was King Alfred's Inſtructor, was alſo Biſhop of Shireburne; which Biſhoprick was certainly beſtowed on him after he had done Writing, ſince tho he mentions the Abbeys of Banwell, Ambresbury, and Exceter, to have been beſtowed upon him by the King, yet he is utterly ſilent of his being made Biſhop, which he would not ſurely have omitted, if he had been then ſo preferred; but how long he held this Biſhoprick we can ſay little poſitively, becauſe we do not find when it was firſt given him; but as for the time of his Death, not only the Annals that go under his Name, but the Saxon Chronicle alſo, places it under Anno 909. So that I think there can be no reaſonable cauſe to doubt of that.

BUT what ſhould lead ſuch a careful Chronographer as Florence of Worceſter into ſo great a Miſtake, as to place this Biſhop's Death under Anno 883, I know not, unleſs he had ſome other Copies of the Saxon Annals by him than are now extant, but the Faſti of the Saxon Kings and Biſhops publiſh'd by Sir H. Savil, at the end of William of Malmesbury, and other Writers are guilty of the like Miſtake, making this Aſſer to have ſucceeded Sighelm Biſhop of Shireburn, and to have died Anno 883; whereas it appears from our Annals, that Sighelm (whom William of Malmesbury makes to be the ſame Perſon with the Biſhop abovementioned) this very Year De Geſt. Pont. carried King Alfred's Alms to Rome, and afterwards went himſelf as far lib. 2. as India: however this Miſtake of Florence, as alſo the pretended Authority of our Welſh Chronicle, hath (as I ſuppoſe) led divers other Learned Men (and particularly Biſhop Godwin, and Arch-biſhop Uſher) into a Belief of two Aſſers both Biſhops, the one of whom died Anno 883, and the other to have been Arch-biſhop of St. Davids, and to have ſucceeded Novis: who (according to the Chronicle of that Church publiſh'd in the 2d Volume of Anglia Sacra) died Anno 872; and there immediately follows under Anno 909, Aſſerius Epiſcopus Britanniæ fit, which muſt certainly be an Errour in the Monk that wrote this Chronicle; for Aſſer himſelf in his Life of King Alfred, tells us of Hemeid Prince of South-wales, That & Nobis Archiepiſcopum Propinquum meum & me expulit, viz. from the Church of St. Davids: which word Nobis, the Learned Dr. Gale reads Novis, and ſo makes it good Senſe, that otherwiſe ſeems Non-ſenſe in the printed Copies. The falſe reading of which Word, as well as this Chronological miſtake of Florence abovementioned, led Bale into the belief that the Arch-biſhop above- Script. Britan. mentioned muſt have been that Aſſer, whom Caradoc's Chronicle (publiſh'd Cent. 2. cap. by Dr. Powel) makes to have died Anno Dom. 906. and which Authority led 25. the Lord Primate Uſher into that ſmall Miſtake in his Index Chronologicus, at the end of his Britan. Eccleſ. Antiquitat. of ſuppoſing this Aſſer to have been the Author of the Hiſtory of King Alfred, and not he who was Biſhop of Shireburn.

AND the right reading of this word Nobis in Aſſer, alſo proves the falſhood of that Welſh Annal but now mentioned: for if Novis was expell'd his Biſhoprick not long before Aſſer was ſent for by King Alfred, which was about Anno 885. then Novis could not be dead in Anno 872. as that Chronicle makes him; nor yet could Aſſer ſucceed Novis, Anno Dom. 909. for then there would have been a Vacancy of near 40 Years in that See, whereas the Saxon Annals rightly place the Death of our Aſſer Biſhop of Shireburn under this very Year.

SO that upon the whole Matter, it is the Judgment of the Reverend and Learned the now Lord Biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, “That there ne“ver was but one Aſſer, who was alſo Biſhop of Shireburn; and that as
“for this Aſſer Biſhop of St. Davids, he had never any Being in Na“ture, but in the Brain of ſome ignorant Monks, who would for the Honour “of their Church have made this Aſſer to have been Biſhop, not only of

" St. Davids, but of Britain, contrary to the Truth of all Chronology, as " well as Matter of Fact.

I have no more to remark of this Aſſer, but that Ingulph not only ſays he was Biſhop of Shireburn, but alſo Abbot of Bangor, which I find not related by Aſſer himſelf, nor by any other Author; and therefore I look upon it as a Miſtake either in Ingulph or his Tranſcriber, in writing Bangor inſtead of Banwell, which was one of thoſe Abbeys that Aſſer ſays King Alfred beſtowed upon him.

FROM this Aſſer to Ethelwerd, who calls himſelf Quæſtor, (i. e. Treaſurer) and wrote in the beginning of the Reign of King Edgar, being deſcended from the Saxon Blood-Royal by King Alfred his Great-Grandfather, there flouriſhed no Hiſtorian; nor are we indeed ſo much the better for him as I could wiſh, for unleſs it be in the right ſettling of the Reigns and Deaths of ſome of our Saxon Kings, who lived not long before him, (about which the ſeveral Copies of the Saxon Annals do differ) there is not much to be learnt from him but what is in the Annals themſelves, or elſe in the laſt mentioned Author: from both which one may perceive that he had borrowed the moſt part of what he there writes. So that partly from the affected Obſcurity of his Stile, and partly from the bad Copy from which it was printed, (being that which is now in the Cottonian Library) in many Places we do not underſtand his meaning; but as far as we are able to do it, we have given you a true Account of what he has added to this Hiſtory.

BUT either from the Lazineſs or Ignorance of the Monks, who were almoſt the only Writers of that Age, from the Time that Ethelwerd left off, to ſome Years after the Conqueſt, we meet with no Hiſtorians, except Osbern and another Monk, that is Anonymous; the former of whom writing the Lives of St. Dunſtan and St. Alphege, has afforded us ſome Paſſages relating to this Hiſtory, as has alſo the latter in his Life of St. Dunſtan, which is ſtill in Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library: But as for Osbern, he is publiſhed in the firſt Volume of Anglia Sacra. And from theſe that Age gives us none, unleſs the Author (whoſe Name we know not) that wrote that ſhort Account of the Times immediately preceding the Reign of Edward the Confeſſor, called Encomium Emmæ, until Ingulph Abbot of Croyland finiſhed the Hiſtory of that Abbey about the latter end of the Reign of William the Firſt. And tho he did not take upon him to write a Hiſtory of more Affairs than thoſe of his own Monaſtery, yet he hath by the by interſperſed many conſiderable Paſſages relating to the Publick Tranſactions of this Kingdom, which I likewiſe have here inſerted.

FROM him to Eadmerus we find no Hiſtorian; and He, only relating the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory during the Reign of William the Firſt, and his Sons William Rufus and Henry, is of no uſe to us in this Volume here publiſhed.

IN the beginning of the Reign of Henry the Firſt, we find a moſt Laborious and Diligent Chronologer, viz. Florence of Worceſter, who continuing and enlarging the Hiſtory of Marianus Scotus, hath among the various Tranſactions of the reſt of Europe, given us at the end of almoſt every Year out of the Saxon Annals, an exact Account of the Affairs of England; to which he hath alſo added divers very curious Memoirs and Illuſtrations of his own: and beſides what is printed, there is alſo in Manuſcript in the Bodleian Library, a fair and perfect Copy of this Author, which once belonged to the Monaſtery of St. Edmundsbury, to which I have been much beholding, not only for ſome things concerning that Abbey, but alſo for ſeveral choice Paſſages relating to this our Hiſtory, which are neither to be found in the printed Editions of this Author, nor any where elſe that I know of; therefore where-ever the Reader ſhall meet with any thing cited from Florence which is not found in Print, he may be aſſured it is in that Manuſcript, under the Year there ſet down in the Margin: this I mention, that the Reader may not be ſtartled, if he does not find the Paſſage I cite in the printed Copies, ſince I had not always time to compare them together.

FLORENCE was immediately followed by Simeon of Durham, who did not only Copy from him, but alſo added ſeveral Remarkable things particularly relating to the Northumbrian Kingdom, as well before as after it came under the Government of Earls. Tho Mr. Selden in his Preface to the Decem-ſcriptores, will not allow this Simeon to have been the Author of this Work, but that he was a Plagiary, and ſtole it from Turgot a Monk of the ſaid Church, who was alſo afterwards ordained Biſhop of St. Andrews in Scotland; and Simeon only adding ſome things to it of his own, took the whole Honour to himſelf: his Hiſtory reaches no farther than 1129. but was continued by John Prior of Hagulſtad to Anno 1154.

TO whom we may adjoin Richard (a Monk of the ſame Monaſtery) his Hiſtory of the Church of Durham, who has interſperſed many excellent Paſſages concerning the ſame Northern Story. Here likewiſe we may add the Chronicle of the Abbey of Mailroſs, which tho wrote by the Abbot of Dundraimon, was certainly collected out of ſome much antienter Annals of that Monaſtery which was then deſtroyed; and theſe together with the laſt mentioned Authors, have helped us to make up the Succeſſion of the Northumbrian Kings after Eardulf, that was expelled his Kingdom Anno 806. from whom our common Writers ſuppoſe there was an Interregnum for the ſpace of above ſixty Years, tho by thoſe above-named it appears to have been otherwiſe, as you may ſee in the Tables at the end of the laſt Book.

AFTER theſe flouriſhed William of Malmesbury, who finiſhed his Hiſtory in the Reign of King Stephen; but certainly he began it long before, viz. in the Reign of Henry the Firſt. To which Learned Monk, being one of the beſt Writers both for Judgment and Stile of that Age, I muſt own my ſelf obliged for the beſt and choiceſt Paſſages in this Volume.

TO him ſucceeded Henry Arch-Deacon of Huntington, who wrote a Hiſtory of the Kings of England, as well before as after the Conqueſt, and retiring to Rome lived there for ſome time for that purpoſe. He deduced his Hiſtory almoſt to the end of K. Stephen, and writing moſt commonly by way of Annals, tranſcribed many things out of Florence of Worceſter; and was of ~~that~~ great Reputation, that Geoffrey of Monmouth, who was his such Cotemporary, recommends the Engliſh Hiſtory to be written by his Pen, as he does the Britiſh to be continued by Caradoc of Lancarvon, who wrote a Welſh Chronicle as far as his own Time; the Subſtance whereof I have here likewiſe given you, as it was put out by Dr. Powell, to which I have alſo added ſeveral remarkable Paſſages that were deſigned in a new Edition of the ſame Work, to be publiſhed from the Manuſcripts of the Learned Antiquary Mr. Robert Vaughan, by Mr. Ellis late of Jeſus College in Oxon, but which were never finiſhed. And I have likewiſe inſerted divers choice Notes, that I gathered from another Manuſcript of the ſame Author's, relating to the Chronology and Actions of the Britiſh Princes, which he wrote for the Satisfaction of the Lord Primate Uſher, and from him is now in my Poſſeſſion. And I ſuppoſe no Ingenious Britiſh Antiquary will think this Performance unneceſſary, ſince he will here find the Subſtance of all that is contained in Caradoc's Chronicle, together with a great many conſiderable Additions from the Manuſcripts abovementioned, as alſo ſome others gathered from two MS. Copies of the Chronicles of Wales, the one in the Cottonian Library, the other in the Exchequer, written at the end of one of the Volumes of Doomeſday; for the peruſal of which I ſtand obliged to the Reverend Dr. Gale.

H. Huntingdon was followed by Rog. Hoveden a ſecular Prieſt of Oxford, and was Domeſtick Clerk or Secretary to Henry the Second; he ſeems to have chiefly tranſcribed from Simeon of Durham, as to the Affairs before the Conqueſt, as he does from William of Malmesbury and other Authors, as well as his own Obſervations for thoſe that occur'd afterwards to his own Time, continuing his Hiſtory to the beginning of King John's Reign.

THE next we come to, are thoſe Authors contained in that noble Volume, called the Decem-Scriptores, ſuch as Ailred, Abbot de Rievalle, who wrote concerning the Kings of England ſo far as King Henry the 2d. in whoſe Time he lived; as alſo concerning the Life and Miracles of Edward the Confeſſor, from whom I have taken divers memorable Paſſages relating to the Life of that King, as well as to his Predeceſſors, omitting his Fables and Legends in which he does too much abound.

AFTER him follows Radulphus de Diceto Dean of St. Pauls, London, who flouriſhed in the Reign of King John, about the Year 1210. he was eſteemed a very accompliſhed Hiſtorian, and an indefatigable Collector in his Time of things not only before, but after the Conqueſt.

I have alſo taken ſome few Paſſages from William Thorn a Monk of Canterbury, who wrote an entire Hiſtory of the Affairs of his own Monaſtery of St. Auguſtin down to the beginning of King Richard the Second, in whoſe Reign he lived.

AFTER whom we had for a long time no printed Hiſtorians of the Times before the Conqueſt, till that in the Decem-Scriptores, which goes under the Name of John Brompton Abbot of Jorvaulx in Richmondſhire; tho Mr. Selden has ſhewn us in his Preface to that Volume, that he was rather the Purchaſer, than Author of this Chronicle, which he left to his own Abbey: he is ſuppoſed to have lived in the time of Edward the Third, but the Hiſtory concludes with the Death of Richard the Firſt.

BUT the ſaid Reverend Dr. Gale farther obſerves of him, “That he intended to continue Geoffrey of Monmouth, as appears in the Preface, and in Col. 1153. as alſo that he took much from Benedictus Abbas (ſtill in Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library) and not from Roger Hoveden; for where a Fault or Omiſſion is found in Benedictus, the ſame is here found alſo, but not ſo in Hoveden: e. g. Benedictus wanted the Seal of the King of Sicily, and ſo did Bromton, till it was added from ſome other Copy, and not out of Hoveden, for the Seals differ, and ſome Copies of Hoveden have it not at all. And tho the Compiler of this Hiſtory ſeems to have lived in the Time of Richard I. as himſelf ſeems to intimate, yet Col. 967. it mentions Richard the Third, which muſt have been added to continue down the Genealogy of our Kings, as is often done in antient Chronicles by ſome later Hand. But the Learned Doctor farther ſuppoſes this Chronicle to have been written by one John Brompton, who (as the Doctor found in an old Manuſcript Year-Book, or Collection of Reports of the Reign of King Edward the Firſt) was a Juſtice Itinerant about that Time; which Conjecture is alſo confirmed by his careful inſerting the Antient Saxon Laws into this Chronicle: This as it was not done by any before him, ſo neither does it ſavour of the Monk.

THIS is the more worthy taking notice of, becauſe Sir William Dugdale hath omitted this John Brompton in his Catalogue of Judges Itinerant, at the end of his Origines Juridiciales.

TO this Hiſtorian ſucceeds Henry de Knyghton Canon of Leiceſter, who wrote his Hiſtory de Eventibus Angliæ, beginning with King Edgar, and ending with the Reign of Richard the Second.

BUT the Reader may be pleaſed to take notice, that in theſe two laſt Authors are found many Paſſages which are in none of the more Antient Writers; and ſince moſt of them relate to Cuſtoms and Terms that had their Original after the coming in of the Normans, therefore they may with good Reaſon be ſuſpected to have been borrowed from ſome common Stories or Traditions that then paſſed up and down for current.

NOR can we here omit ſeveral other Pieces of leſs Bulk and Note, publiſhed ſince that Volume laſt mentioned, containing the Chronicles and Hiſtories of divers Cathedrals and Abbeys, ſuch as are the Annals of the Abbey of Wincheſter, &c. which have been publiſhed from the Cottonian and other Libraries, in Monaſticon Anglicanum, and the firſt Volume of Anglia Sacra, lately publiſhed by the late Learned and Induſtrious Mr. Wharton.

TO theſe likewiſe may be added the Hiſtories of the Monaſteries of Ely and Ramſey, as alſo of Glaſtenbury, by William of Malmesbury, from whom we have taken ſeveral Things, not only relating to that Abbey, but the General Hiſtory of England: nor can I omit the Hiſtory of John of Wallingford, whom Matthew Paris mentions in his Lives of the Abbots of St. Albans; as the 21ſt Abbot of St. Albans, he wrote the Hiſtory of the Kings of England as far as the 42d of King Henry the Third; the firſt Part of which down to the Norman Conqueſt, hath been publiſhed in the aforeſaid laſt Volume at Oxford by the Learned Dr. Gale. From all which laſt mentioned, tho mingled with abundance of Monkiſh Traſh, we have here and there excerpted ſeveral excellent Remarks.

WE have alſo ſometimes made uſe of Ranulph Higden his Polychronicon, who was a Monk of Cheſter, the firſt Part of which is publiſhed alſo by the ſaid Dr. Gale as far as the Conqueſt; and Matthew a Monk of Weſtminſter, his Flores Hiſtoriarum: theſe Authors being Cotemporaries, and collecting to the Reign of Edward the Third, from all the reſt of the Antient Writers abovementioned, I have ſeldom uſed but as ſubſidiary Helps, when the Paſſages they relate are not to be found any where elſe, ſeveral other Authors they borrowed from, being now loſt, or very rare to be met with.

HAVING now done with our printed Authors, I proceed to thoſe that continue ſtill in Manuſcript, in the Bodleian and Cottonian Libraries; and alſo in thoſe of Lambeth, Greſham College, and the Heraulds Office; ſuch as are John of Tinmouth his Hiſtoria Aurea, Johannes Caſtorius (in Engliſh, Beaver*) his Hiſtory of the Kings of* England, and John Rouſe of Warwick his Collections on the ſame Subject; together with above forty or fifty nameleſs Authors which I have peruſed, to ſee what I could find in any of them that had not been taken notice of by others: but how little they have anſwered my Expectations, the ſmall Additions I have made from them I hope will ſatisfy the unprejudiced Reader; and for any that are otherwiſe, if they pleaſe to take the ſame Pains that I have done, I wiſh their Labours may be better requited.

BUT as for the Extracts of Eccleſiaſtical Canons and Laws, which I have inſerted at the end of divers King's Reigns, I have faithfully tranſcribed them out of Sir Henry Spelman's firſt Volume of Britiſh Councils, and Mr. Lambard's Archaionomia, under their reſpective Years; and have alſo compared and corrected them in a great Part from the Manuſcript Notes of the Learned Junius, at the end of the Cambridg Edition of Bede, which is in the Bodleian Library; or elſe by another Latin Manuſcript Verſion of the Induſtrious Mr. Somner's. And I do not know of any other Saxon Laws, unleſs there be ſome of King Cnute's, which remain as yet in Manuſcript untranſlated in the Bodleian Library, as alſo in the Hands of Dr. Gale, as I am well informed: I hope they may be one day added to a new Edition of Mr. Lambard's moſt uſeful Work.

THUS having gone through all the chiefeſt Engliſh Hiſtorians, both in Print and Manuſcript, that I know of, relating to the Times before the Conqueſt, which I think are as many, and of as good Credit as any Countrey in Europe can ſhew in the like ſpace of Time; it may be expected I ſhould ſay ſomething in their Vindication, ſince I find they have been attacked in a poſthumous Treatiſe, long ſince written by a Learned Civilian, Sir Thomas Craig, in Latin, in anſwer to what Mr. Hollingſhead has publiſhed concerning the Homage that was due from the Kings of Scotland to thoſe of England; and is lately tranſlated into Engliſh by the Ingenious Mr. Ridpath: and as I ſhall here faithfully give you his Arguments againſt the Antiquity and Credit of our Writers, ſo I hope I ſhall return ſuch Anſwers to them as will ſatisfy all impartial Readers.

Vid. Hollinſhead. Lib. I.

HIS firſt Objection is, "That from the Death of Bede, (whoſe Credit, he "ſays, he will every where preſerve entire,) the Engliſh have no certain Hi"ſtory nor Writer to the Reign of King Henry the Firſt, except that Frag"ment of Ethelwerd's; for (ſays he) I do not acknowledg that Fragment "of Ingulphus, who preceded Ethelwerd twenty Years, as an Hiſtory; nor "Aſſerius Menevenſis, who wrote only concerning the Tranſactions of "his own King Alfred. And leſt he ſhould be thought to affirm any thing raſhly, "He brings William of Malmeſbury to witneſs the Matter, ſaying, "That all the Memorials of Tranſactions from the Death of Bede to his "own Time, which was in the Reign of Henry I. about 1142. were utter"ly loſt; nor was there any who followed that Study, or indeavoured to pur"ſue the thread of Hiſtory till himſelf.

Scotland's Soveraignty aſſerted, p.39,40.

Lib. I. fol.23.

NOW to give an Anſwer to this Learned Advocate, and take him Point by Point as he goes on; in the firſt Place I am ſorry to find a Perſon, otherwiſe every ways Able and Skillful in his own Profeſſion, ſo ignorant in our Engliſh Hiſtorians, ſince if he had not been ſo, he could not have committed almoſt as many Miſtakes as he hath wrote Lines: for in the firſt Place he calls Ingulph and Ethelwerd two Fragments, whereas if he had been pleaſed to have looked upon either of them, he would have found them entire Pieces ſo far as they went, (and we call Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, Saluſt, Livy, Hiſtorians, not Fragments, altho each of them be imperfect) only the Edition that was then publiſhed of Ingulph wanted the Laws of William the Conqueror, and ſome few Sheets at the Concluſion, which have been ſince added.

Vid. Vol. I. Script. Ang. Edit. Oxon.

AND whereas he ſays, that Ingulph preceded Ethelwerd twenty Years, he is ſo far from being in the right of that, that the direct contrary is true; for Ingulph lived and wrote above one hundred Years after Ethelwerd had finiſhed his Hiſtory with King Edgar's Reign, whoſe Eulogy he only gives us in barbarous Verſe.

AND as for what the Advocate ſays concerning William of Malmesbury; he much miſrepreſents the Senſe of this Author, who does not affirm that there were no Memorials from the Death of Bede to his Time, but the contrary; for he mentions the Saxon Annals in his Proem in theſe words, Sunt ſanè quædam vetuſtatis Indicia, patrio Sermone, & chronico more per annos Domini ordinata: alſo in his Book de Antiquitate Glaſtoniæ (publiſhed by Dr. Gale, as above) he citeth them as good Authority, Tradunt Annales bonæ credulitatis, &c. Nay, Sir Thomas Craig himſelf (I ſuppoſe through Forgetfulneſs) has allowed no leſs than three Writers of part of our Hiſtory, who lived before Malmesbury, as you may ſee above: and therefore he muſt alſo be underſtood only in this Senſe, that till himſelf there was none had undertaken an entire Latin Body of Engliſh Hiſtory; for he, diſtinguiſhing between an Hiſtory and Annals, did not reckon (it ſeems) theſe Saxon Annals as ſuch, though he often mentions them by the Name of the Engliſh Chronicles; being, as I ſaid before, the ground-Work upon which that Author, as well as others that followed him, built their Hiſtory: and theſe Annals remaining in Manuſcript till long after Sir Thomas Craig*'s Death, gave him perhaps occaſion to affirm in the ſame Place, "That there is nothing of certainty to be found in the* Britiſh Hiſtory from 734. which was the Year of Bede*'s Death, to the Year* 957. but all things were founded upon the Rumours of Antient Men, and it may be old Wives Fables, which being collected together into one Book, and put in a Latin Dreſs, made up as it were the ſhadow of a Hiſtory, from whence Hollingſhead does nevertheleſs bring moſt certain Arguments to eſtabliſh his fictitious Homage.

THIS Point concerning the Homage I ſhall not take upon me here to decide: but tho I confeſs there is no expreſs mention of it in the Annals, yet I muſt needs ſay there is ſomewhat to be met with in them that comes very near it; for under Anno 924. they relate thus of King Edward the Elder, "That the King and whole Nation of the Scots choſe him in Patrem & Dominum, in the Latin Verſion, i.e. for their Father and Lord; which is word for word the ſame with the Saxon Original, which I omit becauſe not commonly underſtood or read in that Character. But becauſe he ſuppoſes that Florence of Worceſter was the firſt Author that wrote this Homage and Fealty, therefore he muſt be the firſt that ever mentioned the Submiſſion of the Scotiſh King to the King of England: I deſire thoſe of Sir Thomas his Opinion to tell me, tho the formal Ceremonies of Homage and Fealty (which in different Ages and divers Countries, even where the Feudal Law was obtained, were very different) were not brought up till after the Norman William came hither; yet what could thoſe words in Patrem & Dominum ſignify, but ſuch an Acknowledgment or Dependance upon a Superior Lord as was tantamount? And it is the more remarkable, becauſe this is mentioned above 20 Years before. The ſame Annals relate, that King Edmund the Younger, Son to King Edward, beſtowed Cumberland upon Malcolm King of Scots, viz. Anno 945. on condition, that he ſhould ſerve him in his Expeditions by Sea and Land, for which alone the Scotiſh Writers will allow this Homage to have been due.

Craig. ubi ſupra. p. 47.

AND in the Year following we find in the ſame Annals, that K. Eadred, Brother to Edmund, having reduced all Northumberland into his Power, (which then took in almoſt all the Low-Lands of Scotland, as far as Edinburgh) thereupon Scoti etiam ei juramenta præſtiterunt, ſeſe velle quicquid is vellet, i. e. the Scotiſh Nation (by which I ſuppoſe muſt be underſtood derſtood the King as well as the People*) took an Oath to King* Eadred to perform whatſoever he ſhould pleaſe to command them. But that Florence of Worceſter underſtood this to be an Oath of Fealty, appears by his Paraphraſe ~~of~~ upon theſe words in the Annals thus, & Edredus à Scotis, ut ſibi fideles eſſent, juramentum accepit.

Lib.4. cap.24.

BUT that, if not Homage, yet ſomewhat very like it, was rendered in that Age by the Kings of Scotland to thoſe of England, for the beſt part of what is now called the Lowlands, may appear from the Teſtimony of John of Wallingford, who in his Hiſtory relates, that Keneth King of Scots received Lothian from King Edgar under the Condition of doing Homage to himſelf and his Succeſſors: which, if it had not then the direct Ceremony of Homage, which perhaps came in with the Normans, yet that it was ſomewhat very near it, John Fordun the antienteſt Scotiſh Hiſtorian, acknowledges in theſe words, That King Edmund (viz. of England*) gave the Province of* Cumberland to Malcolm King of Scots, ſub fidelitate Juramenti; and it was afterwards agreed between the ſaid King Edmund and King Malcolm, that Prince Indulf his next Heir, and all the future Heirs of Scotland ſucceſſively, ſhould pay to King Edmund and his Succeſſors for the ſame, Homagium, & fidelitatis Sacramentum: ſo that if our Engliſh Writers have been miſtaken in calling that Submiſſion, which the Kings and Princes of Scotland then payed to England, Homage, you may here ſee the moſt Antient Scotiſh Hiſtorian guilty of the ſame Error: which was indeed an Oath of Fidelity, if not the ſame, yet very like what the Scotiſh Kings afterwards took when they did Homage to our Kings of England after the Conqueſt.

HAVING ſaid thus much, I ſhall now leave it to the Reader's Judgment, when he has gone through our Annals, to conſider, whether this Author's Cenſure of our Engliſh Hiſtory, from the Year 734. when Bede ended his, to the Year 957. be juſt, that they were only things, as he ſays, founded upon the Rumours of Antient Men, and it may be old Wives Fables, and ſo being collected together in one Book, dreſs'd up in Latin, made up as it were the ſhadow of a Hiſtory.

Idem. pa. 41.

AS alſo whether what Florence is cited by the Author to ſay, “ That after Bede*'s Death the* Engliſh Hiſtory ceaſed, and that for his own part he had left things to Poſterity, either as he found them in the Text of the Engliſh Chronicles, or as he had them from the relations of Men worthy of Credit, or heard and ſaw them himſelf; deſerves that raſh Cenſure, not only concerning theſe Annals now publiſhed, but of Florence himſelf, viz. as to what concerned the Text of the Engliſh Chronicles, he mentioned them that he might deceive his Reader with the greater Facility: whereas Florence was accounted always a Writer of unqueſtionable Diligence and Veracity, as appears by the ſeveral Teſtimonies of Learned Men before his Hiſtory.

Id. ibid.

BUT the reaſon of this Author's Triumph before the Victory, was, that he did not believe any ſuch thing as a Saxon Chronicle could be found; for ſays he immediately after, “ If there were any Chronicles of thoſe Times, ſeeing Florence lived about the Year 1148. they muſt ſtill remain in the Archives, which hitherto no Engliſh Author did ever alledg, or hath been able to demonſtrate; for that Chronicle, as is obſerved by the Prologue, did only ſet down the number of Years. And ſo he proceeds to invalidate the Credit of Florence of Worceſter, as if he had had no Voucher to warrant his Chronicle.

BUT I hope this Tranſlation I here preſent you with, will ſatisfy all ordinary Readers, that the Saxon Annals do contain much more than the bare numbers of Years, and the Edition firſt publiſhed by Mr. Wheelock in Saxon and Latin from two Copies in Sir Robert Cotton's, and Bennet College Libraries, have long ſince convinced all Learned Men, that we really had ſuch Monuments in our Archives, which have been alſo farther confirmed as to the Truth of it, from two other Manuſcript Copies, given by Arch-biſhop Laud to the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and lately publiſhed together with thoſe abovementioned, by the aforeſaid Mr. Edmund Gibſon; moſt of which Copies belonged to ſeveral antient Monaſteries, and I doubt not but many more of them were loſt at their Diſſolution in Henry the Eighth's Time, or carried over Seas; for we find Lazius in his Book de Migratione Gentium, quotes ſeveral of them. And it's evident that our Annals ſometimes follow not Tradition only, but alſo old written Hiſtories, and perhaps Latin Writers, as may appear by the Actions of Athelſtane and Eadmund, An. 938, and 942. But for the ſupport of their Authority I refer the Reader to this Author's own Country-man John Fordun, where he tells us in his Prologue to his Scotiſh Hiſtory, “He had heard it was very well ordered in England, that every Monaſtery of Royal Foundation ſhould have its particular Writer, who was Chronologically to ſet down all the Memorable things which happened in each King's Reign, either in their own or Neighbouring Kingdoms; and that at the next Great Council after the Death of every reſpective King, each of thoſe Chronographers met there, and produced whatſoever they had ſo remarked; and that ſome of the moſt diſcreet Perſons in the ſaid Council who were beſt skilled in ſuch Matters, being choſen for that purpoſe, ſhould examine thoſe Memorials, and by comparing them together ſhould extract a brief Chronicle from them all, which was to be preſerved in the Libraries of thoſe Monaſteries, as Authentick Annals to be relied on by Poſterity, that ſo the remembrance of thoſe publick Affairs of the Kingdom might not be loſt, or devoured by the Ruſt of Time.

WHICH Paſſage had Sir Thomas Craig but carefully conſidered, he would have had no reaſon to doubt whether we had had any Chronicles of thoſe times remaining in our Archives, and whether William of Malmesbury, and all the reſt of our Hiſtorians, have blindly followed Florence of Worceſter into an Error, as Cattel do their Leader that break over a Ditch. Id. p. 47.

BUT if our Saxon Annals were not a good Foundation for ſucceeding Hiſtorians to build upon, I deſire to know what Credit the Antient Greek and Roman Authors can claim with Men of that ſcrupulous Temper, ſince they had nothing but ſuch ſhort Annals or Chronicles preſerved in their Archives, (beſides Traditions, and the common Fame of their Anceſtors) from whence to compoſe the particular Hiſtories of thoſe Common-Wealths they treat of; ſuch as were the Libri Lintei preſerved in the Capitol, from whence Livy drew the moſt antient Memorials for the writing his Roman Hiſtory.

AND tho there is ſome difference to be found between the ſeveral Copies of theſe Annals as to the Calculation of Years, and ſome particular Matters that are ſometimes inſerted in one, and omitted in another; yet the Ingenious Author of the Preface before it, has given the World a ſatisfactory Anſwer as to this Matter, which is, “That as to the general Affairs of the whole Kingdom they all agree well enough, tho indeed as to foreign Tranſ-

“ actions, or ſome few Paſſages relating to their own private Monaſteries, “ there may be ſome Additions that are not to be met with in the reſt; as may be obſerv'd from thoſe called the Canterbury and Laudean Copies in the Bodleian Library.

SO I ſhall leave it upon the whole Matter to the Reader to conſider, whether the Author has made good his Challenge, viz. That the Engliſh were not able to produce one approved Writer of their own Countrey, who compoſed any Story or Hiſtory from the Death of Bede, to the Time of Henry the Second; tho I ſuppoſe he meant the Firſt, however it is unluckily printed twice the Second in one Page.

BUT to come to this Author's ſecond Objection againſt our Engliſh Hiſtorians, the ſubſtance of which is, “ That the Writers as well before as af- “ ter the Conqueſt were Monks, who being dead to the World, have no right “ of giving a Legal Evidence, it being expreſly forbid by the Canon Law to “ concern themſelves in ſecular Matters; and alſo that by reaſon of their ſo- “ litary Lives, they ought very ſeldom to be entruſted in publick Affairs, “ ſeeing they are no competent Judges concerning them: for it was not very “ probable that either the Secrets of Princes, or things belonging to the State, “ were ever communicated to them, otherwiſe than by common Report, “ ſeeing they were kept at the greateſt diſtance from all manner of Action, “ and do oftentimes embrace things doubtful as certain, and Fictions for “ Matter of Fact; and that therefore this feigned Homage muſt of neceſ- “ ſity fall to the Ground, for which there is no better Evidence than that of “ a Monk; for it will not be admitted as a good Concluſion, that becauſe a “ Monk ſays ſo, therefore it is true.

THIS Argument may as eaſily be retorted upon him thus, That as a thing is not true becauſe a Monk writes it, ſo neither is it falſe for that reaſon alone; for tho Monks are by the Canon Law forbid medling with Secular Affairs, and may not perhaps be admitted for good Witneſſes in Civil Cauſes, yet is this but a meer Cavil as to the Point in Queſtion, ſince that was not the intent of the Canon to forbid them the writing either of Civil or Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtories; and Bede himſelf (whoſe Credit this Author ſays he will not impair) was a Monk, as were alſo Marianus Scotus (whom he alloweth and would have to be taken for his own Countrey-Man) Sigebertus, Hermannus Contractus, and almoſt all the Famous Chronographers of thoſe Times, who flouriſhed in our Neighbouring Nations as well as our own; and that they were not of ſuch retired Lives as not to have Memorials ſent them of publick Actions, appears by the aforeſaid Citation out of Fordun, concerning the manner of writing our Engliſh Annals in the Monaſteries, which, as he tells us, were ſuperviſed afterwards by ſome appointed of the Great Council of the Kingdom. And that ſome of the Monks after the Conqueſt were in great Reputation for their faithful Accounts, appears by the great Credit given to Florence of Worceſter and William of Malmesbury in thoſe times; the laſt of whom dedicated his Hiſtory to Robert Earl of Glouceſter Natural Son to King Henry the Firſt: and Matthew Paris was of ſo great Eſteem, that we learn from himſelf, that King Henry the Third gave him particular Directions for inſerting into his Hiſtory ſeveral conſiderable Paſſages relating to his own Reign: ſo far were the Princes of that Age from being of this Author's Opinion, that Monks were no wiſe fit to write Hiſtory, nor to be credited when they had done.

BUT if no Credit muſt be given to the Memorials of Monks, I deſire to know, what will become of the ſo much talked of Scotiſh Annals that were kept in the Iſle of Jona or Ilcomhil, and of their famous Book of the Abbey of Paſely, from whence Hector Boethius pretends to have derived the principal Matters that make up the firſt part of his Hiſtory? Nay, what will become of their moſt creditable Writer John Fordun, who bottoms much of his Hiſtory on the Legends of S. Brendane, and others?

NOR is there any difference that I know of between theſe Books now mentioned and our Saxon Annals, but that theſe are to be ſeen (I mean the Originals) in our Libraries, and are alſo publiſhed both in Saxon and Latin, and are here tranſlated into Engliſh in this enſuing Hiſtory, whilſt theirs are not; and if Hector Boethius ever ſaw them, is more than we can be ſure of, ſince a moſt Reverend Doctor (and now Biſhop of our Church) hath produced very good Reaſons to render it highly ſuſpicious, that there never were any ſuch Books at all; and if ſo, I wonder what will become of the Credit of all their Antient Scotiſh Hiſtory, and their long Bedroll of Kings before Fergus the Second.

AS for the reſt of this Author's Objections, I ſhall be very ſhort in my Anſwers to them.

THE third of which is, that our Authors are not to be credited, becauſe they are Engliſh-men. If this were of any weight, I might turn his own Cannon upon him, and tell him, no more are his Writers who deny this Homage, becauſe they are Scots-men: and if neither are to be believed, I would fain have any Learned Gentleman of that Nation to ſhew me a Foreign Hiſtorian who lived near thoſe Times, that denied there was any ſuch thing.

AS for his laſt, that they were Enemies, it is yet more trivial; ſince I have here made uſe of no Authorities but what were written before the Conqueſt, when there was no War at all between the two Nations, but rather a ſtrict Amity or League againſt their Common Enemy the Danes; or elſe from Florence of Worceſter and William of Malmesbury, Authors that lived and wrote (as hath been already ſhewn) in the very Times when thoſe Homages they mention were done; which whether they were for Scotland it ſelf, or elſe for Northumberland and Cumberland, which they then held of the Kings of England, ſhall be further conſidered in my next Volume, if God ſhall permit me to finiſh it.

BUT I deſire the Reader to take notice, that finding the Engliſh-Saxon Chronicle to be very dry in many places, it giving us only an account of the Succeſſion of their Kings, and the Battels they fought againſt one another, without ever telling us what were the Grounds of their falling out; the Monks of thoſe Times, for want of Civil Affairs, or (as we call them) thoſe of the Cabinet, filling up their Annals only with Fighting and Devotion, I ſaw it neceſſary for me to purſue in great part the Method that Bede had laid down throughout the whole Work, and to inſert ſome things relating to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, to make this Hiſtory more uſeful, as well as diverting, to all ſort of Perſons.

AND therefore being ſenſible of the near Conjunction of the Civil with the Eccleſiaſtical State, which were often united into one Mycel-Synod, or Great Council of the whole Nation, wherein were made not only Civil Laws, but alſo Eccleſiaſtical Canons or Conſtitutions, reſpecting Religion and Diſcipline, as well as Reformation of Manners, I have ſet down both the

the one and the other whenever I thought they contained any Matter of more than ordinary Notice: and as for thoſe Synods or Councils which were wholly Eccleſiaſtical, though I have not always expreſly given you all the Canons they made, yet I have not failed to refer the Reader for his farther Satiſfaction, to that rich Treaſury of this kind of Knowledg, Sir Henry Spelman's firſt Volume of Councils.

TO which I have likewiſe not only added the Succeſſion of ſome Biſhops, and Abbots, as far as I have found them in the Saxon Annals, but have inſerted from William of Malmesbury and other Writers, whatever I could find relating to them, or any other of the ſame Order, remarkable for Learning or Piety; eſpecially the Arch-biſhops of Canterbury and York, whoſe Succeſſions I have often ſupplied from other Authors, wherein the Annals were ſilent.

NOR have I omitted the Foundations of the greater Monaſteries, as I met with them in the Annals, ~~ne~~ more than the other Foundations of the ſame kind ſet down in Monaſticon Anglicanum, yet ſtill confining my ſelf to ſuch of them as were valued at 500 l. per annum or more, at the time of their Diſſolution. And I hope no Man that is a Lover of Antiquity, or the Honour of his Nation, will look upon this as needleſs, any more than the Foundations of our two famous Univerſities, of which I have here given you the earlieſt Accounts I can find. any NEITHER do I ſuppoſe it will prove tedious, if I have here likewiſe put down the Stories of ſome Miracles related by Bede and other Monks, ſince I have done it with Moderation, and where the Contexture of this Work would have ſeem'd Lame and Imperfect without it; and I only give them you juſt as I find them, leaving every one to make what Judgment he pleaſes of them.

I confeſs I am not ſatisfied that divers of thoſe Relations ſwallowed by Bede and other Authors of Note, are true, they having been ſince diſcovered by Men of great Learning and Judgment, to carry evident Marks of Forgery along with them; ſuch as is that of Joſeph of Arimathea his Preaching the Goſpel in England, which hath been examined with great Accuracy by the Reverend and Learned Dr. Stillingfleet, now Lord Biſhop of Worceſter, in his Origines Britannicæ; ſo that though I have both from him, and others, ſaid ſomewhat upon that Subject, yet I muſt ſtill refer the Reader to the Book it ſelf, if he deſires farther Satiſfaction either in gratifying his Curioſity, or informing his Judgment. Chap. 1.

BUT to the foregoing Relations, I muſt needs here add that of the Martyrdom of St. Alban, which though the Learned Author laſt named, in his ſecond Chapter of his ſaid Book, hath with great Learning proved it, if not true, yet at leaſt probable; I hope he will not take it amiſs if I farther examine the Certainty of this Story: for notwithſtanding it be ſet down in the old Roman Martyrologies, and his Suffering here is alſo mentioned by Conſtantius, Presbyter, who lived above one hundred Years before Bede, from whom I have borrowed this; yet I muſt Ingenuouſly confeſs, I do not ſee how it can conſiſt with the Eccleſiaſtical or Civil Hiſtory of thoſe Times, in which it is ſuppoſed to have happened. For Bede places the Suffering of St. Alban during the Perſecution of Diocleſian, and after the Recovery of Britain from the Vſurpation of Allectus. Lib. 1. c. 6.

WHEREAS it is evident from Chronology, that Carauſius the Vſurper, having Anno Dom. 286. rebelled againſt the Roman Emperors, held Britain under his Power for near ſeven Years, and then was murdered by the Uſurper Allectus, who alſo governed near three Years longer, till about the middle of the Reign of the Emperor Diocleſian; who having conſtituted Conſtantius Chlorus, Cæſar, ſent Aſclepiodotus as his Lieutenant into Britain, (being then part of his Share, as were all the Provinces on this ſide the Alpes) in the Year 295. and he having ſlain Allectus in Battel, governed here ſome ſhort Time, till Conſtantius himſelf coming over in Perſon, reigned as Cæſar or Auguſtus ſo long as he lived: During all which Revolutions we do not read of any Perſecution in Britain, as the Learned Mr. Dodwell in his Diſſertationes Cyprianæ has very well obſerved, and conſequently St. Alban could not ſuffer Martyrdom between the Years 303. and 305. or at any other Time where the Roman Martyrologies place it. Diſſert. Cypr. 11. de paucitate Martyrum, §. 75.

AND this I think is clear from the Teſtimonies of two Authors of unqueſtionable Credit, who lived in the very Time when this (if at all) muſt have happened. The firſt of theſe is Euſebius, who in his eighth Book of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, giving a Character of Conſtantius the Emperor, hath theſe words, viz. "He always ſhewed himſelf moſt benign and affable "towards all Men, which appeared by this, that he was no ways partaker of "the Perſecution raiſed againſt us (i. e.) Chriſtians: but having pre"ſerved the Worſhippers of the true God free and unhurt from all Accu"ſations, and not having ſo much as deſtroyed the Buildings of our "Churches, or acted any thing againſt thoſe of our Religion, he at laſt "attained a quiet and happy End. To which we may alſo add another Paſſage in his firſt Book, cap. 8. but it being more tedious, and not ſo expreſs and full as the Place now cited, I therefore omit it. Cap. 13.

TO whom we may alſo ſubjoin Lactantius, who in his Treatiſe de Mortibus Perſecutorum, differs indeed from Euſebius about his demoliſhing the Chriſtian Churches, yet he agrees with him in the main, that no Chriſtians ſuffered Death in Conſtantius his Diviſion or Share of the Empire. This Author's words I have thus tranſlated. "But "Conſtantius, leſt he ſhould ſeem to diſſent from the Edicts of the "greater Emperors, tho he permitted the Meeting-places of the Chri"ſtian Aſſemblies, that could be rebuilt, to be pulled down, yet he ſtill "preſerved the true Temple of God, which is in the Bodies of Men, ſafe "and inviolate. And this is farther confirmed by Optatus de Schiſmate, as alſo by Zozomen in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, who both reciting the Addreſs of the Donatiſts to the Emperor Conſtantine, do acknowledg that his Father never ſhed the Blood of any Chriſtian. Lib. 1. Lib. 2.

AND even this ſmall difference between theſe two Authors may be thus reconciled, by ſuppoſing that tho he connived at the deſtroying of the Chriſtian Churches by the vulgar Pagans, yet he no ways commanded it, much leſs approved of it when it was done. So that there could be no Perſecution in Gaul or Britain, (both which were part of his Province) during the Time that he continued either as Cæſar or Emperor, and the Perſecution ceaſed Anno Dom. 308. not long before his Death.

BUT ſince a Learned and Ingenious French-man, Theodorus Ruinartus, in his Preface to a late Treatiſe, entituled, de Actibus Martyrum, put out with a new Edition of this Work of Lactantius in Holland, hath endeavoured to juſtify the Martyrologies againſt this Opinion of Mr. Dodwell*'s, I think it very convenient to take ſome notice of what he there alledges; and his chief Argument againſt theſe plain Authorities, is, that the Emperor* Maximian was in Gaul during ſome part of this Perſecution, and that then the Power of Conſtantius being only as Cæſar, was ſuſpended by the Preſence of the Emperor himſelf; and conſequently the Perſecution was carried on in that part of the Empire, notwithſtanding Conſtantius his private diſlike of it, or perhaps oppoſing it as much as he durſt.

BUT in return to this ſeeming Argument, we ſhall firſt obſerve, that neither Euſebius nor Lactantius, mention any Perſecution in Gaul or Britain during all this Time, which it is highly probable they would have done, had it been carried on with the like Fury in theſe as it was in the other parts of the Empire. So that I do not find this Author clearly makes out, that the Emperor Maximian was in Gaul during this Perſecution, by any other Teſtimonies than thoſe Martyrologies themſelves, whoſe Credit we have juſt reaſon to queſtion.

BUT ſuppoſe I ſhould admit there was a Perſecution in Gaul at the ſame Time as he affirms, what will this concern Britain, where it is certain from the Authority abovementioned, that the Power of Conſtantius was never abrogated, or ſuſpended by any of the other Emperors? But if it appears there was no ſuch Perſecution in Gaul as he pretends, can one with reaſon believe that there ſhould be any at that Time in Britain, which lay ſo much more remote, and out of the View or Notice of thoſe perſecuting Emperors? But Michael Alford in his Britiſh Annals, being ſenſible of the great Improbability of this Perſecution between the Years 303, and 305. when upon Conſtantius*'s being declared Emperor, all Authors agree the Perſecution ceaſed all over the Empire; he therefore antedates the Time of it to the Year* 287, when he ſuppoſes that St. Alban, after he had been kept ſix Months in Priſon, ſuffered Martyrdom, viz. in the beginning of the Reign of Diocleſian and Maximian; and for this he cites an antient Manuſcript Copy of Bede which he had ſeen, as alſo the Authority of Matthew Paris in his Hiſtory, and Matthew Weſtminſter, who both follow an old Martyrologiſt cited by Capgrave, as much antienter than Bede.

An. 794.

TO this Opinion we reply, that in the firſt place it does not appear by any Authority, but this Writer's bare conjecture, that there was any Perſecution in Britain or Gaul at the beginning of the Emperors Reigns above mentioned, but rather the contrary, ſince Euſebius expreſly tells us, that Diocleſian was ſo far from perſecuting, that he favoured and employed the Chriſtians in all Offices both Civil and Military, till after the Perſian War, which was toward the latter end of his Reign. Nor indeed could this Perſecution have happened under the Uſurpations of Carauſius and Allectus here in Britain, ſeeing they were always engaged in defending themſelves againſt the Roman Emperors, and therefore could could not be at leiſure to perſecute Men for Religion during ſuch unſettled Times.

AND as for the Authority of theſe Martyrologies which this Author urges for the Truth of this Perſecution, viz. That they are ſome of them very Antient, the Originals of them being about 900 Years old: I doubt this will be ſo far from ſupporting their Credit, that it will rather be inſtrumental to deſtroy it, ſince it is very well known that it was about the end of the fifth, or beginning of the ſixth Century, that this trick of forging the Lives and Sufferings of Saints came firſt in Faſhion, and ſo was carried on in thoſe dark Times for near 500 Years following, as the Reverend Dr. Burnet (now Biſhop of Salisbury*) has learnedly proved in his Preface to his Tranſlation of the aforeſaid Treatiſe of* Lactantius.

NOR did the Monks fail of finding their Account in this Deſign, ſince nothing contributed more than this and ſuch like Legends, to the worſhipping of the Reliques of Saints, and going on Pilgrimages to their Tombs: Which Superſtition, how much it advanced the worldly Power and Grandeur of the Clergy of thoſe Times, he muſt be a great Stranger to the Eccleſiaſtical as well as Civil Hiſtory of thoſe Ages, not to underſtand.

HAVING now, I hope, gone through all thoſe things I thought neceſſary to advertiſe the Reader of, I have little elſe remaining, but to ask his Pardon for not adding in the Margin ſome ſhort Notes or Contents of what is in the Body of the Work; which tho I confeſs ſeveral Hiſtorians have done, yet I thought it might very well be ſpared here: Firſt, Becauſe in my Opinion it ſpoils the Beauty of the Margin; and beſides, this Volume being written in an exact Chronological Order, it will be very eaſy for the Reader, (if he will but pleaſe to remember near the Year about which any thing he would find, happened) to ſatisfy himſelf in the Matter he would know, by turning over but two or three Pages: and further, the Years of our Lord ſtanding in Roman Figures in the Margin, do in many Places fill that Space which thoſe Contents uſually take up. But if theſe Reaſons by ſome may not be thought ſufficient, a good Friend of mine has been at the Pains, for your ſake, as well as my eaſe, to make an exact Table to the whole Work, by which I am confident you cannot miſs readily finding out any thing whatſoever you have a deſire to be ſatisfied in, that is contained in this Volume, either as to Perſons, Places or Things.

I have endeavoured to make this Hiſtory as diverting as I could by variety of Matter, as alſo by inſerting into it whatſoever Relations I met with in our old Hiſtorians, that were not utterly improbable; and therefore I hope the Reader will not be uneaſy, becauſe all the parts thereof are not kept up alike pleaſant and agreeable, ſince the dryneſs of the Matter, and the barrenneſs of thoſe few Authors I find in ſome Periods, will not always equally afford it; any more than it can be expected, that in a long Journey it ſhould be alike pleaſant Travelling through dark and narrow Lanes, as over a free and open Champaign.

THERE is one thing more I muſt needs ſtand obliged to you in for your Pardon, and that is, the many Errata's you will find in the firſt four Books; for being out of Town when near half of it was wrought off, I could not ſuperviſe it my ſelf: and though I committed the Correction of thoſe Sheets to a Perſon on whom I could (as I have done before) ſafely rely for his Ability and Faithfulneſs in the diſcharge of that Truſt; yet no Man is able to judg of the Author's Senſe ſo well as himſelf, nor conſequently to mend it, if any where too Obſcure or Miſtaken; and I cannot, as I would, anſwer ſo well for the Care of my Amanuenſis in his Writing or Pointing: and I muſt add this alſo, that ſome Printers are not always ſo careful as they ſhould be to amend their own Faults, tho never ſo exactly Corrected by thoſe to whom their Sheets were entruſted for that Purpoſe.

General Introduction
TO THE Whole Work.

SINCE the late Learned Doctor Howell and Doctor Brady, the former in his Second and Third Parts of his General Hiſtory of the World, and the latter in his General Preſace, and Firſt Book of his Compleat Hiſtory of England, have given us a large Account of the Political Government and Laws in this Part of our Iſland we now call England, during the time of the Roman Emperors, as alſo of our Engliſh-Saxon Kings, as far as the Norman Conqueſt; this Undertaking of Mine would look very imperfect, if I ſhould not in ſome meaſure follow their Method, and prefix before it ſomething of the like nature.

I have therefore made bold to borrow from Mr. Selden, and thoſe other Authors who have written on this Subject, whatſoever I thought was neceſſary to carry on the ſame Deſign; and alſo added thoſe Things that I found they have either omitted or miſtaken, and which required more largely to be treated of, in order to render this Work as uſeful as poſſible I could for a matter of ſo great Importance.

TO begin then with the Government of the Britains before the Arrival of Julius Cæſar into this Iſland: Of which we have ſcarce any Account but what can be gathered from Geoffrey of Monmouth, which is ſo uncertain and fabulous, that there is little reliance upon what he ſays, ſave that in the general it was governed by Kings, and often canton'd into ſeveral Kingdoms: for that it was ever under one Monarch, as he frequently affirms, I have very good reaſon to doubt; it being not only contrary to the Genius and Cuſtom of the Britiſh Nation, (where all the Male Iſſue inherited alike) to ſuffer the Eldeſt Son to go away with the whole Inheritance, but likewiſe it is directly oppoſite to Cæſar's Account of this Iſland when he came firſt hither, which he ſays he found divided into ſeveral diſtinct Principalities and States.

BUT if any Part of Geoffrey's Relation be true, that is moſt likely to be ſo which he gives us of the Laws of Molmutius, viz.

THAT the Temples of the Gods had this Privilege, That whatever guilty Perſons ſhould fly to them, they ſhould be ſecure from their Proſecutors; becauſe we find that Cuſtom very antient, not only amongſt the Greeks and Romans, but indeed all other Nations, the Jews not excepted.

NEXT, That the publick Ways leading to the ſaid Temples, and the Cities wherein they were, ſhould be free and ſafe. And,

LASTLY, That ſuch a Proportion of Land ſhould maintain ſo many Ploughs for the Encouragement of Husbandry; which was very natural in a Countrey, where not only the Soil, but the Lazineſs of the Inhabitants, rendred it more apt for Grazing than Tillage.

[redacted] I cannot forbear obſerving how little ſtreſs is to be laid on Geoffrey's Account of the Laws of thoſe Britiſh Princes, ſince he has the Confidence to tell us of another Sett of Laws ſuppoſed to be made by Queen Martia, which, he ſays, being afterwards tranſlated by King Alfred out of the Britiſh Language, were by him inſerted into his Body of Saxon Laws, under the Title of Mearchen-Lage. The Falſhood of which Derivation Mr. Camden has very well diſcovered, by ſhewing, That this Word had not its Original from Queen Martia, but from the Saxon Word Mearc, ſignifying a Limit or Boundary; from whence the Mercian Kingdom had its Name, and was ſo called from its Situation, as being circumſcribed by the other Kingdoms of the Heptarchy.

[redacted] As for the Britiſh Government that ſucceeded upon the Romans deſerting of this Iſland, we can ſay no more of it, than that it was Regal; but that it was all ſubject to one Monarch, I no where find. For tho it appears from Gildas and Nennius, that Vortigerne was made King not long after the Romans leaving it, yet does it not follow from thence, that there were no more Kings than he at the ſame time; ſince it ſeems very unlikely, that all Britain (properly ſo called) which in the time of the Romans was divided into ſo many diſtinct Provinces, each of which had their particular Præfects or Deputies, ſhould ſo unanimouſly agree in the Choice of this Vortigerne, whom Geoffrey prepoſterouſly relates to have been then Count of the Gewiſes, when indeed there were no ſuch People of that Name in Being, till the erecting of the Weſt-Saxon Kingdom; thoſe People being then (and not before) ſo called from one Gewis, an Anceſtor of Hengiſt. And Gildas, who lived within fourſcore Years after the Reign of this Vortigerne, tells us of no leſs than four diſtinct Kings reigning together in this Part of the Iſland, and mentions not a Word of its ever being otherwiſe.

BUT that the Titles of thoſe Kings who reigned here during the firſt Wars between the Britains and the Saxons, were oftner by Election than Succeſſion, may appear not only from Geoffrey himſelf, but alſo from Gildas and Nennius, who are Authors of better Credit; and they relate Vortimer the eldeſt Son of Vortigerne, to have been elected upon his Father's Depoſition, King of the Britains; and after his Death, and the ſecond Deſertion of Vortigerne, that Aurelius Ambroſius was elected firſt General, and ſome time afterwards King of the Britains.

NOR can we believe that theſe Kings were Abſolute or Deſpotick Monarchs, ſince we find that Government unſutable to the Temper of the Britiſh Nation, both then, and in ſucceeding times; having not only frequently caſt off the Government of the Roman Emperors, but alſo of their own Kings, for their cruel Tyranny and Oppreſſion.

AND that this way of the Election of one ſupream King over the reſt, was after often uſed by the Britains, you will find in the Hiſtory it ſelf; not but that it muſt be confeſſed, that the ſeveral petty Kingdoms or Principalities which the Britains ſtill poſſeſſed, and that go under the Name of North and South-Wales, did commonly deſcend, and were diviſable among the ſeveral Sons of the deceaſed Prince, tho it was with great Inequality and Confuſion; which often produced frequent Civil Wars between the Contending Competitors, and became the Ruin of them all at laſt.

BUT to paſs from theſe Britiſh Princes, and the manner of their Government, as well before the coming in, as after the Deſertion of the Romans, and which (tho not in its due order of Time) I have here put together, that the Reader might have a full View of it all at once. I proceed now to the Civil and Military Adminiſtration of the Romans whilſt they continued Maſters of this Part of Britain.

JULIUS Cæſar, when he had rather view'd than conquer'd this Iſland, left it, upon the Delivery of ſome Hoſtages, and the Promiſe of ſending over more into Gaul, together with a certain Tribute to the Senate and People of Rome, neither of which the Britains ever perform'd; but during the Civil Wars, which not longer after enſued, they recovered their antient Liberty, ~~which~~ for divers Years ~~they~~ enjoyed, and & it till the Emperor Claudius, at the Inſtigation of one Bericus a Fugitive, and upon a Pretence of their denying the Romans to trade here, ſent over firſt Aulus Plautius as his Lieutenant, and then following preſently afterwards himſelf in Perſon, made the Britains (I mean the greateſt part of them) partly by Force, and partly by Fear, ſubmit themſelves to his Empire; tho in a great meaſure under the Regiment of their own Kings, who only paid Tribute, and received Roman Gariſons, and ſuffered them to erect Colonies where they pleas'd: during which time the Government of the Romans was rather Military than Civil, the People living after their own Laws.

NOR were the Britains wholly ſubdued by them, till ~~upon~~ their Inſurrection under Queen Boadicia in the Time of Nero, when Paulus Suetonius being Legate or Lieutenant here, reduced them (tho with great difficulty) under the Roman Yoke.

BUT the Civil Wars that afterwards happened upon the Death of Nero, hindred their entire Conqueſt, until ſuch time as the Emperor Veſpaſian ſent over that famous Commander Agricola to be his General here; who in a few Years, having laid aſide their petty Kings, brought it into the Form of a Province under the Roman Governours, ſometimes ſtiled Preſidents, ſometimes Conſulares, and ſometimes Legati or Procuratores, as the Emperor's Commiſſion, or the various Appellations of the Roman Hiſtorians are pleaſed to entitle them.

AND then it was, I ſuppoſe, this Part of the Iſland was firſt divided into ſeveral Præfectſhips or Governments, tho how many they were, cannot be aſcertained; only we find from the Breviary of Sextus Rufus, that in the Reign of Conſtantine it was parcell'd into theſe four for its better Adminiſtration, viz. Britannia prima, which is conjectured to have been that Part of the Countrey lying from the Gallic Sea to the River Thames and the Mouth of the Severn; Britannia ſecunda, which reached from the Severn to the Iriſh Sea; Flavia Cæſarienſis, which was encloſed by the Rivers Thames, Severn and Humber; and Maxima Cæſarienſis, lying betwixt Humber and Hadrian's Wall; to which was afterwards added by Theodoſius the Elder, the Province of Valentia, ſo called from the Emperor Valentinian; and which, having been taken out of Maxima Cæſarienſis, lay betwixt the Wall of Hadrian, and the Friths of Glotta and Bodotria, which now are thoſe of Edinburgh and Dunbritton.

EACH of which Provinces were under their particular Magiſtrates, ſome whereof had the Title of Conſulares, and others of Præſides: all which, according to the Notitia Romani Imperii, were by Conſtantine's new Conſtitutions, made ſubject to the Vicarius of Britain, as he was to the Præfectus Prætorii of Gaul, who was one of the Four Præfecti of Conſtantine's Erection.

THIS Vicar of Britain had alſo ſeveral inferiour Officers under him for the Civil Adminiſtration; as firſt, he had his Princeps or Lieutenant out of the Agentes in rebus, that is, from the Chief of the Agents, Solicitors, or Attorney-Generals: he had alſo from the Ducenarii, or Society of the Emperors Purſuivants, a Cornicularius, i. e. one that wrote and publiſhed the Sentences and Decrees of the Preſidents and other Magiſtrates, and had his Name from Cornu a Horn, by the ſounding whereof he is ſuppoſed to command ſilence in the Court; then two Numerarii, i. e. Clerks Accountants, who did ſet down all the Sums of the publick Revenues; then a Commentarienſis, i. e. the Jailor or Keeper of the Priſon, and was ſo called from the Commentaria, or Kalendars which he kept of the Priſoners, and delivered to the Judges: then certain Officers called ab Actis, who were Publick Notaries, that wrote Teſtaments, Contracts and other Inſtruments, which were ſigned before by the Judg or Preſident, and atteſted by him, that ſo after the Death of the Party they might remain Authentick: then other Clerks or Secretaries de Curâ, or de Curâ Epiſtolarum, who wrote and ſent the Letters and Diſpatches of the Governours of Provinces to the Emperor, or to each other.

BESIDES whom, the Vicarius himſelf, (and, I ſuppoſe alſo, each of the Preſidents) had his Adjutorem, i. e. his Coadjutor, in caſe of Sickneſs, or neceſſary Abſence; as likewiſe Subadjuvas, Under-Aſſiſtants, or Aſſiſtants to the Adjutor: and, in ſhort, certain other Officers called Singulares, from the particular Civil Imployments they had, who ſeem'd to have been Proſecutors, Informers, or Serjeants; not to mention others of more inferiour Rank, as Apparitors, Summoners, or Meſſengers. This was the Civil Court of the Vicarius, or Deputy of Britain, under the Præfectus Prætorii of Gaul, who had the Power to reverſe his Judgments and Decrees.

Vid. Pancirol. in Notit. Imperii.

THE Enſigns of his Government were a Draught of thoſe Five Parts of Britain before-mentioned, expreſſed in the Forms of ſeveral Buildings, with the Superſcription of their Names placed on the Triangular Form of the Iſland, as if they had comprehended the whole Iſland; the Book of their Inſtructions covered with Green, and the Commiſſion in a gilt Cover, with ſeveral Letters inſcribed on the Book, the Signification of which is unneceſſary to be here inſerted; but you will find this, as alſo a Draught of theſe Inſignia themſelves, in the above-cited Pancirollus.

BESIDES theſe general Preſidents, there were likewiſe Courts in all the great Cities, Municipia, or Colonies of each Province, which had their ſeveral Officers and Magiſtrates according to the Model of Rome it ſelf, who heard Cauſes, and adminiſtred Juſtice to the particular Diſtricts belonging to them, much after the ſame manner as the Parliaments in France do at this day.

HAVING thus concluded their Civil Adminiſtration, we now come to the Military, which was executed by Three Chief Officers under the Magiſter Militum of the Weſt, and they were theſe, viz. the Comes Britanniarum, Comes Littoris Saxonici, and the Dux Britanniarum; whoſe ſeveral Charges, and the Tracts ſubjected to each of their Commands, may be beſt diſcerned by the Names of thoſe Towns where their Under-Officers and Forces are ſaid to have had their Head-quarters. The firſt of theſe, viz. the Count of Britain, is thought to have had his Command over the Inward or Middle Part of the Iſland, becauſe the two others are known to have had theirs over the Northern or Maritime Parts thereof; but the Notitia aſſigns not any Forces to the former, nor mentions any Places under his Command, becauſe, as Pancirollus writes, the whole Iſland was then almoſt overrun by Barbarians.

BUT as for the Comes Littoris Saxonici, ſo called in the Declenſion of the Roman Empire, from the charge or Care he had to ſuppreſs the Saxon Pirates, who often landing on the Eaſtern Parts of Britain, (lying over againſt Germany) committed great Ravages there; he had eight Præpoſiti, and one Tribune under him, that were Leaders of divers Cohorts, conſiſting of Gauls, Germans, and other Foreign Nations, who quartered in ſeveral Towns all along the Coaſts, from Suſſex, as far as the remoteſt part of Norfolk: for the Names of whom, with the Places where they lay, I ſhall refer you to the Notitia Imperii Occidentalis, or (if you had rather have them in Engliſh) to Mr. Selden's Titles of Honour, and Dr. Howell's ſecond Part, and third Chapter, of his General Hiſtory.

THE like I may alſo ſay of the Forces under the Dux Britanniarum, or General of Britain, whoſe Army, had it then been really in being, was ſufficient to have ſuppreſſed both the Picts and Scots; for they conſiſted of no leſs than fourteen Præfects or Præpoſiti of Horſe and Foot, whoſe Names, and Places where they quartered (extending from Lincolnſhire through all the Northern Counties, as far as the Pictiſh Borders, and ſo round about by Lancaſhire into North-Wales) you may find in the Authors abovementioned.

~~BUT~~ As for the ſeveral Enſigns of theſe three chief Military Officers, they being much what the ſame with thoſe of the Vicarius Britanniæ, viz. The Figures of certain Towns, with their Names ſet over them, together with their Commiſſions, contained in Books of different coloured Covers, with the Emperor's Images ſet by them on Pillars, I will leave it to thoſe who take more Pleaſure than I do in ſuch Curioſities.

ALL theſe Comites and Duces were equal in Power, and only ſubordinate to the Vicarius Britanniæ; the Forces under their Command were not only diſperſed through the Municipia or Free Colonies, which the Romans planted here, and were governed by their own Civil Magiſtrates in Imitation of Rome their Mother-City, but were alſo gariſon'd in divers Towns, Caſtles and Forts, all along the Roman Limits, thereby to diſcover the Motions of the Neighbouring Nations; ſeveral of which being intended only at firſt for their Military Camps, by degrees grew up into Cities, and are known at this day by the Name of Cheſters; ſuch as are Weſt-Cheſter on the River Dee, Portcheſter in Hampſhire (now deſtroyed,) Cheſter in the Street in Northumberland, with ſeveral others of leſs note near the Picts Wall; as alſo in the Inland Parts of England, ending in the word Ceſter, as Leiceſter, Cirenceſter, &c. all which owe their Original to the Latin Name Caſtra.

The Heptarchy.

HAVING now diſpatched the Britiſh and Roman Polity, I come to the main part of my Deſign, which is, to give a brief Account of the Civil Government that the Engliſh Saxons eſtabliſhed in this part of our Iſland, which they called England, who conſiſting of ſeveral Tribes or Nations inhabiting different Countries, yet all ſpeaking the ſame Language, came over hither at ſeveral Times under their particular Leaders; and as ſoon as they had expelled the Britains, they did within the ſpace of about a hundred Years, erect ſeven diſtinct Kingdoms, though not of equal Extent; the Names of which, (notwithſtanding they are ſet down in the Hiſtory it ſelf, yet having not given you the particular Catalogue of the ſeveral Counties they contained, becauſe their Dominions were not then divided into thoſe Diſtricts as they were afterwards,) I have reſerved to this place.

1*ſt*. Kingdom. THE firſt Kingdom, being that of Kent, conſiſted only of that County and Surrey.

2*d*. Kingdom. THE ſecond, viz. that of the South-Saxons, contained Suſſex and Surrey, or at leaſt great part of it.

3*d*. Kingdom. THE third was the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, and contained Devonſhire, Dorſetſhire, Somerſetſhire, Wiltſhire, Hampſhire and Berkſhire. But as for that Countrey called Cornwall, I ſhall not reckon it here, becauſe it was ~~for a long Time after~~ then governed by its own Princes, and not brought under the Weſt-Saxon Dominion till long after.

4*th*. Kingdom. THE fourth was that of the Eaſt-Saxons, which contained Eſſex, Middleſex, and part of Hertfordſhire.

5*th*. Kingdom. THE fifth was that of the Northumbers, which contained Lancaſhire, Yorkſhire, the Biſhoprick of Dureſme, Cumberland, Weſtmorland, Northumberland, and part of Scotland, as far as Edinburgh Frith.

THIS Kingdom after the Death of Ida, was divided into two parts; the firſt whereof, containing all the Countries lying on this ſide the River Tyne, was called the Kingdom of Deira; and that on the other ſide of it was called Bernicia, and ſo continued for ſeveral Deſcents, till King Oſwy, about the Year 643. upon the Murder of King Oſwin his Couſin, again reduced them into one; and they continued thus united till ſuch time as the Southern Provinces were overrun by the Danes, as the more Northern were by the Scots, and have ever ſince remained part of that Kingdom: and hence it is that the Low-Lands of Scotland, (that is, all the Countrey from the River Tyne, to the Friths of Edinburgh and Dunbritton,) antiently ſpoke the Engliſh Saxon Tongue, which in ſucceeding Times was changed into that Engliſh Dialect they call the Modern Scotch; and conſiſts of the old Saxon, with no little mixture of the Daniſh Language: this, I ſuppoſe, proceeded from the great Conqueſts, and ſettling ſo many of that Nation in thoſe Northern Parts.

THIS is in great meaſure confirmed by John of Wallingford, (publiſh'd by the Learned Dr. Gale) where he relates, that Keneth King of a Homage from himſelf and his Succeſſors Kings of Scotland, to the King of England, as alſo that the People of that Countrey ſhould enjoy their Laws and Cuſtoms, as alſo the uſe of the Engliſh Tongue.
545. of Scots received Lothian from King Edgar, under the Condition of

BUT as for the true and genuine Scotiſh, which they now call the Speech of the Highlanders, becauſe by them only ſpoken at this day, it is no other than the antient Iriſh, which the Scots brought over with them from thence, when they firſt came over to inhabit there, as you will find in the Beginning of Bede's Hiſtory.

THE ſixth Kingdom was that of the Eaſt-Angles, which contained Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgſhire, with the Iſle of Ely. 6th. Kingdom.

THE ſeventh was that of the Mercians, containing Glouceſterſhire, Herefordſhire, Worceſterſhire, Warwickſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Rutlandſhire, Northamptonſhire, Lincolnſhire, Huntingtonſhire, Bedfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Oxfordſhire, Staffordſhire, Shropſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Derbyshire Cheſhire, and part of Hertfordſhire. 7th. Kingdom.

~~BUT~~ As for the Names of the Kings who reigned in each of theſe Kingdoms, till they were all brought under that of the Weſt-Saxons, I ſhall refer you to the Tables at the end of the third, fourth and fifth Books of this Volume, wherein you have at one view all the Kings that ſucceeded in each of thoſe Periods, as alſo thoſe of that part of Britain we now call Wales; and for the more exact Chronology of the firſt Britiſh Princes, I muſt own my ſelf obliged to the ~~exact~~ faithful account of the Right Reverend the preſent Lord Biſhop of Bangor, who I hope one day will let the World ſee ſome of his Learned Labours on that Subject.

THIS is a ſhort Scheme of the ſeveral Kingdoms, into which that Part of Britain we now call England, was divided in the Saxon Times.

I ſhould next proceed to the particular Laws and Forms of Government in each reſpective Kingdom; but ſince we have no Remains of thoſe left us for want of Letters, before the Preaching of Chriſtianity here, we can only ſay in the general, that without doubt each of theſe Kingdoms had its own particular Laws and Cuſtoms; and tho they might perhaps differ one from the other in ſome Points, yet they all agreed in the main, as to the moſt Material and Fundamental Conſtitutions of their Government, and long received Laws and Cuſtoms before ever they arrived in England, as proceeding from the ſame Common Anceſtors.

AND tho the Engliſh-Saxons were not immediately derived from the Germans but Goths, as you will find in the third Book of this Volume; yet ſince even the Germans themſelves were derived from the ſame Gothick Original, with all the reſt of thoſe Northern People, as the Sweeds, Danes and Norwegians, as appears by the Agreement of their Language, Cuſtoms and Laws; I ſhall therefore ſuppoſe that in the main likewiſe they agreed with the Antient Germans, as they are deſcribed by * Tacitus, in their Laws, Manners, and Religion; and therefore I ſhall from him give you ſome of the moſt conſiderable of them, as they are collected by Mr. Selden in his Learned Treatiſe, called, Jani Anglorum Facies altera. * De moribus Germanorum.

THE firſt of which is, In conciliis Rex vel Princeps, prout Ætas cuiq; prout Nobilitas, prout Decus Bellorum, prout Facundia eſt, audiuntur, Auctoritate ſuadendi magis quàm jubendi poteſtate. Si diſplicuit 1.

Sententia, fremitu aſpernantur; ſin placuit, frameas concutiunt. Honoratiſſimum aſſenſûs Genus eſt Armis laudare. Which for the Benefit of the Common Readers, I will take upon me to tranſlate into Engliſh, viz.

“ IN their Councils the King, or ſome principal Perſon, according to every one's reſpective Age, Nobility, Reputation in Arms, or Eloquence, are heard, rather by the Authority of Perſwading, than the Power of Commanding: if their Opinions diſpleaſed them, they ſhewed their diſlike by their Clamour; but if they approved of what was ſpoken, they ſtruck their Launces one againſt another. This was thought the moſt Honourable way of giving their Aſſent to approve by Arms.

2. THE ſecond is, Eliguntur in iiſdem Conciliis Principes, qui Jura per pagos vicoſq; reddunt. Centeni ſingulis ex plebe Comites Conſilium ſimul & Auctoritas adſunt, viz.

“ IN thoſe Councils ſuch chief Men are Elected, as judge Cauſes in Towns and Villages. A hundred Aſſeſſors choſen out of the common People are added to each of them, as well for Counſel as Authority. From whence Mr. Selden here ſuppoſes our Hundreds had their Original; which antiently conſiſted of the Maſters of one hundred Families.

3. THE third goes on thus, Nihil publicæ vel privatæ Rei niſi Armati agunt, ſed Arma ſumere non antè cuiquam moris, quam Civitas ſuffecturum probaverit. Tum in ipſo Concilio, vel Principum aliquis, vel pater, vel propinquus, ſcuto frameâq; Juvenem ornant: hæc apud illos Toga, hic primus juventæ honos: ante hoc Domus pars videntur, mox Reipublicæ, viz.

“ THEY tranſact nothing either of Publick or Private Concern without their Arms: but it was not a Cuſtom for any to aſſume thoſe Arms, before the Common-Wealth had approved of his Ability. Then in this very Council, either one of the principal Men, or his Father, or his near Kinſman, adorned the Youth with the Shield and Lance. This ſerved them inſtead of a Gown, and was the firſt Honour of their Youth: before they only ſeemed as part of the Family, but now they became a Member of the Common-Wealth. And here Mr. Selden diſcovers the firſt Footſteps of Knighthood.

4. THE fourth is, Inſignis Nobilitas, aut magna patrûm merita, Principis dignationem, etiàm Adoleſcentulis aſſignant; viz.

“ EMINENT Nobility, or the ſignal Merits of their Anceſtors, do advance even theſe young Men to the Degree and Honour of being a chief Man.

FROM hence we may obſerve, that all Nobility among the antient Germans was at firſt Military, as being derived from the Noble and Valiant Acts of their Anceſtors in War; and thence proceed all the preſent Enſigns of it, videlicet, the Shield, on which our Coats of Arms are now depicted; as alſo the Helmet and Creſt that ſtand for an Ornament over them: for until ſome Brave and Worthy Act was performed, it was not lawful among the Germans for a young Warriour to paint any Device upon his Shield, which was only Perſonal to himſelf, and extended not to his Poſterity.

5. THE fifth is, That Dotem non Uxor Marito, ſed Uxori Maritus offert, viz.

“ THE Husband ſettles a Dower upon the Wife, and not, vice verſa, “ the Wife upon the Husband. Which ſhews the Antiquity of Dower among the Germans and Engliſh-Saxons; and as Mr. Selden upon this Law obſerves, it was called antiently MORGANGHEB among them.

6. THE ſixth ſhews, that Acciſis Crinibus, nudatam adulteram coram propinquis expellit domo Maritus, ac per omnem vicum verbere agit, viz.

“ FOR Adultery, the Husband turned the Wife out of his Houſe in “ the preſence of her Relations, having firſt cut off her Hair, and be- “ ing then ſtrip'd, whip'd her through the Town.

BUT the Severity of this Puniſhment, if ever it was in uſe here, was quite aboliſhed by the Engliſh-Saxons, as you will find from the Laws about it.

7. THE ſeventh is, that Hæredes, ſucceſſoreſq; ſui cuiq; Liberi: & nullum Teſtamentum, viz.

“ EVERY Man's Heirs and Succeſſors are his Children; and no “ Teſtament is allowed.

BUT in this the Engliſh-Saxon Law differed much from thoſe of the Germans; for it was lawful in England for Men of Quality to diſpoſe of their Land by Will (if they pleaſed) provided it were Bocland, (that is Free-Tenure grantable by Deed) as you may find by ſome Laws in the enſuing Volume; otherwiſe in Lands held in Socage, every Man's Sons inherited all alike: But this Law was changed after the Conqueſt, and no Will could be made of Lands held by Military Service, but they deſcended entirely to the eldeſt Son: which Law continued ſo low as the Reign of King Henry the 8*th*, when the Statute was firſt made, which gives the Tenant by Knights Service, Power to bequeath his Eſtate by Will, provided there were enough left to perform the Service. 32 Hen. VIII. Cap. 1.

8. THE eighth ſays, that Suſcipere Inimicitias, ſeu patris, ſeu propinqui, quàm amicitias, neceſſe eſt, viz.

IT is abſolutely neceſſary to continue the Enmities of a Father, or near Kinſman, as well as Friendſhips.

FROM whence, as Mr. Selden well obſerves, aroſe thoſe Family-Quarrels, called in the North of England, DEADLY FEUDS, (which you will alſo find mentioned in the enſuing Collection of Saxon Laws) and which are continued in Scotland even to this Day.

BUT to proceed with Tacitus, he ſays, Nec implacabiles durant: Luitur enim etiam homicidium certo Armentorum ac Pecorum numero, recipitq; ſatisfactionem univerſa Domus, viz.

“ THAT they do not remain implacable; for the Homicide is re- “ compenſed with a certain Number of great and ſmall Cattel, and “ the whole Family thereupon receives Satisfaction.

THIS Cuſtom continued long not only among the Germans, but alſo Engliſh-Saxons; the Price of Blood being to be redeemed at a certain Rate, according to each Man's Condition, which you will hereafter often find in the ſaid Laws to be mentioned under the Title of WIREGILD: and in the Laws of King Æthelſtan you will meet with the particular Prices of each Man's Head, from the Clown even to the King himſelf; the Eſtimation of whoſe Life is likewiſe there ſet down, thô at a much higher Rate (as it ought to be) than that of other Mens. But of this we ſhall ſpeak more anon.

9. THE ninth Law bears, that Frumenti modum Dominus, aut pecoris, aut veſtis Colono injungit, viz.

“ THE Lord of the Soil preſcribes to the Husbandman, what “ quantity of Corn, Cattel, or Clothes he ſhall pay him.

FROM whence we may take notice of the Antiquity of Rent reſerved upon Farms, which was chiefly in Proviſion, and not in Money, as it continued for a long Time after the Conqueſt here in England, and remains ſo in Scotland even to this Day.

Nithard*. p. 4.

HAVING thus done with the Laws, we ſhall next deſcend to the People who practiſed them. The antient Saxons, as Adam of Bremen from Einhardus relates, were like the Germans, divided into theſe four ſorts, viz. Noblemen, Freemen, Slaves that were Manumized, and laſtly, thoſe that continued Slaves: But * Nithardus ſpeaking of his Time, makes them but of three ſorts, ſcilicet, Ethelings, Frilingues, and Lazzi, that is, Noblemen, Freemen, and Slaves: and it was eſtabliſhed as a Law among them, that none of theſe ſhould tranſgreſs the Bounds of their own Condition, by matching with thoſe who were either a Degree above, or below them.

Vid. Mag. Charta, C. 6. &Merton.C.7.

THIS Cuſtom was alſo long obſerved in England after the Conqueſt, and gave Original to thoſe Statutes of Mag. Char. and Merton, by which the Lord was to loſe the Benefit of his Wardſhip, in caſe he married the Ward to his Diſparagement, that is, To the Daughter of a Villain, or a Tradeſman, in caſe that the Kindred complained of it.

BUT before we come to treat of the ſeveral Degrees of People abovementioned, it is fit we ſhould ſay ſomething of the Head of the Saxon Common-Weal, viz. their King; who though he was choſen in all the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, out of the Blood-Royal of Woden, their firſt Leader of this Gothick Colony into Europe, as appears by their Pedigree at the end of the Book; yet were they at firſt no better than Generals in War, and in time of Peace they had little or no Power, as we may ſee in Bede.

Bede Eccleſ. Hiſt. Li. 5. Cap. 12.

FOR he ſpeaking of the Province of the Hither (i. e. Eaſt) Frizeland, (from whence he ſuppoſes our Saxon Anceſtors to have come, and to which the two Hewalds, the White and the Black, went to preach the Goſpel, and were there martyr'd for their Pains) he hath this remarkable Paſſage, Non enim habent Regem iidem antiqui Saxones, ſed Satrapas plurimos ſuæ Genti præpoſitos, qui ingruente Belli Articulo mittunt æqualiter ſortes, & quemcunque ſors oſtenderit, hunc tempore Belli Ducem omnes ſequuntur, & huic obtemperant; peracto autem Bello, rurſum æqualis potentiæ omnes fiunt Satrapæ: i. e. “ For the Antient Saxons “ (ſays he) have no King, but ſeveral Noblemen of their own Nation “ ſet over them, who on the breaking out of any War, caſt Lots, and on “ whomſoever the Lot happened to fall, all the People during that War, “ follow and obey him as their General; but when the War was over “ and at an end, all theſe Lords again became of equal Power.

AND it is likewiſe very obſervable, that neither Bede nor any other German Author, who relates the Story of the Saxons being invited by the Britains over hither, ever mention their being ſent by any of their Kings, but only by the Saxon Nation in general: and if it continued thus in Bede's Time, it ought reaſonably to be concluded, that it was likewiſe ſo before their coming over, unleſs any Man can ſhew me ſome better Authority than ever I have yet met with to the contrary.

AND that this likewiſe continued ſo, not only in Bede's Time, but many Years after, may appear from this Teſtimony of Johan. Pomarius in his Saxon Chronicle, which, tho written in Latin, yet not being able as yet to procure the ſight of it, I ſhall give you what he ſays almoſt to the ſame effect out of Verſtegan's Reſtitution of decayed Intelligence; "As for "the General Government of the Countrey, they ordained twelve "Noble-men, choſen from among others for their Worthineſs and "Sufficiency. Theſe in the Time of Peace rode their ſeveral Circuits, "to ſee Juſtice and good Cuſtoms obſerved; and they often of Courſe, "at appointed Times, met all together, to conſult and give Order in "Publick Affairs; but ever in Time of War one of theſe twelve was "choſen to be King, and ſo to remain as long only as the War laſted; "and that being ended, his Name and Dignity of King alſo ceaſed, "and he became as before: and this Cuſtom continued among them "until the Time of their Wars with the Emperor Charles the Great, at "which time, Wittekind one of the Twelve as aforeſaid, a Nobleman "of Angria in Weſtphalia, bore over the reſt the Name and Authority "of King; and he being afterwards by the means of the ſaid Emperor "converted to the Faith of Chriſt, had by him his mutable Title of "King turned into the induring Title and Honour of Duke; and the "eleven others were in like manner by the ſaid Emperor advanced "to the honourable Titles of Earls and Lords, with Eſtabliſhment "for the continual remaining of theſe Titles and Dignities unto them "and their Heirs; of whoſe Deſcents are ſince iſſued the greateſt "Princes at this preſent in Germany.

Verſtegan. Chap. 3. pag. 68, 69.

FROM what now I have given you, I think nothing is more evident than that the Government of the Antient Engliſh Saxons was rather Ariſtocratical than Monarchical: and admitting they allowed the King they had ſet over them ſomewhat more Power than thoſe Noblemen abovementioned, by whom they where governed in their own Countrey in time of Peace; yet was this Power of theirs far ſhort of that abſolute Dominion which Dr. Howell in his Diſcourſe of the Polity of the Engliſh-Saxons ſuppoſes, (tho without any juſt Ground,) that theſe Kings enjoyed, and therefore he would have it, "That the Government was Monarchical, and that not only in reſpect of the particular Kingdoms during the Heptarchy, which had their peculiar Kings, "but even of the whole Body of the Nation, which was uſually "commanded by one of the Seven; of all which Bede takes notice in "his Time.

Dr. Howell's General Hiſtory, Part. 4 Fol. 272.

BUT if every one of theſe Kings were no more a Monarch, than he [illegible] was ſometimes Supream or Chief above the Reſt, I doubt he will fall very ſhort of that Title, which is not found either in Bede, or in the Saxon Annals, or yet in any other Antient Writer before the Conqueſt, until the Time of King Edred.

BUT I have ſaid enough to confute this Notion, I hope, in the Preface.

THE Doctor's next Argument is from the Nature of the Monarchy, which he ſays, "We muſt believe at the firſt followed the Condition "of the Tenure, abſolute Conqueſts and Territories, both got and "held by the Sword alone, uſually producing abſolute Governments, "which

“ which many times either by reaſon of the infirm Foundation laid by
“ the Conquerors themſelves, the Humour of the People not induring “ ſuch Subjection, or other Accidents, change into more Moderate
“ and leſs Arbitrary. That Hengeſt, Ælla, and the other Captains, “ where they firſt erected their Dominations, governed their Souldiers, “ whom now being Kings they called Subjects, with as great Authority,
“ and as full Command as formerly, we little doubt.

IN anſwer to this, and to ſhew you, that notwithſtanding what this Author hath alledged, we have ſtill great reaſon to doubt the Truth of it, as being founded on no Authority, but rather the quite contrary appears; I ſhall therefore only deſire the Reader in the firſt place to take notice, that it is no good Argument at all to ſay, that becauſe the Saxon Princes were Conquerors by the means of their Followers, therefore they muſt have ſubmitted themſelves abſolutely to their Dominion, when the War was over.

FOR the better Proof of which, I would farther intreat the Reader to obſerve;

FIRST, That thoſe Princes or Generals over the Engliſh-Saxons, (thô all of them were deſcended from Woden their Common Anceſtor,) knew no ſuch Power as that of Kings at Home, (according to Bede;) or if we believe Pomarius, the Title of King laſted at the moſt no longer than the War: nor could thoſe Princes be made Kings by their own Nation before they came over, ſince being only meer Souldiers of Fortune, they had as yet conquered no Dominions, from whence they could receive that Denomination: ſo that then it muſt fall out, that they could only be ſo by the Election of their Souldiers and Followers, that came over along with them; which may be alſo proved from the enſuing Annals themſelves.

FOR firſt they call Hengeſt and Horſa the two Brothers, who came over hither only Heretogan, i. e. Leaders or Captains of the Jutes that accompanied them, as you may ſee An. 449. of theſe Annals.

NOR ſecondly, do they begin the Reign of Hengeſt till the Death of Horſa his Brother, Anno 455. ſix Years after his coming over: ſo that it is plain he could have no other Right to his Kingdom of Kent, but the free Election of the People that came over with him, or elſe followed him not long afterwards.

THE like I might ſay of all the reſt of the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy for the ſame Reaſon, were there no expreſs Authorities to prove it, which yet alſo are not wanting.

FOR as to the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, (which afterwards ſwallowed up all the reſt) our Annals, Anno 495. tell us “ Of Cerdic, “ and Cynric his Son, their landing in Britain with five Ships, and having “ fought with the Britains, they about ſix Years after their coming over, “ upon their conquering the Countrey of the Weſt-Saxons, became “ their firſt Kings: which is further confirmed under Anno 519.
“ where it is expreſly related, that Cerdic and Cynric then began their “ Reigns over the Weſt-Saxon Kingdom. So likewiſe in Anno 547.
“ it is there ſaid, that Ida began firſt to reign; from whom is derived
“ the Royal Stock of the Northumbrian Kings.

AND yet we find from Nennius and Malmesbury, and all our other Hiſtorians who treat of this Matter, that Octa and Ebuſa, Son and Nephew to Hengeſt, had landed in the Northern Parts of England not long after Hengeſt himſelf; and having conquered thoſe Countries, they and their Deſcendants ruled there for near 100 Years, tho without the Title of Kings, but only as ſubordinate Lords or Earls under the Kings of Kent, till this Ida obtained the Kingdom; but whether by Succeſſion or Election, William of Malmesbury cannot tell us, but rather inclines to the latter: and tho it be true, that theſe Annals mention no other Kingdoms of the Heptarchy than theſe three laſt; yet it appears from very good Teſtimonies in the enſuing Hiſtory, that Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgſhire, being the Countrey of the Eaſt-Angles, were conquered by them under ſeveral petty Princes, that ruled there long before Uffa, who was made the firſt King of that whole Countrey.

THE like I may ſay for the Mercian Kingdom, where Creoda, or Crida, began his Reign about Anno 585. above 60 Years after the Eaſt-Angles firſt ſettled in thoſe Parts.

HAVING now, I hope, ſufficiently proved this Point againſt the Learned Dr. Howell, I think it will plainly follow, that all thoſe Kings above-mentioned could have no other Title to their Crowns beſides Election, who from Captains and Generals in time of War, became Kings in time of Peace over the Countries they had conquered.

I will here therefore leave it to the Impartial Reader, to conſider, whether what Dr. Howell aſſerts is at all likely to be true, viz. "That "the Power of theſe Kings commencing by the Sword, was as abſo-"lute in Time of Peace as in that of War: for we plainly ſee, that theſe were a free People, and it is in no ways probable that they ſhould, contrary to the Genius of ſo noble and free a Nation, ſubmit themſelves to the abſolute Dominion of one Man, who owed his delegated Power to themſelves.

BESIDES this, the original Conſtitution of all theſe ſeveral Kingdoms ſpeaks the quite contrary; for we find in the following Hiſtory, frequent mention made of great Councils of the Wites, i. e. the chief, or wiſe Men of the whole Kingdom, which Councils were eſtabliſhed to curb the exorbitant Power of their Kings; ſince by theſe they were elected, and by theſe too they were likewiſe often depoſed, when ever their Tyranny rendered them inſupportable; as you will ſee in ſeveral Inſtances when you peruſe the following Books in this Volume.

AND thus having traced as far as we are able the Original of the firſt Engliſh-Saxon Kings, we ſhall now in the next Place treat of the manner of their Succeſſion to the Crown, which ſome of our Modern Authors fancy to have been by a Lineal Succeſſion, becauſe we find the Son to have often ſucceeded the Father in moſt of theſe Kingdoms for ſeveral Deſcents. But if this ſhould be granted, yet is it no good Argument to prove a Lineal Succeſſion by Blood: for tho I am ſenſible that the Saxon Annals, as well as all other Hiſtorians, are very obſcure in this Point, not declaring which way thoſe Princes came to the Crown, whether by Succeſſion or Election, becauſe it was omitted in the old Saxon Annals out of which they wrote, and which we find very ſhort in that particular; yet this will by no means warrant thoſe Kingdoms to have been only Succeſſive, as ſome Men fondly ſuppoſe; ſeeing we may obſerve, that in the German Empire, (which every one knows to be Elective) the Son hath ſucceeded the Father, or a younger Brother the Elder, for above 150 Years, ever ſince the Time of the Emperor Ferdinand Brother to Charles the Fifth; however I hope no Body will have the Confidence to affirm, that the Empire hath been only Succeſſive, and not Elective all this while.

THE ſame I may ſay concerning the Succeſſion of our Engliſh-Saxon Kings, in which tho we find the Son often ſucceeded the Father, or one Brother another, yet does not this prove that the Succeſſion went by right of Inheritance, as it does at this day.

I MAY ſay the like as to Denmark and Sweden, the latter of which has been by Succeſſion but little above fourſcore Years from Charles the Ninth; and as for the former, it has become ſo even in our own Memories: and yet for many Succeſſions in both theſe Kingdoms, he that was the next Heir by Lineal Deſcent, was moſt commonly choſen King after the Death of his Father, Uncle or Brother; but before this Election he could claim no Legal Right to the Crown by the Laws of theſe Kingdoms, of which I ſhall give you divers Inſtances. And I think we may affirm this of all the Kingdoms of the Saxon Heptarchy; where tho the Mycel-Gemots commonly obliged themſelves to chooſe one of the Blood-Royal, and the next Heir rather than any other, provided he were equally fit to govern, eſpecially if he were recommended or deſigned for Succeſſor by the Will of the laſt King; however in this they took a great Latitude, as will evidently appear in the purſuit of this Diſcourſe.

BUT I muſt confeſs the manner how the Saxon Kings came to the Throne is but darkly expreſſed by the words FENG to RICE in Saxon, in Latin Regnum capeſſit, which we have commonly rendered, ſucceeded in, or to the Kingdom: yet thoſe words do not ſignify any Lineal Succeſſion, but are often promiſcuouſly uſed, when the next Succeſſor could have no Title but Election, as ſhall be farther ſhewn by and by.

NOW the beſt way to prove this, I think, will be briefly to ſurvey the Succeſſions of each Kingdom, and the ſeveral Breaches and Alterations that were made therein, upon this ſuppoſed Lineal Succeſſion. 1. Kent. And firſt, to begin with the Kingdom of Kent, of which we indeed have ſcarce any more than the bare Names of the Kings, with but very little of their Actions, for about four Deſcents, till Ethelbert the firſt Chriſtian King there began to reign, only that the Son ſtill ſucceeded the Father.

SO likewiſe from this Ethelbert to Earcombert his Grandſon, for two Deſcents more we find the like ſeeming Lineal Succeſſion; yet for all this doth it not therefore follow, that there might not have been either elder Brothers, or the Sons of them, who were excluded during that Time; ſeeing that we only meet with the next Succeſſor mentioned, without telling us whether there were not ſuch Heirs put by: for under the Year 640. we learn from our Annals, that Earcombert King of Kent ſucceeded Eadbald his Father abovementioned, who yet left an elder Son named Ermenred, that according to the Courſe of Lineal Deſcent ought to have ſucceeded to the Kingdom before his younger Brother Earcombert: but whether he was diſinherited by his Father, or rejected by the People, our Annals mention not, only that this Ermenred left two Sons, who afterwards were made away by one Thunor, Servant to King Earcombert.

Vid. Florence of Worceſter's Genealogy of the Kentiſh Kings at the end of his Chronicle, pag.689. and Will. of Malmesbury, *Lib.*1.p.10,11.

AFTER him Egbert his Son ſucceeded, leaving a Son called Eadric, yet he did not ſucceed as he ought to have done (according to our Modern Opinions) by Hereditary Right, but Lothaire his Uncle, that kept the Kingdom twelve Years from him: But whether he came in by the Teſtament of his Brother, or Election of the People, or by both, neither Bede nor any other Author give us an Account; tho it muſt be confeſſed, that this Eadric was diſcontented at his being thus put by, and therefore fled to the South-Saxons, and joined with them who were then in actual War againſt Lothaire; who happening to be worſted in the Fight where this Eadric commanded, and dying of the Wounds he therein received, Eadric ſucceeded, but whether by Right of Lineal Deſcent, or Election, is no where ſaid: Nor doth his thus making War upon his Uncle prove his Right, ſince we find that King Edward the Elder ſuffered the like Diſturbance from Prince * Ethelwald, the Son of King Ethelred his Father's elder Brother, as you will ſee in the beginning of the Reign of that King, which ended not but with the Life of the ſaid Prince Ethelwald, who pretended to the Crown.

* Vide Saxon Annals, Anno 901, 502.

NOR were Foreign Princes any better ſatisfied with Eadric's Right; for William of Malmesbury tells us, that Ceadwalla made War upon him, and deſtroyed his Countrey, to revenge the Death of King Lothaire his Predeceſſor.

Ibid.

BUT after this Eadric, two Princes, called Webba and Seward, held the Kingdom, which muſt certainly have been by Election, becauſe it is not related, whether they were of the Royal Family or no; but they reigned not long, for Whitred Brother to Eadric ſucceeded them: after whom this Kingdom ſeems to have gone in a Lineal Succeſſion for three Deſcents, as far as to his Sons Eadbert, Ethelbert, and Alric; tho theſe Princes might have been alſo elected, for ought we know to the contrary, for they all reigned ſucceſſively after each other: But whether any of theſe left Sons is uncertain, for Malmesbury tells us, "That after them the Kentiſh "Royal Family decaying, any bold Aſpirer, whom Wealth or Faction "made formidable, obtained that Crown, but how?— Moſt likely by the Election of their Great Councils, for Uſurpations by Force could not well be practiſed in Kingdoms where (there being no ſtanding Army) the King in great meaſure depended on the general good Will of the People.

2. South-Saxons.

BUT as for the next Kingdom, viz. that of the South-Saxons, there is ſo little ſaid of them by any of our Hiſtorians, and they were ſo ſoon ſwallowed up by the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, that we can only gueſs they ſucceeded to the Crown, but it is moſt probable, that it was after the ſame manner as the Kings did in all the other Kingdoms.

I ſhould next treat of the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, according to the courſe of Time wherein it begun, but I intend to reſerve that to the laſt, becauſe it is from them that all our Engliſh-Saxon Kings deſcended, till the Conqueſt.

3. Eaſt-Saxons.

Bede Lib. 2. Cap. 5. & Flor. Wig. pag. 690.

AND therefore I will now give you a brief Succeſſion of the Kings of the Eaſt-Saxons, where they ſeem to have followed in a Lineal Deſcent, till Sebert, the firſt Chriſtian King; and he dying, as Bede relates, left his three Sons joint Heirs of his Kingdom, tho we can find no more than the Names of two of them, viz. Sexred and Seward, who being both ſlain in a Battel againſt the Weſt-Saxons, Sigbert, the Son of Seward, ſucceeded him.

THIS I remark to ſhew you, that this Kingdom did not always go according to a Lineal Succeſſion, for all the three Brothers were Heirs alike: and that the Teſtament of the King alone had not the Power to do this without the concurring Aſſent of the Great Council of the Kingdom, I ſhall prove when I come to diſcourſe of the Succeſſion of the Weſt-Saxon Kings; ſince it is moſt reaſonable to ſuppoſe the ſame General Laws or Conſtitutions concerning it to have been in uſe among them all, until any one can prove the contrary.

Ibid. Cap. 12.

I have no more to ſay concerning theſe Kings of the Eaſt-Saxons, but that after the Death of King Sebbi or Sebba, we are informed by Bede, that Siggard and Swithered his two Brothers, reigned jointly after him, which I obſerve only the further to make good the former Inſtance, of more Heirs than one at a Time.

4. Northumbers.

AND now I come to the Kingdom of the Northumbers, the Lineal Succeſſion whereof being ſo often broken, and ſo very perplexed, it would be tireſome to give you all the particular Inſtances in which the next Heirs by Deſcent were put by, and other Princes of the Blood more remote choſen by the People in their Rooms: ſo that from Ida their firſt King for near three hundred Years, we ſhall ſcarce ever find that Crown ſettled in any one Family for above three Deſcents, but that it was ſtill tranſlated to ſome other Prince of the Blood Royal, which ſeems to have been the moſt general Rule they obſerved, as any one may ſee, who will pleaſe to conſult their Pedigree at the end of Florence of Worceſter.

Vid. The Genealogies of the Saxon Kings at the end of Florence of Worceſter.

AND indeed the frequent Rebellions of this Nation againſt their Kings, and the Depoſing of them ſo as they did, being not only obſerved, but frequently blamed by William of Malmesbury and our other Antient Hiſtorians, I ſhall not draw any Precedents from thence, but ſuch as we find in the very beginning of this Kingdom, and before that People were infected with that turbulent Humour of caſting off their Kings whenever they diſpleaſed them.

Lib. 1. Cap. 3.

TO begin with Ida their firſt King, 'tis true William of Malmesbury will not affirm, whether he made himſelf King by his own Power, or elſe became ſo by Conſent of the People, becauſe he owns it to be very much in the dark; yet Henry Huntington is poſitive, that he was choſen to this Dignity by the Conſent of the Great or chief Men: but after his Death, tho a Prince of great Merit, the Kingdom became divided, and Adda his Son only obtained the Kingdom of Bernicia, whilſt Ælla, the Son of Yffi, of the ſame Royal Lineage, ſucceeded him in that of Deira, which how it could be unleſs by Election, I do not underſtand.

See Florence in the Place above cited.

NOR did any of the Sons of Adda ſucceed him in that Kingdom, but three other Princes, viz. Glappa, Theodulf, and Frethulf, whoſe Relation to the Northumbrian Blood Royal, our Authors do not declare, nor yet how they ſtood in Conſanguinity to each other; only they ſay that after them, Thedorick firſt, and then Ethelrick, the Sons of Ida, ſucceeded in the Bernician Kingdom, which how they could do otherwiſe than by Election I do not find.

Flor. Ibid.

AND note, that theſe ſix Princes laſt mentioned, governed Bernicia, whilſt Ælla being yet alive ſtill reigned in Deira; nor did he, for all he ruled above thirty Years, long ſecure the Kingdom to his Son Eadwin; for he was ſoon expelled by Ethelfrith, the Son of King Ethelrick, who forced him to fly his Countrey, whilſt he commanded both Nations for ſeveral Years, till being at laſt overcome and ſlain in Battel by Redwald King of the Eaſt-Angles; Eadwin again recovered not only his own Kingdom, but that of Deira alſo.

BUT yet he did not enjoy what he had thus obtained many Years, for he loſt his Life in a fight with Penda King of the Mercians, and then Oſric his Couſin-German ſucceeded him in Deira, whilſt Eanfrid, the Son of Ethelfrith, was made King of Bernicia; but he ſoon after being killed by Cadwallo King of the Britains, Oſwald his Brother ſucceeded him, who being alſo ſlain by the ſaid Penda, Oſwin his younger Brother was made King, whilſt Oſwy, the Son of Oſric, reigned in Bernicia, and having cruelly murdered Oſwin, made himſelf Maſter of both Kingdoms; but whether it was done by the Power of the Sword, or by Election, ſince our Authors are ſilent in this Matter, I will not determine. I have only ſet down the Succeſſion of theſe firſt Kings, to ſhew that there was not often any Hereditary Lineal Right to the Crown obſerved among them.

5. Eaſt-Angles.

AS for the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles, the Antient Annals and Hiſtories of that Countrey having been all deſtroyed by the Danes, we have little more than the Names and Succeſſions of their Kings left us, nor yet of thoſe higher than Uffa, (tho it is certain the Eaſt-Angles had fixed themſelves in thoſe Parts long before he began to reign) and thoſe but very lame and defective: For from Ethelbert who was murdered by King Offa, for above threeſcore Years, we have no Account of what Kings reigned in that Kingdom; and it is certain, that upon the Death of Offa and his Son Egfert, the People of the Eaſt-Angles freed themſelves from the Mercian Yoke; but about the Year 855. (as Aſſer in his Annals, and Florence of Worceſter aſſure us) Edmund, (after called the Martyr) being then but fifteen Years old, was Elected and Crowned King of the Eaſt-Angles by the general Conſent of the People of that Kingdom; but they do not inform us who was his Father; yet if we may give Credit to John of Tinmouth in his Sanctilogium, he makes him to be the Son of one Alcmond a Nobleman of the Blood Royal.

I have given you this Inſtance, to let you ſee that they were no Strangers to Elective Kings; for if his Blood alone would have fixed in him any Title, there would have been no need at all of his Election: but this King being afterwards murdered by the Danes, they alſo ſeized on his Kingdom, and held it till it was reconquered by King Edward the Elder.

6. Mercians.

NOR have we much to remark of the manner of the Succeſſion of the Mercian Kings; for tho the Son very frequently ſucceeded the Father, or one Brother or Couſin to another, yet it is as certain that it muſt have been chiefly by an Elective Right, notwithſtanding the Annals and our Hiſtorians do not expreſly mention it: * For Beornred having in the Year 755. treacherouſly ſlain Ethelbald King of the Mercians, Offa a young Man of the Blood Royal, raiſing Forces againſt him, and having driven him out of the Kingdom, he was, as † Ingulph relates, made King in his room by the General Conſent of the Nobles of Mercia; or as || Matthew Weſtminſter words it, “He was by the unanimous “Conſent of the Clergy and Laiety of that Kingdom, Elected and “Crowned King; which without doubt was done in a Great Council of that Nation, for we find that to ſecure the Crown to his own Family, * Matthew Paris in his Life of King Offa, tells us, that in a Great Council aſſembled at Calcuith, Anno 787. he cauſed Egfrid his eldeſt Son, a comely and valiant Youth, to be crowned King, who jointly reigned with him as long as he lived: and that this could not be done without the Conſent and Election of this Great Council, appears by the twelfth Law or Decree made therein, entituled, De ordinatione Regum, viz. "That at the Election or Ordination of Kings, no Man ſhould "permit the Aſſent or Vote of evil Men to prevail, but Kings ſhall be "lawfully Elected by the Clergy and Elders, (i.e. chief Men of the Kingdom) "and not begotten of Adultery or Inceſt, becauſe an Adulterer, "according to the Canons, cannot arrive to the Prieſthood; ſo neither "can he be the Lord's Anointed and Heir of his Countrey, or King of "the whole Kingdom, who is not begot of Lawful Matrimony.

Vid. Sir Henry Spelm. Concil. Vol. 1. Anno 787.

FROM hence the Reader may obſerve, that he who is appointed to be Elected, is alſo called Hæres Patriæ, to let us ſee, that he who was to come in by an Elective Right, was alſo accounted the Right Heir of the Kingdom.

AFTER Egfrid ſucceeded Kenwulfe, who certainly came in by Election, being himſelf very remote from the Crown; for William of Malmesbury ſays, he was in the fifth Deſcent from Cenwalch the Brother of Penda, one of the firſt Mercian Kings; a Title too ſtale in that Age to give a Right without a new Election, ſince his Predeceſſor King Offa could not be admitted to obtain the Crown without it, tho he was in Blood almoſt as near to it, being in the fifth Deſcent from Wibba or Wippa, who was the Father of the aforeſaid Penda.

Lib. 1.

Vid. Chronicon Saxonicum, Anno DCCLV. where his Pedigree is ſet down.

BUT were there no other Proof of this, the Decree of the Council abovementioned ſufficiently evinces this Kingdom to have been elective at that Time.

TO Kenwulf abovementioned, ſucceeded Kenelme a Child, and he is the firſt Example of an Infant's ſucceeding when there was a Male Heir of full Age alive, viz. Ceolwulf the Brother of the ſaid Kenwulf; which I ſuppoſe proceeded from the great Love they bore to their late deceaſed King, and ſome Averſion they had to his Brother, as you will ſee by and by.

Vid. William Malm. Lib. p. 33.

BUT if John of Tinmouth in his Hiſtoria Aurea, (ſtill in Manuſcript in ſeveral Libraries) may be credited, tho he wrote long after thoſe Times, yet out of antient Manuſcripts not now extant, he ſays expreſly, Kenelmum ætate parvulum, ſed animo & pietate magnificum, ad Regem elegerat Amor Populi ſui, i. e. the Love of the People had elected Kenelm to be their King, tho an Infant in Years, yet remarkable for Spirit and Piety.

BUT King Kenelme being murdered by his Siſter Quendride, and ſhe fruſtrated in her expectations of the Crown, our Annals tell us, that then Ceolwulf was advanced to it, (without making any mention at all of King Kenelme) and the next Year expelled his Kingdom by the Faction and Contrivance of Bernulph a potent Nobleman, but however no way related to the Blood-Royal, and ſo conſequently could have no other Title or Pretence but Election, however unjuſtly he came by it.

THE like I may ſay of his Succeſſors Ludican, Wiglaff, Bertwulf, and Burhed; the former of whom was only a remote Kinſman of Bernulph's, and the three latter were all of them of quite different Families: but as for Ceolwulf, who was the laſt that bore the Title of King of Mercia, he deſerves not to be mentioned, being only for a Time made King by the Danes to ſerve their turns, and was quickly after depoſed by them. I have but lightly run over the Succeſſion of theſe Kings, and refer you for the farther Proof to the following Hiſtory, where you will find all the Authors fairly quoted.

BUT now I come to the Succeſſion of the Kings of the Weſt-Saxons, from whom our Engliſh Monarchs derive their Pedigree to this Day: and therefore I ſhall be the more particular in my Quotations out of the Antient Authors concerning the Right which thoſe Princes had to the Crown, and the manner how they attained it.

7. Weſt-Saxons.

AS for Cerdic, and his Son Cynric, the firſt Kings of the Weſt-Saxons, it is certain that they had not the title of Kings before they came over, which the Annals place under Anno 495. as we have already obſerved: nor is it likely that they claimed by any other Title than the Election of their Followers, becauſe we find by the ſame Annals, that it was above twenty Years before they took upon them the Name of Kings; for An. 519. they ſay, Hoc Anno Cerdicus & Cynricus Occidentalium Saxonum Regnum ſuſceperunt; à quo uſque die regnavit Occidentalium Saxonum proles Regia. This Year Cerdic and Cynric began to reign over the Weſt-Saxons, and from that Time the Royal Race of the Weſt-Saxons have reigned to this day.

BUT it muſt be confeſſed, that the Crown from Cerdic to Ceawlin went lineally in three Deſcents from Father to Son; however this doth not prove but that it might alſo have been Elective for the Reaſons at firſt given.

THE ſame may likewiſe be ſaid for Ceolric and Ceolwulph the Nephews of Ceawlin: but that the former of theſe came in by Election is apparent; for upon Ceawlin's being expelled the Kingdom, Cwithelme * his Brother ought to have ſucceeded him in caſe he had no Sons, as we do not read he had: and yet notwithſtanding Ceolric was made King, and this Cwichelme died in the ſame Year with his Brother, viz. DXCIII. as you may ſee in the Annals.

* Vid. Rad. de Diceto, Anno 593.

AND to Ceolwulf ſucceeded Cynegils, Son of Ceol, Brother to the King laſt mentioned; and that he alſo came in by Election is highly probable, becauſe another Cwichelme who was his Brother was made Partner with him in the Kingdom, which could not have been done by his ſole Authority, his own Power at that Time not being abſolute.

Vid. Annal. Saxon. An. 611.

THIS Cwichelme * William of Malmesbury makes to be his Brother; but Florence of Worceſter, and Matthew Weſtminſter, call him his Son: but let him have been whether you pleaſe, it is certain here was no Monarchy, the Kingdom being divided between two who had equal Power. But Cwichelme dying before Cynegills his Brother or Son, the latter left the Kingdom to Cenwalch his Son; tho if Cwichelme was his Son, then Cuthred his Nephew, the Son of * Cwichelme, ought by right of Blood to have ſucceeded his Father.

*Lib. 1. cap. 2.

* Vid. Flor. Wig. An. 666. and the Pedigree at the end of the 4th Book.

BUT this King dying without any Iſſue, || left the Kingdom to Sexburge his Conſort by his Teſtament.

||Vid. William Malmesb. Lib. 1. pag. 13.

AND tho this Example may ſeem to make good Dr. Brady's aſſertion, viz. that the Weſt-Saxon Kings might bequeath the Crown to whom they would, yet that they could not do this without the Conſent of the Eſtates of the Great Council of the Kingdom, I hope I ſhall fully make out before I have done.

BUT this Queen Sexburge dying, or being depoſed, as * Matth. Weſtminſter relates, after ſomewhat more than a Year's Reign, Æſcwin a remote Kinſman ſucceeded her, tho he was ſix Degrees off from Cerdic the firſt firſt King; and therefore he is not likely to have had any better Title than his Predeceſſors, for the Reaſon already given under the Kings of Mercia; and if that will not ſatisfy, then I ſay Centwin his Succeſſor was much nearer to the Crown than he, being younger Son to Cynegils, who had reigned within two Succeſſions before, as you may ſee by the Pedigree at the end of the fourth Book, where are exactly ſet down either from the Annals, or Antient Manuſcripts, in what manner theſe ſeveral Kings ſtood related to each other.

* Flor. Hiſt. Anno 672.

BUT before the Death of Æſcwin, it ſeems by the Saxon Annals, Anno 785. That Ceadwalla, a Prince of the Blood Royal, taking Arms, began to contend for the Crown of that Kingdom, tho he was very far removed from it, being deſcended from Cutha the younger Son of Ceawlin.

Vid. Annal. Saxon. Anno 693.

TO Ceadwalla ſucceeded Ina, to whom that King upon his going to Rome left the Crown, tho he was no nearer to it than his Predeceſſor, being deſcended from Cuthwin, the youngeſt Son of Ceawlin abovementioned, and could for certain have had no other Right than that of Election, becauſe Cenred his Father was alive at the ſame time, as you may ſee in the * Preface to this King's Laws, where he is expreſly ſo called.

*Vid. 1ſt Vol. of Sir Henry Spelman's Councils, as alſo the enſuing Hiſtory.

BUT as for the five next Princes, viz. Athelhard, Cuthred, Sigebyrht, Cynewulf, and Bryhtric, it is moſt probable that they neither could have any other Title than Election, ſince being only Kinſmen and not Sons to each other, it is very unlikely that ſo many of them ſhould have died without leaving any Son to ſucceed them: which is alſo as good as confeſſed by William of Malmesbury, in theſe words, Nam & ipſe Brihtricus, & cæteri infra Inam Reges, licet naturalium ſplendore gloriantes, quippe qui à Cerdicio originem traherent, non parum tamen à linea Regiæ ſtirpis exorbitaverant; i. e. For tho Brihtric himſelf, and the reſt of the Kings ſince Ina, tho boaſting of their Royal Lineage, as drawing their Origine from Cerdic, yet did they not a little deviate from the right Royal Line, that is, they were not Lineal Heirs by Blood: and if ſo, what other Right could they have except that of Election by the People? Therefore ſince neither our Annals, nor any other Author that I know of, have given us their Pedigrees, I have been forced to ſet down the Names of theſe laſt five Kings by themſelves, without being able to ſhew you what Relation they had to each other.

BUT as for Cynewulf, that he could have no Title to the Crown but what Election gave him, it is certain; for our Annals inform us under Anno 755. “That he with the Wiſe and Noble Men of the “Weſt-Saxons, deprived King Sigebert of the whole Kingdom for his “Cruelty and Injuſtice. And certainly then the ſame Authority that Depoſed the one, muſt alſo Elect and ſet up the other; ſince he could by no means ſucceed him as his Heir, becauſe we find in the ſame Annals, “That Cyneheard the Brother of the late King Sigebert, conſpiring againſt King Cynewulf, ſet upon him in a certain Woman's “Houſe at Merton in Surrey, and there ſlew him; and was at laſt “alſo killed himſelf: after whom Bryhtric began to reign, who was “in a Right Line deſcended from Cerdic.

BUT we are now come out of the Dark into clearer Times; for K. Egbert ſucceeding Bryhtric, came in by Election, being, as our Annals likewiſe inform us, four Deſcents removed from Ingilds the Brother of King Ina; and that his beſt Title was Election, appears from the Teſtimonies of our moſt antient Hiſtorians, viz. Ethelwerd, who ſays expreſly, Itaq; ordinatur Egberht ſuper Occidentales Saxones in Regnum; this muſt ſignify, that he was ſet over the Kingdom. And further to confirm that, Ordinatur here ſignifies the ſame with Eligitur: ſee the Law abovementioned concerning the Election of the Mercian Kings; the Title of it in Sir Henry Spelman's firſt Volume of Councils, is, de Ordinatione Regum, i. e. of the Election of Kings.

Fol. 292.

AND that by this word Ordinatur, cannot be meant any Lineal Succeſſion in Ethelwerd, will further appear from him, where he ſays, Poſt Obitum Athulfi Regis, ordinati ſunt filii ejus in Regnum; which muſt be underſtood either an Appointment by the Father's Will, or elſe a new Election, ſince theſe Sons of King Æthelwulf could never be thus appointed or ordained Kings by the Law of Lineal Succeſſion, becauſe each of theſe Brothers, except the Eldeſt, left Sons.

Lib. 4. Cap. 1.

BUT William of Malmesbury does likewiſe as good as own, that King Egbert came in by Election, when he ſays, that upon the Death of Brytrich, Egbert at the frequent Solicitations of his Countrey-men coming over into Britain; Moxq; imperare juſſus, Patriæ Deſideriis ſatisfecit, being immediately commanded to reign, did thereupon ſatisfy the Deſires of his Countrey. Now I would fain know, if he had come in by virtue of a Lineal Deſcent, why he ſhould have needed the being commanded to reign, ſince he ought rather to have commanded their Allegiance as his Due?

Lib. 2. Cap. 1.

AND either to this Time, or rather to the latter end of this King's Reign, (as you may find in the enſuing Hiſtory) I ſuppoſe may be referred what the Author of the Mirror of Juſtices, in the very beginning of the Book, ſays concerning the firſt Election of a King to reign over the reſt of the Saxon Sovereign Princes, viz. “That forty of them made him to ſwear, that he would maintain the Holy Chriſtian Faith with all his Power, and govern his People according to Right, without regard to any Perſon: and that he ſhould be liable to ſuffer Right, (i. e. Judgment) as well as others of his People.

THIS Paſſage, tho it be accounted by ſome of but a doubtful Authority, becauſe of the forty Princes abovementioned, whereas we never read of above ſeven or eight Saxon Kings to have reigned at once, and thoſe too were by this Egbert reduced to three beſides himſelf, viz. the Eaſt-Angles, Mercia, and Northumberland; yet if by the Princes here mentioned, we underſtand not Sovereign Princes, but Ealdormen of Counties and Great Cities, who (as Mr. Selden ſhews us in his Titles of Honour) are commonly ſtiled in the old Saxon Charters Principes, and by this Author in his French Original, rendred Princes; theſe meeting together in a Great Council, did, as the chief Magiſtrates of the Cities and Counties from whence they came, injoin the King this Oath which was taken at the General Council mentioned in the enſuing Hiſtory under Anno 803, or elſe 828. This Paſſage in the Mirrour of Juſtices, if it were taken out of ſome old Saxon Monument now loſt, (as I have great reaſon to believe it was, ſince the Laws which he here relates concerning King Alfred, are admitted by the Learned Author of the Notes upon his Life, printed at Oxford, to have been tranſcribed by him from ſome Antient Commentaries of that King, which Laws he there a little after recites:) I ſay, this Paſſage may ſerve as a great Proof, not only of this King's Election to be the Chief or Supream King of all England, but alſo it gives us the Original Contract, if I may ſo call it, which he then entred into with this Nation, at the time of his Election and Coronation.

Selden. Tit. Hon. Fol. 502. laſt Edition.

The Diviſion of England into Counties was much more antient than King Alfred.

Ælfredi Magni Vita, Fol. 82.

TO Egbert ſucceeded Athelwulf his Son; who, though I grant it is no where ſaid that he was Elected, yet if his Father were ſo (as it is moſt evident he was) it is not likely that the Kingdom ſhould become Succeſſive in one Deſcent, eſpecially if we conſider the manner of all his five Sons coming to the Kingdom, either in his Life-time, or after him.

Vid. Annal. Saxon.& Flor. Wig. *An.*636. * Flor. Hiſt. Anno 637.

FOR as to Athelſtane his eldeſt Son, on whom he beſtowed (almoſt as ſoon as he came to the Crown) the Kingdom of Kent, with the South and Eaſt-Saxons, I have proved in the enſuing Hiſtory from * Matthew Weſtminſter and other Authors, that he was Illegitimate, and ſo could have no Legal Right of Succeſſion: nor does it ſeem probable, he ſhould be ſet over thoſe Kingdoms by his Father without any previous Election, or Conſent of thoſe People.

* Vid. Annal. Aſſerii, Anno 855. pag. 56. edit. per Doct. Gale, & De Geſtis Ælfredi, pag. 3.

AND as for his other four Legitimate Sons, Ethelbald, the Eldeſt of them, did by the General Conſent of the King and the whole Nation, (which amounts to an Election) * divide the Kingdom with his Father, he himſelf enjoying that of the Weſt-Saxons, whilſt his Father ruled over the reſt. And by the virtue of his Teſtament, confirmed likewiſe by the General Conſent of the Kingdom, Ethelbald remained only King of the Weſt-Saxons, whilſt Ethelbert his ſecond Brother reigned in Kent, as alſo over the Eaſt and South-Saxons, which had been his Brother Æthelſtane's ſhare, who died without Iſſue for ought we can find.

BUT, after King Ethelbald's Death, Ethelbert ſucceeded in the whole Kingdom; and he likewiſe dying, Ethelred his Brother ſucceeded him, after whoſe Death alſo Alfred the youngeſt Brother came to the Throne.

THIS ſhort Account is the Truth of the Matter of Fact; yet there requires a great deal to be ſaid to have it well underſtood; ſince Dr. Brady in his true and exact Hiſtory of the Succeſſion of the Crown, Vol. 1. of his Introduction, will needs derive the whole Right which theſe Princes had to the Kingdom, from the Entail of it by their Father's Will abovementioned; and if the Teſtament of a King then Regnant could diſpoſe of the Crown to the prejudice of the Right Heirs by Lineal Deſcent, I deſire this Learned Antiquary to ſatisfy us how this could conſiſt with his ſuppoſed Right of Lineal Succeſſion at the ſame Time?

BUT the Truth is, this worthy Doctor, as well as the Author of the great Point of Succeſſion diſcuſſed, here deal with us like ſome crafty Witneſſes, who indeed ſpeak the Truth, but not the whole Truth, if they find it will make againſt them. For the Doctor in the firſt Place conceals, and the nameleſs Author of the other Pamphlet, either wilfully or ignorantly, poſitively denies, that King Alfred's three elder Brothers, who reigned before him, left any Iſſue Male; whereas it is moſt certain that two of them, if not all Three, left Sons behind them: for Athelm and Æthelwold, (to whom King Alfred by his Teſtament bequeaths divers Lands therein mentioned, under the Title of his Brother's Sons) are ſuppoſed by the Learned Author of the Notes upon his Life, to have been the Children of King Ethelbald his eldeſt Brother, er, tho whether they were ſo or no I will not be ſo confident as to ffirm. But that they were either the Sons of Ethelbald or Ethelbert is oſt certain, and conſequently they ought to have reigned before him who was but their Uncle.

Vid. Teſtament. Alfredi Regis.

AS for King Ethelred, he had alſo two Sons if no more, viz. Alfred, uppoſed to be Grandfather to Elthelwerd the Hiſtorian, and Oſwald, whom Mr. Speed, in the Reign of this King, ſays was a Witneſs to his Father's Charter to the Abbey of Abington: but the Author of the Notes to King Alfred's Life being convinced of this, to ſolve an Ob- ection ſo directly contrary to the received Hypotheſis of a Lineal Succeſ- ſion, is feign to take refuge in a ſuppoſed Arbitrary Power the Engliſh-Saxon Kings had of diſpoſing of their Kingdom as a Fee-Simple: which is ſuch a Conceit, that if he would but have been pleaſed to put down the firſt ſeven or eight Lines of King Alfred's Teſtament, inſtead of that Scrap he has there given us of it, it would have ſufficiently confuted that Aſſertion. Therefore ſince he has been ſo fair as to give us this Teſtament at full length in the ſecond Appendix to the ſaid Life, I will make bold to tranſcribe ſo much as will be enough to evince the contrary, and leave the Reader to conſult the reſt at his leiſure.

* EGO Ælfredus Divino Munere, labore ac ſtudio Athelredi Archiepiſcopi, nec non totius Weſt-Saxoniæ Nobilitatis Conſenſu paritèr & Aſſenſu, Occidentalium Saxonum Rex, quos in teſtimonium meæ ultimæ Voluntatis complementi, ut ſint advocati in diſponendis pro ſalute Animæ meæ, Regali Electione confirmo, tàm de hereditate, quam Deus at Principes cum ſenioribus populi miſericorditèr ac benignè dederunt, quàm de hæreditate, quam pater meus Æthelwulfus Rex nobis tribus fratribus delegavit, videlicet Æthelbaldo, Ætheredo, & Mihi; ità quod qui noſtrum diutiùs foret ſuperſtes, Ille totius Regni Dominio congauderet.

* Printed alſo at the end of Aſſer deGeſtis Alfredi.

See the Tranſlation of this Will at the end of K. Alfred's Life.

NOW I would gladly be ſatisfied from the Author abovementioned, in theſe three Points, if King Æthelwulf had full Power to bequeath the Kingdom to his Sons, and to turn it from a Fee-Simple into a Fee-Tail;

FIRST, Why K. Alfred in the very firſt Line of this Teſtament calls himſelf King of all Weſt-Saxony by the Divine Donation, and the Aſſent and Conſent of the whole Weſt-Saxon Nobility, if he had not been Elected, or at leaſt Confirmed by them in the Poſſeſſion of the Crown, ſo bequeathed to him by his Father?

SECONDLY, When he here ſummoned them to be Witneſſes to the compleating and confirming of this his laſt Will, why he diſtinguiſhes that private Inheritance which he had given him by the Grace of God, and the Favour and Bounty of his Nobility and People, from that publick Inheritance which his Father had beſtowed on him and his two Brothers, ſo that the longeſt Liver of them ſhould enjoy the whole Kingdom? But,

THIRDLY, if his Father's Teſtament alone could have given his Brothers and him an abſolute Right to the Kingdom, how came it to paſs that he ſtiles himſelf King by the Aſſiſtance of Arch-Bp Athelred, with the Aſſent and Conſent of the whole Weſt-Saxon Nobility? and what neceſſity was there for him to ſummon them only to be Witneſſes thereof, if their Confirmation were no ways neceſſary thereunto? I fear he will not be able to anſwer theſe Queries, unleſs he will grant that this laſt Will of King Alfred wanted as much their Confirmation, as that of his Father had done before.

AND this may be plainly proved, not only from the beginning of the Will it ſelf, but alſo from an Agreement therein recited to have been “ made between the three Brothers abovementioned; by Virtue of “ which they dying, the whole Inheritance of King Ethelwolf his Fa- “ ther was devolved upon him by a certain Charter made in the Mycel “ Gemote, or General Council of the Kingdom, at Langdene; which “ being read before the Witneſſes, (i. e. all the Eſtates) of all Weſt- “ Saxony, they unanimouſly declared, that they knew of none who had “ a juſter Title than himſelf. And yet you muſt not forget, that both his ſaid elder Brothers had left Children behind them.

WHEREUPON the ſaid Eſtates farther declared thus, Ecce jam habes tuam hæreditatem iterum in Manibus tuis. Nunc de Bonis & Poſſeſſionibus conde Teſtamentum tuum; lega, & dona tuo proximo ſanguini vel Amicis tuis & Cognatis ſicut tibi placuerit. To which the King replied, Et Omnes illi firmitatem irrevocabilem mihi fecerunt, & ſubſcripſerunt, ipſos nunquam hereditatem meam alicui homini aliter pervertendo daturos, præterquam cui Egomet legabo die proximo jam inſtante.

FROM whence it is moſt evident, that it was to the Conſent of the Eſtates of the Kingdom that King Alfred owed the Power of making this his laſt Will, and of bequeathing only the private Inheritance which his Father and Brothers had left him; and where, tho he diſpoſes of the ſeveral Lands therein mentioned, firſt to his eldeſt Son Edward, then alſo to his younger Son, whom he does not name, and his two Nephews and others; yet he pretends to make no Bequeſt of the Crown, which one would think he would by no means have omitted, had he had any ſuch unlimited Prerogative abſtracted from the Conſent of the Kingdom, to have diſpoſed of, or entailed it, as his Father had done before him, tho not without or againſt the ſaid Conſent, to which it appears every one of his Predeceſſors chiefly owed his Title.

NOW give me leave to draw two Concluſions from the whole Will, which I have almoſt tranſlated verbatim at the end of King Alfred's Life in the following Hiſtory.

FIRST, That it was then indeed in the Power of the King to make his Will, and bequeath his Kingdom; but how? with the Conſent and Aſſent of the Eſtates; and the Perſon or Perſons to whom it was thus entailed, came in ſucceſſively by virtue of ſuch Deſignation: and therefore * Aſſer very well and juſtly calls King Athelwolf's Will, Hereditariam, vel Commendatoriam Epiſtolam, i. e. a recommendatory Letter to the Eſtates of the Kingdom to elect his Sons; but if no ſuch Bequeſt was made, and ſo confirmed as aforeſaid, then the Eſtates of the Kingdom were at liberty to chooſe the Eldeſt Son, or next Brother or Kinſman, if he were of fit Age and Capacity, for their Sovereign; nay, the King's Teſtament or Adoption preceding, a meer Stranger to the Royal Blood might be capable of ſucceeding, provided he alſo had the Election or Confirmation of the Great Council of the Kingdom, as I ſuppoſe Queen Sexburgha the Wife of King Cenwalch had; and as you will further find Harold, the Son of Earl Godwin, obtained, towards the end of this Volume.

* De Geſtis Alfredi.

SECONDLY, That the Perſon ſo deſigned was called the Heir of the preceding King, and enjoyed the Inheritance thus acquired Jure Hæreditario, i. e. by Hereditary Right, tho he was not the next Heir in Blood to him that went before him, as is clearly manifeſt from this Teſtament it ſelf, wherein King Alfred plainly diſtinguiſhes between the Dominions which he and his Brother King Ethered were to conquer, and thoſe that came to him Jure Hæreditario, i. e. by Hereditary Right, viz. by Virtue of his Father King Ethelwulf's Will; therefore when the Crown fell to King Alfred by virtue of that Entail, Abbot Ailred expreſly ſays, ad Eum totum Regnum jure Hæreditario tranſiit, &c. And yet King Alfred could not be Lineal Heir to his Brothers, ſince they both left Sons behind them, as hath been already obſerved.

De Genealog. Regum Ang. Col. 351.

AND in the ſame Senſe King Edward the Confeſſor, in the Preface to his Charter to the Abbey of Weſtminſter (which you may find at large in Monaſt. Anglican.) having recited the Miſeries the Nation had undergone from Wars raiſed by Strangers, which were to that extremity, Adeo ut pene periclitata ſit hæreditaria Regum Succeſſio, magnúmq; eſſet interſtitium inter fratrem meum Edmundum, qui Patri meo ſucceſſit, méq; habitum ſit; invadentibus Regnum Sweyno, & Cnuto filio ejus, &c. where you may obſerve he calls his own Succeſſion to his Brother, Hæreditaria Succeſſio; and yet his Brother left a Son behind him, who was Living when he was choſen King. Thus alſo Eadmerus relates, that Duke William claimed the Crown of England, Jure Hæreditario, from King Edward the Confeſſor's Teſtament; but certainly the Duke could have no pretence to it by Right of Blood, being no ways deſcended from the Engliſh-Saxon Kings.

1 Vol. pag. 59.

Hiſt. Eccleſ. Pag. 5.

SO that it is a manifeſt Errour in ſome of our Modern Writers of the Succeſſion, who will needs underſtand theſe words, jus Hæreditarium, to have been uſed in the ſame Senſe in thoſe, as they have been taken in later Ages, ſince the Crown came to be claimed by a Lineal Deſcent of Blood: But indeed Eadmerus his Senſe of theſe words is moſt agreeable to the Civil Law, wherein he is called HÆRES EX ASSE; who comes in as Heir by Teſtament to the whole Inheritance, tho no way related to the Teſtator; for that Law deſcribes an Heir thus, Hæredis ſignificatione, omnes ſignificari Succeſſores, etſi verbis non expreſſi: And therefore our Bracton derives the word Hæres, ab Hæreditamento; for ſays he, Inheritance is a Succeſſion to all the Right which the Predeceſſor (he does not ſay Anceſtor) enjoyed: from whence you may obſerve, that in Bracton's Time, this word Hæres was not even by our Law limited only to an Heir by Blood or Deſcent.

HAVING ſaid thus much of our Saxon Kings Acceſſion to the Throne, as far as King Alfred; I ſhall in the next Place proceed to give you the Succeſſion of all the reſt, down to the pretended Conqueſt, from the moſt Antient Authors who lived either a good while before, or elſe not long after that Time, before Men's Minds became prejudiced by thoſe Notions of Lineal Succeſſion, which began to be in Vogue about the Time of Edward the Third, when the Crown had deſcended from Father to Son for four Deſcents, tho not without ſomewhat that was tantamount to an Election in that Prince himſelf.

TO King Alfred ſucceeded his Son King Edward the Elder, who, not having the Crown bequeathed to him as his Father had, viz. by Will, confirmed by an Act of the Great Council, was fain to be Elected, as Chron. Ethelwerdi. Lib. 3. Ca. 3. An. 901. Ethelwerd expreſly tells us in theſe words, Succeſſor equidèm Monarchiæ poſt filius ſupra memorati Regis coronatur, ipſe Stemmate Regali, à Primatis ELECTUS Pentecoſtis in die: that is, afterwards Edward the Son of the abovementioned King, being Succeſſor of the Monarchy, was Crowned; and being deſcended of the Blood Royal, was Elected by the Chief Men of the Kingdom on the day of Pentecoſt, (i. e. Whitſunday).

AFTER this Edward's Deceaſe, Æthelſtan his Son ſucceeded him, whom moſt Antient Writers, as well in Print as Manuſcript, relate to have been begot of a Concubine, and therefore could have no Legal Right: and tho William of Malmesbury endeavours to palliate it, yet he is almoſt forced to confeſs it at laſt by ſaying, Sed Ipſe præter hanc Notam (ſi tamen vera eſt) nihil ignobile habuit, i. e. that he had no other Mark of ill upon him but this, if it were true.

BUT tho Dr. Brady will have this Prince to have ſucceeded wholly Lib. 2. Cap. 6. by virtue of his Father's Will, and cites William of Malmesbury for it, who, he ſays, has theſe words in the Hiſtory of Edward the Elder, Juſſu Patris in Teſtamento Æthelſtanus in Regem acclamatus eſt; by the Command of his Father, in his Will, Æthelſtan was proclaimed King; yet he might have been ſo fair and ingenuous as to have given us the words that are in the very beginning of this Chapter in the ſame Author, viz. Itàq; magno Conſenſu Optimatum ibidèm Athelſtanus ELECTUS, apud Regiam Villam quæ vocatur Kingſton Coronatus eſt; i. e. That thereupon by the General Conſent of the Chief Men or Eſtates of the Kingdom, Athelſtan being Elected, was Crowned at the Royal Town of Kingſton: but this did not agree with the Doctor's Hypotheſis, and ſo I ſuppoſe he thought it beſt to leave it out.

THIS Paſſage was borrowed by William of Malmesbury from a much Antienter Author, viz. the Compiler of the Saxon Annals, who under Anno 925. expreſly tells us, That he was Electus in Regem, & apud Cingeſtune Conſecratus, Elected King, and Anointed at Kingſton: from both which it appears, that the Election and Conſecration were then two different Actions.

AFTER Athelſtan, ſucceeded Edmund his Brother, and indeed ought to have been King before him, he being Legitimate, whereas the other was only a Natural Son.

BUT he dying, and leaving two Sons behind him, Edwy and Edgar, neither of them, but Edred, King Edmund's younger Brother, was advanced to the Throne; which how it could be done unleſs by Election, I confeſs I do not underſtand: and therefore this might be omitted as to this Prince, as well as the Coronation of King Edgar, and other of our Engliſh-Saxon Kings are both by our Annals and Antient Hiſtorians; for I muſt own I cannot find that the word Electus is uſed in his Advancement to the Throne: for Ethelwerd tells us expreſly, ejus Succeſſor extitit Ethelwerdi Hiſtor. Cap. 7. Eadred in Regnum, ſuus quippe frater; that Eadred his Succeſſor obtained the Kingdom, becauſe he was his own Brother.

AND in this he is followed by Florence of Worceſter, who expreſſes it thus, Edredus proximus hæres fratris ſuccedens, Regnum ſuſcepit; Edred ſucceeding as next Heir to his Brother, enjoyed the Kingdom.

Dr. Brady in his above-cited Treatiſe, will needs ſolve this open Breach of a Lineal Succeſſion, by the Nonage of King Edmund's Sons, and the Nation's then being under great Difficulties. The former of theſe

I grant to be a good Excuſe, but as for the latter it was not at all true; ſince King Edmund, by ſubduing both Northumberland and Cumberland, driving the Danes out of the one, and delivering the other to the King of Scots, to be enjoyed as his Vaſſal, had thereby ſufficiently ſettled the Peace of the Nation: ſo that let the Doctor take his choice, and either allow this King to have ſucceeded by Election, or elſe if by Succeſſion, it was no Lineal one, as the Doctor would maintain, becauſe theſe Hiſtorians tell us, he ſucceeded his Brother as next Heir, when at the ſame time they confeſs too, that he left two Sons behind him; and if the Nation's lying then under great Difficulties, will be a good Warrant to ſet by a Right Heir, I deſire he would be pleaſed to ſatisfy me, why it may not always be a juſtifiable Reaſon to make a Breach upon the Succeſſion in the like Caſes?

AS for Edwy, Nephew to this King, indeed I do not find any thing mentioned in the Annals or other printed Authors of his Election; yet the Antient Manuſcript Life of Arch-biſhop Odo, now in the * Cottonian Library, and which ſeems to have been written by ſome Monk not long after that Time, ſays expreſly, Edwigus Filius Ædmundi in Regem ELECTVS eſt. Nor indeed could he ſucceed as Heir to his Uncle, for his Lineal Right was before him: nor does the Expreſſion commonly uſed in the Saxon Annals, viz. FENG to RICE, (which is rendered in the Latin by capeſſit Regnum) ſignify any thing concerning the manner of this or any other King's coming to the Crown, "Theſe being, as the "Doctor himſelf acknowledges, the uſual Saxon and Latin words, by "which the Succeſſion is expreſſed, being variouſly rendered by Tranſlators, by Regnum capeſſit, ſucceſſit, or Electus eſt: and thus we likewiſe find the ſame words are uſed in the Annals to expreſs King Æthelſtan's and Eadred's, nay Harold's Acceſſion to the Throne, tho it is evident none of them could claim by any Lineal Succeſſion.

* Otho.D.12.

True and exact Hiſtory of the Succeſſion of the Crown, fo. 3,9.

AND theſe are not the only words made uſe of in the Saxon Chronicle when an Election is ſignified; for An. 1015, we find theſe words concerning the Election of K. Edmund Ironſide, that the Wites or Wiſe Men who were at London, and the Citizens, Gecuron Eadmund to Cynge, i.e. choſe Edmund King. So likewiſe Anno 1036. concerning the Election of Harold Harefoot, that all the Thanes North of Thames, and the Seamen of London, Gecuron Harold, to rule over all England: the ſame word we alſo find Anno 1066. where after the words FENG to RICE abovementioned, theſe likewiſe follow, and eac men Hine hær to Gecuron; i.e. all Men Elected him, viz. Harold, to the Crown.

AND that there may be no diſpute about the meaning of this word Gecuron, we find it often uſed in theſe Annals for the Election of the Pope, as, e.g. Anno 1054. upon the Death of Pope Leo, Victor wæs gecuron to Papan. So likewiſe Anno 1057. upon the Death of Victor, wæs Stephanus Gecoren to Papan; and I think the Doctor might with as much appearance of Truth have maintained, that the Saxon word Gecuron here rendred by the Latin Electus in theſe Annals, ſignified not the Election, but Recognition of the Pope; as to aſſert (as he does) with ſo much Confidence, that Eligerunt in all Hiſtorians ſignifies no more than Recognoverunt, when uſed concerning our Engliſh Saxon Kings; i.e. the Subjects acknowledged, owned or ſubmitted to him as their King, as he ſays concerning King Edgar and others.

Vid. Exact Hiſtory of the Succeſſion, p. 7,9.

BUT King Edwy being caſt off by the Mercians and Northumbers, our Annals inform us, that Eadgar Ætheling (FENG to RICE, i. e.) ſucceeded to the Mercian Kingdom, which yet was no otherwiſe than by Election; for an Antient Manuſcript Life of Arch-biſhop Dunſtan, written before the Conqueſt, and now in the * Cottonian Library, ſhews us plainly, that both the Mercians and Northumbers Elected him for their King: the words are theſe, Hoc itàq; Omnium Conſpiratione relicto, eligêre ſibi, Domino dictante, Eadgarum ejuſdem Germanum in Regem; i. e. This King Edwy by the Conſent of all Men being thus deſerted, they choſe, the Lord directing them, Eadgar his Brother for their King.

AND hereupon the Kingdom becoming divided between him and the King his Brother, that Diviſion was alſo confirmed by a publick Act of the Eſtates, as the ſame Author teſtifies; Sicq; Univerſo populo teſtante, Publica Res Regum ex Definitione Sagacium ſegregata eſt, ità ut famoſum Flumen, Thamenſis Regnum diſterminavit Amborum; tunc Edgarus à prædicto populo ſic ſortitus ad Regnum, &c. i. e. So that all the People being Witneſſes, each of theſe King's ſhares were apportioned and ſet out by the Decree of the Wites or Wiſe Men; and the Noble River of Thames was the Boundary of both their Kingdoms; then Edgar was advanced to the Kingdom by the aforeſaid People. x

BUT Edwy dying not long after, the ſame Author relates of this Edgar, that Regnum illius velut æquus hæres ab utròq; populo ELECTUS, ſuſcepit; that is, that upon his Death Edgar as Right Heir being Elected both by Clergy and Laity, ſucceeded to his Kingdom. x

FROM whence we may obſerve, that the ſame Perſon who is here called the Right Heir, yet needed an Election upon his Brother's Death to confirm his Title, and gain him an Admiſſion to the Throne of the whole Kingdom; which is alſo confirmed by Florence of Worceſter, whoſe Citation the Doctor himſelf here makes uſe of thus, Ab omni Anglorum populo Electus, Regnum ſuſcepit; which ſhews that a new Election by all the People of England was neceſſary, tho he was King of part of it before.

AFTER the Death of King Edgar, our Hiſtorians tell us, there was a Conteſt between Prince Edward, and his Brother Ethelred, concerning their Succeſſion to the Crown; which, ſays William of Malmesbury, was ſet on foot by Elfrida the Wife of King Edgar, and Mother-in-Law to Edward; which divers of our Authors tell us, was becauſe thoſe of her Faction pretended that Egelfrida, the Mother of Prince Edward, was never married to King Edgar; for otherwiſe there could have been no Colour why the elder Son ſhould not be preferred before the Younger, eſpecially ſince he was alſo recommended by his Father's Will: and indeed it is left very much in the dark, whether the Lady laſt mentioned were ever Edgar's lawful Wife or not: For the Annals, and more Antient Hiſtorians, are wholly ſilent in it; nor does any Writer make mention of that Lady as King Edgar's Wife, till John of Wallingford, who lived in the Reign of King Henry the Third.

BUT be it as it will, whether Prince Edward was Legitimate or not, his Father however had left him (as Florence of Worceſter ſays) Heir of his Kingdom, as well as of his Vertues; yet we alſo learn from Simeon of Durham, that Quidam Regis filium Edwardum, Quidam illius fratrem eligerunt, Ethelredum; quam ob cauſam Archipræſules Dunſtanus & Oſwaldus cum Co-epiſcopis, Abbatibus, Ducibuſq; quamplurimis in unum convenerunt, convenerunt, & Edwardum, ut pater ejus preceperat, eligerunt, electum conſecrarunt, & in Regem unxerunt. "Some Elected Edward the King's "Son Edmund, ſome his Brother Ethelred; wherefore the Arch-Biſhops, "Dunſtan and Oſwald, with the Biſhops, Abbots, and very many No-"blemen being gathered together, Elected Edward, (as his Father "had commanded) then Conſecrated and Anointed him King.

Sim. Dunelm. 975.

THIS ſhews it ſo plain from the Doctor's own Tranſlation of the words, that Prince Edward (notwithſtanding his Father's Will) was firſt Elected, and then Anointed King, that I needed not have added any further Remark to it, had he but faithfully rendred the Latin Text as he ought to have done; but he has unhappily left out one material ſmall word, and that is Electum, that ſo the unwary Reader might not obſerve that thoſe Kings were firſt Elected, before they could be Anointed.

BUT I have not yet done with this Prince, nor with the Doctor, for John of Tinmouth in his Hiſtoria Aurea (now in Manuſcript in the Lambeth Library) tells the Story of this Election thus:

EDGARO Rege mortuo, & Edwardo ad Regnum relicto, dum quidam principes acquieſcere nollent, Dunſtanus arrepto Crucis Vexillo in medio conſtitit, Edwardum illis oſtendit, elegit, ſacravit; that is, King Edgar being Dead, and Edward left Heir of the Kingdom, whilſt ſome of the Chief Men would not Conſent to it, Arch-Biſhop Dunſtan taking up the Banner of the Croſs, placed him in the midſt, and ſhewing him to them, he Elected, and then Conſecrated him.

SO that I will leave it to the impartial Reader to judg, whether theſe words Eligerunt and Electum, here ſignify no more than recognoverunt; "As the Doctor will have them, i. e. they acknowledged, owned, "ſubmitted unto him as their King, as his Father had commanded, and "by Will appointed, as the Doctor has been pleaſed to Paraphraſe it. But I would adviſe him in the next Edition of this Treatiſe, or any other he writes upon this Subject, to ſhew us an Example out of any Antient Roman Authors, nay, any Gloſſary of the more barbarous Ages, where the word Electus or Eligerunt, ſignifies Recognition.

FOR as to all his Inſtances out of his own Gloſſary at the end of his Introduction, inſtead of Preſidents, I may boldly ſay they are only meer Cavils againſt the Right and Manner by which the Kings or Biſhops he there mentions came to obtain their Thrones or Sees; for that the Monks who wrote of them, ever meant by ſuch their expreſſions that they were truly Elected, he himſelf cannot deny, which alſo proves the Falſhood of that his Aſſertion, wherein he affirms, "That the old "Monks ſaid every one was ELECTED, that had not an HEREDI-"TARY Title; and tho he was ſet up by the ART or VIOLENCE "of a Faction, or obtained the Crown by Force and Arms without Ti-"tle, yet according to them he was ELECTED, when as the PEOPLE "only received and ſubmitted unto them when they could not help it, "and it may be becauſe there was much Shouting, and many Accla-"mations at his Reception.

Ibid pag. 38.

BUT I hope the Preſidents I have here now given will evince the contrary, ſince of all the Kings that have been already mentioned to have been Elected, I deſire him to ſhew me one, concerning whom the word Election can mean no more than a bare Recognition or Acclamation of the People, when they firſt received and ſubmitted to them; whereas indeed they were then ſolemn and deliberate Acts of Choice by the whole Eſtates of the Kingdom.

BUT ſince the Inſtances that the Doctor brings for this his Opinion are all after his Conqueſt, when he fancies the Nation totally ſubdued, and their Liberties loſt; I ſhall reſerve the Conſideration of the Force of thoſe Authorities till my Introduction before my next Volume, if God ſhall grant me Life to finiſh it.

BUT to return from whence ſome perhaps may think this too long a Digreſſion.

Bibliothec. Cotton. Nero. cap. 7.

KING Edward being murdered by the Inſtigation of his Mother, Ethelred his Brother ſucceeded him; and tho the Doctor again ſeems to put ſome ſtreſs on the words FENG to RICE, as if he had come in by Lineal Succeſſion, yet that he was alſo Elected as well as his Brother, I deſire he would conſult the Antient Annals of the Monaſtery of Thorney in the Cottonian Library, great part of which is written in Saxon Letters, and either ſome time before, or elſe not long after the Conqueſt, and there under Anno 978. he will find theſe words, Eadwardus Rex occiditur, Atheldredus eligitur, that King Edward was killed, and Ethelred Elected.

Id. ſub Effigie Claudii. A.3.

AND for a Proof of this, there is in the ſame Library the form of the Coronation of that King and his Queen, which hath theſe words in it.

* i. e. the Ld. or Prince to be elected; whence the Spaniſh and Italian Titles of Seignior.

* SENIOREM per manus producant Duo Epiſcopi ad Eccleſiam, & Clerus hanc decantet Antiphonam, duobus Epiſcopis præcinentibus.

FIRMETUR manus tua, ut ſupra verſic.

GLORIA Patri, &c. perveniens Rex ad Eccleſiam proſternat ſe coram Altare, ut hymnizetur.

TE Deum Laudamus; Te Dominum confitemur.

QUO finito tenus ymnizato, Rex erigetur de Solo, & AB EPISCOPIS ET A PLEBE ELECTUS. Hæc tria ſe ſervaturum jura promittat, & clara Voce coràm Deo omniq; Populo dicat. Hæc tria populo Chriſtiano, & mihi ſubditis in Chriſti promitto nomine, IMPRIMIS, ut Eccleſia Dei, & omnis populus Chriſtianus veram pacem noſtro arbitrio in omni tempore ſervet.

SECUNDO, Ut Rapacitates, & omnes Iniquitates omnibus gradibus interdicam.

TERTIO, Ut in omnibus Juditiis æquitatem & miſericordiam præcipiam, ut mihi & vobis indulgeat ſuam miſericordiam clemens & miſericors Deus, qui vivit, &c. His peractis omnes dicant, Amen.

AND for a farther Confirmation of the Truth of this Oath, there is alſo an Antient Saxon Copy of it, together with a Latin Verſion which differs but little from that now cited, and is ſaid to be that Oath which Arch-Biſhop Dunſtan adminiſtred to this King at Kingſton on the Day of his Coronation; at the end of which Oath it is alſo ſpecified, that ſo long as the King obſerves it, he will thereby obtain both Earthly Glory, and alſo God's Mercy; ſo if he breaks it, he will ſtill paſs from bad to worſe, as well in reſpect of himſelf, as People, unleſs he repent. This you will find printed both in Saxon and Latin, in the ſecond Book of King Alfred's Life, printed at Oxford from an Antient Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library.

Cleopatra. B. 13.

I ſhall not trouble you with a verbal Tranſlation of all this long Oath; only obſerve thus much, that hereby it appears plainly that King Ethelred had been before Elected by the Clergy and Laity, in order to be crowned King; which is further confirmed by that old Saxon imperfect Ritual of the Coronation of the Engliſh Saxon Kings and Queens, part of which Mr. Selden hath given us in his Titles of Honour, where Seld. Tit. Hon. pag. 116. in the Prayer upon the Anointing we find theſe words, Reſpice propitius ad preces noſtræ humilitatis, & ſuper hunc famulum tuum illum quem ſupplici Devotione in Regem ANGLORUM vel SAXONUM pariter ELIGIMUS, Benedictionum tuarum Dona multiplica; as alſo what Id. pag. 140. follows in the ſame Chapter, in the Bleſſing after the Coronation, in giving him the Scepter. Benedic, Domine, hunc PRE-ELECTUM Principem, qui Regna omnium Regum à ſæculo moderaris. Amen.

NOW from both theſe Places above quoted, we may ſafely conclude, that an Election did moſt commonly precede the Coronation of our Engliſh Saxon Kings; which I think is made ſo evident by theſe Authorities, that it needs no farther Enlargement; nor ſhould I trouble my ſelf about it were it not to expoſe the Obſtinacy of ſome Men, as well as to continue the Series of this Succeſſion (which perhaps would ſeem lame to others without it) down to the Conqueſt.

TO go on therefore where we left off, after the Death of King Ethelred, the Saxon Annals tell us, that Omnes Proceres, qui in Londonia erant, & Cives, eligerunt Eadmundum in Regem, i. e. All the Chief Men, (or Witan, as it is in the Saxon, i. e. Wiſe Men) that were at London, and the Citizens, choſe Edmund for their King; and yet he was his Father's eldeſt Son, tho whether Legitimate or not is uncertain: for we do not find any antient Author till after the Conqueſt, that mentions Ethelred's being married to the Mother of this Prince; and if he was not, this Son of his could have no other Title but Election. This is alſo confirmed by Ingulph, who ſays, Cui (Ethelredo) ſucceſſit in Regnum, Londonenſium & Weſt-Saxonum Electione, Filius ejus primogenitus Ingulph. fol. 507. b. lin. 5. Edmundus, &c. i. e. Edmund his eldeſt Son ſucceeded his Father Ethelred, by the Election of the Londoners and Weſt-Saxons, in the Kingdom.

BUT tho our Saxon Annals are ſilent of it, yet an Antient Manuſcript Chronicle, wrote about the Time of the Conqueſt, now in the Cottonian Library, relates, that about the ſame Time that King Edmund Otho. D. 7. was thus Elected, Epiſcopi, Abbates, quiq; Nobiliores Angliæ Canutum in Regem eligere, the Biſhops, Abbots, and ſeveral of the Chief Men of England choſe Cnute for their King; which is alſo confirmed by Florence of Worceſter in theſe words under this very Year. Poſt cujus mortem maxima pars Regni tàm Clericorum quàm Laicorum in unum congregati, pari conſenſu Cnutonem in Regem eligerunt, & ad eum Suthamptoniam veniens pacem cum eo pepigerunt, & fidelitatem jurabant; i. e. after whoſe Death (viz. of King Ethelred) the greateſt part of the Kingdom, as well of the Clergy as Laity, being met together, choſe Cnute for their King; and coming to Southampton made Peace with him, and ſwore Fidelity; but he there ſays nothing of his Coronation.

THESE Teſtimonies concerning Ethelred and Edmund being thus plain, I confeſs Dr. Brady has been ſo juſt as to cite them, and fairly to tranſlate that Paſſage in Ingulph by the word Election, whereas it ſhould have been Recognition, if it had ſuited with his Hypotheſis; as he does alſo that of Florence of Worceſter, rendring the word Eligerunt, by choſe him King: if therefore it were a true Election in one caſe, then ſurely it muſt be ſo in the other, for the ſame Reaſon.

BUT the nameleſs Author of the Great Point of Succeſſion diſcuſs'd, tho he does wilfully conceal all the printed Authorities above mentioned, yet being hard preſs'd with this Paſſage of King Cnute, has no other way to evade it, but by ſaying, "That Canutus, by the Terror "of his Arms, having the greateſt part of the Iſland at his Devotion, "forced them to acknowledg and receive him for their King, which "they being under an apparent Force, could not refuſe to do.

THE falſeneſs of which Aſſertion I will not go about to prove in this Place, but refer the Reader to the enſuing Hiſtory, where he will find that the Perſons abovemention'd, were not ſo forced by the Terror of his Arms, as to acknowledg him for their King, ſince London (then, as ſtill) the Capital City of the Nation, with many others of the Nobility, had before Choſen King Edmund, who by their Aſſiſtance was ſtrong enough immediately after his Election to fight the Danes at the great Battel at Aſſendune; and therefore if voluntarily, yet it was treacherouſly done of them, to quit the Prince who ought to have been Elected, and to chooſe a Stranger and an Invader over his Head: and whether the Gentleman this Author writes againſt, had ridiculouſly called King Cnute's Acceſſion to the Throne an Election, as he would have it, I ſhall leave to the impartial Reader's Judgment.

AFTER the Death of King Cnute, our Annals relate, that at a Witena-Gemot or Great Council being held at Oxford, Leofricus Comes, & omnes propè Thani à Boreali parte Thamiſis, & Nautæ de Lundonia eligerunt Haroldum in Regem totius Angliæ, dum ejus Frater Hardecnutus eſſet in Denmearcia, i. e. Leofric the Earl, and almoſt all the Thanes North of the Thames, and the Sea-men of London, choſe Harold King of all England, whilſt his Brother Hardecnute was in Denmark; which is alſo confirmed by * Ingulph, and † William of Malmesbury, who farther report, "That the Engliſh had a Mind to chuſe Edward the Son "of Ethelred, or at leaſt Hardecnute the Son of Cnute by Emme his "Wife, the Widow of King Ethelred, who was then in Denmark.

† Lib. 2. c. 12.

BUT Henry of Huntington ſays expreſly, Haroldus filius Cnuti in Regem Electus eſt. But Radulphus de Diceto is yet more expreſs as to this Election of Harold, as appears by this Paſſage under An. 1038. Haroldus Rex Merciorum & Northymbrorum, ut per totam regnaret Angliam, à Principibus & omni Populo Eligitur, i. e. Harold King of the Mercians and Northumbers, that he might reign over all England, is Choſen by the chief Men and all the People: whence you may obſerve, that tho he were then King of the Mercians and Northumbers, yet that ſtill needed a new Election to make him King of all England.

NOW if this were ſo, as the Doctor himſelf has ingenuouſly cited it in his ſaid Treatiſe; I deſire he would let us know, where was then the Right of Lineal Succeſſion, when the People of England would fain have choſen Edward, who could not be Right Heir of the Crown ſo long as the Children of his Elder Brother were alive, tho then in Exile? nor could Hardecnute have any Right ſo long as Harold his Elder Brother was alive; whom alſo, as our Hiſtorians relate, his Father had appointed Succeſſor at his Death, tho whether that be true or no, is much to be doubted.

BUT the Author of the aforementioned Great Point of Succeſſion, &c. (to evade this Proof of Harold's Election) will have all this Point in Controverſy to have been, who had the moſt Right, and beſt Title to the Crown of thoſe two, Harold or Hardecnute, and that Earl Godwin objected Harold's Illegitimacy, and the Will of the deceaſed King; of all which there is not one word mentioned in any of our moſt Antient Hiſtorians, only he cites a Scrap in the Margin, as he thinks, out of Brompton, (but it ſhould be Simeon of Durham, for no ſuch thing is to be found in the former Author) viz. That Harold ——— quaſi juſtus hæres cœpit regnare, nec tamen ità potentèr ut Canutus, quia juſtior hæres expectabatur Hardicanutus, i. e. as juſt Heir, but yet not ſo abſolutely as Cnute, becauſe the juſter Heir (Scil. Hardecanute) was expected, which he is pleaſed to call him, becauſe he falſly ſuppoſes that none could have a Right to the Crown but one of Queen Emma's Children. But this Writer cunningly leaves out the preceding Words with a daſh, becauſe they make againſt him, which I ſhall here add, atq; conſentientibus quamplurimis MAJORIBUS natu Angliæ, quaſi Juſtus hæres, &c. So that it ſeems his Right to reign, proceeded from the Conſent of the Eſtates of the Kingdom.

SO that granting, as this Author ſuppoſes, That Hardecnute had been left Heir by his Father King Cnute's Teſtament, yet you ſee this could only give him a Precedency of being firſt Propoſed, and Elected.

HAROLD dying after a few Years Reign, Hardecnute was ſent for out of Flanders to ſucceed him; yet this could not be as his Heir, being but of the half Blood, and his ſuppoſed Brother only by his Father's ſide: and therefore Henry of Huntington ſays expreſly, that Poſt Mortem Haroldi Hardecnute filius Regis Cnuti illicò ſuſceptus eſt, & ELECTUS in Regem ab Anglis, & DACIS, i. e. After the Death of Harold, Hardecnute the Son of King Cnute was preſently received, and Elected King by the Engliſh and Danes. †

Lib.6. p.365.

† which is also related by y book of Abingdon above mentioned, wher after the death of King Cnut he proceeds thus, post eum in Regem constituitur Haraldus filius ut ferebatur ipsius Regis ex concubina progenitus &c. i.e. after him Harold his son (as 'tis reported) by a Concubine is ordained King.

HARDECNUTE dying ſuddenly after, about two Years Reign, the abovecited Antient Chronicle in the Cottonian Library, proceeds to tell us, that Mortuo Hardecanuto, Eadwardus Annitentibus maximè Comite Godwino & Wigornenſi Livingo, levatur Londoniæ in Regem, i.e. that Hardecnute being dead, Edward by the Aſſiſtance chiefly of Earl Godwin, and Living Biſhop of Worceſter, was advanced to the Throne at London.

Otho D. 7.

WILLIAM of Malmesbury words it thus, ſpeaking of Earl Godwin, Nec mora, congregato concilio Londoniæ, rationibus ſuis explicitis, Regem effecit. From whence it appears, that by Godwin's means he was made King at a Common-Council of the Kingdom.

Lib.2.cap.13.

BUT Ingulph is yet more expreſs, who ſays, Poſt ejus (Scil. Hardecanuti) obitum, Omnium Electione in Edwardum concordatur, maximè cohortante Godwino Comite. i. e. that after the Death of Hardecnute, it was unanimouſly agreed upon to Elect Prince Edward; Earl Godwin chiefly adviſing it.

Pag. 895.

AND Henry Huntington goes yet a ſtep higher, and writes thus, Edwardus cum paucis venit in Angliam, & Electus eſt in Regem ab omni populo. Prince Edward coming into England with but a few Men, was Elected King by all the People: which is alſo confirmed by an Antient Manuſcript Chronicle of Thomas of Cheſterton Canon of Litchfield, in the Cottonian Library, who under Anno 1042. ſays thus, Edwardus dus filius Athelredi Regis, ab omni Populo in Regem Electus, & Conſecratus eſt.

Lib.6. p.365.

Cleopatra. C. 3.

BUT the Doctor very cunningly conceals all this concerning his Election, Lib.6. cap.9. and only gives us a ſhred out of Guilielmus Gemeticenſis in theſe words, Hardecanutus Edwardum totius Regni reliquit hæredem; that is, left Edward Heir of the whole Kingdom: but ſo far indeed the Doctor Page 8. is in the Right, “ That he could be no other than a Teſtamentary Heir, “ there being other Heirs of the Right Line, both of Saxon and Daniſh “ Blood before him. But it may well be doubted, whether the Author laſt mentioned, being a Foreigner, may not be miſtaken, if he means the words hæredem reliquit, for a Bequeſt by Will, ſince no Engliſh Hiſtorian that I know of mentions any ſuch thing: and indeed it is highly improbable that this Prince made any Will at all, ſince all Writers agree that he died ſuddenly at a Drunken Feaſt, in the very Flower of his Age; and as it is not likely he made any Will before, ſo it was impoſſible he could do it at his Death.

BUT this Election of King Edward farther appears, from the mean and abject Carriage which this Prince ſhewed, (as you will find in William of Malmesbury) towards Earl Godwin, when he was ſo far from claiming the Crown, that he only deſired he would ſave his Life, till the Earl encouraging him, put him in hopes of obtaining the Kingdom upon Promiſe of marrying his Daughter; which he would never have done, had he had ſo fair a Pretence as the laſt Will of his Brother Hardecnute to recommend him to the favour of the Eſtates of the Kingdom; and if that alone would have done, to what purpoſe ſhould he need afterwards to be Elected?

THIS is in part acknowledged by the Doctor; but to palliate it, he “ will have Godwin, (a Council being immediately called) by his Reaſon “ and Rhetorick to make him King; (it ſeems then he was to be made ſo) but he dares not ſay one word of his Election, for fear it would betray “ the Cauſe which he has ſo ſtrenuouſly laboured to advance.

AND therefore he thinks he has now nothing more to do, but to expoſe and ridicule the Legend of the Abbot of Rievalle in making Edward the Confeſſor to be elected King in his Mother's Womb: which tho I grant to be as abſurd as to drink a Prince of Wales his Health before he is born, yet the Abbot had certainly no ground for this Story, unleſs he had been ſufficiently convinced that this was an Elective Kingdom in the Time of King Ethelred his Father.

BUT if the Reader deſires further Satisfaction concerning the Circumſtances of this King's Election, I ſhall refer him to the Antient Annals of the Church of Wincheſter, which I have faithfully tranſcribed out of the firſt Volume of Monaſticon Anglicanum, and inſerted into this Volume under Anno 1041. where he will find the whole Hiſtory of this Prince's Election and Coronation, written by a Monk of that Church not long after the Conqueſt; theſe Annals are alſo in Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library, to which I muſt likewiſe by the Favour of its honourable Poſſeſſor, own my ſelf highly obliged for ſeveral conſiderable Remarks in this Hiſtory of the Succeſſion of our Saxon Kings.

BUT to draw to a Concluſion upon this Subject; King Edward (as appears by our Annals) in the Year 957, ſent over for his Couſin Prince Col.189.n.20. Edward, ſirnamed the Out-Law, Son of King Edmund, out of Hungary, as Simeon of Durham relates, Illum ſe Regni hæredem conſtituere, that he might appoint him Heir of the Kingdom: which had been a very idle Thing had the Kingdom been Hereditary, and that it had been his undoubted Right by Proximity of Blood.

THIS Prince dying ſoon after his coming over, we no where find, that King Edward ever offered to do the like for his Couſin Edgar Atheling; but on the contrary forgetting his own Family, Ingulph tells us, that the Year before his Death, he ſent Robert Arch-Bp of Canterbury his Fo.512. n.40. Ambaſſadour, to let William Duke of Normandy know, Illum deſignatum eſſe ſui Regni ſucceſſorem, that he had appointed him Heir of his Kingdom: which relation tho I have proved to be falſe as to Arch-biſhop Robert, towards the end of this enſuing Hiſtory; yet might it be true in the main, and ſome other Biſhop might have gone over to Duke William on that Meſſage; but however, for all this, King Edward afterwards adopted Earl Harold upon his Death-bed, for which we have very good Authority, ſince our Saxon Annals teſtify it in theſe words, Page 172. Tunc Haroldus Comes capeſſit Regnum, ſicut Rex ei conceſſerat, Omneſq; ad id Eum eligebant, & conſecratus eſt in Regem in Feſto Epiphaniæ, which was the ſame day that King Edward was Buried.

THIS is alſo confirmed by the Hiſtory of the Abby of Ely, written not long after the Conqueſt, and lately publiſhed by the Learned Dr. Gale, Quo (Scil. Edwardo) tumulato, ſubregulus Haraldus Godwini Lib.2. cap.43. fol. 515. Ducis Filius, quem Rex antè ſuam Deceſſionem Regni Succeſſorem eligerat, à totius Angliæ Primatibus ad Regale Culmen ELECTUS eſt, Die eodem ab Aldredo Eboracenſi Archiepiſcopo in Regem honorificè conſecratur; which alſo agrees with Florence of Worceſter, and Simeon of Durham under Anno 1066. almoſt in the very ſame words, and by Eadmerus (who Page 5. lived not long after the Conqueſt) in theſe words, Juxtà quod Edwardus ante mortem ſtatuerat, ſucceſſit HARALDUS.

FROM all which remarkable Teſtimonies I ſhall draw theſe two Concluſions.

FIRST, That this Teſtamentary Deſignation of Harold by King Edward for his Heir, was not ſufficient alone to make him King, but it alſo required a ſubſequent Election of the Eſtates of the Kingdom.

SECONDLY, That there is an apparent Diſtinction here made between his Election and Conſecration.

AND I think this enough, had I no more to ſay, to ſettle this Point; but to let the Reader know the utmoſt that may be objected againſt theſe Authorities, I muſt freely confeſs, that divers Writers of good Credit and Reputation, who lived after the Conqueſt, viz. Ingulph of Croyland, William of Malmesbury, Ailred Abbot of Rievalle, and Henry of Huntington, look upon this Donation of King Edward as a meer Pretence, invented by the Engliſh in Prejudice of the Norman Duke.

BUT how they will be able to anſwer thoſe plain and full Authorities I have before cited, I know not: for William of Malmesbury himſelf was alſo forced to confeſs, that King Harold claimed not only by virtue of Edward's Deſignation, but by the Election of the Great Council of the Kingdom, as appears by this Memorable Paſſage, viz. Ille VVill. Malmesbur. de Geſtis Anglorum Lib. 2. Fol. 55. (ſcilicet Haraldus) in his Anſwer to William then Duke of Normandy, de puellæ nuptiis referens, de Regno (addebat) præſumptuoſum fuiſſe, quod abſq; generali Senatûs & Populi Conventu & Edicto, alienam illi hæreditatem juraverit, i. e. “That Harold, ſpeaking of the Mar“ riage of the Duke's Siſter, further added, that it was a very preſumptuous thing to ſwear away another's Inheritance to him, without the General Act and Appointment of the Senate and People, that is, the Nobility and Commons.

THIS ſhews, that it would have been a moſt notorious Falſhood for Harold thus to have gone about to impoſe upon Duke William, had there never been any ſuch thing as a Real and Solemn Election, which our abovementioned Authors have related.

Dr. Brady's Anſwer to Argum. Antinorman. fol.238.

NOR is Dr. Brady's Objection againſt this at all material, in ſaying, that thoſe who thus ſet him up, were only a Court Faction, for the People all England over could never have notice to come to, or ſend their Repreſentatives to ſuch a Solemnity, as to elect and crown him King in four and twenty Hour's Time; and therefore ſhould his Election be granted, he could not be choſen by the People, who had neither Notice nor Knowledg of it, but only received and ſubmitted to him as their King.

NOW in anſwer to this I need only ſay, that if the Doctor would have been ſo fair as to have conſulted Sir Henry Spelman's firſt Volume of Councils, or the firſt Volume of Monaſticon Anglicanum, he would have found in both of them, (in the Charters of the Foundation of the Abby of Weſtminſter, and the Hiſtory of that Church printed in the Latter) that it was not (as he ſays) never to have been imagined; for it was really true, that the Eſtates of the Kingdom did meet a little before Chriſtmaſs, (ſecundùm Morem, according to Cuſtom) and not only ſo, but were expreſly ſummoned to be preſent at the Great Solemnity of the Conſecration of that Abbey, which was, as our Annals inform us, on St. Innocent's day, and the King dying on the Tweſth-day following, this Great Council (which certainly was a full one) was ſo far from being then Diſſolved, that it choſe Harold for their ſucceeding King, as the ſaid Annals relate: The nicety of the Diſſolution of a Parliament upon the King's Deceaſe not being at that time known.

I think this is ſufficient to anſwer all that the Doctor has, or I ſuppoſe can ſay upon this Head; therefore I will now leave it to the Reader to conſider, how far any of his Aſſertions are true.

True and exact Hiſtory of the Succeſſion, Fol. 7.

AS firſt, “ Whether the ſure Rule of Succeſſion was either Right of Blood?

OR Secondly, “ Whether the bare Nomination or Appointment of the preceding King, was then thought and allowed as Cauſe ſufficient for the Father to prefer his Brother's Son before his own, or a Baſtard before his Lawful Iſſue, or that the Inſtances which he hath produced will be able to make it out; or elſe whether thoſe very Inſtances, which I have here ſet in their true Light, do not directly evince the contrary?

Id. Fol. 9.

THIRDLY, Whether from this foregoing Hiſtory of the Succeſſion, it appears alſo to be true what he aſſerts, viz. “ That from Egbert the firſt Saxon Monarch, to Ethelred the laſt by Right of Blood, we do not read of many Elections for the ſpace of two hundred and ſixteen Years; and that thoſe we meet with are bound and limited by Proximity of Blood, or Nomination of the Succeſſor by the Predeceſſor, and that where the word Election or any thing in that Senſe is uſed, it ſignifies only a Recognition and Submiſſion? And I will now leave it to the Reader's Judgment, if I have not given ſufficient Inſtances to the contrary in every one of theſe Particulars, there being not above two Kings in all this long Series of more than two hundred and ſixty Years, concerning whom I have not brought expreſs Teſtimonies from Authors of undoubted Credit both in Print and Manuſcript, of their Election by the Eſtates of the Kingdom. Or,

FOURTHLY, Whether his laſt Aſſertion be any truer than the former, viz. “ That the Daniſh Kings, after Sweyn had conquered the “ Kingdom, (whoſe beſt Title was the Sword) either brought hither “ the Cuſtom of the Predeceſſor, naming or giving the Kingdom to “ the Succeſſor, as probably it might have been practiſed in their own “ Kingdoms, or uſed it as they found it here practiſed by the Saxon “ Kings? Or whether the Authorities I have already cited do not expreſly prove, that every one of the three Daniſh Kings came in by Election, and that Harold Harefoot was the only Prince of thoſe Three, who could make any pretence to it by Teſtament? Id. ibid.

AND as for the Saxon Kings that reigned before them, how far they by their laſt Wills alone could diſpoſe of, or entail the Crown, without the concurrent Aſſent and Conſent of the Great Council of the Kingdom, I refer the Reader to that part of King Alfred's Will, I have here made uſe of for his farther Satisfaction, if he have ſtill any doubt left about it.

I have now diſpatched this exact and faithful Hiſtory of the Succeſſion of our Engliſh Saxon Kings, in which I am not conſcious to my ſelf that I have either added or diminiſhed any thing material to, or from the Authors which I have made uſe of; I deſire to be believed that I have not wrote this to prove, that the Succeſſion to the Crown ought at this day to be Elective in the ſame manner as it was before the Conqueſt, but only to obviate and remove the falſe Opinions or Prejudices of ſome Men, who by the plauſible Repreſentations of the Doctor and others, have been ſo far prepoſſeſſed as to believe, that an Hereditary Succeſſion to the Crown hath been as Antient as the Monarchy it ſelf; whereas we find that Sweden and Denmark have from Elective become Hereditary Kingdoms in a much leſs ſpace of Time: And I ſuppoſe no Man of thoſe Countries would aſperſe any Writer there, of being an Enemy to Monarchy for aſſerting ſo evident a Truth; and therefore I hope I may find the ſame fair Quarter at Home, notwithſtanding the Doctor's Inſinuations before his abovecited Hiſtory of the Succeſſion of the Crown, That none but Papiſts, Fanaticks, or Common-Wealth's Men, (a Liſt of whoſe Works he there gives us) would dare to write for, or maintain this Opinion. But if Parſons the Jeſuit has happened in his Diſcourſe of the Succeſſion, to write ſome Truths concerning it, I am no more to be thought Jeſuitical for following (not him, but) the Authors from whom he took them; than I ſhould be if I had wrote a Mathematical Diſſertation founded upon Demonſtrations from Euclid, which had been before made uſe of by Tacquet, or any other Learned Jeſuit, that has wrote upon that Subject.

AFTER the Election, I ſhall ſay ſomewhat of the Coronation of our Engliſh Saxon Kings, which ſometimes was performed on the ſame Day on which they were Elected, and ſometimes ſeveral Days, nay, Months after, as appears by the Coronation of King Edward the Confeſſor; who tho he were Choſen King in June not long after his Brother Hardecnut's Deceaſe, yet was he not Crowned till the Eaſter following, as you will find in the Saxon Annals under the Years 1041, 1042. But Harold his Succeſſor (to make the Crown the ſurer) was Elected and Crowned the ſame Day. This Solemnity of the Coronation, was moſt commonly performed by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, yet was it not at firſt done in the Church, but in the open Air; thus the Kings Athelſtan, Edmund, and Edred, are expreſly mentioned by our Hiſtorians to have been Crowned in the Market Place of Kingſton upon Thames: and I ſuppoſe the like had been uſed in the Coronation of former Kings, ſince it is not taken notice of as an Innovation.

BUT to ſay ſomewhat of the forms of thoſe Crowns which our Kings then wore, it appears from their Coins that they were at firſt no other than Diadems like thoſe of the Greek Emperors in that Age, and from whom they were borrowed: thus Offa King of the Mercians is Graven on his Coin with a Diadem of Pearls about his Head; but our great King Alfred has no more than a bare Head-band, or Circle, which ſeems to have been tied behind, as you may ſee in his Coins. And tho I confeſs there is alſo a Coin of one K. Egbert with a Coronet of Rayes upon his Head; yet that this was not of our K. Egbert, but rather of him that was King of Northumberland, who began to reign An. 867, I rather incline to believe. As for King Edward the Elder, he has in his Coins only a kind of Diadem upon his Helmet, King Athelſtan, Edmund and Eadred his Brothers being the firſt of our Weſt-Saxon Kings, who wore Crowns with three Rayes, or Points higher than the reſt; and therefore I look upon it as a Fiction in them who will needs have it, that K. Alfred was Crowned with a Crown wrought with Flower de Lices; becauſe ſuch a Crown was kept among the Regalia at Weſtminſter before our late Civil Wars, in a Box, upon whoſe Cover was this Inſcription, Hæc eſt Principalior Corona cum qua Coronabantur Reges, Ælfredus, Edwardus, &c. Which having been the Crown of Edward the Confeſſor, it was very eaſy for the Monks of that Church who kept thoſe Regalia in after times, to inſcribe what they pleaſed upon this Box, ſince it added ſo much to the Antiquity and Reputation of this Crown: and I am the more inclined to this Opinion, becauſe I find King Cnute, and Edward the Confeſſor, to be the firſt Kings who wore Diadems adorned with Flower-de-Lices, as appears by their Coins.

I ſhall in the next Place ſay ſomewhat of the Titles by which our Weſt-Saxon Kings ſtiled themſelves in their Laws and Charters; and to begin with King Egbert, (however Supreme he were over all the reſt of the Kings then reigning in England, yet we cannot find that he ſtiled himſelf more than, Rex Weſt-Saxonum in any of his Charters; for as for Laws we have none of his left us. The like I may ſay for his Succeſſors Ethelwolf, and his Sons and Grandſons, as far as King Athelſtan, who for ought I can find was the firſt Prince that upon his Victories over the Danes and Scots, changed his Title of Rex Weſt-Saxonum, or Anglorum alone, which was uſed by his Predeceſſors, to this that follows, Ego Æthelſtanus Rex Anglorum, per omnipotentis Dextram totius Britanniæ Regno ſublimatus, as you will find it in his Charter in William of Malmesbury, de Geſtis Pontif. as alſo in the ſame Place you will find this King's Title to have ſomewhat varied; for on a rich Box, or Shrine, given by this King to keep the Relicts of the Saints in, was engraven this Inſcription, Ego Æthelſtanus totius Britanniæ & multarum nationum in circuitu poſitarum poſitarum Imperator, &c. which Title was alſo made uſe of by his Brother King Edmund, only inſtead of Imperator, he ſtiles himſelf Gubernator & Rector, as appears by his Charter to the Church of Glaſtonbury, ſet down by the ſame Author above-mentioned, in his * Antiquity of the Church of Glaſtonbury, which was alſo uſed by King Edgar, tho with ſome difference, who inſtead of Rector & Rex, ſtiled himſelf totius Albionis Baſileus in divers Charters; but this proceeded from the corrupt Stile of that Time, or elſe the particular Fancy of the Clerk or Monk who drew the Charter: And tho inſtead of this word Baſileus, King Ethelred his Son again made uſe of Rex, yet the reſt of the Title remained the ſame, and was alſo continued by King Knut; however he ſometimes ſtiled himſelf Rex totius Albionis Inſulæ, & aliarum Nationum plurimarum. What Titles his Sons had I do not find, becauſe I have not ſeen any of their Charters; only we may here obſerve, that ſeveral Kings before Cnute, ſtiled themſelves Kings not only of Albion, or Britain, but of ſeveral other Nations round about, by which could only be meant that Superiority they aſſumed at that time over the Kings of Scotland, Wales and Northumberland, before that Country was reduced into the form of a Province, and was governed by Earls.

Lib. 4. pag. 362,364. publiſh'd by Dr. Gale.

* Pag. 318. publiſhed in the ſame Vol. by Dr. Gale.

I now come, in the next place, to give you an Account of the chief Powers and Prerogatives of our Engliſh-Saxon Kings; ſome of which I find ſet down in our Saxon Annals at the end of the Year 693, at the Council of Becanceld, where the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury thus defines them in his Decree at the Concluſion of that Council. Regum eſt, ſays he, conſtituere Comites, Duces, Vice-Comites, & Judices; it is the Office of Kings to conſtitute Earls, Ealdormen, Sheriffs and Judges.

TO which we may alſo add the Power of Coining Money, which being then the Prerogative of the Crown, was granted by Charter to the Arch-biſhops of Canterbury and York, as likewiſe to the Abbots of Medeſhamſted or Peterborough, and to ſeveral other Abbies; as may be ſeen in Monaſticon Anglicanum, as well as in the Annals themſelves. Some Inſtances of which I have given you in the enſuing Hiſtory, not omitting ſome of the Coins which are ſtill preſerved in Cabinets, ſome of whoſe Figures are to be found in the Collection of Saxon Coins before King Alfred's Life, as alſo before the new Edition of Camden's Britannia.

BUT that any of thoſe Kings had Power by their own Royal Prerogative, to enhance or debaſe the intrinſick Value of the Money, coined either in their own or other Mints, I can no ways believe, ſince ſuch a Prerogative would have highly tended to the Loſs and Defrauding of the Subject, for which that Power was never deſigned; nor do I find our Kings ever aſſumed this Prerogative to themſelves, till later Ages. And in Confirmation of this the † Mirror of Juſtices recites it as an old Law of the Saxon Times, that no King of this Realm could change, embaſe, or enhance his Money, or make other Coin than of Silver, ſan's l'aſſent de touts ſes Counties, i. e. without the Aſſent of Parliament; as Sir Edward Coke in his ſecond Inſtitutes, hath on very good grounds interpreted this Expreſſion, in that Author Andrew Horne, who lived in the Reign of King Edward I.

Artic. ſuper Chartas, cap. 20. p. 576.

TO theſe we may further add, that of pardoning Offendors their Lives in ſeveral Caſes, ſuch as ſtriking in the King's Palace, &c. which he might alſo take in Caſe of Homicides; but ſtill reſerving the Wiregilds, or Compenſations that were to be made to the Friends or Relations of the Parties ſlain, which it was not in his Power to releaſe, as appears by ſeveral Paſſages in our Saxon Laws, ſome of which I have inſerted in this Volume; whence, I ſuppoſe, are derived the Appeals of the Wiſe, Son, or Brother, in Caſe of Murder at this day.

BUT as for the Power of making War or Peace, ſince I find little ſaid of it in our Hiſtories, I ſhall not be poſitive in aſſerting any thing concerning it: only ſhall obſerve, that in every Peace made by the King upon Payment of Money, the Conſent of the Eſtates of the Kingdom was required; for Taxes could not be raiſed without it, as you will find in our Annals under the Years 994, 1002, 1006, 1011, when that extraordinary Tax of Danegelt was raiſed to be paid to the Danes for purchaſing a Peace of them. And as for the Power of making Foreign War, that could alſo ſignify little, ſince thoſe Kings had not the Prerogative of raiſing Money without the Conſent of their People, any more than our Kings have at this day: nor were their Revenues ſo much in Money, as in Proviſions for their Houſhold.

NOR can I omit here taking notice, that the Engliſh Saxon Kings wanted one great Prerogative, which ours exerciſe at this day, viz. the power of granting away the Demeſnes of the Crown, even to pious Uſes, without the Conſent of the great Council of their Kingdoms: and of this we find a remarkable Inſtance in Sir H. Spelman's firſt Vol. of Councils, where Baldred King of Kent had given the Mannor of Mallings to Chriſt-Church in Canterbury; but becauſe the chief Men of his Kingdom (i. e. the Great Council) had not conſented to it, it was revoked until K. Egbert afterwards by the Conſent of his WITTENA GEMOT made a new Grant thereof: and this was alſo the reaſon why the Foundations and Infeodations of Abbies were always confirmed and atteſted by all the Eſtates as well Spiritual as Temporal, as you will find by moſt of their Charters in Monaſt. Anglican. of which I have inſerted ſome Examples in the Hiſtory it ſelf; ſo that I ſhall leave it to the Reader's Conſideration, whether thoſe Princes that could not diſpoſe of their Crown-Lands without the Conſent of the Great Council of the Kingdom, could without the like Conſent diſpoſe of the Crown it ſelf as they pleaſed, as Dr. Brady in his * Hiſtory of the Succeſſion, &c. aſſerts, tho without any juſt Grounds, as hath been already proved.

* Pag. 7, 8.

BUT thoſe Kings great Prerogative chiefly conſiſted in giving their Sanction to all Laws that were made, as well relating to Civil as Eccleſiaſtical Matters, that did not concern Doctrines of Faith: but this is ſtill to be ſo underſtood, that this Prerogative could never be exerted without the Advice and Conſent of the Mycel-Gemot, or Great Council of the Realm; at which, tho they were often firſt drawn up into Form, and then propoſed by the King, yet was their Authority alſo neceſſary for the enacting of thoſe Laws, without which they could no ways oblige the Subject, as ſhall be further ſhewn towards the end of this Diſcourſe.

BUT ſince I have given you ſo large an Account how our Kings then obtained the Crown, it may perhaps be expected I ſhould ſay ſomewhat now concerning the manner of their loſing it, ſometimes by other ways than Death.

IN order to this I deſire the Reader would obſerve, that not only in England, but in all the Kingdoms of Europe, that were raiſed upon the Ruins of the Roman Empire after the Gothic Model, the ſame mix'd manner of Succeſſion, partly by Teſtament, partly by Election, did in thoſe days chiefly prevail: Of which Monſieur Mezeray himſelf is ſo ſenſible, that in his Abridgment of the * Hiſtory of France, he freely owns, "That during the Kings of the firſt Race, they were ſtill choſen "out of the Royal Family; but that there were three Conditions re-"quired to it. (1.) Birth, (thô whether they were legitimate or no it "matter'd not). (2.) The laſt Will of the Father. (3.) The Con-"ſent of the Great Men, or Eſtates of the Kingdom; and the laſt of "theſe (ſays he) almoſt ever followed the two former. Moreover, that in all thoſe Kingdoms, where this way of Election was in uſe, their Kings were ſo far from being abſolute Monarchs, that they were accountable for their Tyranny, or Male-Adminiſtration, to the Eſtates of the Kingdom, and were by them liable to be depoſed for the ſame: Of which (were it to my preſent purpoſe) I could give you frequent Examples, not only in Denmark and Sweden, in both which Kingdoms that Law was in force till within this laſt Century, when they became ſucceſſive in a Lineal Deſcent, by an Act of all the Eſtates; but alſo in Caſtile and Arragon, and even in that of France it ſelf (as much as ſhe takes upon her to be Abſolute at this day): and for the Proof of this I ſhall refer you to any French Hiſtory. Thoſe famous Examples of the laſt Childerick's being Depoſed by the great Council, or Aſſembly of the Eſtates of France, who elected Pepin King in his room; and alſo their ſetting aſide Charles Duke of Lorrain, tho the undoubted Heir of the Crown by Blood, only for his ſuppoſed Enmity to the French Nation, and their chooſing Hugh Capet for their King, from whom all the Kings of France from that time have been (ſo far as we know) lineally deſcended, renders this a Truth too notorious to be denied.

THIS I have here mentioned, that ſo you may not wonder if in the enſuing Hiſtory you meet with divers Examples of the Engliſh Saxons depoſing their Kings; ſince the ſame Cuſtom did in thoſe Ages prevail in all thoſe Kingdoms, as a part of their Original Conſtitution.

AND for farther Proof of this, tho I could bring ſeveral Inſtances from the Mercians and Northumbers, yet becauſe the latter were look'd upon as of a Rebellious Diſpoſition againſt their Princes; and for the former it may be ſaid, that thoſe they expelled were Uſurpers, and not lawful Kings; I ſhall therefore content my ſelf with mentioning but two Examples concerning our Weſt-Saxon Kings, which you will find hereafter more at large: The firſt is that of Sigebert, who (as the Saxon Annals inform us Anno 752.) for his unryhtum Dædum, i. e. illegal Practices, or (as Hen. Huntington paraphraſes it) for his Oppreſſion, and wreſting the Laws to his own Advantage, was by all the Wites, or Wiſe and Great Men of Weſt-Saxony, deprived of his Kingdom, and Cenwolf his Kinſman was by them elected in his room. † The next is that of King Edwy, who for his looſe and irregular Life (tho chiefly for perſecuting the Monks) being caſt off or depoſed by the Mercians and Northumbers, his Brother Edgar was choſen to ſucceed him; but yet the Kingdom was divided, and Edwy had only Weſt-Saxony for his ſhare: And both this Depoſition and Diviſion were confirmed by an Act of the Eſtates of the whole Kingdom, as I have already ſhewn.

BUT whether this was lawfully and rightfully done for any real Breach of their Original Contract, it is none of my Buſineſs here to decide; it is ſufficient to ſhew, that the Eſtates of thoſe Countries then judged ſo, not that I maintain the Law is, or ought to be ſo at this day; but that it was ſo before the Conqueſt, pray conſider this Law, which tho found among thoſe that go under the Title of Edward the Confeſſor, yet was certainly much more Antient, as containing not only the Office of an Engliſh King, but what he was to ſuffer in caſe he omitted that Duty: I ſhall give it you from the Latin Original in * Hoveden and † Lambard, in theſe words, Rex qui eſt vicarius ſummi Regis, ad hæc eſt conſtitutus, ut Regnum terrenum, & Populum Domini, & ſuper omnia ſanctam venretur ejus Eccleſiam, & regat, & ab injurioſis defendat, & maleficos ab ea evellat, & deſtruat, & penitùs diſperdat; Quod niſi fecerit, nec Regis Nomen in eo conſtabit, i.e. not ſo much as the Name of a King ſhall remain to him. Here you ſee not only the Subſtance of this Original Contract, but alſo the Penalty annex'd to it, if it were broken.

* At the end of the Reign of K. Clotair II. tit. Moeurs & Couſtumes.

† Pag. 138.

AND that there was ſuch a thing as an Original Compact or Contract between the People of England and the Anceſtors of thoſe Kings, according to which they were to govern, and upon the non-performance of which, they were liable to forfeit or loſe their Crowns, I think may farther be proved, tho what the particular Heads of it were we cannot now exactly tell, unleſs they were thoſe mentioned in the Oath, recited in the Mirror at the Election of the firſt Saxon Sovereign, (whether he were Egbert, or any other) which indeed amounts to a Contract; but there was alſo a Compact of the like Nature in the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons before King Egbert's Time as well as after; for how elſe could the Great Council of the Kingdom proceed againſt King Sigebert or Edwy, if there had not been then ſome known Laws or Conſtitutions, upon the Violation of which they were judged uncapable to govern any longer? And tho the chief Heads of that Contract may have been comprized in King Ethelred's Coronation-Oath, which I have already given you; [the firſt Article of which is, to preſerve the Holy Church, and all Chriſtian People in true Peace at all Times; the ſecond, To reſtrain all Violence and Injuſtice in all ſorts of People, (which comprehends any raiſing of Taxes by the King's Officers contrary to Law); and the third, To obſerve Equity and Mercy in all his Judgments, by which the King is withheld from taking away any of his Subjects Lives arbitrarily, as alſo from pardoning notorious Offenders againſt the State at his meer Pleaſure; ſo that the Religion, Eſtates and Lives of his People were by this Oath well ſecured:] I ſay, tho theſe are the chief Heads of this Contract, yet that this was much more Antient than the Ceremony of a Coronation, may appear from hence.

THAT Kingly Government in this Iſland was never Abſolute nor Deſpotical, but always limited by Laws; and if limited, then thoſe Laws muſt have been the Bounds or Conditions of that Limitation; and if there was from the beginning, or firſt Inſtitution of the Government, a conſtant certain great Council ordained, whoſe Buſineſs it was to obſerve, that the King did not tranſgreſs the due Bounds of his Power; that Council (ſo long as the Kingdom continued Elective) had likewiſe Authority to call him to Account for his Male-Adminiſtration.

BUT ſince the Preaching of Chriſtianity did no ways alter the Original Conſtitution of Government in all thoſe ſeven Kingdoms abovementioned, it follows, that there muſt have been an Original Contract precedent

recedent to the entrance of that Religion: And it did not Commence om the Coronation of our Kings, as ſome have imagined, and conſe- uently from their taking an Oath at that Time to obſerve the Laws of e Kingdom; becauſe both the one and the other was much later than e Preaching of the Goſpel it ſelf: for this Ceremony of a Coronati- n, as Mr. Selden learnedly proves, began no earlier in the Weſt than ith Charles the Great, his receiving his Imperial Crown from the ands of the Pope; and this Ceremony he alſo ſhews us, was bor- owed from the Greek Emperors, who about Juſtinian, or his Succeſſor uſtin's Time, firſt introduced their Unction and Coronation by the atriarch of Conſtantinople, as he there makes out from a Paſſage of he Learned Onuphrius in theſe words, Conſtantinopoli vel ſub Juſtinia- no, vel poſt ejus ſtatim Obitum, Electioni Imperatoris additum, ut quam rimum Imperator renuntiatus eſſet, à Patriarchâ Conſtantinopolitano in agna Bizantii Baſilica Oleo Unctus, Diademate Aureo redimeretur.

De Comitiis Imperatoriis, c. 2.

AND therefore what we find in our Saxon Chronicles, or any other Hiſtorians, concerning the Coronation of our Engliſh Saxon Kings, muſt all of them have commenced ſince that Time.

NOW the Emperor Charles's Coronation above mentioned, ſalling out in the Year 800, it is plain that the Coronation of our Kings could not be antienter than that Time, which was near 450 Years after the Arrival of the Saxons in England, and ſettling Kingly Government here, and above 200 Years after the Preaching of Chriſtianity; ſo that this Coronation Oath ſeems to have been only a conſtant Renovation or Confirmation of this Original Contract, at every new King's firſt Acceſſion to the Throne, and muſt have had (if at all) its Original long before that Time.

AND this alſo appears from the Inſtance of King Sigebert above-mentioned, who was deprived of his Kingdom for the Breach of this Contract, above forty Years before there was either any Emperor or King formally Crowned in theſe Weſtern parts of Europe.

TO all which we may farther add, that if our Annals and Hiſtorians may be credited, it does not appear that ſeveral of our Daniſh Kings, tho they were ſolemnly Elected, were ever Crowned at all: For as for King Cnute, whoſe Election is mentioned in Florence of Worceſter, and other Authors, to have been by many of the Biſhops and Nobility at Southampton, Anno Dom. 1015. yet are they all (except Abbot Brompton's Chronicle, which relates, that he was Crowned by Living A.Bp of Canterbury) ſilent as to his Coronation, only that upon their ſwearing Fealty to him, it is ſaid he likewiſe ſwore to them, Quod ſecundùm Deum & ſeculum, fidelis eſſet eis Dominus, i. e. that according to the Laws of God and Man, he would be a faithful Lord to them. So likewiſe after the Death of Edmund Ironſide, the Author of Encomium Emmæ, ſays expreſly, that he was Elected King by the whole Engliſh Nation; but that he was not admitted without a new Compact, both Florence and Roger Hoveden inform us in theſe words, viz. That when they had again accepted of him for their King, and had ſworn Fealty to him; he likewiſe again pledged his Faith to them in this Form, Accepto pignore de manu ſua nuda, cum juramentis à Principibus Danorum, i. e. they received a Pledg or Promiſe from his bare or naked Hand, together with the Oaths given by the chief Men of the Danes; who it ſeems ſwore on the King's behalf, that he would obſerve the Conditions he had made before with them.

BUT as for the Coronation of his Son Harold Harefoot, that is expreſly denied by the ſaid Author of Encomium Emmæ; for he ſays that Elnoth (or Agelnoth) Arch-biſhop of Canterbury flatly refuſed to crown him, becauſe he ſaid he had taken an Oath not to anoint him King ſo long as the Children of Queen Emma were alive; and that laying down the Crown and Scepter upon the High Altar, he ſtraitly forbad all the Biſhops to crown Harold, which ſo incenſed him, that he thenceforth deſpiſed his Epiſcopal Benediction.

BUT whether this Author (who yet lived in that very Time) might not write this out of Hatred to Harold's Memory, as well as out of Love to Queen Emma and her Children, I will not take upon me to determine, ſince no Hiſtorian beſides himſelf makes any mention of it; for the antient Hiſtory of Ramſey Abby, written ſome time after the Conqueſt, and now lately publiſh'd by Dr. Gale, ſays expreſly in the Title to Chapt. 94. That Harold was Conſecrated (i.e. Anointed) King.

BUT that the Engliſh Nation before the Conqueſt, believed that their Kings were obliged to govern them by Law, (i.e. according to the original Compact) and that their Allegiance to them was then looked upon as wholly due on that Account, our Annals ſeem to juſtify, Anno Dom. 1014, when the Engliſh Wites, or Wiſe Men, both of the Clergy and Laity, after the Death of Sweyn King of Denmark, ſent over a Meſſage to King Ethelred, being then retired into Normandy, whereby they aſſured him, "That no Prince was dearer to them than their own natural "Lord; always provided, Gif He hi rihtlitor healdan wolde thonne He "ær dyde, (as it is in the Saxon) i.e. if he would govern them more "rightly (i.e. according to Law) for the future than he had done be"fore: whereupon he promiſed to be a faithful Lord to them, (i.e. a "Prince keeping his Oath and Promiſe) and redreſs all their Grievances, "if on their parts they would return to their Allegiance. And thus "by giving mutual Aſſurances, he came Home and contracted a new "Friendſhip or League with his People.

HAVING now got over theſe great Points of the manner of Succeſſion, and Deprivation of our Saxon Kings; I ſhall next as briefly as I can run through all thoſe Orders and Degrees of Men that did conſtitute this Common-Weal.

Ætheling.

THE firſt Degree of Men beneath that of Kings, was that of Ætheling, or Prince of the Blood Royal, being derived from the Saxon word Æthel, which ſignifies Noble, and Ing, which being added to it, ſignifies one derived from Royal Blood, as appears by the Terminations of Names in the Saxon Genealogies, ſet down in our Annals under Anno 449. and in ſeveral other Places, and was common not only to the King's Eldeſt Son, but to all others nearly related to the Blood Royal; and was a meer honorary Title, without any Power or Juriſdiction annexed to it that I know of, unleſs the King was at any time pleaſed to beſtow it. Nor can I here omit giving you the Names of two other principal Offices or Dignities of the Kingdom, the one of which was Military, the other Civil, the former in Saxon was called CYNINGS HOLD, in Latin Princeps Militiæ, i. e. General of all the King's Forces in times of War: and thus we find King Alfred in his Will bequeaths a Legacy to Earl Ethelred his Son-in-Law, whom he denotes by this Title, Ethelredo Principi meæ Militiæ.

General of the King's Forces.

THE other, viz. the Great Civil Officer, was that of Chancellour, ſo called from the barbarous Latin word Cancellare, from his cancelling or ſtriking out what he pleaſed in Men's Grants and Petitions. And as for his Power, we find it thus expreſſed in Ingulf, (upon K. Edward the Elder's having made his Couſin Turketule Chancellor) Quæcunq; negotia temporalia, vel ſpiritualia Regis Judicium expectabant, illius conſilio (tam ſanctæ fidei, & tam profundi ingenii tenebatur) omnia tractarentur, & tractata irrefragabilem ſententiam ſortirentur: from whence we may obſerve, that the King did not only in that Age determine Civil, but Spiritual Cauſes too in his own Perſon, and had his Chancellor for his Aſſiſtant in his Judgments; which being ſo given, irrefragabilem ſententiam ſortirentur, i. e. they obtained an uncontroulable Sentence, beyond which there then lay no Appeal: and this I ſuppoſe was done in that great Court we now call the King's Bench; for as for the Court of Chancery in Cauſes relating to Equity, Sir Edward Coke tells us in his 4*th* Inſtitutes, that there are no Precedents of it before the Reign of King Henry VI.

Chancellor.

Hiſt. Ingulph. Fol. 36. Edit. Oxon.

BUT that it was the buſineſs of the Chancellor to draw up the King's Charters, and alſo to ſign them, before the Conqueſt, you will find at the end of the laſt Charter of King Edward the Confeſſor to the Abbey of Weſtminſter, in the firſt Volume of Sir H. Spelman's Councils, where Ælſgeat a Notary ſigns it, vice Reynbaldi Regis Edwardi Cancellarii.

THE next Degree was that of Ealdorman, which was not only Titular as to the Perſon, but an Office, and ſignified, as you will find all along in our Annals, thoſe great Magiſtrates under the King, who being called in Latin Subreguli, Principes & Conſules, in ſome of our Antient Charters; and ſometimes in Saxon, Cynings, i. e. petty Kings, had the ſubordinate Government of Cities, Counties, and often too of whole Provinces, in all Affairs both Civil and Military, and were of much greater Power before King Alfred's Reign than afterwards; for whereas before his Time they had the chief Authority in all Places belonging to their Juriſdiction, they ſeem after the word Eorle came in uſe with the Danes, to have loſt much of their Power, tho they ſtill retained the Title. And it is obſerved by Sir Henry Spelman in his Gloſſary, that he who was called the Ealdorman of the County, ſignified in the Laws of King Athelſtane ſomething between the Earl and the Sheriff, and therefore ſeems to have been him who under the Earl governed the County or Province, and was his Deputy or Judg in the County Court in his Abſence. For in thoſe Laws the Value of an Arch-biſhop and Earl's Head, is ſet at fifteen thouſand Thrimſaes; whereas the Biſhop's and Ealdorman's was but at eight thouſand.

Ealdorman.

Gloſſ. tit. Aldermannus, Fol. 25.

YET notwithſtanding this Title did not ceaſe to be eſteemed very honourable many Years after that Time; for we find in Camden's Britannia, that the Tomb of Ailwin, founder of the Abby of Ramſey, was inſcribed with the Title of Ealdorman of all England; which, as Mr. Selden ſays, could only mean, that he was ſomewhat like the Antient Chief Juſticiary of England, or Chief Director of the Affairs of the whole Kingdom, or Viceroy, Regiæ dignitatis conſors & nominis, or half Cyning, as the * Book of Ramſey has it.

Huntingtonſhire.

Titles of Honour, Chap. 5 Fol. 505.

* Vid. Lib. de Ramſey publiſh'd by Dr. Gale.

NOT but that this word was alſo of a much more inferior Signification, ſeeing we find frequent mention in the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, as well as in thoſe Kings immediately after the Conqueſt, of Aldermannus Hundredi, ſea Wapentachii, as alſo of Aldermannus mannus Civitatis, vel Burgi, whence the Title of our preſent Aldermen of Cities and great Towns are derived, (tho of a far different Signification, as well as a much later Inſtitution:) and this I ſuppoſe happened by reaſon of the Paucity of words in the Saxon Tongue, which called Grave Men, diſtinguiſhed by any Office or Dignity, by the Title of Ealdormen, becauſe they were at firſt beſtowed on Men of elder Years; tho afterwards, as the Auctuary to King Edward's Laws informs us, they were not ſo ſtiled propter ſenectutem, cum quidam Adoleſcentes eſſent; ſed propter ſapientiam. Therefore I cannot forbear taking notice, that whereas Bede ſpeaking of K. Oſwald's ſending (ad Majores natu Scotorum) to the Elders of the Scots for Biſhops, King Alfred in his Tranſlation of Bede, calls them, the Ealdormen of the Scots, that is, the Great or Chief Men of that Nation. I muſt here beg the Reader's Pardon, for a Miſtake I have committed in the rendring of that Paſſage into Engliſh in the enſuing Hiſtory; for not having the Saxon Verſion by me, but only a Latin Copy, when I wrote it, nor having then conſulted Mr. Selden, to whom I confeſs my ſelf much beholden for this Criticiſm; I have there tranſlated the words Majores Natu, Scotiſh Biſhops, becauſe I thought it moſt proper for them to be ſent to about an Affair concerning Religion.

Spelm. Gloſſ. Tit. Aldermannus.

Cap. 35. tit. Geref.

Hiſt. Eccleſ. Lib. 3. Cap 3. & Vid. Lib. 1. Cap. 13.

I have no more to ſay on this Head, only that I have left this word Ealdorman, ſo often uſed in our Annals, untranſlated: for tho I grant he is frequently ſtiled Dux, or Comes, in Latin, yet it would not bear being rendred Duke or Earl in Engliſh, becauſe that thoſe Titles are not only very different, but were unknown in our Saxon Tongue, till many Years after that Government was ſetled in England.

Eorle.

I come now to the Title Earl, or Eorle, which being altogether Daniſh, was not commonly uſed here till the Reign of King Cnute, tho we now and then find it mentioned in our Annals before his Time; but as for its Power and Authority, it being much what the ſame with that of Ealdorman abovementioned, I think I need ſay no more of it, only that neither of them were then Hereditary, nor deſcended to Sons or Brothers, tho they often continued in the ſame Family, when the King was pleaſed ſo to confer it: And both the Title and the Office were liable to be forfeited upon any great Male-Adminiſtration, as you will find in divers Inſtances in this Book.

Heretoch.

Tit. Holde.

THE next Title and Office I ſhall mention, is, that of Heretoch, which was wholly Military; and, as Sir Henry Spelman in his Gloſſary ſuppoſes, was the ſame with that of the Holde, or Commander in War, mentioned in the Laws of King Athelſtan; becauſe his Wiregild is made equal to that of a High-Geriſe, viz. four thouſand Thrymſa's.

THIS Heretoch ſeems to have been ſomewhat like our Lord-Lieutenant of a County at this Day; and was choſen for ſome extraordinary Occaſion, as upon a ſudden Invaſion or Expedition againſt the Scots or Welſhmen: Which being over, their Commiſſion alſo ceaſed, but they themſelves were ſtill had in high Eſteem and Honour, if they had prudently and couragiouſly diſcharged that great Truſt. And as the ſame Author obſerves, in ſome Antient Charters, (I ſuppoſe whilſt the Ealdorman exerciſed the whole Power of the County, as well Civil as Military) the ſame Title of Ealdorman ſignified the latter Dignity; of which he gives us this Inſtance, from a Charter out of the Antient Book of the Church of Worceſter, where Earl Ælfhere is ſtiled Mercna Heretogan.

Tit. de Heretochiis.

BUT in the Time of Edward the Confeſſor (and I ſuppoſe alſo before) they were certainly diſtinguiſhed, as appears by the Thirty fifth Auctuary of that King's Laws; where after the Offices of the Ealdormen, and Greve, the Duty of Heretochs is thus deſcribed, which I will give you here in Engliſh. "And there were other Powers and Dignities conſtituted through all the Provinces and Counties of the whole "Kingdom, which were by the Engliſh called Heretochs, to wit, Noble, Wiſe, Faithful, and Stout Barons. Theſe ſate our Armies in "Battel Array, and raiſed others as they thought fit for the Honour of "the Crown, and Service of the Kingdom. They were elected by "the Common-Council for the publick Benefit of the Realm in all "Provinces and Counties at a full Folk-mote, as the Sheriffs of the ſame "alſo were, and ought to be: And in every County there was always "one Heretoch thus elected, to conduct the Militia of his County, according to the King's Orders, for the Honour and Profit of the Crown "of the ſaid Kingdom, whenever there was Occaſion.

FROM whence we may obſerve, That before, as well as ſometime after the Conqueſt, when this Auctuary was made, the King had not the Nomination either of the Heretoch or Sheriff, which were then the two Great Officers of the County, the one Military, the other Civil.

Sheriff.

Lib. 3. An. 787.

HAVING thus diſpatched the Military, I proceed to the Civil Magiſtrate, viz. the Sheriff; in Saxon, Scire-Gereſa, (or more contractedly Greve in the Laws of King Edward) who is called by Ethelwerd, Exactor Regius, (i. e. the King's Receiver). This Officer, as Aſſer ſhews us in his Life of Alfred, before that King made his new Reformation of the Kingdom, was appointed by the Ealdorman, and therefore called Vice-Dominus, and was much what the ſame with our Vice-Comes, or Sheriff, at this Day: But whether he had the Title of Sheriff before, as well as after that Alteration by King Alfred, I will not determine.

BUT it appears by both theſe Latin Titles, that he was the Officer, who inſtead of the Ealdorman, or Earl, ſat as Judge in thoſe we now call the County-Court, and Sheriff's Tourn. But theſe being ſo well known at this Day, I ſhall not further enlarge, only that this Officer was alſo to anſwer to the King's Exchequer for all Fines, Amerciaments, and other Duties ariſing out of the County; the third Penny of which the Earl had granted him by the King, pro ſuſtentatione Dignitatis.

Thane.

AND now I come at laſt to that great extenſive Dignity of a Thane, called in Saxon Thegne, being derived from the old word Theowian, to ſerve; becauſe they that had this Honour conferred on them, were at firſt the King's Officers or Servants, and in our Antient Latin Charters, ſubſcribed by the Name of Miniſtri Regis, and are called in the Verſion of our Saxon Annals, as alſo in Florence of Worceſter, Miniſtri Regii; not that they were really always the King's Domeſtick Servants, tho they were ſo originally; on whom he likewiſe beſtowed ſeveral Lands in lieu of thoſe Services, (Wages in Money being not then in uſe) which Lands deſcended to their Heirs, if the King pleaſed.

THIS Title of Thane was of two ſorts, the one Spiritual, the other Temporal; the former were called in Saxon, Miſſe-Thegnes, i. e. Maſs-Thanes, Prieſts, or Parſons of Churches, and other dignified Clergy-Men; of whom I ſhall now ſay nothing, but that they were then of ſo great Note, that in our Saxon Laws they are ranged before the Werold-Thegnes, i. e. Temporal Thanes, and their Weregilds rated at the ſame Value with them, viz. two thouſand Thrymſa's.

Tit. of Honours, Fol. 507, 508.

* Vid. Notas ad Eadmerum pag. 170.

“ AND tho the word denoted a Servant or Miniſter in general, (and ſo divers had the Title as it were meerly Officiary and Perſonal) yet as Mr. Selden informs us, thoſe that were the King's immediate Tenants of fair Poſſeſſions, which they held by perſonal Service, as of his Perſon, (or as we ſay by Grand-Serjeanty, or Knight's Service in chief) were, I conceive, the Thanes that had the Honorary Dignity, and were part of the greater Nobility of that Time; howſoever thoſe Officiary Dignities of Holde and Highgereue, had then precedence of them: that is, they were all the King's Feudal Thanes, and the Land held ſo was called Tainland or * Thaneland, as afterwards the Lands held that made a Baron were called a Barony, as alſo they are called to this day. This Title continued all the Saxon times until the coming in of the Normans, and it was in ſome uſe alſo after that Time, and then was ſucceeded by that of Barons. This Title being of Norman Extraction, we rarely meet with it before the Conqueſt.

Cap. 52.

THERE were alſo beſides theſe Chief Thanes, others who were called middle or under Thanes, being the ſame with the leſs ſort of Barons, or Lords of Mannors, who holding of other great Lords, and not of the King, were thoſe that after the Conqueſt were called Vavaſors; inferior to whom there were likewiſe a third Sort, who ſeemed to have been made up of the leaſt or meaneſt Degree of Gentry or Freeholders, which were then all one; none but the Gentry or leſs Nobility then enjoying Lands by Freehold Tenure. And in this ſenſe is to be underſtood that Law of King Cnute, whereby it is appointed, “ That if the Maſter of a Family (who by that Law was to have all his Houſhold under his Pledg) were accuſed of ſuffering any of them by his Privity to eſcape, being guilty of any Crime, he was then to wage Law with five other Thanes, (i. e. in Latin Nobilibus) himſelf making the ſixth. Now it was impoſſible that there ſhould be ſo many Chief Thanes, who held immediately of the King in any one Hundred or Tything, out of which thoſe Thanes, or Gentlemen that were to make this Purgation, were to be taken.

BUT of all theſe Thanes, or leſs Nobility, I ſhall ſpeak more at large by and by, when I come to conſider the Members that compoſed the Mycel-Gemot, or Common-Council of the Kingdom, of which theſe made up the great and principal Part.

Sithcund-Man.

AND next to them I find another Title, tho not commonly uſed, yet as antient as the Laws of King Ina, as alſo mentioned in ſeveral other King's Laws, viz. a Sithcund Man, who if he refuſed his Service in the Army, or a Military Expedition, he forfeited his Land.

THIS Name Mr. Somner in his Gloſſary derives from Sith, or Giſeth, Comes, vel Socius, a Ruler or Governour, and Cund, Kind, as it ſignifies the Condition and Quality of any one; and Mon, Man, that is, a ſort of Comes, Governour, Judg, or Præfect: he was eſteemed equal to a Thane, by the valuation of his Life in Æthelſtan's Laws.

THIS Comes is not to be taken in that Senſe, as if he was a Count or Lord, (as now underſtood) being only a Comes, or Companion in reſpect of thoſe of his own Rank or Degree, and interpreted by Mr.

Lambard by Cuſtos-paganus, and ſo ſeems to have been the chief Man or Captain in a Town or Village, and was to head all thoſe he brought with him from thence into the Field; and therefore the Penalty was the more ſevere on him if he ran away, leſt he ſhould infect others by his bad Example.

Lamb. Explic. Verb. pag. 5.

SINCE I have been ſo large in this Introduction, I have choſen but ſlightly to mention theſe Dignities and Offices; for they having been ſo learnedly and fully handled by Mr. Selden in his Titles of Honour, as alſo by Dr. Brady in his firſt Part of the Saxon Hiſtory, and by Dr. Howel in his Diſcourſe of the Polity of the Engliſh Saxons, I ſhall refer the Reader to them for his farther Satisfaction, and will only ſpeak of two Degrees of Men more, of whom it ſeems (being below their Notice) they give us but a ſhort Account.

Cap. 5.

Part 4. Ch. 2.

THE firſt is that of Ceorle, or Countrey-man, (from whence our word Carle or Churle is derived); indeed he could not be poſſeſſed of what was called Bockland, or Free-land conveyable by Deed; but however he was as free as to his Perſon and Property as the greateſt Thane of them all. And therefore we find in the Laws of King Alfred, divers pecuniary Penalties enacted againſt thoſe who ſhould commit Adultery with a Country-man's Wife, or ſhould endeavour to vitiate the Chaſtity of his Servant or Slave; or ſhould break the Peace by fighting, either in his Houſe or Yard. And as for his Perſon, by the laſt of thoſe Laws it is appointed, what Satisfaction in Money ſhall be paid by any who wound or maim him, even to the Nail of his little Finger. And this Law as equally extended to him, as to thoſe of the greateſt Quality. And becauſe the Nobility or Gentry were too apt to abuſe theſe poor Countrymen who were their Tenants and Vaſſals, the thirty firſt Law of King Alfred ordains, what Satisfaction a Man was to make for any ways injuring and miſuſing a Ceorle's Man, by binding him, beating him, or cutting off his Hair; Frolicks, I ſuppoſe, too often then in faſhion among ſome ill-natured domineering Gentlemen; which made this merciful and good King provide ſuch a neceſſary Law for their future Security.

Ceorle.

AND further to prove their Freedom, it is likewiſe enacted in the Laws of King Ina, that if a Ceorleſman ſhould refuſe going out to War, he was to forfeit thirty Shillings; which ſhews, that he was ſuch a Man as was to have Weapons of his own for the Defence of himſelf and Service of his Country: Which is alſo required by the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, in Title Greve. And therefore Dr. Brady is very much out, in limiting the Title of Freemen, mentioned in King Edward's * Laws, only to ſuch as were Tenants by Military Service; for that Law ſays no ſuch thing, but only that all the Freemen in the whole Kingdom, according to their ſeveral reſpective Eſtates, Goods, and Poſſeſſions, and to their Fees and Tenements, ought to have Arms, and keep them ready for the Defence of the Kingdom, &c. Where you may obſerve, that all Eſtates, Goods and Poſſeſſions, of what kind ſoever, do hereby capacitate Men to keep Arms, and conſequently give them the Title of Freemen; and therefore are not limited to Tenants by Knights Service alone. As alſo appears from the Aſſize of Arms appointed by King Henry the Second.

Socmen. Cap. 12.

THE higheſt Degree of theſe Ceorles, were thoſe called Liberi Socmanni, i. e. Free Socmen, ſo called from Soc, which in the Saxon Tongue ſignifies a Plow. Of theſe we find no mention till the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, where the Manbote (i. e. Satisfaction for a Servant ſlain) is by Danelage (i. e. the Daniſh Law) due from a Villane or Villager, and a Socman twelve Ores; from a Freeman three Marks: Not that this Socman here, put as diſtinct from Freeman, was really a Slave, but only as Freemen were then taken properly for Gentlemen or Freeholders; for that theſe Sockmen were free as to their Perſons, tho not Lands, appears by the old Natura Brevium, where it defines a Socman to be ſuch a Tenant, who holds of the King, or any other Lord, Lands and Tenements by Villain or baſe Services; and was privileged in this manner, that none could eject him from thoſe Lands and Tenements, ſo long as he could do the Services belonging to the ſame.

Cap. de Brev. de Recto.

THIS I have taken notice of, becauſe Dr. Brady, in his Preface before his Norman Hiſtory, as alſo in divers other Places of his Works, has laboured all he can to make the Condition of the common People of this Kingdom (before the Conqueſt, as well as after) to have been little better than that of Slavery, and ſeems to repine very often that it is not ſo ſtill, as I could eaſily ſhew if I would go about it.

BUT certainly thoſe could not be Slaves who had Slaves under them, and were entruſted with the higheſt Badg of Freedom, not being forced or preſſed thereunto, viz. a voluntary Service in War, which the greateſt were alike ſubject to with theſe for the Defence and Safety of the Kingdom, and which was part of the old Oath of Fidelity that was taken, as well before as after his pretended Conqueſt.

Vid. LL. Edwardi Confeſſ. Cap. 35.

BUT before I diſmiſs this Subject, I cannot omit taking notice, that the Laws or Rules of Gentility were not ſo ſtrictly obſerved under the Engliſh Saxon, as afterwards they were under the Norman Kings; for Mr. Selden hath given us a Law of King Athelſtane, which he took from an Antient Manuſcript in the Library at St. James's, in theſe words, Si Villanus excreviſſet, ut haberet plenariè V. Hidas terræ ſuæ propriæ, Eccleſiam & Coquinam, Timpanarium, & Januam & Sedem & Sundernotam in Aula Regis, deinceps Taini Lege dignus ſit. Which is alſo confirmed by Mr. Lambard, in his Itinerary of Kent, concerning the ſame Law, and is there ſet down in Saxon, which I ſhall here tranſlate thus; That " if a Ceorl or a Country-man ſo thrived, that he had fully five " Hides of his own Land, a Church, a Kitchin, a Bell-houſe, a Borough-gate with a Seat, and any diſtinct Office in the King's Court, " then was he thenceforth of equal Honour or Dignity with a Thane. Where by the Church, the Kitchin, the Bell-houſe, the Borough-gate, with a Seat, &c. Mr. Selden underſtands, " The State or Faſhion of a " Lord of that Time, in having a Church for his Family and Tenants, " in keeping a Court for them, (which may well be meant in the Burlgate ſetl, or Town-gate with a Seat) and in keeping a Houſe or Entertainment competent to that Dignity, which may be underſtood in " the Cycenan and Belhuis, i. e. Kitchin and Bell-houſe. The Bell-houſe " may denote the Hall, which was the place of ordinary Diet and Entertainment in the Houſes of Lords. It may well ſo ſignify, if the " Saxons uſed the like Reaſon in impoſing the Name on the Lord's " Hall, as ſome ſay the Italian, Spaniſh, and French have done, in calling it Tinello, Tinello, and Tinel; which in our Laws alſo is re-

Tit. Honour, Ch.5.Fo.515.

Apud Lambard in Itinerar. Cantii, pag.552,553.

“ tained in Tinel le Roy, for the King’s Hall. They would have it “ therefore ſo named, becauſe the Tin, or tinkling of a Bell at the “ Times of Dinner and Supper were ſignified by it.

BUT Sundernota, mentioned in the Latin Copy of this Law, ſeems to denote the diſtinct Office which he was to hold in the King’s Court to make him equal to a Thane. And it is alſo obſervable, that by the ſame Laws of King Äthelſtane abovementioned, ſuch a Ceorlſman ſo advanced, and having five Hides of Land, (ad Utwarum Regis) that is, as Mr. Selden in the ſame place interprets, held by Knights Service, Si occidatur, reddentur 2 Millia Thrymſarum; ſo that his Wiregyld ſhews him to have been every way equal to a Thane.

BUT the moſt conſiderable Obſervation that may be made from this Law, is, that V. Hides of Land were at that time reckoned a ſufficient Eſtate to conſtitute a Thane. But as to the Quantity of Land that then went to make a Hide, it was ſometimes more and ſometimes leſs, according to the Goodneſs or Quality of the Soil; but was certainly no more than what one Plow could well manure, together with Paſture, Meadow, and Wood, competent for the Maintenance of that Plow, and the Servants of the Family. So that the Eſtate of ſuch a Thane could not be much more than what an ordinary Gentleman has at this day.

NOR can I here pretermit what follows in the ſame Law above recited, where after having ſhewn us by what means an Under Theyn might come to be a Chief Thane, and from thence attain to the Dignity of an Earl, it thus proceeds. “ And if a Merchant ſo thrived, that “ he had paſſed thrice over the wide (or broad) Sea, by his own Cun- “ ning, (or Craft as it is in the Saxon) he was thenceforth a Thane’s “ Right-worthy, i. e. was every way equal to him. Where you may obſerve that Wealth and Induſtry conferred Nobility in the Saxon Times as well as at this Day.

Slaves.

Vid. Ælfric. Gloſſ. Saxonic

I come now to the loweſt Rank of Men, viz. that of Slaves, who were called in Latin Servi, and in Saxon Freortorlings; and there were two ſorts of them, viz. ſuch as were Perſonal, poſſeſſing no Eſtates, but all that they earn’d was their Lords, by whom therefore they were maintained. The others were Prædial, ſuch as were of Servile Condition and Original, but poſſeſſed their ſmall Holdings and Goods at the Will of their Lord, doing all thoſe Servile Countrey Works that were ſet them; and from thence in the more modern Norman Dialect were called Villains, from thoſe Villages where they lived and wrought: But before as well as after the Conqueſt, that the Latin word Villanus did not ſignify a Villain or Servant, I could prove from many Inſtances, both out of Records and Hiſtories, if I thought it would not be too tedious in this Place.

AS for the Original of theſe Slaves among the Saxons, there is ſome doubt about them; ſome ſuppoſing them to have been derived from the remainder of thoſe meaner ſort of Britains, who were either taken Priſoners, or elſe never forſook the Land, and ſo their Lives being ſaved, they were made ſervile by their Conquerors; or elſe ſuch as were deſcended from thoſe who came over in the nature of Slaves to the Engliſh Saxons that firſt landed here: but it is not much material how they began, ſince they might proceed from both, or either of theſe Originals; nor had their Lords Power of Life or Death over them, for if they killed any of them, they were to pay the Value of their Heads to the King.

THESE Slaves, if they were ſet free at any time by their Maſters, were what the Romans called Liberti, and in Saxon Freolætan; but being then reſolved into the Body of Ceorles, or Countrey-men, they did not, as among the Romans, conſtitute any new Order of Men.

Burh witan, i.e. Citizens and Townſmen.

Vid. Ælfric. Gloſſ. Saxonic

I HAVING now gone through all the Sorts and Degrees of Men, who either lived in, or were maintained out of the Countrey; I ſhall in the next Place ſay ſomewhat of another diſtinct Body of Men, called in Saxon Burh-witan, or Burh-wara, that is, Citizens or Townſmen, who had Privileges peculiar to themſelves, and living in Cities or great Towns, were governed by their own particular Magiſtrates called Ealdormen, or Portgereſan, i. e. Port-Reeves, aſſiſted by the Chief Men of the Place, called in Saxon, Yldiſt-Burh-wara, who were much the ſame with what we now call Aldermen or Common-Council Men; for as for the Title of Mayor, it came not in uſe here till long after the Conqueſt.

BUT as for theſe Magiſtrates and Members of Cities and Towns, I ſhall ſpeak more by and by, when I come to treat of the conſtituent Parts of the Great Council of the Kingdom.

Different Courts.

FROM the different Orders of Men, we ſhall now deſcend to ſpeak of the different Courts where theſe Perſons abovementioned, (all except the Villains) were bound to appear, and there either to do or receive Juſtice; for which it will be neceſſary to look back to the Reign of King Alfred, who after the firſt Invaſion of the Danes, when he began to reſettle the Kingdom, found his Subjects ſo far corrupted by a long and hazardous War, that all Places being full of Robberies and Murders, there was an abſolute neceſſity for the making of more ſevere Laws to reſtrain them; ſo that (omitting the Diviſion of Counties or Shires, which I ſhall ſpeak to hereafter) he Canton'd his Kingdom, 1*ſt.* into Tribings or Lathes, as they are ſtill called in Kent and other Places, conſiſting of three or four Hundreds; in which the Freeholders being Judges, ſuch Cauſes were brought as could not be determined in the Hundred Court: concerning the Proceedings in which Court of the Tribing or Lathes, you may ſee divers Precedents in Sir William Dugdale's * Origines Juridiciales.

1. The Court of Trihings or Lathes.

Lambard. de priſcis Anglor. Legibus. Fol. 135.

2. The Hundred Court.

NEXT to which there was alſo the Hundred-Court, in Saxon Hundred-Gemot, and in Latin Centuriata, " Becauſe it originally conſiſted
" of an hundred Hides of Land, as an Hide uſually of an hundred
" Acres, or elſe becauſe ſuper decem Decanos, & centum Friburgos judi-

THIS Court before the Conqueſt was held twelve times a Year, and afterwards was increaſed by Henry I. to once a Fortnight, and then by Henry the Third reduced to once in three Weeks.

The Decennary, or Tything Court.

BUT the loweſt of theſe Inferior Courts, was that of the Decennary, or Tything, which yet was the greateſt Bridle upon the Inferiour ſort of People; “For by virtue of this Law of King Alfred, every Engliſh Freeman, as Ingulph tells us, ought to be in ſome Hundred or Tything, (I mean, whoſoever was of full twelve Years of Age); and if any one ſhould be ſuſpected of Larceny or Theft, he might in his own Hundred or Ward, being either condemned, or giving Security, (in ſome Manuſcripts it is being acquitted) either incur or avoid the deſerved Penalty. William of Malmesbury adds to this, “That he that could not find Security, was afraid of the Severity of the Laws; and if any guilty Perſon, either before his giving Security or after, ſhould make his Eſcape, all of that Hundred and Tything ſhould incur the King's Fine.

Vid. Leg. Canut. cap. 19.

HERE we have the Original of Decennaries, or Fribourgs, in which every Man was to be bound for others as well as himſelf, viz. Maſters for their Servants, Husbands for their Wives, and Children, before they had attained the Age of Fourteen; as alſo the Houſholder for his Gueſts. All which ten Perſons being thus bound one for another, were united under one Head, called a Tythingman, and in ſome places a Borſholder; for BORGH ſignifies a Surety or Pledg, and FRI is all one as Free. From whence comes our word NEIGHBOURS, that is, thoſe that are Near-Pledges.

Vid. Leges Edwardi. cap. 27.

BUT that this Law concerning the Decennaries or Tythings, was not only made for the meer Vulgar or ordinary ſort of People, but that the Chiefeſt of the Nobility, and even the Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops themſelves were alike ſubject to it, will appear by that Law of Edward the Confeſſor, confirmed by King William I. whereby all Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Earls and Barons, and all thoſe that had Courts of Sac. Soc. and Theam, &c. ſwore to keep their Knights, and all other Servants there mentioned in their Frithborg, (i. e. Franc-pledg) for whom theſe Lords or Maſters themſelves were to be Sureties: ſo that if any of them offended, their Lords were obliged to do right in their Courts. And by the Laws of Cnute, every Thane or Gentleman of Eſtate, was to have his Family under his own Pledg; and if any of them were accuſed, he was to anſwer for him in the Hundred Court, i. e. was to compel him to appear. And the Lord was alſo to be anſwerable for him, if he eſcaped; ſo that all the Privilege that Noblemen and Gentlemen had above the common Men, was, that they were not bound one for another, ſo as to be part of any Decennary or Tithing; but each of them was Head of his own Friburgh, and his Family was as it were a diſtinct Tithing of it ſelf.

Vid. Lambard Ll. Edward. Cap. 16.

Cap. 50

I obſerve this, to let the Reader underſtand, that how ſevere ſoever this Law was, it was no Badg of Slavery or Subjection upon the common People, for even the beſt Men in the Kingdom were alike ſubject to it: Neither was it brought in, or increaſed, in Rigour by the Norman Conqueſt, as ſome, with greater Prejudice than Truth, have maintained; ſince the Normans as well as the Engliſh, were all under one and the ſame Law as to this Point.

THE Laws of this Court of the Tithing, were theſe;

FIRST, That if any one offended, and failed to appear, the other Sureties were bound to have him forth-coming to Juſtice.

SECONDLY, But if the guilty Party fled, he ſhould not be any where received without a Teſtimonial from the Tithing from whence he came: So that a Man being out of any Tithing, if he were received in any Town, the whole Town was in the King's Mercy. But by the Laws of King Edward, the Decennary was allowed one and thirty Days to bring the Offender to Juſtice, that ſo he might make Satisfaction, either by his Goods or Body.

Cap. 20.

THE third was, that if he could not be found, then the Tithingman or Borſholder, taking with him two of the beſt of his own FRIBURGH, and of the three neighbouring FRIBURGHS nine, (to wit, of each the chief Tithingman, and two others of the beſt Note) and there before the King's Juſtice (if he could) he was to purge himſelf by Oath of the Offence and Flight of the Criminal: But if he could not, he with his own FRIBURGH was to reſtore the Loſs out of the Goods of the Party, if they were ſufficient, or otherwiſe out of his own, and thoſe of his FRIBURGH.

LASTLY, If the Neighbouring FRIBOURGS would not be their Compurgators, then they were to ſwear for themſelves, that they were therein no ways Guilty; and that ſo ſoon as ever they could find him, they would bring the Offender to Juſtice, or elſe diſcover where he was.

THERE were many other particulars concerning this Matter which I paſs over, that I may not be thought too prolix; but theſe are the moſt material.

The Riſe of Court-Barons.

Vid. Leges Edw. Conf. apud Lamb. F. 132. a.

BUT beſides this Caution concerning Pledges, they were alſo the firſt Foundation of Court-Barons, who were under the Thane, or Baron, (i.e.) the Lord of the Mannor, (as their Head) and he was to undertake for every one of his Tenants, and to ſatisfy for the Offences of each Man.

BY theſe Friburghs or Pledges, together with their Borſholders, were all Civil Actions, as of Debt, Treſpaſs, Detinue, or the like, (which aroſe betwixt any of their Townſhip) determined; but when there was a Cauſe that concerned Men reſiding in ſeveral Seigniories, then it was tranſmitted to the next ſuperior Juriſdiction, viz. the Hundred-Court, (in ſome Places called the Wapentake.)

The Sciremote, or Sheriff's Tourn.

Vid. Dugd. Juridical Orig c. 13. fol. 28.

THERE ſtill remain behind two very conſiderable Courts, both held by the Sheriff; "The former of which was antiently called Sciremote, " (i.e. the meeting of the Inhabitants of the Shire) and was held " twice in the Year, long before the Norman Conqueſt, as appeareth " from ſundry Teſtimonies*; but ſince that, the Shireeve's Turn, from " the French word Tour, in Latin Vice, and in Engliſh Turn. THE Stile of this Court is, Curia Viſus Franc. Domini Regis apud B. coram Vicecomite in Turno ſuo, &c. ibid.

THE reaſon of which is, becauſe in this Court the Pledges or Sureties of every Decennary or Tithing were entred before the Court-Leets were taken out of it, and granted to particular Lords of Mannors, which Sir H. Spelman in his Gloſſary ſuppoſes to have been done in the Reign of King Alfred; but ſince I find nothing concerning theſe Court-Leets till after the Conqueſt, I ſhall defer the farther treating of them to that Time.

Verb. Læta.

I have no more to ſay of this Court, but that it was alſo called the Folcmote, and in which, by Edward the Confeſſor's Laws, all Freemen were to take the Oath of Allegiance or Fidelity to the King, as appears by the Law it ſelf; Omnes Proceres Regni, milites & Liberi Homines totius Regni BRITANNIÆ facere debent Fidelitatem Domino Regi in Pleno FOLCMOTO coràm Epiſcopis Regni, &c.

Vid. LL. Edwardi, c. 35.

YOU will likewiſe find in the ſame Law (juſt preceding this) an extraordinary Aſſembly of this Folcmote upon any ſudden Danger, which met on ringing of the Bells, called in Engliſh Motbel; and there they were to conſult how to prevent the Danger.

I ſhall ſay no more of this Court, but refer the Reader to the ſaid Book (from whence I have taken moſt of thoſe things I have here given you concerning all theſe Courts); wherein he may find at large how great the Power of this Court was, not only before but after the Conqueſt: And I have alſo reſerved the treating of theſe two Courts by themſelves, becauſe tho the 3 former are ſuppoſed by ſome to be of K. Alfred's Erection upon his new Reformation of the Kingdom, but theſe two were not ſo; for notwithſtanding Ingulf tells us, that this King Alfred firſt divided the Provinces of England into Counties, yet we find Mr. Selden Learnedly makes it out, " That Alfred was not the firſt that divided the Kingdom into Shires or Counties; for (ſaith he) before Alfred's Time, thoſe Provinces had their Ealdormen in them: Thus we read of Ethelwolfus Barocenſis Pagæ Comes, and Ceorle Domnaniæ Comes, and Eanulf Somerſetenſis Pagæ Comes; for the Earldoms of Barkſhire, Devonſhire and Somerſetſhire under King Ethelwolf, Father to King Alfred, are remembred in Aſſerius Menevenſis, that lived in King Alfred's Time. Two of them are alſo in * Ethelwerd, a Writer of the Saxon Times, beſides Oſric Dorſetum Dux, for Eolderman of Dorſet; Ealchere or Alchere was at the ſame Time Ealdorman of Kent, and Auda or Wuda of Surrey, as we have it in Hoveden,

TO which I may alſo add divers Examples that you will meet with of the ſame kind in the following Hiſtory, out of the Saxon Annals.

HAVING thus diſpatched theſe inferior Courts, I come now to the chiefeſt, (next to that of the Great Council of the Kingdom) viz. that which was called Curiâ Domini Regis, “ Becauſe oftentimes (as Sir “ Wil. Dugdale informs us) the King himſelf ſate here in Perſon, having “ ſeveral Juſtices, à latere ſuo reſidentes, as * Bracton expreſſeth it; and in “ his Abſence, the Ealdorman, or Chief Juſticiary of all England, ſup“ plied his Place.

Curia Domini Regis.

Dugdal. Origin. Juridical. Cap.17.F.38.

*Lib.3. C.10.

CONCERNING this Court, tho we have not many Memorials left of it before the Conqueſt, yet it was certainly at that Time in Being, ſince it ſeems to have been then the Great Court of all Appeals, as well Criminal as Civil, long after the Conqueſt, before the Court of Common-Pleas was taken out of it: for here it was that K. Alfred is ſuppoſed to have re-heard and examined the falſe Judgments of his inferior Judges in the Hundred, and County-Courts; and here it was alſo that he condemned above forty of them to be executed in one Year, for their erroneous Sentences in Matters of Life and Death, as you will find in the Mirror of Juſtices.

Cap. 5.

I need ſay no more of this Great Court, whoſe Power now reſides in that of the King's-Bench and Common-Pleas, neither the Chancery nor Exchequer having then any Being; the former of which commenc'd long after the Conqueſt, and the latter was erected by King William the Firſt.

I have but two Obſervations to make concerning our Antient Engliſh Saxon Courts of Juſtice; the FIRST of which is, that ſtrict Union there then was as well in the Folk-mote and County-Court, as in the Hundred-Court, between the Eccleſiaſtical and Civil State; in both which the Biſhop and the Sheriff ſitting together, all Cauſes both Spiritual and Secular were equally, and at one time, diſpatched to the great Eaſe and Satiſfaction of the Subject, who were taught by the Biſhop in the Folk-mote what was their Duty towards God and the Church, as they were by the Ealdorman or Sheriff what Common Laws they were bound to obſerve, in order to their Honeſt and Peaceable Living one among another: a Cuſtom, which when reading of Books was not generally in uſe among the Laiety, was abſolutely neceſſary for the acquainting them with their Duty; in imitation of which I ſuppoſe our Common Charges at Aſſizes and Seſſions are continued to this Day.

THE SECOND is, the great Eaſe the Subject muſt needs find in having Juſtice adminiſtred to him in ſmaller Actions, in the Court of Decenary or Tything, even at their own Doors; or elſe in Appeals and greater Actions at the Court of the Trihing or Lathe; from whence they might remove it to the County-Court; and if they thought themſelves aggrieved there, then they might bring it before the King himſelf, or his chief Juſticiary, in the Great Court abovementioned. An Admirable and an Excellent Conſtitution this! whilſt the Laws of England were few, eaſy and plain, before the Partiality and Corruption of Countrey Juries came in, and the bandying and Factions of Rich and Powerful Men in the Countrey againſt each other, together with the vaſt varieties of Determinations of Caſes in Law, had rendered thoſe inferior Courts not only perplexed, but unſafe and vexatious to the Subject.

The Great Council, or Parliament.

I come now to the Supream Court of the whole Kingdom, called in Saxon the Wittena-Gemot, or Mycel-Synoth; in Latin Magnum, or Commune Concilium Regni, the Great or Common-Council of the Kingdom, conſiſting of the King and the three Eſtates, which we now call our Parliament; which Court the Author of the Mirror of Juſtices expreſly tells us, "That King Alfred ordained for a perpetual Cuſtom, that twice "in the Year, or oftner, in Time of Peace, if Buſineſs ſo required, they "ſhould aſſemble at London to treat of the good Government of God's "People, and how Folks ſhould be reſtrained from Offending, and live "in Quiet, and ſhould receive Right by certain Antient Uſages and "Judgments, &c. From whence you may obſerve, that in this Author's Time, (viz. that of Edward I.) it was held for Law, "That the great "Council of the Kingdom antiently met of Courſe twice in the Year, "without any expreſs Summons from the King; and this it ſeems was "afterwards altered to thrice in the Year, viz. at the three great "Feaſts of Chriſtmaſs, Eaſter, and Whitſontide, when the King met "his Eſtates with great Solemnity, wearing his Crown upon all "ſolemn Days of Entertainment; and when the Feaſting was over, "they fell to diſpatch the publick Affairs, as Sir H. Spelman well obſerves.

Vid. Vol. 1. Council. An. 851. Fol. 347.

THESE ſtated Councils which were then held ex More (as our Hiſtorians term it) i.e. according to antient Cuſtom, continued long after the Conqueſt, as ſhall be farther ſhewn hereafter: but if this Council happened to meet at any other extraordinary Time, then the King's ſpecial Summons was requiſite, as you may find in Ingulf under Anno Dom. 948. where he tells us, King Edred ſummoned the Arch-biſhops, Biſhops, and all the Proceres, and Optimates (i.e. Chief Men of the Kingdom) to meet him at London at the Purification of the Virgin Mary. Whence we may obſerve, that this Summons was thus iſſued, becauſe this Council was extraordinary, as not being held ex more, at any of the uſual great Feaſts abovementioned.

CONCERNING the Original of this great Aſſembly, ſince Sir Robert Filmer in all his Works, and particularly in his Patriarcha; and Dr. Johnſton in his Excellency of Monarchical Government, "Would have "this (as well as all our other Liberties and Privileges) to have been "only Royal Abatements of Power, and gracious Indulgences and "Condeſcenſions of our Kings for the Benefit and Security of the Subject; who were pleaſed to condeſcend to call ſome Perſons of each of "the three Eſtates (it being left to their Diſcretion whom to ſummon, and "whom not); and tho many of our Kings have made uſe of ſuch great "Aſſemblies to conſult about important Affairs of State, and by their "Conſent and Approbation, to make Laws as well as (at their Prayers "and Petitions) to redreſs their juſt Grievances, yet they owed their "being to our firſt Monarchs, ſince till about the time of the Conqueſt "there could be no General Aſſembly of the Eſtates of the whole Kingdom, becauſe till thoſe Times we cannot learn it was entirely united "into one; but it was either divided into ſeveral Kingdoms, or governed by ſeveral Laws.

I confeſs this looks at firſt like a ſpecious Hypotheſis, and may ſerve perhaps to prevail upon ſome ignorant and unwary Readers, who will not, or r cannot give themſelves the trouble of ſearching to the Bottom, to nd out the Truth of things. But I deſire the Favour of thoſe who elieve and maintain this Opinion, to anſwer me theſe few Queries.

FIRST, How it came to paſs that in all the Kingdoms of Europe, rected out of the Ruines of the Roman Empire, (as well as thoſe that ere not, but yet had been conſtituted according to the ſame Gothick Model) the like General or Great Council of Eſtates, conſiſting of the me Degrees and Orders of Men, were to be found in every one of thoſe Kingdoms? To begin with Sweden and Denmark, and then go n to the Kingdom of Germany, now called the Empire, and ſo into France, and from thence into Spain, among all the petty Kingdoms that then compoſed that Monarchy (taking Portugal, if you pleaſe, into the Account); you will find that the Eſtates of all thoſe Kingdoms (as repreſenting the whole Body of the ſame) conſiſted of the Clergy, Nobility, and Deputies of Cities and great Towns; which is briefly comprized by this ſingle Verſe of Gonterus, an old German-Poet, concerning the Eſtate of the Empire in his Time, Prælati, Proceres, miſſiſq; potentibus Urbes.

SECONDLY, How it happened, that in all the Kingdoms of the Engliſh-Saxon Heptarchy, the firſt Founders of which came out of Frizeland, Weſtphalia, Holſtein and Jutland, the like Great Councils, conſiſting of the King, the Clergy and Nobility, came to be inſtituted in each of them? For as to the Repreſentatives of Cities and Towns in England, ſince the Framers of the abovementioned Hypotheſis deny their appearance here, I ſhall ſay nothing as yet.

THIRDLY, Whether it be probable, that without a General Agreement of Laws and Manners with thoſe People of Germany, from whence theſe Engliſh-Saxons came, they ſhould by a ſort of Natural and Unaccountable Sympathy, fall of themſelves into the very ſame Political Form and Conſtitution?

FOURTHLY, Whether Princes were above a thouſand Years ago, ſo much more Ignorant of the Arts of Government, and ſo little Ambitious of Riches and Power, that they ſhould all agree within a Century of Years, to ſet up one uniform Model of Government, and admit the People into a ſhare of their Power, eſpecially into that Grand Prerogative of laying Taxes; which moſt Princes now do all they can to perform by their own abſolute Will?

FOR as to that of underſtanding their Subjects Grievances, they might either not take notice of them at all, or elſe, if they would, might have found out a more eaſy Method to come to the Knowledg of them, than by Summoning the Clergy, Nobility, and People of a whole Kingdom at once, to acquaint them therewith.

FIFTHLY, How it came to paſs, that in all thoſe Countries (ſo long as they continued Elective) the States exerciſed the ſame Power of Depoſing their Kings for Tyranny or Male-Adminiſtration? Does this look like a precarious and dependent Power? And,

LASTLY, Whence happen'd it, that in France and England (and I believe I could ſhew the ſame in other Countries too) the Eſtates of the Kingdom met twice in the Year, according to Cuſtom, at a certain Time and Place, without any Summons from the King?

NOW when the Gentlemen who maintain the Hypotheſis above-mentioned, ſhall return a fair and ſatisfactory Anſwer to theſe Queries, I ſhall not only willingly ſubmit to their Judgments, but give them my Thanks for their better Information; but till then I think it is much more agreeable to good Senſe, as well as Matter of Fact, to maintain, that thoſe Orders and Degrees of Men that did conſtitute the Great Councils, were more Antient than Kingly Government, nay Chriſtianity it ſelf among them, as appears by thoſe Teſtimonies I have produced out of Bede and other Authors; from all whom it plainly appears, that the firſt Princes in all thoſe Governments were originally Elected, of which I hope I have given undeniable Inſtances, out of our own as well as Foreign Hiſtories: and certainly that which gives Being to a Thing, muſt be prior in Nature to that which is produced from it.

I HAV[illegible] now done with the Original, I ſhall next proceed to the Conſtituent Parts of this Mycel-Synoth, or Wittena-Gemot; the laſt of which words is derived from the Saxon word Wites, or Witen, i.e. Sapientes, or Wiſe-Men; and tho Dr. Brady in his Gloſſary will have this word moſtly to ſignify Noblemen, or Great Lawyers, yet I do not find he brings any good Authority for his ſo doing: For granting it is true, Wite ſignifies a Wiſe-Man, however it no ways proves that all Wiſemen muſt be Lawyers, much leſs that thoſe Lawyers were Noblemen; and ſince he himſelf does not extend this Wiſdom only to Knowledg in the Laws, I need not ſay any more to it.

Gloſſary, Fol. 66.

AS for the reſt of his Authorities in this Page, whereby he would prove that divers things were done by the Decrees of theſe Wiſemen or Lawyers, they ſufficiently anſwer themſelves; ſince it appears even by his own ſhewing, that theſe Sapientes were the Biſhops, Abbots, Aldermen and Thanes; and when he makes it out that every one of theſe Orders of Men were Noblemen, or Lawyers, I ſhall come over to his Opinion.

AS for what he ſays in the next Page, where he gives us the Interpretation of thoſe words of Bede, Principibus, & Conſiliariis, by Ealdormannum and Witum; they are yet leſs to the purpoſe, ſince a Man might be a very good Counſellor, and yet at the ſame Time no great Lawyer.

Id. Fol. 67.

BUT the Author's ſeeming ſtabbing Proof is out of Aſſer, in his Life of King Alfred, “Who admiring the Ignorance of his Earls and “ Præfects, commanded them either forthwith to lay down their Pla- “ ces of Judicature, or elſe to apply themſelves SAPIENTIÆ Studiis, “ to the Study of Knowledg, or of the Law. Here we ſee again (ſays “ he) who had the Title of SAPIENTES, namely the Judges, that is, “ the COMITES, PRÆPOSITI, & MINISTRI, or Thegnes; for theſe “ laſt were the Seminary of Nobility, or Great Officers, Civil, Military, “ and Eccleſiaſtick amongſt the Saxons.

NOW I deſire the Reader to obſerve, that admitting we ſhould take the word Studia SAPIENTIÆ here, for the Knowledg of the Law, does it therefore follow, that all that ſtudied it muſt be Lawyers by Profeſſion? when it is very certain that the Study of the Law was not then, nor long after, a Trade, as it is now; ſince all the Freeholders or Thegnes, afterwards called Barons, were (as well as Ealdormen) required to have a “ competent Knowledg of the Laws of their Country; or elſe how could “ they either plead their own, or try each others Cauſes in the Hundred “ and County-Courts (as they are in the * Laws of K. Henry 1. recited to have done) before the Profeſſion of Counſellors came up? Or how could they ſit, and judg Cauſes in the County-Court, or Folc-mote, when every Thegne, or Gentleman in the County, was capable of being choſen Sheriff, and of ſitting Judg in thoſe Courts, many Ages before the Office of an Under-Sheriff was heard of?

* Cap. 1.

AND as for the Auctuary to the 35*th* Law of Edward the Confeſſor, wherein the HERETOCHS are called BARONES, NOBILES, & inſignes SAPIENTES, there can be nothing urged leſs to purpoſe; for then (according to the Doctor) they muſt have had all great Titles, and have been choſen Generals in War, and Leaders of Armies; and Pray why? becauſe they were SAPIENTES, i. e. Great Lawyers. But the Doctor had the good luck to find once in his Life, that Studia Sapientiæ, for want of a better Expreſſion, ſignified the Study of the Law, and therefore the word SAPIENTES and WITES, where-ever he meets with them in our Saxon Laws, or Great Councils, muſt (forſooth) ſignify Lawyers or Judges: And his Deſign in it is evident, that he might thereby confound the Law-makers with the ordinary Counſellors or Adviſers, whom thoſe Law-makers might often imploy in the drawing of the Laws; but he is indeed at laſt ſo modeſt as to tell us, “ That at “ this day the Judges, and King's Counſel, and other great Lawyers “ that ſit in the Lord's Houſe, are aſſiſtant to the Parliament when there “ is occaſion. But that he would here as well as elſewhere inſinuate, that no body elſe had any more right to appear there than they; you may ſee more plainly in his Notes to his * Compleat Hiſtory of England, where upon the words Sapientes or Witen made uſe of in the Saxon Laws, he ſays, “ That if they only ſignified Men ſkilled in the “ Laws, then were none of the Temporal Nobility preſent at the making of thoſe Laws, unleſs perhaps they were the Lawyers meant “ by that word, as being many of them Judges and Juſticiaries at that “ time. But yet he is at laſt forced (with Juſtice) in the ſame place to acknowledg, upon the words, “ that Witan, Sapientes, or wiſe Men, “ muſt be taken for, or meant of the Biſhops and Nobility, or elſe they “ were not preſent at the making of theſe Laws; which no Man can “ believe, that conſiders how many Eccleſiaſtical Laws there are amongſt them, and Laws relating to the Worſhip of God, and a “ holy Life, that were never made without at leaſt the Advice of the “ Biſhops.

Idibid. Lamb. fol. 147.

* Fol. 85.

IT is well my Lords the Biſhops were concern'd here, or elſe ſure he would never have been ſo free as to make the word Witan ſignify not only great Lawyers, but Divines too: and thus by the ſame liberty of paraphraſing, ſtudia Sapientiæ may ſignify the Study of Divinity.

BUT enough of theſe Trifles; for the Author himſelf hath ſome Lines above in the ſame Notes, granted as much as I can deſire, becauſe he confeſſes, “ That in our Saxon Laws, the Sapientes or Witan were “ divers times taken for the whole Baronage, or Nobility, as I may “ ſo ſay: And in this ſenſe it is uſed in the 49*th* Chapter of the Preface “ to Alured's Laws. And I deſire the Doctor to ſhew me any Inſtance out of the Saxon Laws or Annals, if he can, where the words Witan, or Witena-Gemot are uſed in any other ſenſe. But what was the true meaning of that word Baronage we ſhall reſerve to another place; it ſuffices at preſent to let you ſee he owns they were ſomewhat more than great great Lawyers; and that it comprehended others beſides Noble-men by Birth, I ſhall prove by and by.

Witena Gemot.

IN the mean time I ſhall ſhew, by what Words and Phraſes the Witena Gemot, conſiſting of theſe Wites, is called in the Latin Verſion of our Annals, as alſo of our Hiſtorians who have wrote in the ſame Language.

Concilium Procerum, vel Primatum.

IN the firſt of theſe it is rendered Concilium PROCERVM, how truly, I have ſaid ſomewhat in the Preface: by Florence of Worceſter in his Verſion of the ſame Annals, it is commonly render'd Concilium PRIMATVM, and ſometimes, but more rarely, PROCERVM. But when this Author would diſtinguiſh the Laity from the Clergy at theſe Aſſemblies, he words it thus, Laity and Clergy.

ARCHIEPISCOPOS, EPISCOPOS, ABBATES, & Angliæ OPTIMATES; ſometimes thus, EPISCOPOS, & DVCES, nec non & PRINCIPES, & OPTIMATES Gentis Angliæ.

AS for the Signification of all theſe Words, I ſhall give it you anon; only thus much may be agreed upon, that beſides the Arch-biſhops, Biſhops, and Abbots, the chief or beſt Men of England were preſent and aſſiſted at theſe Councils, and who, as appears by the Subſcriptions to ſeveral Saxon Councils and Charters, were either the Ealdormen, who writ themſelves in Latin, ſometimes Sub-Reguli, but more often Duces, or Comites, of whom we have already ſpoken enough: But this I would have remembred, that the Office of Ealdormen not being then hereditary, it was beſtowed for Merit; and Nobility by Blood was no neceſſary Condition to it, ſince their Places in this great Aſſembly were only ratione Officii, and not by Right of Inheritance as at this day.

Thanes.

THE next Order, whoſe Subſcriptions we find at the Concluſion of ſuch Councils and Charters, are the Thanes; the higheſt Degree of which was called Thanus Regius, the King's Thane, becauſe he held immediately of him; and tho I grant it anſwered the Title or Dignity of the greater Barons after the Norman Conqueſt, yet however neither Mr. Selden, nor any other Learned Antiquary that I know of, does any where exclude the two other Degrees of Thanes, viz. the Middle and Leſſer, from appearing, and having places in thoſe great and general Councils, as well as the chief Thanes themſelves.

Milites.

AND beſides theſe, we find at the end of ſeveral Charters, others who write themſelves Milites, who, I ſuppoſe, ought to be rendered Knights; but whether they were Thanes that held by any Military Tenure, or ſuch as held their Lands in Allodio, that is, freely, under no Services, I will not here take upon me to determine.

THESE are the only Degrees mentioned at the end of thoſe Councils and Charters above-mentioned.

BUT perhaps it will now be told me, that according to my own ſhewing, there were no Commons ſummoned to theſe Aſſemblies; ſince neither in the Titles before thoſe Councils, nor at the Concluſions of them is there any mention made of this Order of Men now called Commons, diſtinct from that of the Biſhops and great Noble Men; and therefore from hence Dr. Brady in his Anſwer to Mr. Petyt, will have none but Biſhops and great Noble-men to have had any thing to do there: and to make this ſeem the more plauſible, he renders that great Council, where Plegmund Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, together with King Edward the Elder preſided, viz. CONCILIVM MAGNVM EPISCOPORVM,

Dr. Brady's Introduct. fol. 6, & 7.

Vid. Antiquit. Britan. Matth. Parkeri Archiep. Cant.

PORVM, ABBATVM, FIDELIVM, PROCERVM, POPVLORVM IN PROVINCIA GEWISORM, &c. in theſe words, A great Council of the Biſhops, Abbots, Tenants in Capite or Military Service, Noble-men, and People in the Province of the Weſt-Saxons.

AND here, before I go any further, I would deſire the Doctor to anſwer theſe two Queſtions.

FIRST, By what Authority he here tranſlates the word Fideles, Tenants in Capite, or Military Service? ſince I am ſure he is not able to prove from any Hiſtory or Record, that this Tenure had any being in England at that time.

SECONDLY, How he can make it out, that the word Proceres always ſignifies great Noble-men by Birth? without which Suppoſition all he is able to ſay on this Subject will fall to the Ground.

Dr. Brady, ut ſup.

BUT the Doctor thinks he has a great Advantage from what Archbiſhop Parker ſays in the ſame Page; EDWARDVS REX SYNODVM PRÆDICTAM NOBILIVM ANGLORVM CONGREGAVIT, CVI PRESIDEBAT PLEGMVNDVS, i. e. King Edward called the foreſaid Synod of the Engliſh Nobility, wherein Plegmund preſided. Here he thinks he hath a ſtrong hold, and therefore ſays, “ That this Author tells us the meaning of the long Title of this Synod, which juſt before he had mentioned, viz. that the Biſhops, Abbots, FIDELES, Proceres, & POPVLVS, were all NOBILES, NOBLEMEN, that is, the Eccleſiaſticks and Laicks, or the Biſhops, and Lay-Nobility, and not the Vulgus, Commons, or ordinary ſort of People.

SO then, according to the Doctor's Conſtruction, all the fore-going Relation of the Members of this Council was a jumbled heap of Tautologies, of Noble Tenants in Capite, Noble-men, and Noble People.

BUT I muſt needs acknowledg that he is ſo far in the right, that by theſe words Nobilium Anglorum, are not meant the vulgar, mean or ordinary ſort of People, or the Mob, (as they are now contemptuouſly term'd) for certainly they had never any thing to do in thoſe Auguſt Aſſemblies: Nor does Mr. Petyt, or my ſelf maintain any ſuch thing; and yet for all this I think we may affirm, that all the Members that appeared there, were not Noble-men, or Great Lords only, in the ſenſe they are now taken.

Nobilis.

FOR to begin with the word Nobilis, which the Doctor ſo much inſiſts on, it is his own too narrow Conception of that Title which has been, I think, one main Cauſe of the greateſt part of the Quarrel between Mr. Petyt and him; for in all the Counties of Europe, except England, it is very well known, that the word Nobilis includes not only Noble-men of Title, ſuch as Dukes, Marqueſſes, &c. but alſo all Gentlemen of Families who are well born, and do not exerciſe Mechanick Trades. Thus Nobilezza in Italian, and Nobleſſe in French, comprehends the leſs as well as the greater Nobility. So likewiſe the word Ædelmen, among the Germans, comprehends all ſorts of Noble-men, as well thoſe of Title as others, which is owned by Sir H. Spelman in his Gloſſary in theſe words, Anglorum Legibus Adelingos dici pro Nobilibus in genere, qui omnes nobiles Ædelmen vocant, à Saxonico Ædel, nobilis. And ſo it was here in England long after the Conqueſt, as well as before, when Knights and Gentlemen were reckoned inter Nobiles minores, before the Title of Noble-men began to be appropriated to the higher Nobility or Peers only; which is alſo owned by Dr. Brady in his Preface to

Tit. Adelingi, p. 10.

" to his Compleat Hiſtory, where he tells us of Lands held by Knights " Service, as well in the Hands of the lower ſort of Nobleſſe, as of the " greater Noble-men.

~~AND~~ This being ſo, I ſhall eaſily prove, that all the reſt of the words inſiſted upon by the Doctor, do not ſignify only great Lords and Noblemen by Birth: To go on therefore to the next word Proceres, that neither this does ſignify only Men Noble by Birth. Iſidore (an antient Spaniſh Author) in his Origines, ſays thus, Proceres ſunt Principes Civium, that is, the chiefeſt of Subjects or Citizens. And the Learned Du-Freſne alſo tells us in his Gloſſary, Proceres appellabantur, qui in Civitatibus præcipuos Magiſtratus gerebant; that thoſe were called Proceres, who were the chief Magiſtrates or Rulers in Cities; and certainly theſe could ſcarce ever be Noble-men by Birth.

Page 420.

AND as for the word Primates, it ſignifies no more than Principal or Chief Men, however born; and that it was underſtood no otherwiſe among our Engliſh-Saxons, appears from Ælfric's Gloſſary above-mentioned, at the end of Somner's Saxon Dictionary, where he renders the words Primates, vel Primores Civitatis, ſeu Burgi, by YLDEST BURHWARA, i. e. the Chief Magiſtrates in a City or Town, who were then Perſons of very conſiderable Note in the Nation, as I ſhall prove further by and by.

Primates.

I come now to the word Optimates, which ſignifies no more than the better ſort of Men, and not always Noble-men and great Lords, much leſs as confined to the King's Thanes, or Tenants in Capite only; ſince the ſame Du-Freſne in his Gloſſary defines Optimates to be Vaſſalli Barones, qui ab ullo Domino ratione Hominii nudè pendent, that is, the Feudatory Barons that meerly depend on any Superiour Lord by reaſon of their Homage; which tho ſpoken in relation to France five or ſix hundred Years ago, yet was certainly uſed in the ſame ſenſe, and no otherwiſe in England, as well before as after that time, and did include all the Inferiour as well as Superiour Thanes, ſuch as were the only Freeholders in thoſe Ages. As Optimates.

~~BUT~~ for the word Principes, he that underſtands any thing of the Latin Tongue, knows, that it doth not always ſignify Princes, or Men Noble by Birth, but any Chief or Principal Man, remarkable by Place, Office or Dignity; and therefore we often read in Livy, and other Latin Authors, of Principes Civitatis: and in the above-cited Laws out of Tacitus, de moribus Germanorum, it is plain, that the word Princeps, or Principes in the plural, ſignified no more than chief or conſiderable Men among the Germans, by reaſon of their Office, or preſent Dignities, without any reſpect to their Birth. And in this ſenſe, I ſuppoſe, every Member of Parliament may at this day be reckoned inter Principes, among the moſt conſiderable or chief Men of the Kingdom.

Principes.

BUT the Doctor lays a great ſtreſs upon a Paſſage out of two Manuſcript Malmesburies, one in the Bodleian Library, cited by Sir William Dugdale, and the other in the Treaſury of the Records of the Church of Canterbury, cited by Sir Henry Spelman, who both report of this very Council, that Edward the Elder " Congregavit Synodum Senatorum
" Gentis Anglorum, cui præſidebat Plegmundus, &c. i. e. convened a Synod
" of the Senators (in Saxon the Aldermen) of the Engliſh Nation, that " is, ſuch as were uſually called to ſuch Councils, which were only the " Nobiles and Great Men.

Dr. Brady's Introduct. fol. 7.

IN Anſwer to this I muſt refer the Doctor again to good old Livy, where he will find that the Roman Senators were not all Noble by Birth, for they were tàm Patricii, quàm Plebeii Ordinis.

BUT when Mr. Petyt cites William of Malmesbury, for calling a Saxon Wittena Gemote, Generalis Senatus & Populi Conventus, to diſtinguiſh the leſſer Nobility from the greater, the Doctor replies, "There "is no heed to be taken how our old Monks and Hiſtorians ſtiled "the Saxon Wittena Gemotes, or their great and Common-Councils, for "the ſame Authors expreſſed them ſometimes one way, ſometimes "another; nor were they ever exact and curious in obſerving and no"ting the Title, or the Conſtituent Parts or Members of them.

Id. ibid.

FROM whence I cannot but obſerve the Doctor's great Partiality for his own Opinion; for whenever William of Malmesbury in the Manuſcript above-cited, mentions the word Senatores, it muſt with him immediately ſignify nothing leſs than Great Noblemen, or what we now call Peers; but when the ſame Author mentions the lower degree of Men (whom we now call Commons) as a diſtinct Order from the Great Lords, or Senators, then preſently he is with the Doctor, "a trifling "old Monk, very little curious in obſerving the Conſtituent Parts or "Members of our Saxon Great Councils.

I hope I have [illegible]

~~HAVING thus~~ ſhewn ſome of Dr. Brady's erroneous and inconſiderate Gloſſes concerning the Engliſh-Saxon Nobility before the Conqueſt, which he vainly ſuppoſes to have been the ſame as it is at this day; I ſhall now endeavour to ſettle ſome truer Notions relating to thoſe Great Councils, which as to the Lay-Members, beſides the Ealdormen abovementioned, I conceive, conſiſted of the whole Body of Thanes, or Freeholders, who were then all Gentlemen either by Birth or Eſtates; for I have already proved from the Laws of King Athelſtan, that a meer Ceorl's Man, if he had purchaſed five Hides of Thane Land, did thereby become equal in all reſpects to a Thane.

NOW if the word Thane before the Conqueſt ſignified the ſame with the word Baro, which came into common uſe after that time, as Sir Henry Spelman and Mr. Selden both grant it did; and Mr. Camden in his Introduction to his firſt Edition of his Britannia in 4°, is yet more expreſs as to this word Baro, as you may ſee by this remarkable Paſſage; Verùm Baro ex illis nominibus videatur quæ tempus paulatìm meliora, & molliora reddidit, nam longò poſt tempore, non milites, ſed qui LIBERI erant DOMINI, & Thani Saxonibus dicebantur Barones vocari cœperunt, nec dum magni honoris erant, paulò autem poſteà (viz. ſome time after the Conqueſt) eò honoris pervenit, ut nomine Baronagii Angliæ omnes quodammodo Regni Ordines continerentur: tho it muſt be confeſt that Mr. Camden, (becauſe he found this Paſſage had given ſome Offence to the higher Nobility) ~~he~~ in his next Edition in Folio, reſtrained it by adding the word Superiores before Ordines, as if none but the higher Barons might be thought to have once made part of the Baronage of the Kingdom. And likewiſe Sir Henry Spelman in his Gloſſary under the Title of Barones Comitatus, i. e. the Barons of Counties, (who are frequently mentioned in the Laws of our firſt Norman Kings) has this remarkable Paſſage, and he being ſo great a Man, I ſhall not offer to abridg it.

Quod per Hundredum colligerentur (46 Marcæ) & Sigillo alicujus Baronum Comitatus ſigillarentur, & ad Theſaurum Regis deportarentur. In Domeſd. habiti ſunt Barones Comitatus; Magnates & Nobiles, qui in Curiis præſunt Comitatuum, hoc eſt, ipſarum Curiarum Judices, quos Hen. 1. LL. ſuarum, cap. 30. eſſe liberè Tenentes Comitatûs demonſtrat. Regis (inquit) Judices ſunt Barones Comitatus, qui liberas in eis terras habent, per quos debent cauſæ ſingulorum alternâ proſecutione tractari. Which I ſhall give you thus in Engliſh. “Under this Title of Barones Comitatus, ſeems to be contained in our antient Writers all ſorts of Feudal Barons dwelling in any one County, viz. the chief Men and Lords of Mannors, as alſo all free Tenants, that is, Proprietors of Lands, in Engliſh, FREE-HOLDERS. And it is alſo to be conſidered, that theſe free Tenants were not antiently ſo mean and pitiful, as they are accounted at this day: For Gentlemen had not as yet parcell'd out their Townſhips and Lordſhips into ſmall Eſtates, but (as we ſee in Ireland) keeping them themſelves, by their hired Servants and Villains, huſbanded their own Lands. In the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, cap. 15. it is appointed, that 46 Marks ſhould be collected out of the Hundred, and ſealed up with the Seal of one of the Barons of the County, and be lodged in the King's Treaſury. In Doomſday Book, thoſe Noblemen and Gentlemen are called Barons of the County, who preſided in County-Courts, that is, who were Judges of thoſe Courts, whom Hen. 1. in the 30*th* Chapter of his Laws, ſhews to be the free Tenants of the County. The King's Judges, ſays he, are the Barons of the County, who have Freehold Lands in them, by whom the Cauſes of each of them ought to be tried and adjudged in their reſpective turns.

AND there alſo immediately follows in the ſame Law of Henry the Firſt, another Clauſe, “whereby Villains, and all ſuch mean and beggarly Fellows, called there Coſcetti or Perdingi, are not to be reckoned amongſt the Judges of the Laws; for they neither in the Hundred, nor in the County, forfeit their own Money, nor that of their Maſters.

THIS, I think, is ſufficient to prove, that all ſuch baſe and indigent People, ſuch as Dr. Brady calls Tag, Rag and Bobtaile, were excluded from having any thing to do in theſe inferior Courts; and if ſo, then much more to be ſure were they ſhut out of the moſt Auguſt Aſſembly of the Kingdom, the Wittena-Gemot, Mycel-Synoth, or what we now call the Parliament.

AND this I have brought to ſhew, that I do as much diſown the Thoughts of introducing any Degrees or Orders of Men, (leſs than thoſe of Quality or Eſtates) into the Great Councils of thoſe Times, as the Doctor himſelf does.

BUT in the firſt part of his Compleat Hiſtory he aſſerts, that not only the King's Thanes, but alſo all the Middle and Leſſer Thanes were both after, as well as before the Conqueſt, Military Men, who held their Lands by Military or Knight's Service, which he would prove from the Heregeat, or Heriots, that by the Laws of King Cnute, were to be paid to their Lords by their Heirs, in Horſes and Money, and certain Arms. Well, let this for once be admitted, but I would then have the Doctor never to urge Military or Knight-Service, as a Badg of the Norman Conqueſt any more; and in the next Treatiſe which he ſhall pleaſe to publiſh, I would deſire him to make it out, that none but the King's Thanes, (who were all one with his Tenants in Capite, after the Conqueſt) had any Place in the Great Council of the Kingdom, for without this, he does nothing: yet thus much I muſt ſay for him, that in the beginning of his Anſwer to Mr. Petyt, he ſeems to be ſomewhat more good-natured, making the Saxon Wittena Gemotes more large and diffuſive; for in them he owns, "were Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops, Maſſe-Thegnes, or Dignified and Great Clergy-Men, Aldermen, or Comites, "King's Gereves or Præpoſiti, King's Thegnes, Thanes, or Miniſters, "his Counſellors, Judges or Magiſtrates. Where tho he confounds the King's Judges and Counſellors, (whoſe Preſence there was not abſolutely neceſſary, as not being any conſtituent Parts or Members thereof) with the Biſhops, Aldermen, and Thanes, without whoſe Conſent no Laws could be made; yet he grants us enough in reckoning other Thanes and Magiſtrates to have had Places there, beſides the King's, and who I conceive had a Right to appear there without any particular Summons to each of them; and ſure all theſe were not Tenants in Capite.

Anſwer to Mr. Petyt's Rights of the Commons in Folio. p. 10.

NOW having laid down, and I hope eſtabliſhed a true Notion what ſort of Men then conſtituted the greater part of the Wittena-Gemotes of thoſe Times; I come to the next Degree or Order of Men, who then moſt properly repreſented the Commons of England, viz. the Deputies of Cities and Great Towns: and tho I confeſs theſe are not ordinarily mentioned in any of the Antient Saxon Laws or Charters, yet that they were comprehended ſometimes under the Title of Procuratores, I am very well ſatisfied, as appears from the Annals || of Winchelcomb, wherein there is a Charter of Kenwulf King of the Mercians, bearing date Anno Dom. 811. where all the Orders of Men ſummoned to be preſent at that Aſſembly, are thus particularly recited by that King, viz. Merciorum Optimates, Epiſcopos, Principes, Comites, PROCURATORES, meóſq; propinquos, nec non Cuthredum Regem Cantuariorum, átq; Suthredum Regem Oriental. Saxon. cum omnibus qui Teſtes noſtris Synodalubus conciliabulis aderant.

Deputies of Cities and Great Towns.

Procuratores.

|| In Bibl. Cotton. Tiber. C. 4.

NOW I would be gladly informed by any Man, well converſant in Antiquity, what the word Procuratores could here ſignify after Comites, unleſs it were the Deputies or Repreſentatives of the Cities and Towns of Mercia?

THE like word is alſo found in a Charter of King Athelſtan's, dated Anno 931. of certain Lands granted to the Abbey of Abington; which Charter is entred in the great Regiſter that belonged to that Abbey, and is now in the Cottonian Library, and concludes thus, Hæc Charta in Villa Regali quæ Ætwelope nuncupatur, Epiſcopis, Abbatibus, Ducibus, patriæ Procuratoribus, Regiâ dapſilitate ovantibus perſcripta eſt.

Claudius. B. 9. Cap. 50.

BY which Patriæ Procuratoribus abovementioned, I know not what elſe can be underſtood, but the Deputies or Repreſentatives of the Cities and Chief Towns, who then ſent Members to thoſe General Councils.

THO of what ſort of Men theſe Procuratores or Deputies of Cities and Towns then conſiſted, I confeſs it is hard at this diſtance of Time to determine; when the Original Records of thoſe Councils wherein they appeared are loſt, and that we have ſo obſcure a mention made of them in the Saxon Laws and Charters. But if I may take the Liberty to gueſs, there were not ſo many Citizens choſen for each City as at this Day; but only their Chief Magiſtrates, Rulers, or Aldermen, (which were ſingle Perſons, and not many, for there was then but one Alderman in a Town) or elſe ſuch as were called Port-Gereſas, (now Port-Reves in divers Places) who might appear for them of Courſe, or be conſtantly Choſen on purpoſe: but if the Charter of King Athelſtan abovecited be true, (as I ſee no reaſon to queſtion its Authority) it appears, that the ordinary Boroughs were then repreſented by two Burgeſſes in Parliament, as at this Day.

BUT that theſe, as well as the Magiſtrates and moſt conſiderable Citizens might then all paſs, and be included under the General Name of Witan, or Wites, called in Latin Sapientes, I have the Authority of the Learned Du Freſne, who in his Gloſſary aſſures us, that antiently among the Lombards, Sapientes in Italia appellabantur Civitatum Primarii, quorum conſilio Reſpublicæ gerebantur, i. e. that among the Lombards in Italy, the Chief Citizens were called Wiſe-Men, by whoſe Counſel publick Affairs were tranſacted: and for this he cites Hieron. Rubeus, who in his Hiſtory of Ravenna under Anno 1297. hath this remarkable Paſſage concerning theſe Sapientes; (ſays he) Sed longè anteà, illud nomen obtinuit in aliis Longabardarum civitatibus, ut colligere licet ex Ottone, & Acerbo Morena in Hiſtoria Rerum Lundevetium; which Authority tho fetch'd as far as Italy, is very pertinent to prove the ſame Title to have been in uſe among the Engliſh Saxons of the ſame Age with the Lombards, ſince (as Grotius hath learnedly proved in his Preface to his Gothic Hiſtory) the Lombards were but one Stirp or Tribe of thoſe Antient Gothes, from whom (as I have already proved in the beginning of the third Book of this Volume) the Engliſh Saxons were alſo derived.

Tome 3. pag. 700.

BUT that theſe Citizens of Cities, in thoſe Times, might deſerve the Name of Wites or Sapientes, as well for their Prudence as Riches, appears from the Charter of K. Edward the Confeſſor, in the great Chartulary of the Abby of Weſtminſter, now to be ſeen in the Cottonian Library, which begins thus, Edward Cing gret Willem and Leodtan, & Ælfy Porte-Reven, and alle mine Burh-Thanes on LUNDEN Frindlic; this tho Saxon, yet being ſo near the Engliſh of our own Times, I need not tranſlate, only I deſire the Reader to take notice, that the Citizens of London were then ſo conſiderable, as in this Charter to have had the Title of Thanes, as they were often called Barones de London in our Antient Hiſtorians after the Conqueſt.

Fauſtina. A.3. Fol. 97.

AND as for the City of Canterbury in thoſe Times, it had not only a Chief Magiſtrate, called in Latin Præpoſitus, in Saxon Port-Gereſa, as Mr. Somner in his Antiquities of Canterbury informs us; but alſo in the ſame Place he has given us a Saxon Deed, written ſome Years before the Conqueſt, and containing an Exchange of certain Lands and Houſes in that City, made between the Family, (i.e. Monks of the Cathedral Church) and the Crihtan of that City, being Merchants or Chapmen; and you have already ſeen, that a Merchant having thrice paſſed the Seas, was accounted equal to a Thane: and can any one then reaſonably doubt, that Perſons of that Wealth and Dignity were not capable of being choſen Repreſentatives of their Cities, in the Saxon Great Councils?

NOR can I forbear citing, before I cloſe up this Subject, that remarkable Authority out of * Sulcardus's Manuſcript Chartulary of the Abby of Weſtminſter, where there is entred a Charter of King William the Firſt, bearing date An. Dom. 1071. And after the King had ſubſcribed his own Name to it with the Sign of the Croſs, there are added many of the Biſhops, Abbots, and Temporal Nobility; and then inſtead of cum multis aliis, this Clauſe is ſubjoined, viz. * Multis præterea illuſtriſſimis Virorum perſonis, & Regni Principibus diverſi Ordinis omiſſis, qui huic Confirmationi piiſſimo affectu Teſtes & Fautores fuerunt: Hii autem illo tempore à Regiâ poteſtate è diverſis Provinciis & Urbibus, ad Univerſalem Synodum pro cauſis cujuſlibet Chriſtianæ Eccleſiæ audiendis & tractandis, ad præſcriptum Celeberrimum Cænobium, quod Weſtmonaſterium dicitur, convocati. i. e. "Beſides many other very Eminent Perſons and Chief Men of "the Kingdom of divers Orders being omitted, who with moſt pious "Affection, were Witneſſes and Approvers to this Confirmation; and "theſe were ſummoned at that Time by the Royal Authority, from "divers Provinces and Cities, to the General Synod held at the Famous "Abby of Weſtminſter, for the hearing and determining of the Cauſes "of each Chriſtian Church.

* In Bib. Cotton. Fauſtina. A. 3.

* In the Margin of the Book there is this Note in a more Modern Hand, Nota hic, hos omnes convocari à Rege ſuâ Auctoritate, ad cauſas Religionis tractandas, tàm nobiles de clero quàm Principes Regni, cum aliis inferioris gradus; conventio quorum videtur eſſe Parliamentum: from whence it appears, that this Notator took this Aſſembly for a Parliament of thoſe Times.

THIS is an Authority which ſeemed ſo convincing, that Sir William Dugdale hath made uſe of it in his Origines Juridiciales, to prove the Antiquity of the Commons of England in Parliament; yet Dr. Brady in the Concluſion of his Anſwer to Mr. Cook's Argumentum Antinormanicum, "accuſes that Gentleman of being both Ignorant and Miſtaken in "the meaning of Cities and Provinces, and the Perſons that came from "them, whom he indeed would have to be not any Repreſentatives of "Counties and Cities, but only Deans, Arch-Deacons, and other dignified Perſons and Church-Officers, as well of the Laity as Clergy, "who were ſummoned by the King to this Synod, from Provinces and "Cities, to adviſe and inform the King of the Conveniency of the "Places, whither the Biſhops Sees then about to be removed from "Villages to Cities, were to be transferred.

BUT ſince there is not one word in this Charter ſaid of any ſuch Thing, and that Sir Henry Spelman in his Gloſſary renders the word Provincia for a County, and not a Biſhop's See; I my ſelf not now having leiſure to purſue ſuch Niceties, ſhall refer the Curious for their farther Satisfaction to the eighth Dialogue of Bibliotheca Politica, where they may read whatſoever he has ſaid againſt it ſufficiently anſwered.

Bibliothec. Politic. pag. 567, 568.

THESE are the only Authorities I ſhall make uſe of at this Time, to prove that the Cities and Boroughs had then their Delegates or Repreſentatives in the Saxon Witena-Gemotes.

I will now conclude this Point with the Judgment of that Learned Antiquary Mr. Lambard, who certainly underſtood the Conſtitution of this Antient Government, as well at leaſt, if not better, than Dr. Brady; and he tells us,

“THAT whereas in the beginning of each Law, (viz. thoſe made by the Saxon Kings he there mentions) all the Acts are ſaid to paſs from the King and his Wiſe Men both of the Clergy and Laity, in the Body of the Laws, each Statute being thus, And it is the Advice of our Lord, and his Wiſe-Men: So as it appears that it was then a received Form of Speech, to ſignify both the Spirituality and the Laity (that is to ſay, the greater Nobility, and the leſs, or Commons) by this one word Witan, i. e. Wiſe-men.

“NOW as thoſe written Authorities do undoubtedly confirm our Aſſertion of the Continuance of this manner of Parliament, ſo is there alſo unwritten Law or Preſcription, that doth no leſs infallibly uphold the ſame. For it is well known, that in every Quarter of the Realm, a great many Boroughs do yet ſend Burgeſſes to the Parliament, which are nevertheleſs ſo * antient, and ſo long ſince decayed, and gone to nought, that it cannot be ſhewed, that they have been of any Reputation at any time ſince the Conqueſt, and much leſs that they have obtained this Privilege, by the Grant of any King ſucceeding the ſame. So that the Intereſt which they have in Parliament groweth by an antient Uſage before the Conqueſt, whereof they cannot ſhew any beginning: which thing is alſo confirmed by a contrary Uſage in the ſelf-ſame thing; for it is likewiſe known, that they of Antient Demeſne, do preſcribe in not ſending to the Parliament, for which reaſon alſo they are neither Contributors to the Wages of the Knights of Shires, neither are they bound by ſundry Acts of Parliament, tho the ſame be generally penn'd, and do make no Exceptions of them. But there is no antient Demeſne, ſaving that only which is deſcribed in the Book of Doomſday, under the Title of Terra Regis, which of neceſſity muſt be ſuch as either was in the Hands of the Conqueror himſelf, who made the Book, or of Edward the Confeſſor, that was before him. And ſo again, if they of antient Demeſnes have ever ſince the Conqueſt preſcribed not to elect Burgeſſes to Parliament, then (no doubt) there was a Parliament before the Conqueſt, to the which they of other Places did ſend their Burgeſſes.

I ſhall here crave leave to add one Record, tho after the Conqueſt, in Confirmation of what Mr. Lambard hath here learnedly aſſerted; for that ſeveral Boroughs claimed to ſend Members to Parliament by Preſcription in the beginning of the Reign of Edward the Third, appears by a † Petition put in to that King An. 17 Edw. 3. wherein the Burgeſſes of the Town of Barnſtaple in Devonſhire, ſet forth, that it being a free Borough, had by Charter from King Athelſtan, among other Privileges, a right of ſending two Burgeſſes to all Parliaments for the ſaid Borough; upon which the King and his Council ordered a Writ of Inquiry, which certainly would never have been done, if Dr. Brady's Notion were true, that the Cities and Boroughs never ſent any Repreſentatives to Parliament but once in the 49th of Hen. 3. and then no more till the 18th of Edward the Firſt, which was but a little above 50 Years to the time of this Petition, which being within the Memory of ſo many then living, the King and his Council would never have ordered a Writ of Inquiry about ſuch a vain and idle Pretence.

FROM all which, I think, it may ſafely be concluded, that this Learned Antiquary above-mentioned, I mean Mr. Lambard, did not without good Authority believe, that not only the Great Lords or Peers, but but alſo the Inferiour Nobility, and Repreſentatives of Cities and Towns, were included under the word Witan; and likewiſe that thoſe Places claimed that Privilege by Preſcription.

* Of which ſort are Gatton in Surrey, beſides ſeveral Boroughs in Devonſhire, Cornwall, and other Counties.

† Rot. Pat. 17. Ed. 3. pars 1. m. 20.

I ſhall therefore deſire the Doctor, that when he writes next upon this Subject, he will pleaſe to crave in Aid ſome Gentlemen of the Long Robe of his Opinion, to help him to anſwer this Argument of Mr. Lambard from general Preſcription; as alſo what hath been already ſaid concerning this matter in the ſame Dialogue of Bibliotheca Politica above-mentioned, beginning at pag. 483, and ending at pag. 593, incluſively: and if he can then with his Aſſiſtances prove all our antient Lawyers to have been miſtaken in this memorable Point, I ſhall own my ſelf to have been ſo too. But I deſire this may be taken notice of, that no Preſcription whatſoever in Law can be laid of later Date, than the firſt Year of King Richard the Firſt, which began almoſt fourſcore Years before the 49*th* of Hen. 3. when he fancies the Commons were firſt ſummoned to Parliament.

BUT that I may be as brief as I can, I ſhall reduce what I have further to ſay upon this Head, to a few Queries. As,

FIRST, Whether in all the Kingdoms of Europe of the Gothic Model, beginning with Sweden and Denmark, and ending with Scotland, there can be ſhewn any of them wherein the Cities and Great Towns, either had not, or at leaſt not till of Modern Times, their particular Repreſentatives in the Common Councils, or Aſſemblies of the Eſtates in thoſe Kingdoms?

SECONDLY, Why in England alone, whoſe King was not more Abſolute than in other Neighbouring Kingdoms, and which was framed after the ſame Gothic Conſtitution, its Cities and antient Boroughs (which were in thoſe Times very conſiderable for Strength, Trade and Wealth, and guarded by ſo many Laws made in the Saxon Times) ſhould not be thought conſiderable enough to have any Delegates in the Common Council of the Kingdom, till ſo long after the Conqueſt, as the 49*th* of Hen. 3. which (if we may believe the Doctor) was alſo intermitted from that time for above the ſpace of twenty Years, till the 18*th* of King Edward the Firſt?

BESIDES which, I would alſo propoſe theſe farther Queries concerning the Antiquity of the Commons in general. As,

FIRST, If Clerus and Populus ſignify in our Antient Authors the Clergy and Laity, which the Doctor aſſerts, and I will not oppoſe; then I would aſk him, why (the ſame word Clerus including the inferiour Clergy, viz. Deans, Arch-deacons, &c. as well as the ſuperiour, viz. Arch-biſhops and Biſhops, &c. aſſembled in our Great Councils or Synods) the word Populus muſt not be allowed the ſame Latitude of Signification, and extend to the Gentry, or leſs Nobility, together with the chief Citizens and Burgeſſes, by a like Parity of Reaſon? unleſs he can make it out, that Clerus muſt be underſtood in a very comprehenſive ſenſe, and Populus in a very contracted and narrow one, only to mean Great Lords and Noblemen of the higher Rank.

SECONDLY, I would deſire to know of him what the words Populus and Populi ſhall ſignify, when put after and diſtinct from the words Proceres, Optimates, Senatores, or Senatus, &c. when theſe words occur in ſeveral antient Charters of our Engliſh-Saxon Kings, as well as Hiſtorians that make any mention of the Great Councils, unleſs they mean the People or Commons diſtinct from the Great Lords? Of which I ſhall here ſet down a few Inſtances out of many, both from Charters, Laws and Hiſtorians.

Vid. Monaſtic. Anglican. vol. 1. fol. 988. col. 2.

THE firſt whereof is found in the Charter of King Ethelred, containing a Grant and Confirmation of ſeveral great Privileges to the Monaſtery of Wolverhampton, which concludes in theſe words, Hæc Decreta ſunt Sigerici Archiepiſcopi in placito coràm Rege Ethelredo, & Eboracenſi Archiepiſcopo, & omnibus Epiſcopis, Abbatibus Regionis Britanniæ, ſeu Senatoribus, Ducibus, & Populo Terræ.

Vid. Spelm. Concil f. 625.

THE next is, the third Charter of King Edward the Confeſſor to the Abbey of Weſtminſter, made in a Great Council of the Kingdom, which was held in the laſt Year of his Reign, and concludes thus, Hanc igitur Chartam meæ Donationis & Libertatis, in die Dedicationis prædictæ Eccleſiæ, recitari juſſi, coràm Epiſcopis, Abbatibus, Comitibus, & omnibus Optimatibus Angliæ, omniq; Populo audiente & vidente.

NOW from both theſe Charters it ſeems evident, that by the word Populus, the Repreſentatives of Cities and Boroughs are here meant and underſtood, who were preſent at the ſealing of them, as well as the greater Nobility, viz. the Senators, Ealdormen and Earls, and the leſſer Nobility, viz. the Thanes, or Freeholders, included under the Title of Optimates, ſince the meer Vulgar or Mob could never be admitted into the Place of the Great Council as Witneſſes to the ſolemn reading and ſealing of thoſe Charters.

* Lamb. LL. Edw. Regis, cap. 8.

MY third Inſtance ſhall be that famous Law concerning the Grant of Tithes by King Ethelwolf, Anno Dom. 855. which is cited in the * Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, and confirmed by King William the Firſt, under the Title de Apibus, & de aliis minutis Decimis, wherein it is thus expreſſed, Hæc (ſcilicet, theſe Tithes) conceſſa ſunt à Rege, Baronibus, & Populo. Here it is plain, that the word Populus muſt ſignify a diſtinct Order or Degree of Men from that of the Barones.

Anſwer to Argument. Anti-Norman. fol. 297.

Lamb. ibid.

THIS Law of King Edward the Confeſſor being urged by Mr. Petyt in his Rights of the Commons aſſerted, the Doctor paſſes over in ſilence; but when the ingenious Author of Argumentum Anti-Normanicum, makes uſe of the ſame Authority, the Doctor can no longer contain himſelf, but in his Anſwer to that Book, tells him (after an inſulting diminutive Reflection upon his Perſon) that, “He thinks this Law was made in King Edward's days, and was piping-hot when the Conqueror came in, but (he ſays) it will prove otherwiſe upon Examination of it, and alſo doubtful, whether there was ever ſuch a Law or not made by a Saxon Monarch or King. For after the Law hath enumerated the manner of Tithing in very many things both great and ſmall, requiring an exact Tenth to be paid for moſt of them; it ſays, That he which detains the Tenth, if need be, may be forced to Payment by the Juſtice of the Biſhop and King; and then immediately follow theſe words, Hæc autem prædicavit Beatus Auguſtinus, & conceſſa ſunt à REGE, BARONIBUS & POPULO: Sed poſteà Inſtinctu Diaboli multi eam (viz. decimam) detinuerunt, &c. Theſe things St. Auguſtine preached up, and they were granted by the King, Barons and People, &c.

THE reſt of the Latin he there cites being not to the Point in Diſpute, I paſs over; yet I cannot but obſerve, that from hence the Doctor believes he hath got a notable Advantage over him, for he thus proceeds.

“ HENCE 'tis evident, that theſe Conceſſions of Tithes were made in the time of St. Auguſtine, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, ſent hither from Rome in the Reign of Ethelbert King of Kent; for the words, & conceſſa ſunt à REGE, BARONIBVS ET POPVLO, can relate to no other than the words immediately preceding, hæc enim prædicavit Beatus Auguſtinus. And the words next following them do alſo prove the ſame; ſed poſteà Inſtinctu Diaboli, Multi eam detinuerunt, &c. which was after they were granted by the King, Barons, and People: ſo that this was at moſt but the Confirmation of a Law made by King Ethelbert; and how, and by what words the Legiſlators were expreſſed near 500 Years after the Law made, and how they were rendred in Latin after the coming in of the Normans, tranſiently and without Deſign to give an Account of them, cannot be of much Value to prove who they were; and that the Laws of King Edward were made, or at leaſt tranſlated into Norman Latin after the Conqueſt, appears by the words, Comites, Barones, Milites, Servientes, Servitium, Villanus, Catalla, manutenere, all Norman words, and not known here till their coming hither. He that will aſſert any thing from a ſingle uncouth Expreſſion in one Caſe, and upon one Occaſion only, brings but a ſlender Proof for what he ſays.

THESE are the Doctor's own words which I have tranſcribed almoſt Verbatim, that I may do no prejudice to the Force of his Argument, which in ſhort depends upon this ſingle falſe Suppoſition, viz. that the Compiler or Drawer up of King Edward's Laws, imagined that this Law concerning Tithes was made by King Ethelbert, and was afterwards confirmed by King Edward near 500 Years after the Law was made, when none could tell by what words the firſt Legiſlators were expreſs'd.

BUT if this now ſhould happen to prove otherwiſe, all that the Doctor has ſaid on this Subject will by an unlucky Miſchance fall to the Ground.

AND I ſhall ſhew here, that firſt of all his Argument is not cogent, that becauſe the words, & conceſſa ſunt à Rege, Baronibus & Populo, immediately follow thoſe aforegoing, viz. Hæc enim prædicavit B. Auguſtinus; therefore this Law could be made by no other than K. Ethelbert, ſince the words are put indefinitely, without mentioning any King in particular.

FOR St. Auguſtine might preach up Tithes, and yet the Law whereby they were given to the Clergy might be made many Years after; and that this was ſo, will appear by a brief Hiſtory of the Matter of Fact. For firſt there is not, (nor I believe ever was) any Law extant of King Ethelbert concerning Tithes, nor is ſo much as mentioned by any Writer or Hiſtorian that I know of: the firſt Law, or Canon we find for the paiment of them, being that of the Council or Synod of Calcuithe, held under King Offa, Anno Dom. 536. and which, either becauſe it was only an Eccleſiaſtical Canon, or elſe becauſe it was not made in a General Council of the whole Kingdom, was not of any Univerſal Obligation, (at leaſt as a Temporal Law) before that famous Grant of Tithes made by King Ethelwolf upon his going to Rome, and confirmed as a General Law at a Council held at Wincheſter after his return, Anno Dom. 855. and at which not any of the Biſhops and Great Lords were preſent, but an infinite Number of other faithful Subjects, (or Commons as we now call them), I ſhall ſhew more at large by and by; and to this, and not to any Law of King Ethelbert's, I doubt not but the Compiler of theſe Laws of King Edward had reſpect, when he tells us that Tithes were granted A REGE, BARONIBUS, & POPULO, that is, by the King, Barons, and People of all England, and not by thoſe of one petty Kingdom, (as Kent was in the Time of King Ethelbert) whoſe Laws could never oblige the whole Engliſh Nation; and therefore the words that follow, viz. ſed poſtea, &c. muſt alſo refer to the Time of making this Law by King Ethelwolf, and not to this imaginary Grant of King Ethelbert, which the Compiler of theſe Laws knew nothing of.

THIS being ſo, I think all the reſt the Doctor ſays ſignifies but little; for he is much miſtaken notwithſtanding he ſo poſitively affirms, that all thoſe words he there mentions, were not known here till the coming over of the Normans; ſince he might have found, if he had pleaſed, the words Comes and Miles in the ſingular Number in the Subſcriptions of divers Charters and Laws before the Conqueſt, and the word Comites in the Body of the very Charters themſelves; for which I ſhall only refer him to the firſt Volume of Sir Henry Spelman's Councils, as well as thoſe in Monaſticon Anglicanum.

Baro. AS for the word Baro, I grant it did not come into Common or Legal uſe till after the Time he mentions; yet that it was ſometimes uſed before, I ſhall refer him to Aſſerius his Annals, which however it was continued by another Hand till the beginning of the Reign of K. Edward the Elder, yet that it was wrote before the Conqueſt, there is no doubt to be made of it; and in the very laſt Page of thoſe Annals he may find the Names of the Barones Normannorum, (as he calls them) who are there related to have been ſlain.

Villanus. AS for Villanus uſed for a Ceorle's Man, or Country-Man, you may ſee an Example of the uſe of that word in King Athelſtan's Law above-cited: and the Doctor himſelf mentions Terra Villanorum, i. e. Lands of Villanes or Villagers before the Norman Times. Compleat Hiſt. p. 67.

AND as for the reſt of the words, viz. Servientes, Servitium, Catalla, and Manutenere, I confeſs they are not to be met with in the Latin Verſions of the Saxon Laws made before the Conqueſt; but I would fain know why they might not have been in uſe before that Time, tho they are not there mentioned? I am confident no impartial Reader will grant that a Negative Argument is any good Proof to the contrary.

BUT ſhould I own that the words (Barones, and all the reſt of them there cited by the Doctor) were not commonly in uſe till after the Conqueſt, yet that would do him but little Service; for admit that this Law was only briefly recited by the Collector of them in the Form there ſet down, it will be all one, for the People or Commons were repreſented in the Time of Henry the Firſt, (when theſe Laws were drawn up in the Form we now have them) or elſe they could never have been mentioned in this Law as a diſtinct Order of Men, by a Writer who certainly lived long before the 49*th* of Henry III. ſince this Law is found thus worded in Roger Hoveden's Copy of King Edward's Laws, which was written by him (being Secretary to Henry II.) above a hundred Years before the Commons (according to the Doctor's Hypotheſis) theſis) were ever heard of: So that unleſs he can prove that Henry III. was before Henry II. I think he will but Æthiopem lavare.

BUT indeed if this ſingle uncouth Expreſſion (as the Doctor calls it) had been found in one Caſe, and upon one Occaſion only, I confeſs it might have been as ſlender a Proof as he would have it: but when I have not only given him frequent Inſtances of the uſe of this word in our Antient Charters and Laws, as contradiſtinct from all the reſt of the Orders abovementioned, I think that Pretence will ſtand him in little ſtead; and if theſe are not yet ſufficient, I will ſuperadd a few more from our Antient Hiſtorians to the ſame purpoſe.

FIRST, From William of Malmesbury and Henry Huntington, who both agree almoſt in the ſame words, concerning the Depoſition of Sigebert King of the Weſt-Saxons for Tyranny and Cruelty, Anno 754. Huntington expreſſes it thus, viz. Sigebertus Rex in principio ſecundi Anni Regni ſui, cum incorrigibilis Superbiæ & Nequitiæ eſſet, congregati ſunt PROCERES & POPULUS totius Regni, & providâ Deliberatione Omnium expulſus eſt à Regno. Kinewulf verò Juvenis egregius de Regiâ ſtirpe, ELECTUS eſt in Regem.

SECONDLY, From Ailred Abbot of Rievalle, who in his Life of Edward the Confeſſor, giving an Account of the manner of that King's being Elected in his Mother's Womb, tells us, that Ethelred his Father having convened a Great Council for the appointing a Succeſſor, proceeds thus; Fit Magnus coràm Rege Epiſcoporum, Procerúmq; Conventus, Magnus Plebis Vulgiq; Conſenſus. Wherein he makes a plain Diſtinction between the Aſſembly of the great Noble Men, or Proceres, from the Conſent of the Commons here, called Plebs and Vulgus.

Decem-Scriptores, fol. 372.

AND tho I grant with the Doctor, this Story of King Edward's Election in his Mother's Womb to have been but a Fiction; yet it is certain, that this Abbot then ſpoke according to his Belief of the manner of Electing a King in thoſe Times, and truly ſets down the Parties whoſe Preſence and Votes were neceſſary for the compleating of ſuch an Election, or elſe he muſt have ſpoke as much by way of Prophecy concerning this Matter, as King Ethelred and the Eſtates of the Kingdom had done about K. Edward's being Elected in his Mother's Womb. And the Reader may remember that theſe Authors abovecited, lived and wrote many Years before the 49th of Henry III. when the Doctor ſuppoſes the Commons were firſt ſummoned to Parliament; and therefore could not be corrupted with the Notions (not to ſay Prejudices) of thoſe who wrote after that Time.

BUT I know the Doctor has a Subterfuge, as he thinks for theſe plain and full Authoriries, and that is, that by the Populus, Plebs and Vulgus mentioned as you have heard, the King's Thanes, or leſs Barons as they were called after the Conqueſt, who were all Tenants in Capite, are hereby only to be underſtood; and that no other but they had any Right to be preſent, and vote in the Great Councils of the Kingdom; and this he has endeavoured to make good in his Anſwer to Mr. Petyt's aboveſaid Treatiſe.

BUT ſince the Doctor's Authorities do there relate to the Times after his Conqueſt, (concerning which I ſhall not now ſay any thing) I will content my ſelf at preſent with asking him only theſe two Queſtions.

FIRST, How he will prove, that none but the Perſons he there mentions, appeared in thoſe Councils, ſince we cannot trace any Footſteps in our moſt Antient Laws or Hiſtorians of his Tenants in Capite, being the only Conſtituent Parts of the Saxon Witena-Gemotes?

AND it was indeed very unlikely they ſhould, if we conſider the many Free-Tenants who before the Conqueſt held in Allodio without Tit. Alodium. any Military Services; and this, as Sir Henry Spelman well obſerves, "was oppoſed to Feud or Fee, in the Antient Verſion of King Canutus Cap. 75. "his Laws, where it is called in Saxon, Bockland; and in the Laws of Cap. 36. "King Alfred, Terra Hæreditaria, and ſeems to be the ſame with our "Fee-Simple, which might be made over to Strangers without any Li- "cence from the Lord of whom ſuch Land was held.

OF which ſort of Men there is alſo frequent mention in Doomſday Book, under the Title of Alloarii and Allodiarii, and of whom it is there alſo often ſaid, Potuit ire cum terrâ quo voluit, or potuit ſe vertere ad alium Dominum. Of theſe there were certainly many more before the Conqueſt than afterwards, when I own the greateſt part of the Kingdom was in a few Years parcell'd out into Knights Fees.

SECONDLY, I deſire to be informed how our Great Councils could conſiſt of ſuch a multitude of Perſons, as I find in Antient Charters and Hiſtorians to have appeared at thoſe Aſſemblies, not only before, but long after the Conqueſt? But of the Period before that Time, (and which I treat of in this Volume) I ſhall give theſe remarkable Inſtances.

THE firſt is out of an Antient Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library, Sub effigie Claudii, D. 2. F. 8. concerning the League between Alfred and Godrun the Dane, which begins thus, Circà Annum Salvatoris noſtri DCCCLXXVI. in Magno Concilio ſive Mycel-Gemot, Aluredus Rex Anglorum & Godrunus Rex Anglo-Danorum, & Omnes Angligenæ Sapientes, & omnis populus qui in Angliâ manſit, Pacis agenda ſive fœdus conſtituerunt, & Juramento confirmaverunt pro ſeipſis & Junioribus ſuis Ingenitis. Wherein this is worth obſerving, that by the Angligenæ Sapientes here mentioned, the greater Wites or Noblemen are underſtood, and by Populus, the Repreſentatives of the inferior People or Commons.

THE next is, that at the end of King Ethelwolf's Charter of Tythes, Anno 855. where you will find after the Subſcriptions of the Biſhops, Vid. Spelm. Concil. f. 350. Earls and other Great Men, or Thanes, to this Law, theſe following Parties are mentioned, Aliorúmque Fidelium infinita Multitudo, qui omnes Regium Chirographum laudaverunt, Dignitates verò ſua Nomina ſubſcripſerunt.

FROM whence you may obſerve, that tho only the Dignified Perſons ſubſcribed their Names, yet all the reſt of this Multitude had a Right to approve, and give their Conſents to what was there tranſacted: But it cannot be imagined, that this Charter would ever take notice of the Approbation of the meer Rabble without, however they might ſhew a Joy and Satisfaction at what was there done by their Hollowing and Shouting.

AND this I conceive to be the Reaſon why theſe Councils often met in the open Air, when the Weather would permit, becauſe no one Room could eaſily hold them; as appears by the Concluſion of King Edgar's Charter to Ely Abby, bearing date at Wulſamere, An. Dom. 970. Charta antiq. in Turri Lond. B. Apud Wlſamere (ſays the Record) non clàm in angulo, ſed ſub Dio, palàm evidentiſſimè, ſcientibus totius Regni mei Primatibus; who were not

nly Primates Regis, the King's Tenants in Capite, but Primates Regni, he principal or moſt conſiderable Men of the Kingdom.

I could give ſeveral more Inſtances to prove, that our Antient Witena-Gemotes conſiſted of a much greater number than the Doctor's Tenants n Capite, which in the time of his Conqueror were not five or ſix hundred Perſons, and might not be half that number in the time of Edward he Confeſſor. But ſince the reſt of my Authorities fall out in the following Period, I ſhall reſerve them to the next ſucceeding Volume. Theſe are ſufficient, I think, to make out that long before the time the Doctor allows, the Commons had their Repreſentatives in the Great Councils by thoſe of their own Order; but whether by Knights, Citizens and Burgeſſes, as now at this day, I do not affirm.

BUT to paſs from Charters to the Laws themſelves, that prove the Engliſh-Saxons Witena Gemotes, to have then conſiſted of a great multitude of People, I ſhall only inſtance in the famous Charter of Athelwolf's concerning Tithes, Anno Dom. 855. which being confirmed into a Law at the Common-Council at Wincheſter, there is both in the Copy of this Charter in Ingulph, as alſo in that in Sir H.Spelman's firſt Volume of Councils, this Concluſion (after the Subſcriptions of Arch-biſhops, Biſhops, Earldormen, and others) in theſe words, Aliorumq; Fidelium infinita multitudo, qui omnes Regis Chirographum laudaverunt, Dignitates verò ſua nomina ſubſcripſerunt, i. e. there were beſides a great multitude of faithful Subjects, who all approved of the Royal Subſcriptions; but the Dignities, i. e. the dignified Perſons alone ſubſcribed their Names.

NOW I would fain be ſatisfied from the learned Doctor, or any other who ſhall next undertake this Controverſy, who this infinita Fidelium multitudo were, that are here ſaid to have approved of this Charter, unleſs they were the whole Body of the inferiour Nobility, or Freeholders of the Nation, together with the Deputies of Cities and Boroughs, on whoſe behalf the Dignities are ſaid to have ſubſcribed their Names? ſince it had been very ridiculous for this Charter to have mentioned the Aſſent or Approbation of the Mob, or meer Vulgar that only looked on at this Aſſembly, or to have taken particular notice that theſe had not ſubſcribed their Names, but only the Perſons of great Dignity.

I come next to conſider in whom the Legiſlative Power, or that of Enacting and Repealing Laws, did then as well as now conſiſt.

Dr. Johnſton in his Excellency of Monarchical Government, Chap. 24. and other high Aſſertors of the Royal Prerogative, think they have done enough to prove, that the Power of enacting Laws reſided wholly in the Engliſh-Saxon Kings; and for this they cite the * Titles or Prefaces to ſeveral Laws, wherein the King by the Advice of his Biſhops, and Wites, or Wiſe-men, ſtrictly charges and commands ſuch and ſuch “ Laws to be obſerved; and ſometimes he does it in his own Perſon “ without mentioning any of them, as may be ſeen in the Preface to “ the Laws of King Cnute, and other Places.

* Vid. LLeg. Regum Inæ, Ælfredi, Æthelſtani, Edgari, &c. Vid. Spelm. Concil. vol. I. fol. 552.

I ſhall not diſpute the Truth of any of the Authorities theſe Gentlemen produce, but freely confeſs that the King, as Head of the Body Politick or Common-weal, is often mentioned, as if he himſelf made ſuch and ſuch a Law; as we ſay at this day the Statutes of King Charles the Firſt, or Second, tho every body knows that thoſe Laws were enacted with the Conſent and Authority of Parliament.

SO under our Engliſh-Saxon Kings, tho the King's Authority gave Sanction to the Law, and he might propter Excellentiam Perſonæ, frequently bid and command in his own Perſon, yet it was ſtill in ſuch a manner as was conſiſtent with the ſettled and received Conſtitution of the Kingdom, which I dare maintain hath not been altered in this Point ſince that time. Some few Authorities of this ſort I will here ſet down, collected out of the ſame Books theſe very Gentlemen have made uſe of, to which I will alſo add ſome antient Charters of indiſputable Credit.

THE firſt ſhall be from the Laws of King Ina, which you may ſee Tom. 1. fol. 219. in the Preface to Sir Henry Spelman's Councils, where in a Mycel Synod ſeveral Eccleſiaſtical as well as Civil Laws were made to theſe ends, viz. ad Concordiam publicam promovendam, per Commune Concilium, & Aſſenſum Epiſcoporum, Principum, Procerum, Comitum, & omnium Sapientum Seniorum, & Populorum totius Regni. And as for the Concluſions of * Pag. 193. King Alfred's Laws, which * Dr. Johnſton urges for the King's ſole Power in making Laws; they rather make againſt than for his Opinion, for he there ſhews us, that this King having commanded his Laws to be written, thoſe that he liked not, he with the Council of his Wites rejected, and thoſe he liked, he bad, or commanded to be holden; where I deſire the Reader to take notice, that he neither rejected nor commanded theſe Laws, but MID MINRA WITENA GETHEAT, in Saxon, that is, with the Conſent of his Witena, or Council of Wiſe-men, whoſe Conſent and Approbation was certainly neceſſary in thoſe Laws, as appears by theſe very words at their Concluſion, which the Doctor himſelf hath thus tranſlated out of Saxon; I Alfred King of the Weſt-Saxons, ſhewed all theſe (Laws) to all my Wites (i. e. Council of Nobility, or Wiſe-Men) and they ſaid they all liked (or were pleaſed) they ſhould be holden.

AND that the Saxon word GETHEAT ſignifies ſomewhat more than bare Counſel or Advice, you may ſee in the Title to King Vid. Chronic. Brompt. fol. 848. Athelſtan's Laws, which is thus, Hæc ſunt Judicia quæ Sapientes Exoniæ, Conſilio Adelſtani Regis inſtituerunt, & iterum apud Fuereſham, & tertii vice apud Thundreſfeldium, ubi hoc definitum ſimul & confirmatum eſt.

HERE you may obſerve, that the Sapientes, the Wites, or Wiſe-men, are ſaid to inſtitute or make theſe Judgments or Laws by the Advice of the King, and not He by theirs.

THIRDLY, I will preſent you with the Title of King Ethelred's Brompt. ut ſupr. col.893, 894. Laws, (as you may ſee in the ſame Author) and there we meet with theſe words, Hoc eſt Concilium quod Ethelredus Rex, & Sapientes ſui condixerunt ad Emendationem & Augmentum Pacis, omni Populo apud Wodeſtocam in Mercena Landa, id eſt, in terra Mercenorum.

FOURTHLY, To another Body of Laws made by the ſame King Idem fol.895. Ethelred, you will find this Title, Hæ ſunt Leges quas Ethelredus Rex, & Sapientes ſui conſtituerunt apud Venetyngum, ad Emendationem Pacis & Fælicitatis Incrementum.

BY theſe two laſt Titles prefixt to King Ethelred's Decrees, the Reader may pleaſe to take notice, that Concilium in the firſt of them does not there ſignify barely Advice or Counſel, (tho if it did only do that it would make but little to theſe Gentlemens purpoſe) but it muſt (and can do nothing elſe here than) intend and mean the Laws and Statutes which were made in this Great Aſſembly, not by King Ethelred alone, but by him and his Wiſe-men: this you find in both of them; for what is called Concilium in the former, the latter Title calls Leges, and were all enacted by the joint and unanimous Conſent of the King and his Great Council.

I ſhall now proceed to give you a few Inſtances from antient Charters: And the firſt is that out of the great Regiſter of Abingdon above-cited, which being thus, Ego Ecberht Rex Occidentalium Saxonum cum Licentia & Conſenſu totius Gentis noſtræ, & Vnanimitate omnium Optimatum, &c.

Bibl. Cotton. ſub Effig. Claud. B. 9. cap. 31.

FROM whence I ſhall obſerve, that as antient as the time of King Egbert, the whole Engliſh-Saxon Nation, as well as the chief Men of it, are ſaid to give not only their Conſent, but their Licence to this Charter, without which the Authority of the King, and the Unanimity of theſe chief Men would have ſignified little.

THE ſecond Charter is that of King Cnute to the Abbey of Briadriteſworth (afterwards called St. Edmundsbury) now in the Office of the King's Remembrancer of the Exchequer, the beginning of which runs thus, * Ego Cnute Rex totius Albionis Inſulæ, & aliarum Nationum plurimarum, in Cathedrâ Regali promotus, † cum Concilio & Decreto Archiepiſcoporum, Epiſcoporum, Abbatum, Comitum, aliorúmq; omnium Fidelium elegi ſanciend.

* Rot. Carr. 4. E. 3. m. 24. n. 58.

† The ſame Expreſſions as to the enacting part, as well as all the Parties that gave their Aſſent, you may alſo find in K. Edward the Confeſſor's laſt Charter to the Abby of Weſtminſter. vid. Si Hen. Spelman's 1ſt vol. of Councils, ad finem.

THIS Charter is the more remarkable, becauſe made by a Prince who came in partly by Force, and therefore one might have thought he would have exerted a more abſolute Power in making Laws by his ſole Authority; and yet we find him ſo far from pretending to do that, that he grants this Charter not only by the Conſent, but by the Decree of the Arch-biſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, and all his other faithful Subjects; which word (in the Latin, Fideles) tho Dr. Brady underſtands it only of Military Tenants in Capite, yet I doubt not but it is there to be taken in a much larger ſenſe, and muſt comprehend all the leſſer Thanes, or Freeholders above-mentioned, as alſo the Deputies or Repreſentatives of Cities and Towns: of which Fideles Sir Henry Spleman underſtands omnes qui in Principis alicujus ditione ſunt, vulgò ſubjecti: Hi ſunt qui in Hiſtoriis dicuntur Fideles Regis. And alſo in the ſame ſenſe it is to be underſtood in the Oath of Fidelity taken antiently in the Court-Leets, as the ſame Author ſhews us, Tu J. S. jurabis quod ab iſta die in anteà, eris Fidelis & Legalis Domino noſtro Regi, & ſuis Hæredibus; & Fidelitatem & Legalitatem ei portabis de vita & membro, & de Terreno honore, & quod tu eorum Malum aut Damnum nec noveris, nec audiveris, quòd non defendes (id eſt, prohibes) pro poſſe tuo, &c.

Spelm. Gloſſ. f. 225. col. 1.

AND tho I grant this word (Fideles) is after the Conqueſt frequently uſed for a Military Tenant or Vaſſal, yet does it likewiſe even then often extend further than to Tenants in Capite only, as I am able to prove from the very Authorities he gives us in his own Gloſſary, under the Title Fideles, were it now worth while to diſpute that Point. But in the mean time it lies upon him to make out, that the Fidelium Multitudo mentioned in King Athelwolf's Charter abovecited, and the Omnium nium Fidelium in theſe, were no other than his Tenants in Capite, which when ever he does, (to make uſe of his own Phraſe) Erit mihi Magnus Apollo.

I could alſo give you ſome Inſtances to the ſame Effect out of the Saxon Annals under the Years 994, and 1002. in both which it is ſaid expreſly, THA GÆREDDE SE KYNG AND HIS WITAN; that is, it was Decreed by the King and his Wites or Wiſemen, to make Peace with the Danes, and to raiſe a Tax for that end.

SO that to conclude, I think this Diſpute about the King's Authority in making of Laws, may eaſily be reconciled to that which the two Houſes of Parliament now exerciſe, that is, the King makes the Laws, yet by and with the Aſſent of the Lords and Commons, as is declared in the Year-Book of Edward the Third. And if ſuch their Aſſent be abſolutely neceſſary, can any Man in reaſon deny their Authority to be Eſſential in the making of theſe Laws?

22 Edw. 3. f. 3. a. b.

AND therefore Bracton underſtood well enough what he wrote, when he tells us, Cum Legis Vigorem habeat Quicquid de Conſilio & Conſenſu Magnatum, & Reipublicæ Communi ſponſione, Authoritate Principis præcedente, juſtè fuerit Definitum & Approbatum; i. e. "That whatſoever hath been rightly decreed and approved of by the Advice and "Conſent of the Chief Men, and the General Agreement of the Com-"mon-Wealth, the Prince's Authority preceding, carries thenceforth "the Force of a Law.

WHEREBY it appears that in this Great Man's Time, the King gave his Conſent to Laws firſt, by ordering them to be drawn up by his Council, and propoſed to the Parliament when they met; and that it was in their Power either to accept or refuſe them, as we ſee it is in Charters and Acts of Pardon at this Day, when they are Paſſed and Confirmed by both Houſes; and for this ſee the Preface to the Statute of Weſtminſter the Third.

AS for the Judicial Power of this Witena-Gemote, in Baniſhing great and notorious Offenders againſt the King and Kingdom, whoſe Crimes were either not directly Treaſon according to the ſtrict Letter of the Law, or elſe their Perſons being too great for any other leſs Court of Judicature; you may find divers Examples in our Annals and Hiſtorians, viz. under the Years 1048, 1052, 1055. But I do not find any great Lord or Nobleman condemned to Death, or attainted by Authority of this Council, till long after the Conqueſt.

I HAVE [illegible] now ſhewn the Antient Authority of the Eſtates of the Kingdom to have been always neceſſary and concurrent, (I do not ſay co-ordinate) with that of the King, and alſo what other Powers they conſtantly then uſed; in the next Place I come to obſerve the near Conjunction and Union of both Church and State in their Mycel-Synods or Witena-Gemotes; which lets us ſee what kind of Supremacy our Engliſh-Saxon Kings then exerciſed in Church Matters, as alſo who they were that at that Time made Eccleſiaſtical as well as Civil Laws: and I ſhall give it you in the Words of a very Learned Lawyer lately deceaſed, I mean, Mr. Joſeph Waſhington, ſince I own I am not able to mend what hath been wrote by ſo excellent a Pen: his words are theſe.

Obſervations on the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction of the Kings of England, pag. 13, 14, &c.

"IN the ſecond Place, (for in the precedent Pages he had given "ſome Inſtances before the entry of the Saxons, (which being not to my preſent preſent Deſign I omit) “to make appear in ſome Meaſure how the Law ſtood in thoſe Times with reſpect to the King's Supremacy;) I will exhibit (ſays he) a very few Inſtances of the Saxon Times, during the Heptarchy. The Reader may conſult many more at his Leiſure.

“NO marvel if we find this People ſubmitting to nothing in Religion, but what was ordained by themſelves; De Majoribus Omnes, was one of their Fundamental Conſtitutions before they came hither, and it is continued here to this Day. And Matters of Religion were amongſt their Majora, even before they received Chriſtianity.

Tacit. de Morib. German. Cap. 11.

“ACCORDINGLY Edwin King of Northumberland, habito cum Sapientibus Conſilio, renounced his Paganiſm, and he and they embraced the Chriſtian Faith. This is deſcribed in Bede and Huntington, to have been done in ſuch an Aſſembly of Men, as the Parliaments of thoſe Days are generally mentioned to conſiſt of.

Vid. Bede Eccl. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 13. Hunting. l. 3. f. 188.

“AFTER the Chriſtian Religion had ſpread among the Saxons, the Biſhops and Clergy frequently held Synods without the Laity for Church-Viſitation, and made Conſtitutions for the Regulation of the Clergy, which they obeyed and ſubmitted to by reaſon of their Oath of Canonical Obedience: but as nothing tranſacted in thoſe Aſſemblies of the Clergy bound the People, ſo can no Inſtance be produced of the Clergy's being bound by any Act of the King, not aſſented to in the Provincial Synods of thoſe Times.

Vid. Spel. Concil. ubicunq;.

THESE Synods may eaſily be diſtinguiſhed from our Mycel-Synods or Witena-Gemotes, not only by the Matters tranſacted in them, but by the Perſons that therein preſided, and ſubſcribed them, viz. the Pope's Legate, or elſe the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury or York, and the Biſhops, Abbots, &c. without the Names of any Temporal Perſons preſent thereat, when they were meer Eccleſiaſtical Synods; but if they were mixt as well for Temporal as Eccleſiaſtical Matters, both the King and Arch-Biſhop are ſaid to preſide, otherwiſe the King alone: and before the Union of the Heptarchy into one Kingdom, theſe Synods were commonly held in the Dominions of that King who was then moſt Powerful, ſo that the leſſer or weaker Princes were fain to appear therein in Perſon, or by their Deputies; but if they did not appear there, nor yet ſend any Deputies, thoſe Councils were looked upon as to all Temporal and Eccleſiaſtical Matters, no other than particular Synods, or Councils of thoſe Kingdoms wherein they were held, or whoſe Kings conſented to them; for which I could give you ſeveral Inſtances were it not to avoid being tedious; but for this I refer the Reader to the firſt Volume of Sir H. Spelman, as alſo to divers Charters in Monaſt. Anglican. and Ingulf; ſome of which are taken notice of in this Introduction, and the following Hiſtory. This I thought fit to ſuperadd, the better to explain what our Learned Author hath ſaid upon this Point.

BUT notwithſtanding he there further obſerves, “That the Clergy themſelves, both as to Doctrine, Diſcipline, and Ceremonies, were bound by the Publick Laws of the Kingdom, enacted in the Great Councils of the Nation; concerning which he gives us theſe enſuing Inſtances.

“IN the Year 673. Concilium Herudfordiæ celebratum eſt ſub initio primi Anni Lotharii Regis Cantiæ, præſidente Theodoro Cantuariæ Archiepiſcopo. At this Council (ſays Matthew Weſtminſter) were

“ In the Year 787. Concilium Legatinum & Pananglicum was held at Calcuith, in which many Canons were made de fide primitùs ſuſceptâ retinenda, aliiſq; ad Eccleſiæ regimen pertinentibus. This Council was held coràm Rege Ælfwaldo, & Archiepiſcopo Eanbaldo, & omnibus Epiſcopis & Abbatibus Regionis, ſeu Senatoribus & Ducibus, & Populo Terræ. After theſe Eccleſiaſtical Laws had been thus enacted by Ælfwald King of Northumberland, the Legats carried them into the Council or Parliament of the Mercians, where the glorious King Offa, cum Senatoribus Terræ, unà cum, &c. convenerat. There they were read in Latin and Teutonick, that all might underſtand, and all promiſed to obſerve them; and the King and his Princes, the Arch-biſhop and his Companions, ſigned them with the ſign of the Croſs.

Spelm.Concil. vol. I. f. 291, 292, &c.

“ MANY Inſtances of this kind might have been added, as particularly that of the Council at Hatfield, Anno 680, wherein the Canons of five General Councils were received, which was a Witena-Gemot, a Conventus Sapientum; but I ſpare time, and am indeavouring only to open a Door.

“ BY theſe Inſtances it is apparent, that the ſame Body of Men that enacted the Temporal Laws of the Kingdom did in the very ſame Councils make Laws for the Government of the Church. Indeed, the whole Fabrick of the Engliſh-Saxon Church was built upon Acts of Parliament; nothing in which the whole Community was concern'd, was enacted, decreed, or eſtabliſhed, but by that Authority. For whoſo reads impartially the Hiſtories of thoſe Times, and compares them with one another, will find, that as moſt of thoſe antient Councils, commonly ſo called, were no other than (to ſpeak in our Modern Language) Parliaments; ſo not any thing whatſoever in Religion, obligatory to the People, whether in Matters of Faith, Diſcipline, Ceremonies, or any Religious Obſervances, was impoſed, but in ſuch Aſſemblies as no Man can deny to have been Parliaments of thoſe times, that has not a Fore-head of Braſs. For the Preſence not of the Kings only, but of the Duces, Principes, Satrapæ, Populus Terræ, &c. ſhews ſufficiently, that neither the Kings and the Clergy, without the concurrent Authority of the ſame Perſons that enacted Temporal Laws, could preſcribe General Laws in Matters of Religion. I do not diſpute what Orders of Men among the Saxons were deſcribed by Duces, Principes, &c. but ſure I am, that they were Lay-men, and as ſure, that they aſſented to, and confirmed thoſe Laws, without whoſe Aſſent they were no Laws: ſo that the Kings of thoſe Times had no greater Legiſlative Power in Eccleſiaſtical Matters than in Temporal.

“ THE tearing the Eccleſiaſtical Power from the Temporal, was the great Root of the Papacy: It was that mounted it to this heighth; thoſe Powers never were diſtinct in England, nor moſt other Nations, till that See got the Aſcendant. And it is a ſtrange Inconſiſtency to argue one while, that whatever the Pope de facto, formerly did by the Canon Law, that of Right belongs to our Kings; and another while,

“ that the ſeveral Acts that reſtore the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction to the “ Crown, are but declarative. It ſhews how little the Supremacy is understood
“ by Modern Aſſertors of it, and how little they are acquainted “ with the Antient Government of England.

“ THE third Period of Time to be conſidered, ſhall be from the uniting “ of the ſeveral Kingdoms of the Saxons under one Monarchy to “ the Norman Conqueſt.

“ IN this Diviſion we find a Letter from Pope Formoſus to King Edward “ the Elder, wherein the Pope complains, that the Country of the “ Weſt-Saxons had wanted Biſhops for ſeven whole Years: Upon the “ Receipt of this Letter, the King calls Synodum Senatorum Gentis Anglorum, “ who being aſſembled, ſingulis tribubus Gewiſiorum (i. e.
Spelm.Concil. 387, 388. “ Weſt-Saxonum) ſingulos conſtituerunt Epiſcopos, & quod olim duo habuerunt, “ in quinque diviſerunt.

“ THE Eccleſiaſtical Laws of King Edward the Elder, and Guthrun
“ the Dane, begin with this Prœmium: Hæc ſunt Senatuſ-conſulta ac
“ Inſtituta, quæ primò Aluredus & Guthrunus Reges, deindè Edwardus “ & Guthrunus Reges, illis ipſis temporibus tulère, cum pacis fœdus Daci “ & Angli ferierunt. Quæque poſteà à ſapientibus (Tha Witan) ſæpius “ recitata átq; ad Communem Regni utilitatem aucta átq; amplificata ſunt.
“ The Titles of ſome of theſe Laws are, De Apoſtatis, De Correctione “ Ordinatorum, (i. e.) Sacris Initiatorum, De Inceſtu, De Jejuniis, &c.
“ all of Eccleſiaſtical Cognizance, or at leaſt of after-times ſo reputed.
“ Theſe are called Senatuſ-conſulta, than which a more appoſite word “ could ſcarce have been uſed for Acts of Parliament, and were aſſented Spelm.Concil. 390, &c. “ to by the Witen; from which word the Saxon Term for Parliaments, “ Witena-Gemot, is derived.

“ A Concilium celebre was held under King Athelſtan, in quo Leges “ plurimæ, tùm Civiles, tùm Eccleſiaſticæ, ſtatuebantur. It's true, the “ Civil Laws are omitted, and Sir Henry Spelman gives us an Account
“ only of the Eccleſiaſtical Laws made at this Aſſembly, which conclude, “ Decreta, Actaq; hæc ſunt in celebri Gratanleano Concilio, cui Wulfelmus Spelm.Concil. 396, &c. “ interfuit Archiepiſcopus, & cùm eo Optimates & Sapientes ab Athelſtano

“ KING Edmund held a Council Anno 944. where many Eccleſiaſtical
“ as well as Secular Laws were made, as De Vitæ caſtitate eorum
“ qui ſacris initiantur; De Fani inſtauratione; De pejerantibus; De iis
“ qui barbara factitarunt Sacrificia, &c. And this Council is expreſſed Spelm.Concil. fol. 419, &c. “ to have been Conventus tàm Eccleſiaſticorum, quàm Laicorum; celebri “ tàm Eccleſiaſticorum, quàm Laicorum frequentia.

“ I will give no more Inſtances before the Conqueſt, tho numbers are “ to be had which lie ſcattered up and down in the Monkiſh Hiſtories, “ which being compared with one another, will ſufficiently diſcloſe
“ what I aſſert. For ſometimes Laws that concert Temporal Affairs, as “ well as Eccleſiaſtical, are ſaid to have been made by ſuch a King in one “ Author, which very Laws another Hiſtorian tells us were made in “ the Great Council, for which yet they have no uniform, appropriated “ Expreſſion, Term, or Denomination: Juſt as we in common Parlance “ ſay, King Edward the Third, or King Henry the Seventh made “ ſuch a Law, which yet every Man underſtands to have been made in “ Parliament, becauſe elſe it were not a Law.

SO far have I made bold with the words of this Learned Gentleman: I ſhall now, by way of Confirmation to what he hath ſaid, obſerve, from Mr. Lambard's Edition of his Engliſh-Saxon Laws (which was a different Copy from that, from whence Sir Henry Spelman publiſhed his Councils) that our Saxon Laws both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, were made by one and the ſame Authority, as appears by the Preface to the Laws of King Edmund, which we find runs thus, Ædmundus Rex ipſo ſolemni Paſchatis Feſto, frequentem Londini tàm Eccleſiaſticorum quàm Laicorum Cætum celebravit, &c. So likewiſe in the Laws of King Edgar, the Preface of which is thus, Leges quas Edgarus Rex frequenti Senatu, ad Dei Gloriam, & Reipublicæ utilitatem, ſancivit. In the Saxon Original thus, MID HIS WITENA GEHEAHTE GERÆD, that is, with the Council of his Wiſe-men he eſtabliſhed. The Laws of King Cnute likewiſe begin thus, Conſultum quod Canutus Anglorum, Dacorum, & Norwegiorum Rex, ex Sapientûm Concilio ſancivit. (Note, the words in the Saxon are the ſame as above.)

Lamb. Archaionomia, f. 57. & dein.

Id. fol. 62.

Id. fol. 97.

I could illuſtrate this further by ſeveral more Inſtances out of the ſame Volume, were I not afraid of having already treſpaſſed too much upon you; only I deſire you would pleaſe to take notice, that in each Body of theſe above-mentioned Laws, the Eccleſiaſtical precede, and then the Civil or Temporal follow, tho being both made at the ſame time, in the ſame Council, and by the joint Authority of the ſame Parties.

BUT now to add one thing more from the ſaid Author, Mr. Waſhington, which is, "That Biſhopricks and other Eccleſiaſtical Dignities were in the Saxon Times (commonly) conferred in Parliament; we have the Teſtimony of Ingulphus, who was Abbot of Crowland in King William the Conqueror's Reign; à multis annis retroactis nulla erat Electio Prælatorum merè libera & Canonica: ſed omnes Dignitates tàm Epiſcoporum, quàm Abbatum, Regis Curia pro ſuâ complacentiâ conferebat: that is, ſays he, that for many Years paſt, there was no Election of Prelates abſolutely free and Canonical: But all Dignities both of Biſhops and Abbots, were conferred by the King's Court (i. e. the Great Council of the Kingdom, as I ſhall prove by and by.) according to their good Pleaſure.

AFTER which, the Perſon ſo elected, being firſt conſecrated, the King inveſted him with the Temporalties, per traditionem Baculi & Annuli, as you will find in the ſame Author.

AND that this Cuſtom was very antient will appear by the Election of Wilfrid to be Biſhop of Hagulſtade, Anno 666. for Stephen Heddi expreſly tells us in his Life, Reges deindè Concilium cum ſapientibus ſuæ Gentis poſt ſpatium inierunt, quem eligerent in ſedem vacantem, &c. Reſponderunt Omnes uno Conſenſu, Neminem habemus meliorem & digniorem noſtræ Gentis, quàm Wilfridum Presbyterum & Abbatem. Then the two Kings (i. e. of Northumberland) after ſome time held a Council with the Wiſe-men of their own Nation, to conſider whom they ſhould chooſe to fill up the vacant See, &c. and they all unanimouſly anſwered, We have none fitter nor more worthy in our Nation, than Wilfrid the Presbyter and Abbot; and thereupon being preſently elected, he was conſecrated Biſhop.

In vitâ Wilfridi, cap. 11. edit. per Rev. Dom. Dr. Gale fol. 46.

THE next Authority of much what the ſame time you may find in an antient Manuſcript-Life of St. Erkenwald in the Cottonian Library, where are theſe words, Contigit autem Epiſcopus Londonicæ ſedis, Cedda migravit ad Dominum, conſenſu verò Sebbæ Regis, & vocabulo univerſæ plebis, vir Domini Erkenwaldus in Cathredrâ Pontificali ſublimatus eſt, i. e. but it happened, that Cedda Biſhop of London deceaſing, Erkenwald, that holy Man, by the Conſent of King Sebba, and the Nomination of all the People, was promoted to the Epiſcopal Throne.

Bibl. Cotton. Vitellius D.17. BUT long after this, as a Nameleſs Author of the Manuſcript-Life of St. Dunſtan informs us, he was made Biſhop after this manner, viz. Poſtea, Anno 958. factus eſt magnus ſapientûm Conventus, in loco, qui vocatur Bradanforde, & eo omnium ex electione ordinatus eſt Dunſtanus ad Epiſcopum Wigornenſem. To wit, that afterwards, ſcilicet, in the Year 958. a Great Council of the Wiſe-men of the Kingdom, was held at Bradanforde, and there by the Election of them all Dunſtan was advanced to be Biſhop of Worceſter, &c. and then the King finding how well he diſcharged that Truſt, the ſame Author tells us, that he committed to him the Church of London, then void by the Death of its Paſtor, or Biſhop.

THIS Nomination of the King's muſt be underſtood in the ſame ſenſe with that which went before, as well as with what immediately follows, viz. that Brihthelm, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, being depriv'd, a little after he retired to his Monaſtery, and then Rex, ſcilicet, Edgarus, ex Divino reſpectu, & Sapientûm Conſilio, conſtituit Dunſtanum ad ſuum prædictæ Eccleſiæ Sacerdotem; King Edgar, both from a Divine reſpect, and from the Counſel of his Wiſe-men, conſtituted Dunſtan chief Biſhop of that Church.

THE next Example we have, is that of St. Wulſtan, Biſhop of Worceſter, who (as it is related by a Monk of that Church in his Manuſcript-Life of that Saint, about Anno 1170.) being ſent for on purpoſe to be made a Biſhop, he gives us the manner of his being elected thus, Sanctus ergò ad Curiam exhibitus, jubetur ſuſcipere Donum Epiſcopatûs; contrà ille niti, & ſe tanto honori imparem (cunctis reclamitantibus) clamitare, adeò concors populus in unam venerat ſententiam, ut non peccaret qui diceret in tot corporibus in hoc duntaxat negotio unam conflatam eſſe Animam. This holy Man being called before the Great Council, (for ſo Curia in this place is certainly to be underſtood) he was commanded to accept the Gift of a Biſhoprick; but he endeavoured all he could to wave the Acceptance of it, alledging, that he was altogether unfit for ſo great an Honour; but the whole Aſſembly not admitting his Excuſe, they all unanimouſly came to this Reſolution, that one ſhould not have told a Lie who had ſaid in this particular Affair, that one Soul had animated ſo many Bodies.

Mat. Paris. fol. 20. SO that it was not without very good Cauſe, that Matthew Paris tells us concerning this Biſhop's Election, there concurred Plebis Petitio, Voluntas Epiſcoporum, Gratia Procerum, Regis Authoritas.

HAVING thus given you ſo many good Authorities from antient Manuſcripts and approved Hiſtorians of the Power of thoſe Great Councils in the Election of Biſhops, I ſhall only add a few more from our Saxon Annals.

THE firſt is under Anno 970, which relates, that then Oskytel, Arch-biſhop of York deceaſed, who had been by the Conſent of King Edward the Martyr, and all his Wiſe-men, conſecrated Arch-biſhop of that See.

THE next is under Anno 994. and there we read, that Sigeric the Arch-biſhop deceaſing, Ælfric Biſhop of Wincheſter was elected in his room on Eaſter-day at Ambresbury, by King Æthelred, and all his Wiſe-men; from whence it appears, that not only the King, but the Great Council of the Kingdom had a ſhare in this Election.

I could give you alſo ſeveral Inſtances in the ſaid Annals of divers Abbots elected in the ſame Aſſemblies to the greater Monaſteries; but I hope what I have done already is ſufficient to my preſent Purpoſe, and therefore ſhall leave it to the Reader's Judgment to conſider, whether, when theſe Annals and Hiſtorians inform us, that Rex conſtituit ſuch and ſuch a Man to be Biſhop or Arch-Biſhop of ſuch or ſuch a See, it is not to be underſtood in the ſame Senſe as we have already obſerved from Mr. Waſhington's ſaid Treatiſe; that when this or that King is ſaid to have made ſuch or ſuch a Law, it is ſtill to be underſtood as made in Parliament?

I ſhall now ſay ſomewhat of the ſame Great Council's Power in the Deprivation of Biſhops, of which I ſhall not trouble you with many; but they ſhall be ſuch Examples as are of undeniable Authority.

THE firſt is from Osbern in his Life of Arch-Biſhop Dunſtan, lately printed in the firſt Volume of Anglia Sacra, concerning the Deprivation of Arch-Biſhop Brihthelme abovementioned in theſe words, Bryhtelmus poſt paucos ſuſcepti Pontificatus dies, cogitans quod ad tantam rem minùs eſſet Idoneus, juſſus à Rege & Omni populo diſcedere, diſceſſit, atq; ad relictam nuper Eccleſiam non ſine Verecundia rediit, i. e. "Bryhtelme within "a few Days after he had received his Biſhoprick, not thinking with "himſelf that he was fit for ſo great a Charge, being commanded by "the King and all the People to quit it, departed, and returned to "the Church he had lately left, though not without Shame.

BUT that John of Wallingford was very well ſatisfied, that this Arch-Biſhop was deprived by the Lay, as well as Spiritual part of the Great Council, appears by his Chronicle, where having ſet forth his unfitneſs by reaſon of his too great Eaſineſs and Softneſs of Temper, he proceeds thus, Rex Edgarus eadem via quâ aſcenderat, fecit eum deſcendere; nam Concione ſuper hoc eodem facta, objecit Bryhthelmo plura Capitula, nimiam ipſius remiſſionem morum argumenta, & condictione & Aſſenſu Baronum ſuorum ad curam Solius Dorcaſinæ Eccleſiæ relabi fecit, that is, "King Edgar made him to go down the ſame way he got up; "for a Council being called for this very Matter, he objected ſeveral "Articles againſt this Bryhtelme, ſhewing his too great Eaſineſs and "Remiſſneſs in Diſcipline; and thereupon by the Appointment and "Aſſent of his Barons, he cauſed him to retire to the Cure of his former Church of Dorcheſter. By which it is evident, that this Author (living in the Reign of Henry the Third) was very well ſatisfied that the Temporal as well as the Spiritual Barons, were concerned in this Deprivation.

I was likewiſe from the Authority of the Saxon Annals, as alſo of William of Malmesbury, about to have here alſo added the Deprivation of one Siward, who is reported by the Annals, An. 1043. "to have been "privately Conſecrated to the See of Canterbury, with the King's good "liking, by Arch-biſhop Eadſige, and who then laid down that "Charge: and of which Siward, William of Malmesbury farther tells Lib. 1. de Pont. us, that he was afterwards deprived for his Ingratitude to Arch-Biſhop Eadſige, in denying him neceſſary Maintenance: but ſince there is no ſuch Perſon as this Siward in the Catalogues of the Arch-biſhops of Canterbury,

Vid. Ang. Sacra, Vol. I. Pag. 107.

Canterbury, and that upon a more nice Examination, I find in the Learned Mr. Wharton's Treatiſe, De Succeſſione Archiepiſ. Cantuar. that this Siward (who was alſo Abbot of Abingdon) was never Conſecrated Arch-Biſhop, but only Chorepiſcopus, or Subſtitute to Arch-biſhop Eadſige; who was then unable to perform his Function by reaſon of his Infirmities: which upon a review of this Paſſage in William of Malmesbury, I find alſo confirmed by him, in calling him no more than Succeſſor Deſignatus, and who being put by for his Ingratitude, was preferred no higher than to be Biſhop of Rocheſter; but this is denied by the abovecited Mr. Wharton, who ſays expreſly, that this Siward Abbot of Abingdon, and Subſtitute to the Arch-biſhop, was never Biſhop of that See, but died at Abingdon of a long Sickneſs before Arch-Biſhop Eadſige. So much I thought fit to let the Reader know, becauſe in this Hiſtory under Anno 1043, being deceived by the expreſs words of the Annals, I have there made this Siward to have been Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and deprived for his Ingratitude to his Predeceſſor, which I am (upon better Conſideration) now convinced to have been a Miſtake.

I ſhall conclude with our Saxon Annals, which under the Year 1052. relate, that Earl Godwin having in a Great Council held at London, purged himſelf and his Sons of the Crimes laid to their Charge; and being thereupon reſtored, Arch-Biſhop Robert the Norman, his Enemy, (having juſt before fled away into his own Country) was not only by a Decree of this Council baniſhed, but alſo deprived of his Arch-biſhoprick; and Stigand then was advanced to that See in his ſtead, which certainly was done by the ſame Authority as deprived the former: and if ſo, then I think none can deny but that Power might alſo have deprived any other inferior Biſhop; and yet we do no where find there was any Schiſm in England among the Clergy at that Time, becauſe theſe two Primates of the Church had been deprived without their own Conſent, by the Lay, as well as Spiritual part of the Great Council.

HAVING now finiſhed all I had to ſay concerning the Power of the King, and the Witena-Gemote in Eccleſiaſtical Matters, I would not be thought to aſſert that they have the like Authorities in Matters of meer Spiritual Cognizance, ſince I am very well ſatisfied of the Primitive Inſtitution of the Epiſcopal Order, from the firſt Preaching of Chriſtianity in the Time of the Romans, to the Reſtoration of it in this Iſland upon the Converſion of the Saxons; which is not liable to be abrogated by any Temporal Power, and which has been continued among the Britains or Welſh, without any Interruption from thence, even to our own Times.

Vid. Lambard's Perambulat. of Kent, Pag. 340.

BUT as for the Eccleſiaſtical Power, it was at firſt ſettled under the two Arch-biſhops of Canterbury and York, who had then no Juriſdiction or Preheminence the one over the other; the former being Primate of the Southern, as the latter was of the Northern parts of England: only I cannot but obſerve, that the Church of St. Martin's without the City of Canterbury, was (till after the Conqueſt) the See of a Biſhop, called in Latin Core Epiſcopus, “who (always remaining in the Countrey) “ſupplied the Abſence of the Metropolitan, that for the moſt part “followed the Court; and that as well in governing the Monks, as in “ performing the Solemnities of the Church, and in exerciſing the “ Authority of an Arch-Deacon;

AND no doubt had alſo the Epiſcopal Powers of Ordination and Confirmation, or elſe he could have been no Biſhop. I obſerve this to let you ſee, that the Engliſh were not then ſo ſtrictly tied up as not to allow of more than one Biſhop in one City.

BUT ſince I have chiefly deſigned to ſpeak of Civil Affairs, I ſhall not here meddle with the Eccleſiaſtical Authority of the Biſhops or their Courts, or the Officers belonging to them, but will leave them to thoſe to whoſe Province it does more peculiarly appertain.

Of the Engliſh Laws before the Conqueſt.

HAVING thus diſpatched what I had to ſay concerning the Synods and Great Councils of the Kingdom in the Saxon Times, I ſhall in the next Place treat of the Engliſh Laws before the Conqueſt; and they were of two kinds, viz. either the particular Cuſtoms or Laws of the ſeveral diviſions of the Kingdom in which thoſe Cuſtoms were in uſe; or elſe ſuch Additions to, or Emendations of them, as were made from time to time by the Great Council of the whole Kingdom, concerning the Puniſhment of Crimes, the manner of holding Men to their good Behaviour, or relating to the Alteration of Property either in Lands or Goods; with divers other particulars, for which I refer you to the Laws themſelves, as I have extracted them from Sir Henry Spelman and Mr. Lambard, their Learned Collections: and ſome concerning each of theſe particulars, I have given you in the following Work.

The Original of the Saxon Cuſtomary Laws.

BUT to ſhew you in the firſt place the Original of the Saxon Cuſtomary Laws, they were certainly derived from each of the Great Nations that ſettled themſelves in this Iſland before the Heptarchy was reduced into one Kingdom; but indeed after the Danes had ſettled themſelves here in England, we find they were divided into theſe three ſorts of Laws, in the beginning of Edward the Confeſſor's Reign, according to the ſeveral parts of the Kingdom wherein they prevailed; as,

1. Merchen-Lage.

1. MERCHEN-LAGE, or the Mercian Law, which took place in the Counties of Gloceſter, Worceſter, Hereford, Warwick, Oxon, Cheſter, Salop and Stafford.

2. Weſt-Saxon-Lage.

2. WEST-Saxon-Lage, or the Law of the Weſt-Saxons, which was in uſe in the Counties of Kent, Suſſex, Surrey, Berks, Southampton, Somerſet, Dorſet, Devon and Cornwal; I mean that part of it which ſpoke Engliſh, the reſt being governed by their own (i.e.) the Britiſh Laws.

3. Dane-Lage.

3. DANE-Lage, or the Laws which the Danes introduced here into thoſe Counties where they chiefly fixed, viz. in thoſe of York, Derby, Nottingham, Leiceſter, Lincoln, Northampton, Bucks, Hertford, Eſſex, Middleſex, Suffolk and Cambridg.

BUT as for Cumberland, Northumberland, and Weſtmoreland, I ſuppoſe they are omitted in this Catalogue, becauſe in the Times not long before the Conqueſt, the firſt was under the Power of the Scots, and conſequently under their Laws, as the two latter were under that of their own Earls, who ruled thoſe Counties as Feudatary Princes under the Kings of England; tho thus much is certain, that the Daniſh Laws took Place there as well as in Yorkſhire.

BUT after King Edward the Confeſſor came to the Crown, he reduced the whole Kingdom under one General; for thus ſays Ranulph Higden, as he is cited by Sir Henry Spelman in his Gloſſary, Tit. Lex. Ex tribus his Legibus, Sanctus Edwardus unam Legem Communem edidit, quas Leges Sancti Edwardi uſque hodie vocant. Brompton ſays the like, Iſte Supradictus Rex Sanct. Ed. Conf. dictus eſt Edwardus Tertius, qui Leges Communes Anglorum Genti tempore ſuo ordinavit; quia proantè Leges nimìs partiales editæ fuerant. But Roger Hoveden carries them up higher in his Hiſtory of Henry the Second, for he ſays, Quod iſtæ Leges primùm inventæ & inſtitutæ erant tempore Edgari Avi ſui; ſed poſtquam Edwardus venit ad Regnum, Conſilio Baronum Angliæ, Legem per 48. Annos ſopitam excitavit, excitatam reparavit, reparatam decoravit, decoratam confirmavit; confirmata verò vocata eſt Lex Edwardi Regis, non quià ipſe inveniſſet eam prius, ſed cum prætermiſſa fuerat, & Oblivioni penitùs data è Diebus Avi ſui Edgari, qui primus Inventor ejus fuiſſe dicitur uſq; ad ſua tempora, quià juſta & honeſta erant, è profundo Abyſſo extraxit, & eam revocavit, & ut ſuam obſervandam tradidit. But the true Reaſon why it is called the Common Law, is, becauſe it is the Common or Municipal Law of this Kingdom; ſo that Lex Communis, or Jus Patriæ, is all one with Lex Patriæ, or Jus Patrium: and it is alſo called the Common Law in other Countries, as Lex Communis Norica, Burgundica, Lombardica, &c. And from this latter they were ſo called by William the Firſt, in his Confirmation of them.

HAVING now given you the Original of our Laws in General, we will next proceed to ſhew you what they were in particular, as far as they concern thoſe two great Branches of all Municipal Laws, viz. the Civil or the Criminal: The former of which concerns Lands and Goods, and the latter the Nature and Puniſhments of Criminal Offences.

The Civil Laws.

TO begin with the former as far as it concerns Lands, I ſhall ſatisfy my ſelf with what Dr. Brady hath with great Induſtry and Exactneſs extracted in the firſt part of his Compleat Hiſtory of England, out of thoſe Learned Authors you will find there cited in the Margin, which is as follows.

Bocland and Allodium.

“ Mr. Somner ſays, there were but two ſorts of Tenures here in the “ Saxon times before the Conqueſt; [1.] Bocland and Folkland, to which “ two all other ſorts of Land might be reduced. Bocland, as [2.] Lam-
“ bard ſays, was Free and Hereditary, and was a Poſſeſſion by Writing,
“ the other without. That by Writing was poſſeſſed by the Free or “ Nobler ſort; that without, called Folkland, was holden by paying “ Annual Rent, or performance of Services, and was poſſeſſed by the “ Rural People, Ruſticks, Colons or Clowns; in thoſe Times theſe “ Writings [3.] were called in Latin, Libelli Terrarum, Landboc's and “ Telligraphia, and Livery and Seizin was then made and given, by [4.]
“ delivery of a Turf taken from the Land with the Writings: This “ was called Terra Teſtamentalis, & hereditaria, Land Inheritable, and “ deviſable by Will, unleſs the firſt Purchaſer or Acquirer, by Writing
“ or Witneſs, had prohibited it; and then it could not be ſold or diſ“ poſed of from the [5.] neareſt Kindred. This Bocland was of the “ ſame Nature with Allodium in Doomſday, holden without any Pai“ ments, nor chargeable with Services to any Lord or Seignory; and “ though the Name was almoſt quite loſt, yet the thing remained un“ der the Name of Allodium, and the Lands poſſeſſed by the Allodiarii “ frequently mentioned in Doomſday.

I have been the more exact in putting down this Paſſage, becauſe it plainly proves, from the learned Doctor's own ſhewing, that if the greateſt part of the Lands before the Conqueſt, held by Men of any Quality, were Bocland, and that this Bocland was the ſame (as he grants) with Lands held in Allodio; (and I have already proved that ſuch Lands were held without any Paiments or Services, other than ſuch publick Taxes as were impoſed by the Great Council of the Kingdom, that is, Danegelt, with ſuch other Duties as all Lands whatſoever were liable to :) then is it alſo as evident that theſe Lands, which were far the greateſt part of the Lands in the Kingdom, were not held by Knight's Service, and conſequently their Owners could not be Tenants in Capite, as this Author is pleaſed in other Places to ſuppoſe; and therefore theſe Tenants in Allodio could never be ſo repreſented by ſuch Military Perſons, as that they alone could either make Laws for them, or lay Taxes on their Eſtates, without their Conſents either by themſelves or Repreſentatives in the Great Councils or Parliaments of thoſe Times; and therefore ſuch free Tenants muſt have either appeared for themſelves in Perſon, or have choſen others to repreſent them.

Compl. Hiſt. pag. 66, 67.

AND if any Man doubt whether theſe Lands held in Allodio, were before the Conqueſt the greateſt part of the Lands of the Kingdom; I muſt refer them for their Satisfaction to Mr. Somners and Mr. Taylor's Treatiſes upon Gavelkind, as alſo to Mr. Lambard's Diſcourſe of the Cuſtoms of Kent, at the end of his Perambulation of that County; who there fully prove, that the Antient Bocland deſcending to all the Male Iſſue alike, was not meer Socage Tenure, but Allodial. 2*dly*, That this was the general Tenure of all Lands not held by Knights Service before the Conqueſt, (as well Gavelkind as others) and that not only at the Common Law, but confirmed by divers Saxon Kings; as by that Law of King Edmund, Si quis inteſtatus obierit, Liberi ejus hæreditatem æqualiter dividant: So likewiſe by the 68*th* and 75*th* Laws of King Cnute, as alſo by thoſe of Edward the Confeſſor, confirmed by William the Conqueror, Cap. 36. And therefore Mr. Somner in his ſaid Treatiſe of Gavelkind, farther proves, that this was a Liberty left to the Kentiſh Men by William the Conqueror, when all the reſt of England changed its Antient Tenure; and Mr. Taylor in his Hiſtory of Gavelkind, Chap. 6, 7, 8. hath proved this to have been a general Cuſtom, not only in Kent, but in Wales and ſeveral parts of England.

Pag. 603.

I ſhall not any further purſue what the Doctor has ſaid of Lands holden by Military Service before the Conqueſt, or of the Herriots or Reliefs that were due upon them, which were payable out of the Feudal Lands of the Ealdormen, middle and leſs Thanes; but ſhall refer you to the Laws of King Cnute, and thoſe of the Confeſſor, the former of which you will find at the end of his Reign in the enſuing Volume, wherein is ſet down what the Heirs of each of thoſe Feudatary Tenants were to pay to their Lords at the Death of their Anceſtors.

BUT that theſe could not be near all the Lands of England, appears by what hath been already ſaid of Lands held in Allodio. And I have known ſome Learned Antiquaries, who have not without good Cauſe believed that all Tenure by Knight-Service in England, was derived from the Danes and Norwegians, who upon their Conqueſts and ſettling here, firſt brought in that ſort of Tenure out of Denmark and Norway; from whence the Engliſh Saxon Kings might by Degrees impoſe it upon ſeveral Lands by them granted to their Ealdormen or Earls, and chief Thanes, by Military or Knights Service, who likewiſe granted them to their inferiour Thanes under the like Tenures; and yet it would have been very unreaſonable that ſuch inferior Thanes ſhould have ſo far been deprived of their antient Engliſh Freedom, as that the Earls and King's Thanes ſhould have it in their Power to make what Laws, and impoſe what Taxes they pleaſed upon them as their under Tenants, without their Conſent.

AND if meer Tenure alone could have done this, I would fain know why the Engliſh Kings before the Conqueſt, by the ſame reaſon might not as well have made Laws, and taxed their Tenants in Capite without their Conſent, as theſe could have done their Tenants that held under them? But this is altogether falſe in Matter of Fact, as all the Hiſtories of thoſe Times ſhew; Danegelt it ſelf being firſt impoſed by the Conſent of the King and his Wites, as appears by the Saxon Annals.

Anno 994.

NOT but that I grant all the Lands of England were then held under thoſe three great Services called in Latin Trinoda Neceſſitas, viz. 1. Expedition (that is, the finding of Men to defend the Kingdom in caſe of Invaſion.) 2. The Repair of Bridges; and, 3. Fortifying of Caſtles; from which even Lands granted to the Church were not exempted, as appears by the Charters to ſeveral Monaſteries. But theſe were Services due, and to be performed by the Common Law and Cuſtom of the Kingdom, and did not concern one ſort of Tenure more than another.

Ingulph. Hiſt. fol. 508.

I have no more to obſerve concerning this Bocland, but that it paſſed by Deed, called by Ingulphus, Chirographa, until the Confeſſor's time, and was confirmed by the Subſcriptions of the Fideles, or Subjects there preſent, with golden Croſſes, and ſome other holy Marks; only this methinks ought not to be paſſed over, that the Ceremony of Livery or Seizin of Lands is very antient, as appears by the Charter of Ceadwalla, King of the Weſt-Saxons (preſerved among the Evidences belonging to the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury) in the Year DCLXXXVII. made to Theodore then Arch-biſhop of that See, of certain Lands with this Subſcription, Ad cumulum autem Confirmationis, ego Cedwalla Ceſpitem terræ prædictæ ſuper ſanctum Altare Salvatoris poſui, & propriâ manu, pro ignorantia Literarum, ſignum ſanctæ Crucis expreſſi & ſubſcripſi: that is, “For the farther Confirmation thereof, I Ceadwalla have put this ſaid “Turf of Earth upon the holy Altar, and for want of Learning, have “with my own Hand made and ſubſcribed the Sign of the holy Croſs. The like alſo hath Camden out of a Patent made by Withered King of Kent, to a Nunnery in the Iſle of Thanet. So much for Bocland.

Folkland.

Spelm. Gloſſ. tit. Folkland.

CONTRARY to which was that called Folkland, which Sir Henry Spelman ſays, was Terra popularis, ſcilicet, quæ jure communi poſſidetur, vel ſine ſcripto; that is, Land belonging to the ordinary ſort of People, which they enjoyed of common Right, without any Writings or Deeds, as we ſee in Copy-hold Lands at this day, for which the Tenants have ſeldom any other Evidences than the Copy of the Court-Rolls of the Mannor; which Copy-hold Lands were antiently either held by Sockmen (that is, Free-men holding by the Plow) to perform mean and villain Services, or elſe by thoſe who were Villains appendant to the Mannor.

THESE might be ouſted of their ſmall Eſtates at the Will of the Lord, which a Farmer could not be ſo long as he honeſtly performed his Services; and theſe were they, who after the Conqueſt were called Tenants in Antient Demeſne, either of the King, or of ſome other Lord, as you will find in the old Natura Brevium.

Tenants in Antient Demeſne.

Cap. Breve de Recto.

OF the like ſort alſo, as Dr. Brady very well informs us, " were Lands and Poſſeſſions mentioned by other Names in our Saxon Laws, as Gaffolland, Rent-Land, or Farm-Land, Fœdus Alured, and Guthr. c. 2. Gafogyldenhus, an Houſe yielding or paying Rent, or Gable. LL. Inæ, c. 6. There are alſo mentioned Inland, or the Lords Demeſnes, which he kept in his own Hands, and Neatland, which is called Vtland, or Outland, in * Byrthric's Will; Terra Villanorum, and was let out to Country-men, or Villagers, Ægder of Thegnes inlandge, of Neatland, i. e. either of the Lords or Thanes Inland, or Demeſnes, or elſe the Country-mans, Villagers, or Villan's Land, Gafolland, Neatland, and Vtland, as † Mr. Somner truly informs us, were oppoſed to Inland, or Demeſne-Lands, and were Lands granted out for Rent, or Service, or both, and reducible to Folkland; and 'tis very probable they were the ſame, or of the ſame Nature; for that in the Laws where they are mentioned, it appears they were always occupied by Ceorls, Churles, Country-men, Colons or Clowns; by Gebures, Boors, Ruſtics, Plough, or Husbandmen; or by Neates, and Geneates, Drudges, Villanes, or Villagers. Theſe three Saxon words being almoſt of the ſame Signification, tho very different in Sound, were always applied to the ordinary ſort of People, called by us Folk at this day. Thus far the Doctor, which I will not contradict, tho he here makes all Ceorles Men to have been meer Drudges, which was not ſo, ſince thoſe that held Land by Socage-Services, were as free as to all things elſe from the Power of their Lords, as our Tenants are at this day.

BUT I deſire by the way, that this may not be unobſerved, that I can no where find the word Colonus uſed for a Husbandman or Clown, in any of our antient Saxon Laws, tho Sir Henry Spelman gives us ſome Examples of the uſe of it in the German Laws, there ſignifying Liberi Eccleſiaſtici, quos Colonos vocant, and the King had alſo his Coloni; but this learned Author ſuppoſes that theſe Coloni anſwered our Sockmen, who were certainly Freemen and not Villains. Nor did Villanus ſignify a Villain, but a Country-man or Villager in general, till after the Conqueſt; and then it was not from the Latin but French Idiom, that a Villain came to ſignify a Slave or Drudg.

Spelm. Gloſſ. in verb.

HAVING now given you what I thought fit to ſay concerning the ſeveral Tenures, and ways of Conveyance of Lands in the Saxon Times, I ſhall proceed in the next place to diſcourſe ſomewhat of the manner of the diſpoſing of their Goods and Perſonal Eſtates, which they might do either by Deed or laſt Will in Writing, as at this day: But if they happened at any time to die inteſtate, then their Goods were equally divided between the Wife and Children of the Deceaſed; tho by a Law of King Edmund, the Relict, or Widow, was to have half her Husband's Goods, yet by the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, it was declared, that in caſe any one died Inteſtate, then the Children were equally to divide the Goods; which I take to be underſtood with a Salvo of the Wife's Dower or Portion. As yet therefore the Ordinaries had nothing to do with the Adminiſtration, for Goods paſſed by Deſcent as well as Lands, and upon this Cuſtom the Writ de Rationabili parte Bonorum was grounded at the Common Law, as well for the Children as the Wife's Part, according as by the Body of the Writ may appear.

THE antienteſt Will that Mr. * Selden ſays he hath obſerved before the Conqueſt, is, one of King Edgar's time, which Mr. Lambard † has given us in his Perambulation of Kent, and that is of one Brithric, a Gentleman, or Thane, and his Wife Elſwithe, wherein they deviſed both their Lands and Goods, and alſo gave his chief Lord and the Lady his Wife ſeveral noble Legacies to prevail with him that his Will might ſtand good. By which it ſhould ſeem the Lands bequeathed were Feudal Lands (held by Knights Service) which could not be alienated without the Lord's Conſent. But Mr. Selden there further takes notice, " That the Protection or Execution of this Teſtament, as well as " the Probate, were within the Juriſdiction of the Lord's Court; and " that eſpecially becauſe divers Lords of Mannors have to this day the " Probate of Teſtaments by Cuſtom continued, againſt that which is " otherwiſe regularly ſettled in the Church.

BUT as for Inteſtates Goods, he ſays, " The Diſpoſition or Admini- " ſtration of them was in the Saxon times in the chief Lord of him that " died, in caſe the Inteſtate were an immediate Tenant, and died at " home in Peace: But in caſe he were no Tenant, or died in his Lord's " Army, then it was (it ſeems) as other Inheritance, under the Juriſ- " diction of that Temporal Court within whoſe Territory the Goods " were. This may be proved out of the Laws of that Time, which " ordain, that upon the Death of an Inteſtate, whom they call " CWIALE AWE, the Lord * is only to have the Heriots due to him, " which are alſo appointed by † the Laws of the ſame time, that by his " (the Lord's) Advice or Judgment, his (the Inteſtate's) Goods be di- " vided among his Wife and Children, and the next of kin, according as " to every one of them of right belongs; that is, according to the nearneſs " of Kindred, if no Children, or Nephews from them be: for it muſt, " I ſuppoſe, be underſtood, that the Succeſſion was ſuch, that the " Children excluded all their Kindred, and of their Kindred the next " ſucceeded, according to that in Tacitus ‖ of his Germans, whoſe " Cuſtoms were doubtleſs mixed with our Engliſh-Saxons; Hæredes, " ſays he, ſucceſſoréſq; ſint cuiq; liberi, & nullum Teſtamentum. But it " ſeems Chriſtianity afterwards brought in the free Power of making " Teſtaments amongſt them, Si liberi non ſunt, proximus gradus in poſ- " ſeſſione, Fratres, Patrui, Avunculi.

* Canut. Legibus, cap. 75.

† Leg. Edw. Confeſſ. cap. de Heretochiis.

" BUT this is expreſs'd only in caſe the Tenant died at home, and " in Peace; for if he died in his Lord's * Army, both the Heriot " was forgiven, and the Inheritance both of Goods and Lands was to " be divided as it ought, which was, it ſeems, by the Juriſdiction of the " Temporal Court, within whoſe Territory the Death (of the Inteſtate) " or Goods were; for in that caſe, it is not ſaid, that the Lord's Judg- " ment was to be uſed, but that the Heirs ſhould divide all; or, as the " words in the Confeſſor's Law are, habeant † Hæredes ejus pecuniam & " terram ejus ſine aliqua Diminutione, & recte dividant inter ſe; where the " Right of the Heir both to Lands and Goods is expreſly deſigned, but " the Judg that ſhould give it them, not mentioned. Therefore it ſeems, it remained as other Parts of the Common Law, under the Temporal Juriſdiction, as by the * Civil Law it was under the Prætors. Thus far this learned and great Author.

* F. S. Inſtit. de bonorum poſſeſſione.

FROM whence we may make this Note, that the Probate of Wills was a Matter of Civil Cognizance before the Conqueſt, and for ſome time after, till, the Canon Law being more generally received in England, the Biſhops Courts took this Power to themſelves, ſuppoſed by Mr. Selden, in his 6th Chapter of his ſaid Treatiſe, to be about the time of Henry the Second.

WE ſhall now, in the laſt place, go on to the Criminal part of the Engliſh-Saxon Laws, viz. the manner of Trial, Judgment and Execution paſs'd and inflicted on Offenders in thoſe Times.

Criminal part of the Engliſh Saxon Laws.

ALL Trials for Criminal Matters were then either in the Court-Leets, the Sheriffs-turn, or the County-Courts, in which laſt the greater Offenders were commonly tried, and that moſt antiently by Witneſſes and Juries, as at this day: for we find in the Mirror of Juſtices, that King Alfred commanded one of his Juſtices to be put to death for paſſing Sentence upon a Verdict corruptly obtained, upon the Votes of the Jurors, whereof three of the Twelve were in the Negative. And the ſame King put another of his Juſtices to death for paſſing Sentence of Death upon an Ignoramus return'd by the Jury.

All Trials in Court-Leets, Sheriffs-turn, or County-Courts.

Mirror, Cap. 5. Sect. 1.

BUT the firſt Law we read of that defined the Number of Jury-men to be Twelve, was that of Ætheldred I. above two hundred Years before the Conqueſt, which ſays, In ſingulis Centuriis, &c. in Engliſh thus, In every ~~Century~~ or Hundred, let there be ~~a~~ Court; and let Twelve Antient Freemen, together with the ~~Lord~~ of the Hundred, be ſworn that they will not condemn the Innocent, nor acquit the Guilty.

The Number of Jury-men to be Twelve.

LL. Sax. Lamb.

Reve, or Provost

BUT whether there were any ſuch thing as a Grand Jury or Inqueſt, we do not particularly find, only we may reaſonably conclude there was, becauſe in the ſame Mirror we read that a Juſtice ſuffered Death for paſſing Sentence only upon the Coroner's Record; and another Juſtice had the ſame Puniſhment for condemning one without any preceding Appeal or Indictment.

Grand Jury.

YET the firſt time that we find any mention of a Jury by Mens Peers or Equals, is in the Agreement between Alfred and Guthrune the Dane, in theſe words in Engliſh, viz. "That if a ~~Lord or a Baron~~ "be accuſed of Homicide, he ſhall be acquitted by twelve ~~Lords~~; but "if of inferiour Rank, he ſhall be acquitted by eleven of his Equals, "and one Lord.

K. Alured. Concil. Brit. fol. 492.

BUT in Caſes very doubtful, and where there was not ſufficient Evidence by Witneſſes, but only ſtrong Preſumptions of Guilt, in the times after King Alfred, Trials by Ordeal came in, which Somner in his Gloſſary ſays was derived from Or a Negative, or Privative, and Dal, which ſignifies Diſtinction, or Difference, that is, without any Diſtinction or Difference, and imports a juſt, impartial Judgment: it was of two ſorts, by Fire or Water; by Fire, when the Perſon accuſed carried in his bare Hand a red-hot Iron ſome few ſteps; which, if it weighed but one Pound, was called ſingle Ordeal, and ſo double, or treble, according to the Pounds the Iron weighed: or when he walked bare-foot, and blindfold, over and between certain red-hot Plow-ſhares, placed at a ſtated diſtance; if in doing this the Party was burnt, he was pronounced Guilty;

Ordeal, what; and what the Trial.

Somn. Gloſſar. in verbo Ordeal.

LL. Longob. lib. 1. tit. 9. c. 39. Glanv. lib. 14. cap. 1. in fine.

Guilty; if not, he was accounted Innocent. Water-Ordeal was either when they caſt the accuſed into Water, and if they did ſwim, were adjudged Guilty; if they ſunk, Innocent: or elſe their Hands and Arms were put ſometimes up to the Wriſt, ſometimes up to the Elbow in boiling-hot Water; if they were ſcalded, they were eſteemed Guilty; if not, Innocent. The Noble and Freemen were tried by Fire-Ordeal, the Peaſants and Servants by Water Ordeal.

Fol. 79.

A great Example of the former you will find towards the latter end of the ſixth Book, concerning the putting of Queen Emma, Mother of Edward the Confeſſor, to this Fire-Ordeal by Plow-ſhares, upon ſuſpicion of Incontinency with Ailwyn Biſhop of Wincheſter: but indeed this Story is very improbable for ſeveral reaſons; for firſt, the Crime ſhe ſtood accuſed of could be no more than ſimple Fornication, which was then as well as now within the Cognizance of the Church, and for which no higher Puniſhment than the common Penance was inflicted. And further, we find this Queen to have fallen into the King's Diſpleaſure in the firſt or ſecond Year of his Reign, and being not long after reſtored to his Favour, we do not read ſhe was ever after queſtioned: and as for Robert, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, who is ſaid to have been one of her chief Proſecutors, it is certain he was not conſecrated to that See till about ſeven or eight Years after. Beſides all which, Biſhop * Godwin in his Account of this Arch-biſhop, further proves from Florence of Worceſter, and William of Malmesbury, that Biſhop Ailwin was dead Anno 1047, a Year before ever Robert was made Arch-biſhop; and therefore this learned Author does wholly deny the reality of this Story. But to return again to our Ordeal.

See the Hiſt. Anno 1042.

* De Præſul. p. 89, 90.

THE firſt mention made thereof as we meet with, was at the Council of Mentz, and afterwards in the Council of Triers; but we have no Foot-ſtep thereof in our Engliſh Laws, till it was brought into this Nation by the Council of Berkhamſtead, under Bertwald Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, Anno 647; and it after became inſerted into thoſe of King Athelſtan, tho it was certainly in uſe before that time.

LL. Æthelſt. Can. 23.

I have little more to add concerning this way of Trial by Ordeal, but that it was under the Government of the Clergy, who never permitted it to be put in Execution but when they were preſent. And ſometimes it was performed with the great Solemnity of receiving the Holy Euchariſt, eſpecially if the ſuſpected Perſon was of their Order and Function; and if the Party was caſt, he was to ſuffer as Guilty.

THIS way of Trial by Ordeal continued long after the Conqueſt, but at laſt it was forbid by the Pope's Decree; and we have now no Remainders of it left, unleſs it be in the Country Peoples trying of Witches, who being tied with their Thumbs and Toes together, and ſo flung into the Water, if they ſink, are accounted Innocent: if they ſwim, Guilty: but indeed if this Ordeal, either by Fire or Water, was performed by the help of the Devil, one would wonder it ſhould ever be introduced, eſpecially with ſuch ſolemn Prayers and Preparations, as you may find in Lambard's Explications of Law-terms, and in Matthew Parker Arch-biſhop of Canterbury his Antiquities of the Britiſh Church. And on the other ſide, if it was aſſiſted by a Divine Power, it is as wonderful how it came to be forbid by the Pope, as wholly unlawful.

Vita Roberti Archiep.

BUT beſides theſe ways of Trial abovementioned, upon more ſlight uſpicions, our Engliſh Saxon Anceſtors were uſed to content themlves with a Voyer dire, or the Oath of the Party ſuſpected, and the oncurring Teſtimony of other Men; the firſt atteſting his own Innoency, the other atteſting their own Conſciences for the Truth of the ormer Teſtimony; and therefore were, and ſtill are called Compurgators. Their number was more or leſs, and of greater or leſs Value, accordng as the Offence, or the Party ſuſpected was of greater or leſs Conernment.

AND as for the way of Trial by ſingle Combat or Duel, tho ſome Writers ſuppoſe it to have been in uſe before the Conqueſt, yet ſince I eet with no mention of it either in our Hiſtorians or Laws, I ſhall der diſcourſing of it till I come to the next Volume.

Sacrilege.

De Geſtis Pontificum, l. 1.

HAVING now diſpatched this Head concerning Trials, I'll proceed o the Judgments and Penalties that were inflicted on Perſons for ſeveral Offences. And firſt I ſhall conſider thoſe againſt Almighty God, as Sacrilege, which you will find upon the firſt introducing of Chriſtianity o have been appointed by the Pope, as alſo by the Laws of King Egert, either in making ſatisfaction of nine times the Value, or in caſe of Inability, to pay that Sum in Stripes; for not then, nor long after was it puniſhable with Death: for William of Malmesbury tells us, hat Theodered, the good Biſhop of London, in the Reign of King Athelan, fell ſhort of one thing, viz. That he cauſed certain Thieves to be anged, who had robbed St. Edmunds Church in Suffolk, and were there eld by ſome inviſible Power, inſomuch that they could not go away with what they had ſtolen, but were all taken and executed accordingly; or which piece of Severity he was much blamed.

Sabaoth-breaking.

THE next Offence was Working upon Sundays, which by the Laws of King Ina, was puniſhable by Fine, if the Criminal were a Freeman; and by Whipping if he were a Bond-Servant.

BUT as for Blaſphemy, Curſing or Swearing, either they were Crimes he Saxons were not guilty of, or elſe they inflicted no Puniſhments on thoſe who were culpable of them; for I find no mention of them in the Saxon Laws.

Adultery and Fornication.

AS for the Offences againſt both God and Man, I will firſt begin with Adultery and Fornication, and theſe were Capital amongſt the Saxons: for by the Laws of Withred King of Kent, if a Military Man ſhould (after that Council was ended, deſpiſing the King's Law, and the Judicial Sentence of the Biſhop's Excommunication) be taken in Adultery, he ſhould pay to his Lord an hundred Shillings. But afterwards by the Laws of King Cnute, a Wife found guilty of Adultery, ſhould have her Noſe and Ears cut off, and the Man was Fined or Baniſhed: and by thoſe of King Alfred, "the Man convicted of Adultery with another's Wife, "ſhould pay to the Husband ſo abuſed, a Fine ſutable to the Eſtate and "Quality of him that was ſo injured.

Treaſon.

THE higheſt Offence againſt Man alone was Treaſon, and the Puniſhment for this Offence I find ſet down in the 4*th* Law of K. Alfred to this effect, viz. "That if any one by himſelf, or any other Perſon ſhould attempt "againſt the King's Life, he ſhould loſe his Life and Goods; or in "caſe he will purge himſelf, he was to do it according to the Valuation of "the King's Head. But in this the King had no greater a Prerogative than divers other of his Subjects; for the ſame Law doth inform us, "That it ordained in all Judgments concerning other Men, whether "Noble or Ignoble, whoſoever ſhould Conſpire againſt his Lord, ſhould "loſe both his Life and Eſtate, or elſe pay the Valuation of his Lord's "Head.

Coining and Clipping.

I come next to the Coining and Clipping of Money, which was not originally ſuch an Offence as was puniſh'd by Death; for the firſt Law that made it ſo was that of Ethelred, whereby it is left to the King's diſcretion, either to fine, or put to Death ſuch Merchants as imported falſe Money; and all Port-Reeves of Towns who ſhould be Acceſſary to it were made liable to the ſame: but for all this it was not even after the Conqueſt puniſhable by Death, but amputation of the Right Hand and Privy-Members.

Murder.

AS for Murder, or killing a Man with Malice prepenſed, it was by the Preface to King Alfred's Laws puniſhable by Death: And this and the former Law concerning Treaſon, will help us to interpret in what Caſes the Wiregilds or Mulcts, that we find ſo frequently mentioned in the Saxon Laws, were to be paid for the Life of a Man, and particularly that Law of King Athelſtan, which ſets the Rate of theſe Wiregilds according to the Quality of the Perſon ſlain, from the King to the Peaſant; that is, when the Party was Killed in ſome ſudden Fray or Quarrel without any Malice forethought.

Manſlaughter.

Maiming, &c.

THIS I take notice of, to obviate the Error of ſome who ſuppoſe, that all Murder, even of the King himſelf, was redeemable by Money, which was not allowed in any Caſes but thoſe we account Man-ſlaughter at this Day; and ſhews the Antiquity of that diſtinction between Man-ſlaughter and Murder, which is now almoſt peculiar to England, and aroſe at firſt from the Proneneſs of our Nation to Fewds and ſudden Quarrels; tho the like Cuſtom is alſo to be found in the Antient Friſian and German Laws, if you will take the Pains to conſult them. But as for Bloodſhed, Striking, Maiming, Wounding, Diſmembring, &c. they were all of them puniſhable by Mulcts or Fines, as you will ſee in the Laws of King Alfred, and other Places in this Volume.

Robbery and Burglary.

I proceed in the next Place to Robbery and Burglary, which by the Laws of King Ina, were puniſhable by Death; only the Thief was admitted ſometimes to redeem it according to the Eſtimation of his Head, and that I ſuppoſe was left to the diſcretion of the Judg, either to deny or allow. But for all other leſs Thefts, they were redeemable by Fines. And the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, limited that Puniſhment of Death to Thefts of twelve Pence in value, or above.

Treſpaſſes.

Cap. 30.

AND Treſpaſſes of a leſs Nature upon Lands and Goods, were to be puniſhed by the Criminal's making Satisfaction to the injured Party, and his paying a certain Fine beſides to the King; which by King Alfred's Law was ſet at five Shillings; and in his Time other Actions were likewiſe uſed, ſuch as we call Actions upon the Caſe; and the Plaintiff not only recovered Damages for Treſpaſſes done to Poſſeſſions and Goods, but alſo Coſts for Injuries in Point of Scandal and Defamation, in caſe the Complainant ſpecially declare that he was thereby diſabled, or injured in his Preferment, and made Proof of the ſame, much like to the Forms of our Pleadings now.

Perjury.

AS for Perjury which I have hitherto omitted, tho in ſtrict Method it ſhould have been mentioned before, as a Sin againſt both God and Man, the Saxons were utterly Enemies to it, and puniſhed it with perpetual diſcredit of their Teſtimony, and ſometimes with Baniſhment, or with grievous Fines to the King, and Mulcts to the Judg. For that difference I find obſerved in thoſe Days between Fines and Mulcts, tho the more Antient Times uſed them for one and the ſame; for I often find pars Mulctæ Regi. In all theſe Matters where any Intereſt was veſted in the Crown, the King had the Prerogative of Pardon, yet always a Recompence was ſaved to the injured Party; beſides the Security of the Good-behaviour for Time to come, as the caſe required.

LL. Æthelſt. Cap. 12. LL. Canuti, c. 5. Spec. Sax. l. 3. Art. 53. LL. Edw. c. 18.

THESE Mulcts for all theſe Offences were ſet down in a Book, which was the Rule and Standard of the Judge's Sentence. And it is called in the Preface to the Laws of King Edward, the Doom or Judgment-Book; and Compoſition was to be made, and Satisfaction given, according to what was laid in this Judicial or Doom-Book.

THIS ſhews that Fines were then ſet out and appointed by Law, and were proportioned not only according to Mens Offences, but Abilities of what they were able to pay; and were not in thoſe Times left to the Arbitrary Wills and Humours of the Judg, to ruin Mens Fortunes and Families, and impriſon their Perſons during Life, perhaps only for a ſmall Offence in a raſh Word, or unmalicious Deed.

Fines ſet and appointed by Law.

I confeſs this Introduction is longer than I firſt intended it, but herein I hope the Reader will excuſe me, ſince I have preſented him with a true Scheme of the Antient Engliſh-Saxon Government and Laws, as well Eccleſiaſtical as Civil, relating to the juſt Prerogatives of the King, as alſo to the true Rights and Liberties of the People: and this I have done for two Ends; firſt, to inform thoſe of our own Nation as well as Strangers, that this Government before the pretended Conqueſt, agreed in the moſt material parts of it with thoſe of the ſame Gothick Model all over Europe; and that if we do ſtill labour to preſerve our Antient Conſtitution, when moſt of our Neighbours have either loſt or given up theirs, I think we do deſerve Commendation, more eſpecially ſince both Prince and People may have found an equal Intereſt and Happineſs in it.

AND ſecondly, to ſhew, that neither the Daniſh nor Norman Invaſions, (called by ſome Conqueſts) have at all altered it in any of the Subſtantial parts of our Government or Laws, notwithſtanding what ſome Men have ſo ſtrenuouſly advanced to the contrary, out of what deſigns they themſelves beſt know.

AS for what I have here laid down, if any thing appears either new, or of ſuſpicious Credit, I deſire to be no farther believed, than the Reaſons and Authorities I have here produced will juſtify me; and therefore ſhall leave the Reader to make what Judgment he pleaſes of it, which if it doth not ſuit with mine, I ſhall not take it amiſs, ſince I am ſufficiently ſenſible how much Mens Opinions depend on their preſent Intereſt, Education, or Courſe of Life: and I cannot but obſerve, that there are a ſort of Men, whoſe Heads ſeem framed for ſuch a ſet of Notions rather than others, which make them that they cannot eaſily digeſt any thing that claſhes with them.

BUT I do not pretend to be infallible, or to propoſe my ſenſe as a Rule and Standard to all others; Homo ſum, nihil humanum à me alienum puto, as the Comick Poet hath long ſince well obſerved.

ONE thing indeed I think I may pretend to in this Undertaking, and that is Integrity; for I look upon it a much viler thing, either to falſify, or conceal part of an Authority that makes againſt one, and uſe only ſo much as ſhall ſerve a preſent Turn, than it is to pick a Pocket: and as it is of far more dangerous Conſequence to the Publick, if not found out; I muſt ſay it is likewiſe more eaſily to be diſcovered, ſince every Man may, if he pleaſe, conſult the Authors that ſuch Writers make uſe of, and ſo detect the Fraud.

BUT for thoſe who think they may differ from me in ſome things with good Reaſon and Authority, and will pleaſe by their learned Labours to give the World any better Information and Account of theſe Matters than I have done; I ſhall be ſo far from being diſpleaſed at them, that I ſhall upon full Satisfaction, readily own my ſelf very much in their Debt, for making the World and me ſo much the Wiſer: only I muſt deſire to be treated as one, who, if I chance to be under any Error, am not ſo wilfully, nor (as I think) without great appearance of Reaſon and Authority on my ſide; ſince I call God to witneſs, that neither from a vain Ambition of Glory, nor proſpect of any Temporal Advantage, nor deſign of gratifying any Party or Faction, have I wrote any thing that may diſguſt Men of different Principles and Notions.

AND I thank God for this great Bleſſing to us, that we live in a Time, when we may not only think or ſpeak, but alſo ſafely write what we believe to be the Truth, to which all Mankind do owe Allegiance; and therefore I hope I never ſhall abuſe that invaluable Liberty, to the Prejudice of the Government, or that excellent conſtituted Church, of which I own my ſelf a Member, being fully ſatisfied that the main End of all our Writings, ought to be for the Honour of God, and the Common Good of Mankind.

ADDENDA & CORRIGENDA.

SINCE this Volume was printed off, coming to a more ſtrict View of the whole Work, than I could make when it was in looſe Sheets; I think fit to make ſome few Additions and Corrections, as in theſe following Particulars.

BOOK IV.

Pag. 195. The Conſecration of Erkenwald Biſhop of London being ſet down twice, viz. in the beginning of Anno 675. and again at the end of that Year, and was forgot to be ſtruck out in the Page abovementioned, thoſe firſt three Lines and half, beginning at Line 23. may be ſtruck out; and that Relation referred to p. 196. at the end of the Year (where it is already) and you may read it in theſe words. This Year alſo according to Matth. of Weſtminſter (for Bede does not give us the time when it was done) Erkenwald a younger Son to Anna King of the Eaſt Angles was by Theodore the Arch-biſhop conſecrated Biſhop of London, he being in great Reputation for the Sanctity of his Life, as having before he came to be a Biſhop, &c. Read the reſt as in the Print.

P. 198. Queen Etheldrithes being twice married and never lain with, having been already mentioned, p. 193. you may ſtrike out part of three Lines in p. 198. beginning at Line 48. at who yet remained, and ending line 51. with but ſhe, and then read it thus: Wife of King Egfrid abovementioned; this Lady, tho twice married ſtill remaining a Virgin, died at laſt, &c.

BOOK V.

Pag. 312. line ult. The Continuation of Aſſer's Chronicle publiſhed by Dr. Gale, having put this Action of Prince Ethelwald's, there mentioned under the Year 904. and Florence of Worceſter making him come as far as Crecanford (now Crayford in Kent); from the different Names of which Places, and Years, I ſuppoſed that this Action was not the ſame with that related in the Year 905. but upon better Conſideration I am now ſatisfied, that either Florence's Copy of the Annals, or his Tranſcriber were miſtaken, and that Crecanford and Bradenewood mentioned by him under 905, and Creccagelade and Bræden ſet down in the Annals under the ſame Year, are both the ſame Places, ſetting aſide the difference of the Years; ſo that this is alſo but one and the ſame Action: and therefore I rather now chuſe to follow the printed Copies of the Saxon Annals, and place the whole under Anno 905. therefore you may ſtrike out the laſt Line of pag. 312. beginning at after, as alſo the four firſt Lines of pag. 313. ending with, ſo returned home.

P. 265. After the Reign of Ethelwulf, Anno 855. add this that follows. That about theſe Times the Scotiſh Kings held the Low-lands of Scotland as Tributaries to the Kings of Northumberland, take this Relation from Leſſely Biſhop of Roſſe's Hiſtory of Scotland, in the Reign of King Donald V. where he tells us, that the Picts (who had been lately conquered and expelled Scotland) having hid themſelves in Northumberland, and the Neighbouring Countries, combined with the Britains and Saxons to recover their Liberties, who, being thus confederated, invaded Scotland; whereupon King Donald gathering together his Army met them near Jetburgh, and joining Battel with them put them to flight; with which Succeſs the King and his Men growing inſolent and ſecure, ſpent the Night following in Luxury and Drinking, without keeping any Guard, or obſerving Military Diſcipline; of which the Enemies (who it ſeems fled not far) gaining Intelligence, and laying hold of this Opportunity, ſet upon them about Midnight, and ſlew near 20000 Scots, being then (as it were) buried in Wine and Sleep; King Donald himſelf being alſo taken Priſoner, and to purchaſe his Liberty, was forced to give up all the Countries lying between the River Cluyde and Sterling to the Britains and Saxons, and farther obliged himſelf and his Succeſſors to the Annual Payment of a Sum of Money in Name of a Tribute: and that then in the ſixth Year of his unhappy Reign the Engliſh-Saxons, in Memory of this Victory, rebuilt the ruined Caſtle of Sterling, and fortified the Bridg of Forth, where they erected a Croſs of Stone as a Monument of their Victory, on which were engraven theſe barbarous Latine Verſes.

Anglos à Scotis ſeparat Crux iſta remotis,
Arma hic ſtant Bruti, ſtant Scoti ſub hac Cruce tuti.

BUT in the mean time the Picts, who were the Authors of this Scotiſh Slaughter, were ſo far from being thereby reſtored to their Country, that they were quite expell'd by the Saxons out of Britain.

THIS Relation Hector Boetius gives you much more prolix, and makes King Osbern who reigned in Northumberland, to have commanded the Engliſh-Saxons at the great Battle above-mentioned.

THE ſame Author likewiſe ſhews us in the Reign of K. Gregory, Anno 872. how the Britains came to be driven out of Cumberland, which they had till then enjoy'd, viz. That the Britains having by the Aſſiſtance of the Danes, expelled the Scots from divers Territories, endeavoured alſo by ſecret Treacheries to drive them yet further; but being ſurprized by K. Gregory were by him quite expelled Cumberland and Weſtmorland, as a Puniſhment for having violated their Faith with him.

Pag. 313. l. 18. After Eaſt-Angles, add this. And Bromton's Chronicle in this Year further adds, That Ethelwald having paſſed the Thames at Crekelade to Brithenden, and marched as far as Brandenſtoke (now Bradenſtoke) in Wiltſhire; ſo that as Mr. * Camden well obſerves, our Modern Hiſtorians have been much miſtaken, in making that Place to be Baſingſtoke in Hampſhire.

* Britan. Wiltſhire. p. 102.

BOOK VI.

*Pag.*8. *l.*1. You may ſtrike out the three remaining Lines after Dunſtan; for I am ſatisfied upon better Conſideration, that the Aſſertion therein contained is not true, as I have prov'd in the Introduction, p. 71, 72.

Pag. 12. l. 8. After the words freely forgave him, add this. That the Low-lands of Scotland continued under the Dominion of the Kings of England till the Reign of King Edgar, we have the expreſs Teſtimony of John of Wallingford Abbot of St. Albans, who wrote his Chronicle in the beginning of the Reign of King Henry the Third, and before ever the Diſpute concerning any Homage being due for the whole Kingdom of Scotland was raiſed, which began not till the time of K. Edward the Firſt. This * Author thus relates it in the beginning of the Reign of King Edgar, viz. that about Anno Dom. 964, that King ſummoning the Northumbrian Barons (i. e. Thanes) to a Council at York, ordained divers things relating to the Publick Affairs of the Kingdom, among which he divided the Earldom of Oſwulph (Earl of Northumberland late deceaſed) ceaſed) into two; for the King was not willing to beſtow ſo great a Part of the Kingdom on any as an Inheritance, leſt the Northumbers ſhould again aſpire to their antient Liberty; wherefore he beſtowed that Part of Northumberland lying between the Humber and the Theys upon Earl Oſlac, girding him with the Sword of that Earldom: But from Theys to Mireferth being the Sea-coaſt of Deira, he beſtowed upon Earl Eadulf, ſirnamed Ethelwald; and thus the two Kingdoms became two Earldoms, and ſo continued all the times of the Engliſh-Saxon Kings under their Gift and Juriſdiction; whilſt Lothian lying open to the Incurſions of the Scots was of no great concern to our Kings.

BUT Keneth K. of Scotland receiving a high Character of the Generoſity of K. Edgar from the two Earls above-mentioned, deſired the King's ſafe Conduct to come to London to viſit him, which being granted, the ſaid two Earls conducted him thither, where he was honourably received by K. Edgar, who often converſing friendly and familiarly with Keneth, he then repreſented to K. Edgar, that Lothian appertained to him as his Right, having been long poſſeſſed by the Kings of Scotland as their Inheritance: but the King not being willing to do any thing that he might afterwards repent of, referred the Determination of this Affair to his great Council; where the chief Men of the Kingdom would not aſſent to part with it, unleſs under a Homage to be yielded by the K. of Scotland to the K. of England; and that too only becauſe all Acceſs to that Country was very difficult, and its Government of little or no Profit: Whereupon K. Keneth aſſented to this Demand, and ſo received it under that Condition, did Homage for it accordingly, promiſing likewiſe many other things; as that the People ſhould ſtill remain under the Engliſh Name and Language, which continues to this day; and ſo the old Quarrel about Lothian was now happily determined, tho ſome new ones were often ſtarted. Thus the King of Scots became Feudatary to King Edgar on this occaſion; whence you may obſerve how the Scotiſh Nation became Maſters of Lothian, where Edinburgh the Capital City of the Kingdom is ſeated, and which City continued in the Hands of the Engliſh (as Mr. * Camden well obſerves from an antient Manuſcript he there cites) till the Reign of K. Indulf, viz. till about Anno Dom. 960.

* Vid. Britan. Deſcript. of Scotland.

You may add this to the Laws of King Edgar at the end of his Reign: p. 14. This King is alſo related by William of Malmesbury to have made a Law to reſtrain exceſſive drinking of great Draughts; by which Law it was ordained, that no Man under a great Penalty ſhould drink at one Draught below certain Pins that were ordered to be fixt within the ſides of the Cups or Goblets for that purpoſe.

Pag. 72. I confeſs I was ſo far miſled by the Authority of the Saxon Annals and Matth. Weſtminſter, as to believe that Siward mentioned under Anno 1043. had been conſecrated Arch-biſhop of Canterbury; but being now ſatisfied of the contrary, and having given good Reaſons againſt it in the Introduction, p. 115, 116. that Relation of William of Malmesbury from theſe words, l. 20. of which Author, may be thus altered. That tho he was deſigned Succeſſor to this Arch-biſhop, and to that end was conſecrated his Corepiſcopus (i. e. his Coadjutor) yet that notwithſtanding he was ſoon after depoſed for his Ingratitude, in defrauding the weak old Man of his neceſſary Maintenance. But that this alſo was a miſtake in this Author, ſee the Introduction, p. 115, 116.

Thus much I thought fit to advertiſe the Reader, ſince I had rather confeſs my own involuntary Miſtakes, than put another to the trouble of ſhewing them to the World; but however, ſince I do not pretend to be infallible, if any Perſon of greater Skill in our Engliſh Hiſtories, will take the pains to ſhew the World any other Errors or Omiſſions I have been guilty of in this Work, I ſhall be ſo far from taking it ill, that for the publick Satiſfaction, they ſhall be mended in the next Edition.

OF BRITAIN,
NOW CALLED
ENGLAND:
As well Eccleſiaſtical, as Civil.

BOOK I.

From the Earlieſt Accounts of TIME; to the Firſt Coming of JULIUS CÆSAR.

SINCE I deſign (with God's Permiſſion) to write and digeſt the moſt Remarkable Things and Tranſactions that have occurred in this Kingdom from the earlieſt Accounts of Time, I ſhall follow Venerable Bede, as well as other Hiſtorians, in firſt giving a brief Deſcription of this Iſland.

Britain, the largeſt of all the Europæan Iſlands, (and one of the biggeſt in this Habitable Globe,) is ſcituate between 50 Degrees 16 Minutes, and 59 Degrees 30 Minutes North Latitude, the whole Iſle lying in length from Dunsby-Head, the moſt Northerly Promontory of Scotland, to Dover, the ſpace of near Six hundred Miles; yet is the Climate more mild and temperate than could be expected in ſo Northerly a Scituation; the Winds from the Seas encompaſſing it on all ſides, ſo tempering the Air, that it is neither ſo cold in Winter, nor yet ſo hot in Summer, as the oppoſite Continents of France, Germany, and the Low-Countries; and alſo by the Indulgence of Heaven, as well as the Fertility of its Native Soil, it is plentifully furniſhed with all Things neceſſary for Human Life.

It was anciently called by the Greeks Albion, but whether from a Giant of that Name feigned to be the Son of Neptune, after the Fabulous Humour of thoſe Times, in giving Names to Countries from Giants and Heroes; or elſe from the Greek word Ἀλφὸν, which according to Feſtus ſignifies White; ſince, this Iſland is on many ſides of it encompaſſed with Rocks of that Colour; or elſe from the Phœnician word Alp, which ſignifies High; or from Alben, which in the Hebrew Tongue ſignifies White, is uncertain, and therefore needleſs to be inſiſted on too much.

As for the Name of Britain, which Nennius and divers other Britiſh Writers derive from Brutus, (whom they likewiſe call Brito;) but others of them from the Britiſh words Pryd Cain, i. e. Forma candida, a white Form; it ſeems too far fetch'd; and beſides, we do not find that the Natives of this Iſle ever called it Britain.

Introduct. to Britan.

Mr. Camden derives it from the Welſh word Brith, which ſignifies Painted, (for the ancient Britains uſed to paint themſelves of a pale blewiſh Colour with Glaſtum, or Woad;) and Τανία, which in Greek ſignifies a Region, or Country. But this Etymology has this Inconvenience in it, that it is derived from too far different Languages; and beſides it ſeems very improbable, that ſuch an Accidental Cuſtom as that of painting their Bodies, ſhould give a Name to the whole Iſland, as well as its Inhabitants. Nor does this word, Brith, ſignifie in the Welſh Tongue, Painted, but rather Spotted with divers Colours; whereas the ancient Britains, as ſome write, did not paint themſelves with various Colours, but only ſtained their Bodies with one ſimple Colour, viz. Blue. We muſt therefore endeavour to derive it from ſome other Language, if it was not the Britains themſelves, but other Nations (as is moſt probable) that firſt called this Iſland Britain. Now it is certain, that there is no Word in the Greek Tongue from whence Βρετανία can well be derived, which Name only the more modern Greek Hiſtorians have given this Iſland; for thô * Strabo in his Geography calls it Βρεταννικὴ, yet ſince this word is an Adjective, it is plain that Νῆσος, i. e. Inſula, an Iſland, is to be underſtood: So that it ſeems the word Βρεταννικὴ muſt be more ancient than Βρετανία, and therefore Mr. Camden's derivation of it will ſcarcely hold good: Yet Ptolomy never calls this Iſland Βρετανία, but Ἀλβίων, for when he ſpeaks of all the Iſlands lying together in theſe Seas towards the North, he calls them Βρεταννικαὶ Νῆσοι, or Αἱ Βρεταννίδες Νῆσοι; i. e. Inſulæ Britannicæ, the Britiſh Iſlands. And * Pliny in his Natural Hiſtory ſpeaking of all theſe Iſlands, ſays, Albion ipſi nomen fuit, cum Britannicæ vocarentur omnes; i. e. The particular Name was Albion, but the Iſlands together were called Britiſh.

* Lib. III. c. 2.

* Lib. II. c. 16.

But Monſieur Bochart, in his moſt Learned Work, Entituled * Chanaan, where he Treats of the Colonies and Language of the Phœnicians, hath given us a more probable derivation of the Name of Britain, which he ſuppoſes to be derived from the Phœnicians, who in their Language called this Iſland (as well as ſome others near it) Barat Anac, or more contractedly Bratanac, i. e. in the Land or Country of Tin or Lead; which being thus given it by the Phœnician Mariners, that firſt ſailed thither and diſcovered thoſe Iſlands, might afterwards by the Greeks be mollified into Βρεταννικὴ, and Βρετανία. Now, that the Phœnicians were the firſt that diſcovered thoſe Iſles, (which the Gracians called Caſſiterides, (and which are proved by Mr. Camden to be no other than our Scilly Iſlands,) and from whence, as * Strabo tells us in his Geography, "The Phœnicians firſt brought Tin, which thô

* Lib. I. c. 39.

“ they vended to the Greeks, yet kept the Trade, as well as the “ Place, private to themſelves, may be believed upon theſe Authorities: “ * Pliny tells us, That Midocritus was the firſt who brought Lead from “ the Caſſiterides. But Monſieur Bochart there ſhews us, That it ought to be read Melichartus, who was the Phœnician Hercules of Sanchoniathon, and to whom the Phœnicians attributed their firſt Weſtern Diſcoveries.

Yet notwithſtanding the Care of the Phœnicians to conceal theſe Iſlands, the Greeks did at laſt diſcover them, (thô we cannot tell the certain time when,) giving them the Name of Caſſiterides, which ſignifies in the Greek Tongue, the ſame that Barat-Anac does in the Phœnician, viz. The Land or Country of Tin; which Name, thô given only to theſe Iſlands at firſt, was at laſt alſo communicated to the adjoyning Countries, now called Cornwal and Devonſhire; from whence alſo the Phœnicians might bring this Commodity; and ſo by degrees this Name came to be given to all thoſe Iſlands thus lying together; ſince in thoſe Times (as well as now) it is probable, there might be Mines of this Metal in Britain itſelf, as well as in thoſe ſmaller Iſlands above-mentioned: In ſome of which Mr. Camden tells us, there are found Veins of this Metal even unto this Day; and there might be far greater Mines of it in former Ages, thô long ſince worn out.

But it is Objected, That Mr. Camden, in his Introduction to his Britannia, hath poſitively aſſerted, that Britain was not known to the Greeks, and therefore its Name could not be derived from them, or the Phœnicians: and for Proof of this, he cites a Place out of the Third Book of Polybius's Hiſtory, which we ſhall here render into Engliſh thus. “ As for Aſia and Lybia, where they joyn to each “ other about Ethiopia, none can ſay poſitively to this Day, “ whether it be a Continent running to the South, or whether “ it be encompaſſed by the Sea. So likewiſe what lies between Tanais and Narbon, ſtretching Northward, is unknown to us at this “ preſent, unleſs hereafter by diligent Enquiry we may learn ſomething of it; they that ſpeak or write any thing of theſe Matters, “ are to be thought to know nothing, and to lay down meer Fables.] By which Words Polybius only means, That as it was doubtful whether the Sea encompaſſed the South Parts of Africa, ſo it was unknown whether the North Parts of Europe about Narbon were likewiſe ſo encompaſſed; whereas Mr. Camden underſtands the Words as if they were ſpoken in general, when indeed they related only to that particular Queſtion, Whether the Northern Tracts of Europe were invironed with the Sea or not, which notwithſtanding the great Improvement of Navigation ſtands unreſolv'd even unto this Day. But that Polybius writ not in this ſenſe, appears further, in that he himſelf deſcribes the Fountains of Rhodanus and Ligeris, with many other Places of Gaul which lie all above Narbon. But to put this paſt all Diſpute, in this very Third Book, he promiſes particularly to write of the further or Weſtern Sea, as alſo of the Britanick Iſlands, (for ſo he calls them,) and of their manner of making Tin: Which Promiſe of his required more than a Curſory Knowledge to perform: Since he ſays, That the Trade into thoſe Seas was then very great; now that he alſo performed this Promiſe, appears from * Strabo where Polybius is cited, as comparing the Opinions of Pytheas, Dicæarchus, and Eratoſthenes, concerning the Magnitude of Britain; but that theſe Iſlands were diſcovered by the Greeks long before Polybius's time, appears alſo from Herodotus, who confeſſes, he does not know the Iſlands Caſſiterides, from whence Tin is brought; (that is, he did not know them any otherwiſe than by Report;) and if theſe ſmaller Iſlands were then diſcovered, can any one believe, that ſo great an Iſland as Britain, which lay ſo near them, could remain undiſcovered? But I have ſpoke enough, if not too much, of the Etymologies of the Names of this Iſland; ſince of all that may be counted Learning, nothing is more uncertain than this, nor is it often of any great uſe when known.

* Lib. II.

I ſhall therefore now proceed to ſomewhat more Solid and Uſeful, and try if we can diſcover who were the firſt Inhabitants of this Iſland; but ſince the Scriptures, as well as Prophane Hiſtories, are ſilent in this Point, it is impoſſible to tell the Name of the Man who brought the firſt Colony hither: Only thus much ſeems probable, That Europe was Peopled by the Poſterity of Japhet, either from one Alanus, (whom Nennius ſuppoſes to have been his Grandſon,) or elſe from Gomer his Son, from whom Mr. Camden derives the Names of Cimmerii and Cimbri, whom he ſuppoſes to be one and the ſame Nation, and by whom the ancient Gallia was firſt Inhabited, and from whom he brings the preſent Welſh, called in their own Language Cymru, which, if true, nothing is more certain and eaſie to believe, than that this Iſland was firſt Inhabited (at leaſt as to its more Southern Parts) from the Continent of Gaul, as is delivered by Bede in his firſt Chapter as a current Tradition in his Time; and Mr. Camden farther proves it out of Cæſar's Commentaries: For thô he there tells us, that the Inland Parts of Britain were Inhabited by thoſe who called themſelves the Natives; yet that the Maritime Parts were poſſeſſed by ſuch, who to make War, and get Prey, had paſſed over from Belgium and Gaul, which were then called by the ſame Names as thoſe People from whence they came. Which may be alſo proved from other Arguments, as their Affinity in Cuſtoms, Language and Religion, with thoſe of Gaul, as they are there deſcribed by Cæſar, and alſo by other Roman Authors: Thô Tacitus, in his Life of Agricola, does not wholly agree with Cæſar as to this Particular, for he there tells us, "That the Northern Parts of Britain ſeem to have been Peopled by the Germans, as the Eaſtern Coaſts by their oppoſite Neighbours the Gauls, and the South Part by the Iberi or Spaniards: This he gathers from the different Complexion of the People, the Northern Britains (ſays he) are Fair, having large Limbs, and long yellow Hair like the Germans; but the Silures, or Southern Britains, were Swarthy, and had curled Hair like the Spaniards, whereas the Coaſt lying over-againſt Gaul agreed in Language, Cuſtoms, and in every thing elſe with the Gauls.

It was not from the Continent of Gaul alone, that this Iſland was firſt Inhabited, but alſo from Ireland, and the North Parts of Germany, or elſe from Scandinavia, now called Sweden; for Bede tells us in the Firſt Chapter of his Hiſtory, "That, after the Britains, the Picts came out of Scythia in long Ships, and landed firſt in the North of Ireland; but being there refuſed Habitation by the Scots, who then poſſeſſed that Iſland, they were adviſed to plant themſelves in the North part of Britain, which they then thereupon performed; and when the Picts, wanting Wives, deſired the Scots to beſtow ſome on them, they con-

" ſented to it on this condition, That when there was any diſpute about the Succeſſion to the Crown, they ſhould rather chuſe a King from the Feminine, than Maſculine Line of their former Kings, which is ſtill obſerv'd (ſays he) among the Picts to this day.

Now that this Country, which Bede here calls Scythia, could be no other, than the more Northern Parts of Germany, or elſe Gothia (now called Sweden) at the fartheſt, ſeems highly probable, ſince the beſt Writers of the middle Ages do all agree, that theſe parts were in thoſe times called by the general Name of Scythia. And you may ſee Authorities ſufficient for this, cited by Arch-Biſhop Uſher in the 15th Chapter of his learned work; De Antiquitate Britannicarum Eccleſiarum, and by the reverend Dr. Stillingfleet (now Lord Biſhop of Worceſter) in his Origines Britannicæ; who allows Hector Boethius his Conjecture not to be be improbable, who derives them from the Agathyrſi, who came out of Sarmatia into the Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, and from thence into Scotland. Cap. 5.

But that the Scots came into this Iſland many Ages after out of Ireland is alſo as certain, Since Bede tells us in the ſame place, that in proceſs of " time Britain receiv'd a Third Nation, viz. of the Scots, beſides the Britains and Picts, which Scots going out of Ireland under the conduct of one Reuda, took thoſe Territories which they have among the Picts, either by terms or agreement with them, from which Reuda even to this day they are called Dalreudini, for Dal in their language ſignifies a ſhare or portion, which Reuda in what Age he lived and brought over this Colony out of Ireland, ſince it hath bred a great diſpute among our Modern Antiquaries, I ſhall not take upon me now to decide: But that the Scots came at firſt from Ireland, is acknowledged by John Fordon, and John Major, their two eldeſt Hiſtorians extant; the latter of whom tells us, "That as yet, that is in his time, almoſt half Scotland ſpoke the Iriſh Tongue, which they had brought over with them from Ireland.

To return to the matter in hand it is evident from Bede, that in his time, God was ſerved in five ſeveral Languages in this Iſland, (viz) The Engliſh, the Britiſh, the Scotiſh, (or preſent Iriſh) the Latin (which they commonly uſed in Divine Service) and the Pictiſh; though what that Language was we cannot now tell; for the Picts being totally ſubdued by the Scots, and thereby incorporated into the body of that Nation, that Tongue is quite extinct; though if it had not been at leaſt different in Dialect from that of the Britains, it ſeems improbable that Bede, who was ſo near a neighbour to them, ſhould mention it as a diſtinct Tongue from all the reſt. And yet notwithſtanding by all the relicts we can now find of it in the Names of places in the South and Weſt parts of Scotland, they are purely Britiſh, as Mr. Camden hath learnedly proved in his ſaid Introduction, and therefore, ſince the name of Pict is indeed Latin, and ſignifies no more than painted Men, and that no Roman Author makes mention of them, before Ammianus Marcellinus, who lived about the end of the fourth Century, and is the firſt who calls the Inhabitants of the Northern parts of Britain by the name of Picti, diſtinguiſhing them into Dicalidonii (perhaps, it ſhould be Deucaldonii) and Vecturiones, which the learned Dr. Lloyd, late Lord Biſhop of St. Aſaph, and now of Coventry and Litchfield, in his Hiſtorical account of Church Government in Britain, probably enough derives from the Britiſh Deucilyddion, and Chwithwrion, that is Southern Caledones, or Borderers and Northern Men. It is probable that theſe Picts were no other than the remainder of thoſe Britains, who preſerved their Liberty by reſiſting the Roman Arms, and were at laſt divided from the Roman Britains, by a Wall, now called the Picts Wall, (the Veſtiges of which are to be ſeen to this Day) drawn between the mouths of the Rivers Tine and Eske, to hinder their farther Incurſions into thoſe parts which were then under the Roman Empire.

But having ſaid enough concerning this Iſland in general, together with its firſt Inhabitants and their Languages; It is now high time to come to our main deſign, the Hiſtory of that part of it, called at this day England, and which was in the Romans time divided into ſeveral Provinces or Governments, as Britannia Prima, Secunda, and Maxima Cæſarienſis,&c. they may be ſeen in the Antient Notitia of the Roman Empire. We muſt therefore in the firſt place ingenuouſly confeſs, that till the coming in of the Romans, there are no certain or Authentick Hiſtories remaining of any tranſactions before that time; for Gildas, who liv'd not long after the Saxons were firſt call'd into Britain, " freely owns, " that as for the Antient monuments of his Country, (whatever they were) " being either burnt by Enemies, or carried beyond Sea by his baniſh'd " Country men, they were not then to be found, therefore I ſhall wholly omit that fabulous Succeſſion of Celtick Kings, who are feigned to be derived from Samothes, one of the Sons of Japhet, whom they ſuppoſe to have planted Colonies firſt on the Continent of Celtica or Gaul, and next in this Iſland, and thence to have named it Samothea, ſince they never had any exiſtence, but in the brain of Amnius de Viterbo, and by him vented in his counterfeit Beroſus, which is long ſince exploded by all that are any thing verſed in Antiquity.

But now I could heartily wiſh that we had any certain monuments of the Hiſtory of this Kingdom, which might juſtly ſupply their room; but having no Authentick accounts left us of the Britiſh Kings, that reigned in this Iſland till Julius Cæſar's firſt Expedition hither, I could willingly have excuſed my ſelf from the drudgery of writing things ſo uncertain, nay in diverſe particulars utterly falſe, were it not that moſt Authors who have already writ our Hiſtory either in Engliſh or Latin, have thought thoſe long Succeſſions of Kings not unworthy a particular Recital, as ſuppoſing it ſcarce poſſible, that a deſcent of above Sixty Kings together, with ſo many tranſactions attended with ſuch particular Circumſtances, as the making of War and Peace, building of Cities and enacting Laws, ſhould be wholly Fabulous and Romantick, or that the names of ſo many ſucceſſive Princes ſhould never have been derived from any real Perſons.

For though it is true that Geoffrey of Monmouth is look'd upon as the chief (if not only) Author of the Story of Brutus and his Succeſſours; yet it is certain that he pretends in the Proem to his Hiſtory, (which he dedicated to no leſs a Man than Robert Earle of Glouceſter, natural Son to K. Hen. the I.) that he received an antient Britiſh Hiſtory from Walter, Arch-Deacon of Oxon, which (as he ſays) he faithfully tranſlated out of the Britiſh Tongue into Latin, though William Neobrigenſis, (who lived ſome time after this Geoffrey) in the very beginning of his Hiſtory writes thus of him, " In theſe our days (ſays he) a certain Writer is riſen, who hath " deviſed many fooliſh Fictions of the Britains, he is named Geoffrey: " And a little after, thus, with how little ſhame, and with what great " Confidence doth he frame his Lyes! So that you may ſee his Hiſtory began to be cryed out againſt almoſt as ſoon as it was publiſhed. And Yet for all this, it is certain, that Geoffrey was not the firſt Author of this Story of Brutus; for Nennius, who lived in the 8th Century (and is alſo Intituled Gildas in ſome Copies) in his Hiſtory makes the Iſle of Britain to be firſt inhabited by one Brito, the Son of Hiſicion, the Son of Japhet, or elſe from one Brutus, (it ſeems he did not know which) whoſe Pedegree he " derives from Æneas by his Son Aſcanius, and who (as he " ſuppoſes) reigned in Britain in the time that Eli Judged Iſrael, and " under whoſe Conduct the Britains in the third Age of the World firſt " came into this Iſland; which Calculation falls out right enough with our at preſent received Chronology: But as for Sigebertus Gemblacenſis, a French Monk, (who lived about Twenty Years before Geoffrey) tho' in ſome Editions he ſpeaks of Brute with his Trojans arrival in Gaul, and of his paſſage from thence into Britain, yet it is certain they are none of that Author's words, there being no ſuch thing to be found in the trueſt Edition of his Chronicle, publiſhed by Mirræs. An. 1608. as the above cited Lord Biſhop of Coventry, and Litchfield, in his learned Preface to his Hiſtorical account of Church Government in great Britain and Ireland, hath fully proved. But after him Henry Arch-Deacon of Huntington, an Author of Credit (who lived at the ſame time with Geoffrey) aſcribes the firſt habitation of this Iſland to Brutus, the Son of Sylvius, Grandſon to Æneas; whom together with his certain Trojans he ſuppoſes to have come into Britain in the third Age of the World, as the Scots did in the fourth into Ireland, which he ſeems to have taken out of Nennius, or ſome other ancient Author: But this muſt ſtill be confeſt, that the whole relation of the Actions of Brutus, and the Succeſſion of all the Princes that followed him, do all depend upon the Credit of Geoffrey and the truth of his tranſlation, and ſo was looked upon in the Age in which he publiſhed his Hiſtory: But to make this Brute to be a Trojan, and to give him a Genealogy, which is plainly contradicted by all the Roman Authors, is that for which his Hiſtory ought to be condemned: Yet thus much may be ſaid in Excuſe of him, and of all thoſe Authors who have aſcribed the Origine of the Britains to Brute, that they have imitated the Vanity of the ancient Greeks and Romans, who derived their Kings from ſome God or Heroe. And have been followed in it not only by the Britains, but the French and almoſt all other Nations of Europe, ſince they began to write Hiſtories of their Originals.

Cap. 2. 3, 4.

But ſince it is fit that we ſhould give you ſome account (though as ſhort as poſſible) of this Brute and his Succeſſors, I ſhall contract their Hiſtory from Geoffrey of Monmouth into as narrow a Compaſs as I can.

Brutus, who is ſuppos'd to have firſt Peopled Britain with Inhabitants of the Trojan Race, is ſaid to have been the Great Grandſon of Æneas, by his Son Aſcanius, who killing his Father Sylvius, King of Alba, accidently with an Arrow, was forced to fly his Country, and going into Greece joyned himſelf with the remainder of thoſe ſcattered Trojans he found there, and becoming their Leader, made War upon Pandraſus, the King of that Country, to whom he ſent this Meſſage, viz. " That the Trojans holding it unworthy " their Anceſtors to ſerve in a Foreign Kingdom, had retreated to the " Woods; chooſing rather a Savage, than a ſlaviſh Life; if that diſ" pleaſed him, then with his leave they might depart to ſome other " Soile. The particulars of which being tedious and fabulous, are here needleſs further to be inſerted. But at laſt that King being by them made a Priſoner, was forced to accept of terms of Peace, the Articles of which were, That Brute ſhould Marry Inogena the King's Daughter, and in Conſideration of her Dower ſhould have a Fleet given him, with Liberty to tranſport all ſuch as would be willing to follow his Fortunes: The Marriage being thereupon ſolemnized, Brute and his Trojans with a great Fleet betook themſelves to Sea, and within a ſhort time landed on a deſerted Iſland, where they found a ruin'd City, in which was a Temple, and an Image of Diana, that gave Oracles; whereupon Brutus conſulting with his Diviner and Twelve other of the Ancients, was adviſed to invoke the Goddeſs to tell him, in what Land or Region he ſhould find a place to ſettle in, and accordingly as we find it in Geoffrey of Monmouth, he is ſaid to Adreſs her thus,

Diva potens Nemorum, terror Sylveſtribus apris,
Cui licet anfractus ire per æthereos,
Infernaſque domos: Terreſtria Jura reſolve,
Et dic, quas terras nos habitare velis.
Dic certam ſedem, quâ te veneremur in ævum,
Quâ tibi Virgineis Templa dicabo Choris.

Thus excellently well tranſlated by the Learned Mr. Milton.

Goddeſs of Shades, and Huntreſs who at will Walk'ſt on the rouling Sphere, and through the deep,
On thy third Reign the Earth look now, and tell
What Land, what Seat of reſt thou bidſt me ſeek,
What certain Seat, where I may worſhip thee
For ay, with Temples vow'd, and Virgin Quires.

Whereupon the Goddeſs returned this following Anſwer.

Brute ſub Occaſum ſolis trans Gallica regna
Inſula in Oecano eſt undique cincta Mari.
Inſula in Oceano eſt, habitata Gigantibus olim,
Nunc deſerta quidem, Gentibus apta tuis.
Hanc pete, namque tibi ſedes erit illa perennis;
Hæc fiet natis altera Troja tuis
Hic de prole tua Reges naſcentur, & illis
Totius Terræ ſubditus Orbis erit.

Rendred thus,

Brutus, far to the Weſt, in th' Ocean wide
Beyond the Realm of Gaul, a Land there lies,
Sea-Girt it lies, where Giants dwelt of old,
Now void, it fits thy People, thither bend
Thy Courſe, there ſhalt thou find a laſting Seat,
There to thy Sons another Troy ſhall riſe,
And Kings be born of thee, whoſe dreaded Might Shall awe the World, and Conquer Nations bold.

But theſe Verſes being in Latin, when there was no ſuch Language ſpoke in the World, ſufficiently betray the moderneſs of the invention: So that were it no more to pleaſe, then inſtruct, I ſhould not have inſerted them here.

And now Brute being guided, as he thought by a Divine Conduct, Sails again towards the Weſt, and Landing in Italy meets with ſome other Trojans who had come thither with Antenor, many of whom he takes along with him, together with one Corinæus their Chief. With this recruit Brute puts again to Sea, and paſſing the Pillars of Hercules, at the mouth of Ligeris in Aquitania caſts Anchor, where they were ſet upon by one Goffarius a Pictiſh King of that Country, now called Poictou, with whom having ſeveral Battles, Brute at laſt Conquered and Expell'd him his Kingdom; but he ſollicitng the other Kings of Gaul to his aſſiſtance; Brute thereupon finding himſelf too weak for ſo great a force, called a Council, where 'twas reſolved, that ſince this was not the Land promiſed them by the Oracle, they ſhould again put to Sea: So embarking all their Forces, after a few days Sail they arrived at Albion, and Landed at a Haven, now called Totneſſe in Devonſhire. The time of which enterprize is ſuppoſed to be about 1200 Years after the Flood, and about 66. Years after the Deſtruction of Troy; if any certain time can be aſſigned for ſo uncertain a relation.

But Brute having at length (through many dangers and difficulties) attained this long wiſh'd for Iſland, ~~Lands~~ his Trojans, and marches up into the Country to take poſſeſſion of it, which he found in great part deſart, or Inhabited only by ſome Gyants; theſe he quickly deſtroys and to his People divides the Land, which in alluſion to his own Name he called Britain. On Corinæus, Cornwall, (as we now call it) was beſtowed: But here I omit as a Fable, only fit to be told Children, how this Hero, though no Gyant himſelf, yet took up the mighty Gyant Gogmagog in his Arms, and flung him off from a Cliff into the Sea, from whence the place hath been ever ſince called Langoemagog, that is to ſay, the Gyant's Leap.

After Brute had thus conquer'd the Iſland, he choſe a fit place to build a City, which he called Troja Nova; (for it ſeems he ſpoke Latin though it were not then uſed in Italy) which Cities Name was changed in time to Trinobantum, or Troynovant, after to London: This he made the Seat of his Kingdom, (Eli being then High Prieſt in Judea), where he enacted ſeveral Laws, and having reign'd here Fifteen Years, he divided his Kingdom among his Three Sons; Locrinus the Eldeſt had that part called Loegria now England: Camber the ſecond poſſeſſed Cambria, now Wales. And Albanactus, Albania, now Scotland; but he ſome time after being invaded by one Humber King of the Huns, was ſlain in Fight, and his People driven back into Loegria, whereupon King Locrinus and his Brother Camber march'd againſt this Humber, who fighting with them, and being overcome, and drown'd in a River, left his Name to it. I deſignedly omit the long ſtory of the Lady Eſtrildis, whom Locrinus then taking Priſoner he fell in Love with, and privately enjoy'd, and would have Married, had it not been for fear of Corinæus, whoſe Daughter Gwendolin, he had already betroathed; but no ſooner was Corinæus dead, but he owned Eſtrildis for his Queen, which ſo incenſed Gwendolin, that although Locrinus was ſtrengthened by the addition of Cambria upon the Death of his Brother; yet ſhe goes into Cornwall, and by powerful ſollicitations in the behalf of her ſelf and her young Son Madan, the Corniſh are brought to aſſiſt her: With theſe Forces, ſhe marched againſt Locrinus, and in a pitch'd Battle nigh the River Stour he was overcome, and Slain, in the 20th Year of his Reign, upon this (juſt as ſhe would have it) the Kingdom fell to her Son

Madan, the Son of Locrinus by Gwendolin, although a Child, yet ſucceeded his Father, but under the Regency of the Queen his Mother, who out of Revenge, drown'd Eſtrildis and her Daughter Sabra in a River, which from her was called Sabrina, in Engliſh Severne; Gwendolin, her Son coming to full Age, reſigned her Power, and retired into Cornwall, after ſhe had Govern'd Fifteen Years: But Madan having had the fame of Ruling well for the ſpace of Forty Years in all, left behind him two Sons, Mempritius and Manlius; Mempritius the Eldeſt Son of Madan is ſuppoſed to have ruled over the whole Iſland, but Manlius his Younger Brother rebelling againſt him, he deſired a treaty with him, who giving his Brother a meeting, he treacherouſly murdered him, and now having put an end to that trouble, giving himſelf up to Luxury and Cruelty, and at laſt to unnatural Luſt, hunting in a Forreſt was devoured by Wolves; to whom ſucceeded Ebrank his Son, who was a Man of mighty Strength and Stature; he firſt after Brutus waſted Gaul, and returning rich and proſperous, built Caerbranc, now York, and in Albania, the Town of Mount Agned, now Edinburgh He is ſaid to have had Twenty Wives, and by them Twenty Sons and Thirty Daughters, which (as our Author relates) were ſent under the Conduct of their Brother to Sylvius Alba then King of Italy to be provided with Husbands, becauſe he had heard that the Sabines would not give their Daughters in Marriage to the Latins, which is ſo very ridiculous that it needs no Confutation. This Prince dying, after he had reign'd about Forty Years, left the Kingdom to Brute, Sir-named Greenſhield from the colour of his Target; he revenged thoſe Indignities, which had been put upon his Father by Brunchild, Prince of Hannonia or Hainault Conquering him near the banks of the Scaldis, i. e. the Scheld, but the modern names of Hainault, and Brunchild ſufficiently betray the Novelty of this Fable: He hath the Character of an Excellent Prince, Juſt, Merciful, and a moſt exact obſerver of his Word; and reigned Twelve Years, to whom ſucceeded

Leil his Son, who built the City of Carliſle, (in the Days of Solomon,) after called by the Romans Lugubalia, and did alſo repair Caerleon, now called Cheſter; he was a good Prince till the latter end of his days, when falling into ſeveral Vices, he occaſioned great diſſentions in the Kingdom, which did not end with his life, but after he had reigned Twenty five Years, left the Kingdom to

Rudhudibras or Hudibras, who compos'd the diſturbances begun in his Fathers days, and, ſtudying nothing more than to ſtrengthen and adorn his Kingdom, built ſeveral Cities, as Caerkim now Canterbury; likewiſe Caer Guent, now Wincheſter; as alſo Mount Paladur, after Septonia or Shaftſbury, and having reigned Twenty nine Years, was ſucceeded by,

Bladud his Son, who is ſaid to have been ſkill'd in Magick, and thereby to have found out thoſe Medicinal Waters, now called the Bath, where he alſo built a City, called Caer Baden; he is ſaid to be a Man of a good Invention, and having made himſelf Wings to flye, fell down from the Temple of Apollo in Trinovant, and broke his Neck, having governed Britain Twenty Years. To him ſucceeded

Leir his Son who built Caer Leir, now called Leiceſter: He had only Three Daughters, Gonnilla, Regana, and Cordiella his darling; but in his old Age, being jealous of their Affections, he called them before him, and demanded, that they would give him ſome aſſurance of their Love; the two Eldeſt called Heaven and Earth to witneſs, that they loved him Ten thouſand times dearer than their own Souls, and that they were not able to Expreſs their infinite kindneſs for him; and at laſt concluded their flatteries with horrid Oaths and aſſeverations of their Sincerity; but Cordiella, the Youngeſt, though having before her Eyes the preſent reward of an eaſie flattery, yet could not be moved from giving him this downright honeſt Anſwer: Father (ſaith ſhe) my Love toward you, is as my Duty bids, What ſhould a Father ſeek? What can a Child promiſe more? They who pretend beyond this flatter: This ſhort Anſwer not at all ſatisfied the old ſuſpicious King; for he ſhewed his reſentments by his neglect of her, and the ſuddain advancement of her Siſters, Marrying Regana to the Duke of Cornwall, and Gonarilla to the Duke of Albania; reſerving no portion at all for Cordiella, but it ſo happen'd, that Aganippus a Prince of Gaul (however he came by this Greek Name) hearing of her Vertue and Beauty deſired her in Marriage, to whom ſhe was welcome without any other Dower, but her own Vertues. King Leir having thus diſpoſed of his two Eldeſt Daughters, and dividing half his Kingdom between them, they within ſome time by their ſubtile practices work him out of all; ſo that he was forced to ſojourn with his Daughters by turns, who being ſet on by their Husbands, put ſo many affronts and Indignities upon him (needleſs here to be recited) that in the end he was conſtrained to leave the Realm, and take refuge with Cordiella. This rejected Daughter received him with all the Duty and Affection imaginable; and then appeared the difference between the down-right Love of ſome Children to their Parents, and the over talkative obſequiouſneſs of others, while the hopes of a large Inheritance obliges their Tongues to Expreſs more Duty than ever they mean to perform; but what was more ſignificant than Words, ſhe aſſiſted her Father with powerful aids, and in Perſon went to revenge his wrongs: So that bringing a great Army into Britain, ſhe deſtroyed his Enemies, and reſtored him to his Crown, which he held but for the ſpace of Two Years, whoſe Reign in all is computed to be about Forty Years, and then dying left the Throne to Cordilla, who Governed the Kingdom for Five Years; but in the mean time her Husband Aganippus dying; Morgan and Cunedage her Nephews, by her Siſters Gonorilla and Regana, diſdaining to be under the Government of a Woman, rebelled againſt her; and ſo prevailed, that they took her Priſoner; but ſhe being a Woman of a high Spirit ſlew her ſelf, rather than to live under their Tyranny.

Whereupon Cunedage and Morgan poſſeſſing the whole Government, divided the Iſland between them; to Morgan fell Albania, to Cunedage all the Land on this ſide Humber; Morgan not being content with his Portion Invaded his Brother, but being driven by him into Wales, and there Slain, gave the Name of Glan-Morgan to that Country: Cunedage now Ruling alone built many Temples to his Gods, and dying, was buried at Trinoyant; after he had Ruled Thirty three Years, to whom ſucceeded

Rivallo the Son of Cunedage; in his time it rain'd Blood for Three Days together, from whoſe Putrefaction, Noiſom and Venemous Flies were bred; which in Swarms infeſted the whole Land, and brought great Contagion both upon Men and Beaſts. He, after he had Ruled Forty ſix Years, was ſucceeded by

Gurguſt his Son, of whom nothing is recorded worth mentioning; he is ſaid to have Reign'd Thirty ſeven Years: Nor is there more left of Jago his Nephew,

Nor yet of Sillius, or Sicillius, thô how related to the former is not ſaid: But to him, after Forty nine Years Reign, ſucceeded

Kinemare, ſaid to be Brother of Jago, of whom there is nothing Recorded, but that he was Buried at York: To whom ſucceeded

Gorlodug, the Son of Kinemare, he is noted for Tyranny: But dying, he left behind him two Sons

Ferrex, and Porrex, who Reigning joyntly at firſt, did within a few Years begin to contend, who ſhould have the whole Kingdom; in which Contention, after a great Battle Fought between them, Ferrex was Slain, whoſe Death affected his Mother with ſo great a Grief, that tranſported by Revenge, ſhe by the help of her Maidens, Slew her other Son Porrex whilſt he was a Sleep; an unheard of Example, and too ſtrange to be true.

After his Death, the Blood Royal of Brute being extinguiſhed by his Death, there happned cruel Wars, ſo that the Kingdom was rent into five parts; one Pinnor made himſelf King of Loegria or England: Stator ſeized Albania; Rudock, Cambria, and Cloten, Cornwall: But as to the fifth diviſion, the Story is ſilent; this Pentarchie is ſuppoſed to have laſted above Fifty Years, the Kingdom in the mean time being miſerably harraſſed by Civil Wars, until Dunwallo Molmutius, Son of Cloten King of Cornwall, excelling in Valour and Comlineſs of Perſon, by ſubduing the other four Princes, reduced the whole Iſland again into a Monarchy, and is ſaid to be the Firſt in Britain that were a Crown of Gold; and therefore by ſome reputed the firſt King: But what he got by Force he managed with great Prudence and Moderation; Enacting ſeveral excellent Laws, which Geoffrey ſays were tranſlated into Latin by Gildas; and in Saxon afterwards by King Alfred. But ſince no ſuch work of his is any where extant, I ſhall not give them ſo much Credit as to recite them; though Mr. Selden hath not thought them unworthy of a place in his learned Treatiſe; called, Janus, Anglorum. But this King, after he had governed Forty Years, died, and was buried at Trinovant, to whom ſucceeded his two Sons

Belinus and Brennus, who after ſome Controverſies, divided the Kingdom between them, Brennus being to have all that lay North of Humber, and Belinus the reſt; but the Younger being not long ſo contented, did upon new deſigns Sail into Norway, and enter into a League with Elſing King of that Country, and Married his Daughter, which Belinus hearing of, did in his abſence diſpoſſeſs him of his Kingdom; Brennus with a Fleet of Norwegians makes toward Britain, but is encounter'd by Guithlac, a Daniſh King, who laying claim to his Bride purſued him at Sea, and being there vanquiſh'd in a Fight, was forced to get away with a few Ships; but Brennus nevertheleſs recollecting his ſhattered Navy, landed in Albania, and gave Battle to his Brother, who totally routed him and forced him to fly into Gaul, with no more than one ſingle Veſſel.

But Belinus being now rid of his Brother, turns his Thoughts to Arts of Peace, and amongſt other things they reckon his making the Four great Ways or Streets, which are ſtill to be ſeen, to run croſs the Kingdom, which they will have him, and not the Romans, to have firſt laid.

Brennus in the mean while having been kindly received by Seguinus King of Armorica, now Britagn in France, and having Married his Daughter, was by him aſſiſted with a powerful Army to regain his Kingdom, and Landing in Britain, was now ready to give Battel to his Brother; when their Mother Conwenna mediated between them, and ſo perſwaded them, that embracing each other they were perfectly reconciled; ſo that going to Trinovant, they reſolved to turn their united Forces on Foreign Parts, and then Sailing into Gaul, the Author tells us, that under theſe two, not only all that Country, but alſo Italy, was Conquered; as you may find in the Roman Authors. If thoſe were Britains and not Gauls which took Rome, which is not worth our while to Diſpute: Some ſay, that Belinus went not into Gaul with his Brother, or if he did that he ſoon returned. After which he made it his Buſineſs to adorn his Kingdom, Building ſome Cities, of which Caer-Uske, now Caer-Leon upon Uske was one; and he alſo adorn'd Trinovant with a Gate called to this Day Belin's Gate, having a Tower on the Top of it; at the Foot of which he made a Harbour for Ships: He is alſo ſaid to be the firſt Founder of the Tower of London. After he had Reigned Twenty-ſix Years died, and his Body being burnt on a Funeral Pile, his Aſhes were put in a golden Urn, and placed on the Top of the Tower that he himſelf had Built.

Gurguint, Sirnamed Brabtruc; his Son, ſucceeded him, in whoſe Reign the Danes refuſed the Payment of the Tribute, which had bin impoſed by Belinus, when their King Guithlac, being driven by force of Weather upon the Coaſt of Northumberland, was made a Priſoner, nor could be ſet free, without an Engagement to pay Tribute for himſelf and Succeſſors, which being now denied, Gurguint now Sailed into Denmark, and by force of Arms obliged the Danes to renew their Treaty, and received Homage of their King and Chief Nobility, and then Embarqued again for Britain: In his return he met with a Fleet of Thirty Sail about the Iſle of Orkeney, theſe he encountred, and having taken their Captain Bartholain, he demanded of him what he was, and the Reaſon of his coming into thoſe Parts; Bartholain anſwered, that he and his Followers were named Balences, being baniſhed from Spain (their Country) with their Wives and Children, and thereupon had put to Sea to ſeek out new Habitations, whereupon it is ſaid this King aſſigned them Ireland, being a Place not then Peopled. This King is ſuppoſed to have Built Caer-Werith or Lancaſter, Caer-Peris or Portcheſter in Hampſhire, and Caer-Gaurvie now Warwick, where he was buried, after he had Reigned Nineteen Years; to whom ſucceeded

Guintelin his Son, he was a Prince Learned, Prudent, and of ſingular Juſtice and Moderation; he is ſaid to have had a Wife of as great Vertue, named Martia, to whom Geoffrey falſly Attributes the making of the Laws called Mercenenlage, which was indeed ſo called not from her, but but from the Mercians, by whoſe Kings they were firſt enacted. This King is alſo ſaid to have Reigned Twenty ſix Years, and was ſucceeded by

Sicilius the II. his Son, being about Seven Years of Age, but under the Government of his Mother Martia, he is ſuppoſed to have Reign'd Fifteen Years, Seven under the Tuition of his Mother, and Eight after his full Age; and having given all the Signs of a hopeful Prince, he was ſuddenly ſnatched away by Death, and then the Crown fell to

Kimarus the Son of Sicilius; but he being of a wild and ungovernable Temper, and wholly given up to all manner of Exorbitances, was killed in the Woods, in purſuit after his Game, ſome ſay by an Ambuſh, others by wild Beaſts: He Reigned but three Years, then

Elanius, or Danius his Brother ſucceeded. This King was not Inferior to his Predeceſſor in Wickedneſs of Life, inſomuch, that ſome make them the ſame Perſon, ſo exactly did theſe two Princes correſpond in their Vices. He held the Scepter about Ten Years; then ſucceeded his Son

Morvidus, or Morindus (by a Concubine) a Man of great Strength and Comelineſs; as to the Qualities of his Mind, he was Liberal, but withal exceeding Paſſionate: In his Days the Moriani, or rather Morini, a People of Gaul, Landing in Northumberland with Fire and Sword waſted that Country, which Morindus hearing of, with all Expedition gathered his Forces, and with long and weariſom Marches made up to them, and in one Battel utterly defeated them, and then put all the Priſoners to Death with exquiſite Torments; but not long after, hearing of an hideous Monſter, which, coming out of the Iriſh Sea, ſeized and devoured many that lived near the Shore. The King beholding the lamentable Deſtruction of his Subjects, fought the Monſter himſelf: the Conteſt held for a while doubtful, but at laſt the Monſter prevailed and devoured the King. This is ſaid to have happened in the Ninth Year of his Reign, to whom ſucceeded

Gorbonian his eldeſt Son, a religious Prince, which he evidenced to the World by repairing decay'd Temples, and erecting new ones in ſeveral Places in his Dominions: He is ſaid to have built Grantham in Lincolnſhire, and ſome ſay Cambridge, antiently called Caer-Grant and Grant Cheſter. He Reigned Ten Years, and was ſucceeded by his Brother

Archigallo, the Second Son of Morindus; he endeavoured to depreſs the Nobility, by depriving them of all Power and Command, and preferring Mean and unworthy Men, and by taking away Men's Eſtates to enrich his own Treaſure; all which Oppreſſions the Nobility of the Kingdom not being any longer to bear, they roſe up in Arms, and depoſing him, placed Elidure his Brother in the Throne; he was called by his Subjects Elidure the Pious; for as he went on Hunting one Day in the Wood Calater, in the midſt of the Foreſt he met with his Brother Archigallo, and being ſtruck with Pity of his Misfortunes, he ſecretly conveyed him Home to his own Houſe at the City of Alchluid, where feigning himſelf ſick, he aſſembled all the Nobles of his Realm, and there partly by Perſwaſions, partly by Commands, he engaged them again to receive his Brother Archigallo for their Sovereign; and afterwards calling a general Aſſembly of his People at York, he there publickly reſigned his Crown, and taking it off his own Head, placed it on his Brother's, after he had Reigned Three Years.

Archigallo being thus Reſtored, by his wiſe and ſober Deportment regained the Affections of his People; for he diſcarded his former Favourites, rites, and adhered to the prudent Advice of his Nobility, and Reigning to the general Liking of his Subjects for the ſpace of Ten Years, died and was buried at Caer-brank, or York.

Elidure, after the Death of his Brother, became once more King of Britain, and ſo with much Honour and Reputation received the ſecond time the Crown, but was ſoon depoſed by the Ambition of his Brethren, Vigenius and Peridurus, after One Year's Government; when being ſeized by them, and his Perſon confined to the Tower of London, they divided the Kingdom between them; Peridurus took Albania, and Vigenius all the Country on this ſide Humber for his ſhare.

x Trinovant or

Vigenius dying after he had Reigned Seven Years, the whole Kingdom devolved to Peridurus who managed it with great Moderation and Juſtice, and having governed Nine Years died, then Elidure again reſumed the Crown, being delivered out of Priſon by his Subjects, and after he had Reigned Four Years to the general Satisfaction of all Men, then dying, was ſucceeded by his Nephew or Grandſon, the Son of Gorbonian, who is called

Regin, by Mat of Weſtminſter, though not named particularly by Geoffrey; He was a worthy Prince, and Reigned with the general Approbation of all his People, to whom ſucceeded

Morgan, or Margan, the Son of Argigallo, he Reigned Fourteen Years in Tranquillity: After him

Ennian, or Emerian, another Son of Archigallo's was advanced to the Throne, who, quite different from his Brother, govern'd Tyrannically, and was in the Sixth Year of his Reign Depos'd, and then ſucceeded

Idwallo the Son of Vigenius, who warned by the Misfortune of his Predeceſſor avoided Tyranny; after whom Reigned

Rinco the Son of Peridurus, an heroic Prince and a great Warriour Then next follows, in Geoffrey of Monmouth, a long deſcent of Kings, who either did nothing, or had no Body to Record it; theſe make up Seventeen Kings in all, viz. Gerantius the Son of Elidurus, to whom ſucceeded Catellus his Son, then Coillus, and after him Porrex the Second; then Cherin, or Cherim; then ſucceeded Fulgentius the Eldeſt Son of Cherin; next him Androgeus the Third Son of Cherim enjoyed the Crown; then after him

Urianus the Son of Androgeus began to Reign, who giving himſelf up to all Riot and Intemperance, ſoon died; and to him ſucceeded

Eliod; then Elidavius, then Cledanus, or Cletanus, called alſo by others Detonus; but here ariſes ſo great a Difference amongſt the Writers of this long Bed-Roll of Britiſh Kings, that there is nothing of Certainty concerning their very Names, much leſs of their Actions, for their Names are variouſly recited by Geoffrey, and thoſe Authors that lived after him, and pretend to correct or enlarge him; but you muſt take them as we find them. Then ſucceeded x*Gurguntius*; then Merianus, and after him Bledunus; then Capenus; next to him Siſilius the Third; then Blegabred, who is ſaid to have been excellently well Skill'd in Vocal as well as Inſtrumental Muſick; he Reigned Ten Years: After him ſucceeded

Arthimallo his Brother; and after him Eldol: Then follow Nine Kings more, without any thing Recorded of them, but their bare Names, viz.

Rodianus or Redian, then Redarchius or Redargius, then Samuil, then Peniſill, then Carpoir or Corporius, and after him Geiduellus or Dinellus the Son of Carpoir, a Prince Modeſt and Prudent in all his Actions, who left his his Son Heli his Succeſſor, who Reign'd Forty Years, and was ſucceeded by

Lud his Eldeſt Son, who is reported to have been a Vertuous Prince, making divers excellent Laws, and Correcting many Abuſes in the Government; he Adorn'd the City of London with new Walls and Towers, and therein built a Gate, which is ſtill called after his Name, Lud-Gate; and is ſaid to have built himſelf a Palace not far from it: And, after he had Reigned Eleven Years, died, leaving behind him two Sons, Androgeus and Theomantius, under the Tuition of his Brother

Caſſibelan, whoſe Bounty and Worthy demeanour ſo wrought upon the People, that he eaſily got the Kingdom transferr'd upon himſelf; yet neverthleſs ſhewing ſome Favour to his Nephews, he conferred freely upon Androgeus London with Kent, and upon Theomantius Cornwall; reſerving to himſelf a Superiority over them both, till the Romans for a while eclipſed his Power.

I ſhall not here trouble my ſelf to ſet down, much leſs to confute the Errors that may be found in the Chronology of theſe Kings Reigns, ſince Geoffrey of Monmouth, from whom they are taken, hath bin ſo cautious, as not to give us any account in what Year of the World they Reign'd; ſometimes telling us (tho' with no certainty at all) the Names of the Judges and Kings of Iſrael, whom he makes Contemporary with them. But as for his laſt Nine and Twenty Kings from Elidure to Lud, he has given us nothing but their bare Names, without ſo much as ſetting down how many Years they reign'd, as if he himſelf, or thoſe Authors he had Tranſlated had bin aſhamed, or weary of their own tedious Stories, and ſo would make it as ſhort as they could.

But as for Mat. of Weſtminſter, Ponticus Virunnius, Polydore Virgil, and one Richard White, (who calls himſelf Baſinſtoke) I do not think it worth while to put down their pretended Corrections, Emendations, and Additions of Geoffrey's Hiſtory, ſince, if he had no Authority to invent, I am ſure they can leſs pretend to Correct his Inventions, or alter his Courſe of Succeſſion of the Britiſh Kings, as Polydore has done, under pretence of making them more ſuitable to his own Accounts of time: But White has exceeded all others in this, making bold with Geoffrey, not only altering the Names of his Kings and their Courſe of Succeſſion in many Places, but alſo referring them in particular to the Years of the World, in which he ſuppoſes them to have Reigned, adding alſo the Years of their Reigns where-ever he thought Geoffrey to be deficient, but without vouchſafing to give us the Names of any Authors from whence he took them: So that ſince we have indeed no better Authorities than Geoffrey himſelf, I ſhall not go about to Confute the Faults that might be found in the Chronology which ~~Mr.~~ White has given us of theſe Kings Reigns; though it were no hard Matter to ſhew diverſe Abſurdities in it. But this much is evident from the diſagreement of theſe Authors, about the Names of their Kings and the Years of their Reigns, that they had nothing but their own Fancies to rely upon, for what they wrote; whence proceeds ſo great a Confuſion in this part of their Britiſh Hiſtory, that no Body can certainly conclude any thing from hence, unleſs that they were all miſtaken: Nor is it only the uncertainty of Kings Names and Succeſſions that we here find fault with, but the great Improbability (I might ſay Impoſſibility) of divers Matters of Fact related by Geoffrey of Monmouth, in this Hiſtory of the Britiſh Kings: As for Inſtance, that of King Ebrdne's ſending his Thirty Daughters to find Husbands in Italy; which Story plainly took its riſe from the Sabines denying their Daughters to thoſe People, which Romulus many Years after got together. Not to mention the ~~Story~~ of Morindus's being devoured by a Sea-Monſter, whereas neither our Seas nor Rivers do now (or ever did) afford any ſuch noxious Creatures; divers other more improbable Relations (becauſe I would not tire the Reader with ſuch Fooleries) I have here omitted. Beſides all which, the very Names of many of theſe Kings, ſuch as Jago, (which is the ſame with James in Engliſh) Molmutius, Morindus, as alſo Archigallo, Gorbonian, Ennianus, Geruntius, Fulgentius, Androgeus, Archimalus, Rodianus, ſufficiently betray ſome a Phœnician, ſome a Grecian, and ſome a Roman Original, and could never be derived from any ~~the~~ British ~~Original.~~ [illegible] Roots

Laſtly, There is great difference between this part of the Britiſh Hiſtory (eſpecially from Elidure to Lud) and all other Hiſtories; for whereas theſe commonly are barren of particular Tranſactions in their beginning, and afterwards enlarge themſelves ſtill more and more the further they proceed. This Hiſtory is quite contrary, and the farther we go, the more confuſed we find the Succeſſion of their Kings, and the leſs there is Recorded of their Actions; for from Elidure to Lud there are Nine and Twenty Kings, of whom nothing almoſt is Recorded but their bare Names; and which is alſo very remarkable, from this Elidure, Geoffrey makes no mention of the Years of their Reigns. What we find of this kind hath been added by thoſe that writ long after him, who have done it very prepoſterouſly, allowing not above Ten Years one with another to Thirty Kings, which are ſuppoſed to have Reign'd in about Two Hundred Years; ſo that if there were any Truth in this Hiſtory, it ſeems more rational to believe theſe Kings not to have ſucceeded each other, but many of them to have bin Contemporary Rulers of particular Provinces of this Iſland.

I ſhall therefore conclude this Part of the Hiſtory with Mr. Milton's Words concerning theſe Kings. "Thus far have we gone relying up" on the Credit of Geoffrey of Monmouth and his Aſſertors, though,
" for the Reaſons above-mentioned, I have not thought it beſide my " Purpoſe to relate what I have found, whereto I neither oblige the " Belief of other Perſons, nor ſhall over-haſtily ſubſcribe my own.

But ~~Yet~~ granting theſe things not to have been true, but invented by the Author above-mentioned; yet ſince even Romances, as well as true Hiſtories, may furniſh us with Obſervations ſufficient to Inſtruct us, not only in the Humours and Paſſions of Mankind, but alſo in the Cauſes as well as Effects of human Actions: And ſince Ambition, Luſt, and the Deſire of Revenge are commonly in their turns the Motives that incite Princes as well as private Men to Tranſgreſs the Laws of Reaſon; let us look back and ſurvey ſome of the moſt remarkable Actions of thoſe Princes, whoſe Hiſtory we have here cited.

These are [illegible]

From thoſe frequent Diviſions we here read to have been made of the Kingdom between ſeveral Brothers, we may learn, that the Britains had no Notion of any Right in the Eldeſt Brother to Command over all the Reſt, no not after they became Chriſtians; the Welch Princes ſtill dividing their Territories among all their Sons alike, though we may ſee the Inconvenience of this Courſe, by their making War upon each other about their particular Shares: Whence we may conclude, that Sovereignty ought to be left undivided, and the more Shares there are in it, the more Cauſes there are of Civil Wars and Diviſions; nor have any prov'd more fatal than thoſe among Brothers, of which we have ſufficient Examples, not only in this, but other Hiſtories.

From ſo many Kings being depos'd for their Tyranny, we may obſerve, that the ancient Britains, though under a Monarchy, yet did not think themſelves oblig'd to ſuffer their Kings, by becoming Tyrants, to make their People Slaves; but knew how to caſt off that Yoke when it grew inſupportable.

Laſtly, from Caſſibelan's being made a King by the People, for his Valour and Worth, it plainly appears, that if the Kingdom were ~~then~~ Hereditary; yet the Eſtates ~~did then~~ still reſerved a Power to themſelves, during the Minority of the Right Heir, to place in the Throne that Prince of the Blood-Royal, who was like to prove moſt able to defend them either againſt Foreign or Domeſtick Enemies; as this Prince in the War with Cæſar evidenced to the World. I have made bold to add theſe few political Obſervations, that the Reader as well as my ſelf may profit ſomewhat by Reading a Hiſtory otherwiſe ſo dry and uninſtructive.

BRITAIN,
NOW CALLED ENGLAND:
As well Eccleſiaſtical, as Civil.

BOOK II.

Containing the Annals of ENGLAND, from the Firſt Landing of JULIUS CÆSAR, to the Romans Total Deſertion thereof, being about Four Hundred and Ninety Years.

HAVING in the former Book deduced the Succeſſion of Britiſh Kings (as well as I was able) from Brute to the Beginning of the Reign of Caſſibelan, in whoſe Time Cæſar Landed in Britain; and having hitherto wandred through divers Ages of Fictions, or Uncertainties at beſt, like a Man in a dark Night, who knows not well whether he is in or out of his Road, yet is ſtill forced to Travel on, till Day-light overtake him: So we having hitherto gone forward, though in the dark, are at laſt arrived at a Period, which will give us a more certain Light into our Britiſh Hiſtory; though no Roman or Greek Hiſtorian did ever undertake to write a Hiſtory on purpoſe concerning this Iſland, during all the time that the Roman Emperors govern'd here, either in Perſon or by their Lieutenants. For thoſe Authors that are extant, only write of the Affairs of Britain occaſionally, and as they ſtood intermix'd with other Parts of the Roman Hiſtory: Hence we find that they rarely mention the Affairs of Britain, but by the bye, when an Expedition, occaſioned by ſome freſh Rebellion or ſudden Commotion, oblig'd them either to come in Perſon, or to ſend Forces over hither. Nor is there any Author, except Tacitus in his Life of Agricola, who expreſly treats of the whole Government or Actions of any one Lieutenant of all thoſe that govern'd here; whence it is that we have ſo imperfect an Account of the Civil State of this Iſland, or what particular Laws were made for the Government of it, whilſt it continued part of the Roman Empire, farther than we may pick up from ſome Laws diſperſed here and there in the Code, and Digeſt; or elſe from the Notitiæ of the Roman Empire: To which may be alſo added (that which is yet worſe than all the reſt) the great Loſs Civil Knowledge has undergone, by the periſhing of ſo many excellent Hiſtories both in Greek and Latin; ſo that whoever pleaſes to ſurvey them will find of thoſe few that remain, ſcarce one of them is come to us entire, but has loſt ſome conſiderable Part or other: All which, if we had them together, would without doubt make a Compleat Roman Hiſtory of this Iſland, which now it is impoſſible to perform, having nothing left us during ſeveral Emperors Reigns, but ſome lame Epitomes, or immethodical Lives in the Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ. This I premiſe, that you ſhould not wonder if you find ſuch large gaps in this Period, as to things perform'd in Britain, during ſeveral Succeſſions of Roman Emperors: So that if it were not for ſome old Altars, and votive Inſcriptions that have been dug up of late Years in divers Places of this Iſland, we could not certainly have known any further than by gueſs, that thoſe Emperors, whoſe Names are there mentioned, had any thing to do here; and as for Geoffrey of Monmouth, and thoſe few Modern Writers who take upon them to treat of theſe Matters, they are ſo falſe and uncertain, that they are rarely to be relied upon, and indeed never to be made uſe of, but when we are at a loſs for any other Account of thoſe Times. So that this (as I ſuppoſe) hath bin the Reaſon why ſome of our late Engliſh Hiſtorians, for want of other Matter, have ſtuffed out their Hiſtories, not only with what the Roman Emperors did in Gaul, or Britain, but all the other Parts of the Roman Empire, where they had occaſion to make Wars; which is indeed rather to give a General Hiſtory of the then known World, than of one ſingle Iſland or Province.

But ſince I intend to confine my ſelf only to write of ſuch Actions as were perform'd within the compaſs of this Iſle, either by the Roman Emperors or their Lieutenants during the time they govern'd here; I ſhall rather chuſe ſometimes to leave a gap in the Story it ſelf, than to write Things foreign and impertinent to the Subject I am to treat of: And indeed I could willingly have forborn Writing this Part of the Hiſtory at all, ſince it hath been done already by Mr. Camden in Latin, and Mr. Milton in Engliſh, who have ſcarce omitted any thing which is worth the Collecting out of the Greek and Latin Hiſtorians, that was neceſſary to compleat this Period. Therefore, were it not for leaving too great a Chaſm in our intended Work, I could very willingly have excuſed my ſelf from ſo ungrateful a Task, in which I confeſs it is hard to equal, and much more to exceed ſuch great Authors. But ſince I find there is a Neceſſity, in order to render the Hiſtory entire, to give an Account of what was done in this Iſland during the Roman Empire, I ſhall perform it as well as I am able.

But that I may follow Cæſar's Example, give me leave from him, as well as other Greek and Roman Authors, to give you a ſhort Account of the Religion and Manners of the antient Britains, as well in Cæſar's Time as ſome Ages after, before we ſay any thing of his Expedition hither.

That Great Man in the Fifth Book of his admirable Commentaries tells us, that in his Time there were “ in Britain a vaſt number of Men “ and Cattel, the Houſes thick, and built almoſt like to thoſe of the “ Gauls; that they uſed Copper or Iron-Plates weighed by a certain “ Standard inſtead of Money: That they counted it againſt their Re- “ ligion ſo much as to taſte of a Hare, Hen or Gooſe. And a little after proceeds thus; “ Of all People thoſe which inhabit Kent were moſt “ human, neither differ'd much from the Gallick Cuſtoms: The more “ Inland People for the moſt part ſowed no Corn, but lived upon Milk “ and Fleſh, being cloathed with Skins. But all the Britains ſtain'd “ themſelves with Woad, which made them of a blewiſh colour, and “ thereby of a more terrible aſpect in Battel: They wore long Hair, “ but ſhav'd all the reſt of their Bodies, beſides the upper Lip. Ten “ or twelve Men had Wives among them in common, chiefly Bre- “ thren with Brethren, and even Parents with their Children, but the “ Children that were got by them were looked upon as theirs, by whom “ thoſe Women were taken in Marriage.

As for their manner of Fighting, I ſhall leave that to be related when I come to Julius Cæſar's War in Britain.

Strabo in his Geography * tells us, “ That the Britains exceeded the “ Gauls in Stature, he having ſeen ſome of them at Rome who were half a “ Foot higher than the talleſt Men there, but that they were looſer made. He ſays farther, “ That they were like the Gauls in Diſpoſition, but more “ ſimple and barbarous; ſo that ſome of them knew not how to make “ any Cheeſe, though they abounded in Milk; and that divers of them “ were ignorant of dreſſing Gardens, as well as other Parts of Husban- “ dry: That they had many diſtinct Governments among them; their “ Woods ſerv'd them inſtead of Cities, for with Trees cut down, when “ they had incloſ'd a large Circle, they build themſelves Cottages, and “ Stables for their Cattle within it, though for no very long time.

* Lib. IV.

Diodorus Siculus deſcribes the Britains to be Aborigines, and living after the Manner of the Antients, and in Fight uſing Chariots like the Greek Heroes in the Trojan War; that they made their Houſes for the moſt part of Reeds or Wood; that they laid up their Corn in the Ear in Granaries, from whence they fetch'd as much as would ſerve for one Day's Uſe; that they were ſimple and uncorrupt in their Manners, Strangers to the Craft and Subtilty of that Age, and liv'd content with very mean Diet and Apparel, remote from Riches and Luxury that attends them; and that the Iſle abounded in a multitude of Men, who were ſubject to divers Kings and Princes.

Lib. Hiſt. Lib. IV.

* Pomponius Mela in his Treatiſe de Scitu Orbis relates, That Britain produced much People and divers Kings, but that they were all rude and unpoliſhed; and that the farther they were from the Continent, the more ignorant they were of Foreign Riches, abounding chiefly in Cattle. That they died their Bodies with Woad, uncertain, whether for Ornament, or ſome other Cauſe. That they ſought frequent Cauſes of War, and diſturbed each other, from Ambition of Empire, and deſire of enlarging their Dominions. That they fought not only on Horſeback and on Foot, but alſo arm'd like the Gauls in Chariots, whoſe Axeltrees were arm'd with Scythes.

Cornelius

* Cap. 2. Cornelius Tacitus in his * Life of Agricola tells us, " That the Britains " were very like the Gauls, whether the ſame Original, or the likeneſs of " Climate ~~were~~ the Cauſe of it; ſo likewiſe their Speech was not much " different. They had the ſame boldneſs in ſeeking out Dangers, and " the ſame fear in declining of them when they were at hand: Yet that " the Britains ſhew'd greater fierceneſs, as whom long Peace hath not " yet ſoftned; for we have heard (ſays he) that the Gauls were once famous for War, but Cowardice ſoon ſucceeded ſlothfulneſs, their Valour and Liberty being loſt together; which hath alſo happened to the " Britains already Conquer'd; but that the reſt of them remained ſuch " as the Gauls once were: their chief Strength was in their Foot, but " that ſome Nations of them us'd alſo Chariots in fight; the Charioteers " were more Noble, their Followers fighting for them. That in Times " paſt they obey'd Kings, but were then divided by their Princes into " Factions and Parties; neither is there any thing ſo advantagious for the " Romans against the ſtrongeſt Nations, ~~then~~ as that they do not conſult " in Common; for there are very ſeldom Aſſemblies for two or three " Cities to repel common Danger; ſo whilſt they fight ſeparately they " are all alike overcome. And in the next Chapter he goes on thus; " The Britains chearfully yielded to the Preſſing of their Men, paying " Tribute, and all the other Duties impos'd by the Emperor, provided " Injuries were not done them; theſe they will hardly endure, for they " ſubmit that they may obey, not that they may ſerve as Slaves.

Lib. LXIII. Dion Caſſius (epitomized by Xiphilin) ſpeaking of the more Northern Britains relates, that they Tilled no Ground, but liv'd on their Fruits and Hunting, for of Fiſh, though they had great Store, they never taſted. That they liv'd in their Cabines naked and barefooted. They had their Wives in Common, and all of them maintain'd the Children. The chief Authority, for the moſt part, reſided in the People. They were much addicted to Steal. They fought from Chariots, and had little nimble Horſes; their Footmen ran very faſt, and alſo ſtood very firmly to their Poſts. Their Arms were a Shield and a ſhort Spear, at whoſe lower end there was a Ball of Braſs, that when they ſhake it they may terrifie their Enemies with the noiſe. They wore long Daggers. They can bear Hunger, Cold, and all ſorts of Labour; being in the Woods they can live upon the Bark of Trees. They have ſtill ready a certain ſort of Food upon all Occaſions, of which if they take the quantity of a Bean, they will not be Hungry or Thirſty for a great while after.

Lib. XI. But Herodian is the firſt who deſcribes the Northern People, then the moſt barbarous ſort of Britains, and who, I ſuppoſe, were afterwards called Picti (that is, painted Men) to have had their Bodies mark'd with divers Figures; which, whether it was their Cuſtom in Cæſar's Time, may be doubtful, ſince he makes no mention of it. But this Author thus proceeds: The Britains know not the uſe of Garments, but gird their Bellies and Necks with Iron, thinking it an Ornament as well as a Sign of their Riches, in the ſame manner as other Nations prize Gold. They mark'd their very Bodies with divers Figures of all ſorts of Animals, wherefore they will not wear Cloths, leſt they ſhould hide the Painting of their Bodies. It is a warlike Nation, and moſt greedy of Slaughter, and uſe only a narrow Shield and a Lance, beſides a Sword hanging from their naked Bodies. They knew not the uſe of the Breaſt-plate or Helmet, thinking them a hinderance to them in their running over the Bogs, of which they had great Store.

Pliny relates (among their other Cuſtoms) that they wore Rings on their middle Fingers, and manured their Land with Marl; which can be only meant of the more civilized Britains, who undertook Husbandry; which improvement is uſed with us in ſome Countries to this day: but as for their Drink, Solinus tells us, they made it of Barly as we do now: and as Dioſcorides alſo notes, who calls it, (though corruptly) Curmy, for Curw, for ſo the modern Britains ſtill call Ale.

Lib. XXXIII. cap. 1. *Lib.*XVII. c. 8.

So that whoever will but conſider the Manners and Cuſtoms of the Ancient Britains, may find them not to be much different from thoſe of the naked Indians of ſome part of America; when they were firſt diſcovered: only they had the uſe of Braſs and Iron, which thoſe wanted until they were brought to them from other places: and alſo had Horſes and Chariots, the uſe of all which were unknown to the Americans: but in other things you will find them much alike, only the latter ſeem to have been a better temper'd and more Vertuous People; from whence the Reader may judge of the likelyhood of thoſe Stories in Geoffrey of Monmouth, when he makes ſuch deſcriptions of the ſtately Cities, Palaces, and Fleets of the Britiſh Kings; whilſt Cæſar, and Lucan, and Pliny deſcribe their Veſſels to have had their Ribs and Keels made of ſlight Timber, interwoven with Wicker like our Baskets, and covered with Hides, ſowed together; not having the Art of making Saws to cut out Boards or Planks.

Cap. 35.

Having given you an account of their Ancient Manners and Government; I will next ſay ſomewhat of their Religion. Cæſar tells us, that the Religion of the Britains and Gauls were much the ſame; that they had the ſame Gods, and the ſame Prieſts, viz. The Druids, who had a great Authority, not only in Religious, but Civil Matters; ſo that they could Excommunicate whom they thought fit; and a Perſon ſo interdicted could not be admitted to their Sacrifices, but was eſteem'd among the number of the Accurſed: ſo that all Perſons ſtudiouſly avoided him, not daring to come near him, for fear of being infected with ſo dangerous a Curſe.

Theſe Druids taught the People that the Soul was Immortal, and went out of one Body into another: But whether they had learned this from the Greeks, who traded amongſt them, or from the antient Phœnicians, is uncertain.

Cæſar Comment. Lib. IV

But as for their Gods, they were the ſame with the Gauls. Jupiter was Worſhipped under the Name of Taramis, or Taran, for Taran ſtill ſignifies in Welſh Thunder. Maximus Tyrius writes, That they Worſhip'd the higheſt Oak they could find, as the Figure or Repreſentation of this God.

Tutates the God of Travellers is ſuppos'd to be the ſame with Mercury, and by the Britains called Duw Taith, the God of Journeys. Mars was Worſhipped by the Gauls and Britains under the Name of Heſus; as alſo Camulus, as Mr. Camden proves, from a Coin of Cunobelin, of which he gives us the Draught, being a Man's Head with an Helmet on it, and with theſe Letters, CAMU. The next God of the Britains was Apollo, Worſhipped by them under the Name of Beleus or Belinus, as appears by a Paſſage of Julius Capitolinus in his Life of Maximin. He is alſo ſuppos'd to have bin called Belatucadrus; there being divers Altars and Inſcriptions dug up of late Years out of the Earth, all of them with this Title, DEO BELATUCADRO, which Name ſeems to be deriv'd from the Aſſyrian God Bel, or Belus.

As for Goddeſſes, they Worſhipped Diana under the Name of Camma. Another Goddeſs the Britains had, who is call'd by Dion Andraſte, or Andrate, and is ſuppos'd to have bin the Goddeſs of Victory; ſhe had a Temple at Camalodunum (now Maldon in Eſſex.) As for their Sacrifices, though they were moſt often Beaſts, at ſometimes they alſo Sacrific'd Men, as Cæſar expreſly tells us; and Tacitus relates, That it was uſual for the Britains to conſult the Gods by the Entrails of Men; Pliny alſo tells us, That the Miſletoe growing upon an Oak, being cut with many Ceremonies, was made uſe of in all their Sacrifices and other Religious Rites; and alſo ſays, that Britain in his time did ſo Superſtitiouſly cultivate Magick Arts, and that with ſo many Ceremonies; that they might have communicated it even to the Perſians themſelves.

Theſe are the chief Things, which antient Authors have left us, concerning the Britiſh Cuſtoms and Manners, relating either to their Religious, Civil, or private Life, which, if it ſeem tedious to you, may be paſſed by: So I now come to my main Deſign, and give you Cæſar's own Account of his firſt Invaſion of Britain, out of the Fourth and Fifth Books of his Commentaries.

Comment. Lib. IV. Julius Cæſar having now ſubdued moſt part of Gallia, and quieted the Germans, and ſtopped their Incurſions into his Province, reſolv'd on an Expedition into Britain: his Pretences were theſe, That the Britains had underhand ſent Supplies to the Cities of Armorica, who the Year before had revolted from his Obedience, and had joined with the reſt of Gaul in a general and dangerous Rebellion, and not only ſo, but that they had received into their Protection the Bellovaci his Enemies, who had fled to them for aid. Theſe Cæſar there aſſigns as the Cauſes to juſtifie this Invaſion.

But though theſe were the ſeeming Cauſes that moved Ceſar to this ſudden Expedition, yet certainly a Soul ſo great as his could not be tempted, by the mean hopes of getting the Britiſh Pearls, to ſo dangerous a War, as Suetonius in the Life of Cæſar ſuppoſes, though he mentions his comparing their weight and largeneſs by poiſing them in his Hand; yet I will not deny, but he might even propoſe the getting of theſe as a Bait to encourage his Souldiers in this Enterprize. By his paſt as well as future Actions we may gueſs, that beſides Glory his main Deſign in Invading Britain, was to inure his Souldiers to Hardſhip, and to accuſtom them to the moſt uncouth and barbarous Enemies; that they might not be afterwards terrified at the moſt dangerous Enterprizes, but wholly depend upon his Fortune and Conduct.

Cæſar therefore, although Summer was almoſt ſpent, and Winter coming on very early in the Northern Parts of Gaul, yet reſolved to paſs over into Britain, and if the time of the Year ſhould not ſuffer him to make War, yet he thought it might be to good purpoſe if he ſhould but Land upon the Iſland, and underſtand the Natures of the Inhabitants, and come to know the chief Places, Harbors and Acceſſes to it, all which, he ſays, were as yet unknown to the Gauls; for, beſides Merchants, no Body commonly went thither, and even to thoſe ſcarce any thing was known beſides the Sea-coaſt, and thoſe Countries which were oppoſite to Gallia: Therefore though the Merchants were called together from all Parts, yet could he not underſtand what Nations they were that inhabited it, nor what ſort of War they made, nor what cuſtoms they uſed, nor what Ports were fitting to receive a Fleet of great Ships: Though by the way this ſeems very ſtrange, if it were true, as they of Rhemes told Cæſar, that Divitiacus King of the Soiſſons had a little before held Britain alſo under his dominion; beſides the Belgian Colonies, which he affirms to have named and Peopled many Provinces there, as alſo what he tells us in the Sixth Book of his Commentaries, that thoſe who deſired to know the Druids Diſcipline went thither Yearly on purpoſe to learn it.

But be this as it will, he thought it neceſſary before he expoſed his own perſon, to ſend Ca. Voluſenus thither with one Galley to diſcover theſe things, commanding him to return as ſoon as this could be effected, whilſt he with all his Forces marched towards the Country of the Morini, now the Province of Picardy. Becauſe thence was the ſhorteſt cut into Britain; hither he draws together his Ships from all parts of the neighbouring Provinces, as alſo that Fleet which he had built laſt Summer for the Armorican War, in the mean time when his deſign was made known, being carried over by the Merchants into Britain, Ambaſſadours came to him from divers Princes and States of this Iſland, who promiſed to give Hoſtages, and to obey the Roman Empire: All which being heard, Cæſar as largely promiſing and exhorting them to continue ſtill in that mind ſent them back; and with them Comius of the Atribates (now called the Country of Arras,) whom upon the conqueſt thereof he had made King, and of whoſe Courage and Fidelity Cæſar was very well aſſured: him he enjoyns, that he ſhould go to as many of the States as he could, and perſwade them to come into the Roman Intereſt, and ſhould alſo inform them that he himſelf would ſpeedily come over thither. But Voluſenus having only ſurveyed the Country at a diſtance (which was all he could do, ſince he durſt not go out of his Ship, nor truſt himſelf with theſe Barbarians) on the Fifth day return'd to Cæſar, and related to him whatſoever he had there obſerved.

Cæſar having ſettled the Morini by taking Hoſtages of them, then gathered together about Eighty Ships of burthen, which he judged ſufficient for the tranſporting of two Legions; but all his Gallies he diſtributed to his Quæſtor and Lieutenants; there were alſo Eight Ships of burthen more, which lay Wind bound at a place Eight Miles diſtant, ſo that they could not reach the ſame Port; Theſe he appointed for the Horſe, the reſt of the Army he committed to Q. Titus Sabinus, and L. Aurunculus Cotta, with orders to march into the Country of the Menapii, and into thoſe Towns of the Morini, from whence Ambaſſadours had not yet come to him. But P. Sulpicius Rufus his Lieutenant he commands to keep the x Port with a ſufficient Garriſon. All things being thus diſpatched, and having now got a fair Wind, about the the Third Watch, he ſet Sail, commanding the Horſemen to march to the further Port, and thence to go on board and follow him, which orders proved too ſlowly executed. But he himſelf together with the firſt Ships about Four a Clock in the Afternoon reached Britain, where he found divers ſtrong Troops of the Enemies lodged on the Hills; the nature of which * place was ſuch, theſe Hills hanging ſo ſteep over the Sea, that a Dart might be caſt from the higher ground to the Shore; therefore judging this no fit place to Land his Men, he lay at Anchor till Nine of the the Clock, that the reſt of the Navy could come up to him: in the mean time calling a Council of his Lieutenants and Tribunes, he communicates thoſe things he had learn'd from Voluſenus, and alſo what he would have done; telling them that the Nature of all Military (and eſpecially Maritime) Affairs, having a ſudden and unconſtant motion, all things ſhould be executed by his orders, and that in due time. Theſe being diſmiſſed, and having got the Wind and Tide both with him, the ſignal being given, and the Anchors weighed, he ſailed again forward about Eight Miles from that place, to an open and plain Shore, where he came to an Anchor. But the Britains knowing the Roman's deſign, having ſent their Horſes and Charioteers before (which they were chiefly wont to uſe in Fight) followed with the reſt of their Forces, and hinder'd the Romans from landing: The difficulty of which was great in theſe reſpects, becauſe the Ships by reaſon of their great bulk were not able to ride, but in a deep Sea; whilſt the Souldiers having their hands taken up with their Arms, were yet in unknown places, not only to Leap down from the Ships and to withſtand the Billows, but alſo at the ſame time to Fight their Enemies; whilſt they either fighting on the Shore, or elſe marching but a little way into the Water, and having their hands free, fought in places where they were well acquainted, and boldly ſpurr'd on their Horſes already managed and uſed to it; but the Romans being terrified with theſe things, and altogether unskill'd in this ſort of fighting, did not ſhew the ſame briskneſs and courage, as they were wont to expreſs in Land Service; which when Cæſar perceived, he ordered the long Ships or Gallies (as both unuſual to theſe Barbarians, and more ready for uſe) to fall off a little from the Ships of burthen, and to be rowed towards the Shore, and being laid againſt the naked ſide of the Enemies, to drive them back with Slings, Darts, and other Engines; which ſtood the Romans in good ſtead, for the Britains being terrified with the ſtrange ſhape of their Gallies, the motion of their Oars, and thoſe unuſual kind of Engines, firſt ſtood ſtill, and then began a little to retreat: But the Romans ſtill delaying, becauſe of the depth of the Sea, the Enſign of the Tenth Legion firſt invoking the Gods, that this action might prove fortunate and ſucceſsfull, cried out, Leap down fellow Souldiers, unleſs you mean to betray this * Eagle to the Enemies, for I will certainly perform my duty to the Commonwealth, and to the General: When he had ſpoke thus with a loud Voice, he caſt himſelf into the Sea, and began to carry the Eagle towards the Enemy; Then the Roman Souldiers encouraging one another not to ſuffer ſo great a diſgrace as the loſs of their Enſign, all leap'd out of the Ship, whom when the others from the next Ships had beheld, they alſo followed them, and quickly reaching the Shore, preſſed upon the Enemy.

* Note the Roman Enſigns were then all Eagles, tho afterwards they took the Figures of other Animals.

The Fight was ſharp on both ſides, but the Romans were not able either to keep their Ranks, nor get any firm footing, nor yet to follow their Enſigns: So that every Man being forced to joyn himſelf to the firſt Enſigns he met with, they were hard put to it, whilſt the Enemies acquainted with all the ſhallows, when ever from the Shore they beheld any marching from the Ships, immediately ſpurring on their Horſes, they charged them at diſadvantage, many encompaſſing a few, whilſt others aſſaulting them on the * unarmed ſide, caſts Darts againſt the reſt; which when Cæſar perceived, he commanded the Long Boats of the Gallies, and ſmaller Veſſels to be mann'd with Souldiers, and ſent them to the aſſiſtance of thoſe whom he beheld moſt diſtreſſed. The Romans, as ſoon as they got on Shore, making head, all together charged the Enemy, and joyning and put them to flight, yet could not purſue them far for want of Horſe; this only was deficient to Cæſar's wonted Fortune.

The Britains being worſted in fight, as ſoon as they got together again, preſently diſpatched Meſſengers to Cæſar deſiring Peace; promiſing that they would give him Hoſtages, and do whatever he injoyned; together with theſe Ambaſſadours came Comius of Arras, whom (as I have before who ſhown) had been already ſent by Cæſar into Britain; him, as ſoon as he came out of the Ship, and had related the General's Meſſage, they laid hold on, and put into bonds; but the fight being over they ſent him back, and Petitioning for Peace, caſt the blame upon the common People; and deſired that becauſe of their Ignorance this fault might be pardoned: but Cæſar complained, That when they had of their own accord, by their Ambaſſadours ſent to him into the Continent deſiring Peace: Yet that they had without any Cauſe made War; But (he ſaid) he would pardon their Folly, and therefore again injoyned them to ſend Hoſtages, part of whom they gave him preſently, the reſidue they promiſed (being to be ſent for,from places more remote) to ſend him within a few days, whereupon their Princes came from all parts, and commended themſelves and their States to Cæſar.

Peace being thus concluded, within Four days after his arrival in Britain, the Eighteen Ships which are already mentioned to have taken in the Horſe; ſailed from the farther Port on the oppoſite Shore with a gentle Gale, but when they drew near the Iſland, and could be now diſcern'd from the Camp: So great a Tempeſt ſuddenly aroſe, that none of them could hold their courſe; but ſome were driven back to the ſame place from whence they ſet forth, whilſt others were carried to the further part of the Iſland lying toward the Weſt with very great hazard; for caſting out their Anchors they took in ſo much Water, that they were forced (thô in the Night) out to Sea again, and to Steer towards the Continent: It alſo happened the ſame Night that the Moon was at the full, which is wont to make the higheſt Tides in the Ocean; but was then unknown to the Roman Mariners: So that at the ſame time the Spring Tide had filled all thoſe Gallies with Water in which Cæſar had tranſported his Army; though he had now drawn them on Shore; whilſt the Tempeſt had ſhattered the Veſſels of burthen which lay at Anchor, neither was it in their Men's power any ways to help them; ſo that many Ships being Wrack'd, the reſt, their Cables, Anchors, and other Tackle being broken or ſpoiled, became unfit for Service; this cauſed a great Conſternation in the Army, for there were not any other Ships left, in which they could be again tranſported, and all things neceſſary were wanting to refit them, nor was there any Corn provided for them to Winter in theſe parts; all which being known to the Britains, their Princes, though after the Fight they had agreed to perform thoſe things which Cæſar had injoyned; yet when they underſtood that the Romans wanted Horſes, Ships, and Proviſions, and had alſo judged of the paucity of their Souldiers from the ſmall circuit of the Roman Camp, which ſeemed the leſs, becauſe Cæſar had tranſported his Legions without any Baggage; they thought it the beſt courſe again to take Arms, and thereby to hinder the Romans from fetching in Corn or other Proviſions, and ſo to protract the War till Winter came on, for they thought if theſe were once vanquiſh'd and cut off from ever returning into Gaul, none of them hereafter would again preſume to tranſport an Army into Britain; Therefore the Plot being thus laid, they began by little and little to ſteal out of the Camp, and privately to draw their Men out of the Fields.

But Cæſar although he did not then know their deſign, yet from the late diſaſter of his Ships, as alſo from their neglecting to ſend in their Hoſtages, ſuſpected what would happen, therefore provided for the worſt, for he every day brought in Corn out of the Fields into the Camp, and as for thoſe Ships that were moſt ſhatter'd, he made uſe of their materials to refit the reſt, and what things were farther neceſſary he ordered to be brought from the Continent, all which being executed by his Souldiers with the utmoſt labour and diligence, only twelve Ships being loſt, he fitted out the reſt ready to go to Sea: Whilſt theſe things were in action, the ſeventh Legion being by courſe ſent out to Forrage, and that there was at that time no appearance of War, whilſt great part of their Men remain'd in the Fields, and others of them went, and came between that and the Camp, thoſe Souldiers who kept guard at its Entries, gave notice, that there appear'd a greater duſt than was uſual in that part of the Country toward which that Legion had marched; whereupon Cæſar ſuſpecting that the Britains were undertaking ſome new deſign, commanded thoſe Cohorts which were then upon the Guard, to march with him towards that Quarter, ordering two more to take their places, and the reſt to Arm, and immediately to follow him; when he had marched ſome diſtance from the Camp, he perceived his Souldiers to be overcharged by the Enemy, and hardly able to ſuſtain their aſſault, and that the Legion being drawn up cloſe together, Darts were caſt at them from all quarters; for the Corn being cut and carried away in all other parts, one piece was left, and the Enemies gueſſing that the Romans would come thither for it, had laid an ambuſh in the Woods, and ſuddainly aſſaulting them, being then without their Arms, and buſie in reaping, killing ſome, thereby routed the reſt, being then out of their Ranks, hemming them in both with their Horſe and Chariots*: For in their Battles they make uſe for the moſt part of Chariots, with which they firſt of all ſcowre through all parts, caſting Darts as they go, and ſo by the terror of their Horſes, and ratling of their Chariot-wheels, they often break the Roman Ranks, and when they have got in among the Troops of Horſe they leap down from their Chariots, and Fight on Foot, in the mean time the Charioteers retire a little from the Battle, and ſo place themſelves, that if they ſhould be preſſed by any number of their Enemies, their Maſters may find an eaſie retreat; by which way of fighting they had both the ſpeed of Horſe-men, and the ſteadineſs of Foot Souldiers; and had ſo enured themſelves by daily uſe and Exerciſe, as that they were able to ſtop their Horſes in full ſpeed, though running down ſteep places; as likewiſe they had been uſed to turn their Chariots in a narrow compaſs, to run along the * Pole, to ſit upon the † Yoke, that joyn or couple the Horſes together, and from thence quickly to return into their Chariots. The Romans being much aſtoniſhed with this new way of Fighting; Cæſar in a lucky moment came to their reſcue: At whoſe approach the Enemies ſtopped, and the Romans began to recover themſelves, which tho' done, yet Cæſar thinking it no fit time further to provoke the Enemy, nor then to renew the Fight, kept his ground and preſently led back the Legions to the Camp; whilſt theſe things were doing, the Britains who where in the Fields alſo retired.

During many days following there happned continual bad weather, which both kept the Romans in the Camp, and hindered the Enemies from attempting any thing againſt them.

But in the mean time the Britains ſent Meſſengers into all parts, publiſhing abroad the ſmall number of the Roman Forces; and how great a booty they were like to get, that this was the time of freeing themſelves for ever, if they could but take the Roman Camp: Upon which great numbers of Horſe and Foot being now drawn together came to the Camp: Cæſar although he foreſaw the Event by that which had happen'd before, and that the Enemies if once ſtoutly repulſed, would avoid the danger by flight; having got about Thirty Horſe, whom Comius of Arras had brought over with him at his coming into Britain, drew out the Legions in Battle before his Camp, which when joyned, the Enemy being not able to bear the aſſault of the Roman Souldiers, turned their backs; whom Cæſar follow~~ed~~ ing as long as his Men's ſpeed and ſtrength would permit; After a great ſlaughter, and burning of the Villages round about, ~~but~~ & they ~~they~~ return'd to their Camp. The ſame day Meſſengers came from the Britains to treat of Peace, from whom Cæſar demanded double the number of Hoſtages, which he had before enjoyned, commanding them to be brought over to him to the Continent; becauſe the Equinox approaching, he did not think a Winter Voyage was to be undertaken with ſuch weak, crazy Veſſels; therefore having now got a convenient Seaſon, a little after midnight he hoiſted Sail, ſo that all the Ships got ſafe to the Continent.

It is not pertinent to our Hiſtory to relate here how Cæſar's Men as ſoon almoſt as they came on Shore, were ſet upon by the Morini, whom he had before left in peace, and whom notwithſtanding he routed, and killed a great number of them till they were quite ſubdued.

But it ſeems the Britains had no great Opinion of Cæſar's Power, for only Two States of all Britain ſent him Hoſtages, the reſt neglecting it. Theſe things being thus performed upon the reading of Cæſar's Letters, Twenty days ſupplication to the Gods was decreed by the Senate.

Thus far we have given you Cæſar's own account of his firſt Expedition into Britain, of which he had no great cauſe to boaſt; ſince, had it not been for his own good conduct, aſſiſted by the timorouſneſs of the Britains, he had never return'd to make this relation ^ but this much is to be acknowledged, that his landing here is a noble monument of his skill in Military affairs, for Cicero writing to his friend Atticus, tells him in one of his Epiſtles, that the acceſſes to the Iſland were wonderouſly fortify'd with ſtrong works, or banks.

But Valerius Maximus, as alſo Plutarch in his Life of Cæſar, have given us a noble Example of the Roman Courage, as well as diſcipline, who both relate that in the confuſed fight which happen'd at Cæſar's firſt landing, Sceva a Roman Souldier having preſſed too far among the Enemies, and being beſet round, after incredible valour ſhewn, ſingle, againſt a Multitude, ſwam back ſafe to his General, and in the very place that rung aloud with his praiſes earneſtly deſired pardon, for his raſh adventure againſt Military diſcipline; which modeſt confeſſing his fault after no bad event for ſuch an action, wherein Valour and Ingenuity outweighed the transgreſſion of Diſcipline, eaſily gain'd him pardon and preferr'd him to be a Centurion: this was that Sceva who afterwards gave good occaſion to have his name remembred at the Battle of Dyrachium, between Cæſar and Pompey, whoſe ſide he had then took.

This is all we can find concerning Cæſar's firſt Expedition into Britain either from himſelf or others;* ~~more~~ than that Oroſius in his Hiſtory from ſome accounts that are now loſt, tells us, that moſt of Cæſar's great Ships which were to bring over his Horſe, were caſt away in that violent Storm, he had already told us of, which might be one reason he w

The Winter following Cæſar returned into Italy as his Cuſtome was, then p for ſome Years before; but upon his return thence finding that moſt of take in the Britains had neglected to ſend him their Hoſtages according to their former agreement, he reſolved to make a freſh deſcent upon them, and in order to this (in the Fifth Book of his Commentaries) he tells us that upon his going into Italy he had commanded his Lieutenants, whom he had ſet over the Legions, that they ſhould take care to build as many new Ships as poſſibly they could that Winter, and to repair the old ones, ſhewing them the model of thoſe that he would have built: And, for the more ready taking in of Men and Horſes, to be of ſomewhat a lower make, than thoſe that are uſed ~~of~~ in the Mediterranean Sea; and for the more ſpeedy lading and unlading them, to be alſo ſomewhat broader and flatter bottomed than ordinary, as well for the tranſporting of the Horſes as baggage, but to be all made to be rowed with Oars, to which purpoſe their low building contributed much, but all things neceſſary for the rigging out of theſe Ships he ordered to be brought out of Spain.

Cæſar upon his return from Italy, having ſettled all things in the hither Gallia, made a ſhort Expedition into Illyricum, and having ſettled affairs there, return'd into Gaul; where he found built by the extraordinary induſtry of his Souldiers, about Six hundred Veſſels of that kind already deſcribed, (notwithſtanding the great ſcarcity of all neceſſary materials) together with Twenty Eight Gallies, all which did not want much of being ready to be launched within a few days; ſo having much commended his Souldiers, and Overſeers of the Work, he then commanded them all to meet at the Port called Ictius, from which (he had already known) was the moſt convenient paſſage into Britain, being about Thirty Miles from the Continent.

Concerning which Port, give me leave to ſay ſomewhat by the bye, ſince there are ſo many ſeveral Opinions whether it be ſtill in being, or elſe is deſtroyed by the Sands; and indeed there is ſuch a great difference about this Port, that there is ſcarce a Haven, or Creek upon all the Coaſt of Flanders and France, from Bruges to Buloign, but ſome Writer or other would make to be this Portus Ictius now mentioned by Cæſar; but ſince there can be but Three places on this Coaſt, viz. Calice, Whitſand, and Buloign, that can with any probability pretend to have been this Portus Ictius, I ſhall neglect to ſpeak of any of the reſt, except theſe Three.

As for the firſt of theſe, though it be the neareſt cut between France and England; yet it is not likely to have been that Ancient Haven: For though it be the ſhorteſt, yet it was not the moſt convenient paſſage in Cæſar's time; both which are to be taken notice of, ſince he himſelf in his former Book calls it the ſhorteſt; but in this, the moſt convenient paſſage, and therefore cannot anſwer the diſtance from Calice to Dover, which is but Twenty Miles; whereas Cæſar deſcribes this Port to be about Thirty Miles diſtant from Britain, nor was this place ſo much as known in Cæſar's time, being never uſed as a Port, till of latter Ages that Whitſand was quite ſtopped up by the Sands driven into it. Nor was Calice ever commonly uſed for a Port till Philip Earl of Buloign built and walled this Town, before which time there is little mention made of it: But as for Whitſand, though it had much fairer pretences than Calice, as having been the ancient Port from whence Men uſually paſſed from France into England, for above Five hundred Years before; till it was at laſt about the Fourteenth Century become utterly unſerviceable for the Reaſon already given: Yet that this could not be the Portus Ictius, is proved by the learned Cluverius, in his Geography, nor was it any ancient Port, being ſeldom or never made uſe of as ſuch in the Roman's time; none of the Military ways leading at all to it.

And therefore only Boloign can with any probability pretend to be this Portus Ictius, as being the antient Geſſoriacum, from whence the Romans moſt commonly paſſed into Britain, and beſt agrees with the diſtance that Cæſar here ſets down, being alſo proved by the above-cited Cluverius; and by our Learned Antiquary Mr. Somner, to have been the true Portus Ictius, by many unanſwerable Arguments and Authorities. And as for the only Objection made againſt it, that it is not likely that one Place ſhould have ſo many ſeveral Names: It ſignifies not much, ſince the ſame Place might be called by ſeveral Names in different Ages. That which was Portus Ictius in Cæſar's Time, being afterwards, (when a Town came to be Built there,) called Geſſoriacum, which in after-times was named Bononia, and now Buloigne. But whoſoever deſires to know more concerning this Matter, may conſult the ſaid Cluverius's Antient Germany, as alſo his Geography; but eſpecially that * Treatiſe of Mr. Somners, wherein he proves againſt Monſieur Chiflet, that neither St Omers, nor Mardick, could be the Portus Ictus mention'd by Cæſar: Which Treatiſe, together with another of the Learned Monſieur Du Freſne's upon the ſame Subject, hath bin lately Publiſh'd in Latin by my worthy Friend Mr. Edmund Gibſon, of Queen's Colledge, Oxon. together with an Ingenious Diſſertation of his own upon the ſame queſtion. But to return to the Matter in Hand, from which we have too much digreſſed.

* De Portu Ictio.

Anno ante Chriſt. LII.

Cæſar in the Fifth Book of his Commentaries tells us, That having found a fit time, he had Commanded his Souldiers again to Embarque for Britain, when there happen'd a Mutiny rais'd by Dumnorix with his Æduan Horſe, who would have left the Expedition and gone home; but he being kill'd by ſome of Cæſar's Souldiers, whom he had order'd to do that Execution, all thoſe Horſemen return'd again to him. Things being thus ſettled, Labienus was left behind on the Continent with Three Legions and Two Thouſand Horſe to defend that Port, and to provide Corn, as alſo to obſerve the Motion of the Gauls.

Then Cæſar with Five Legions, and an equal Number of Horſe, to what he had left behind, about Sun-ſet weigh'd Anchor, and ſailed on with a gentle Southern Gale; but about Mid-night the Wind failing, he could not hold on his Courſe; but Day coming on, found he had bin carried away by the Tide, and that he had left Britain too much on his Left Hand: But then again taking Advantage of the Change of the Tide, he endeavour'd, by the help of Oars, to reach that part of the Iſland, where he had found before to be the beſt Landing the laſt Year; wherein the Souldiers deſerved a great Commendation, who made the heavy Tranſport Ships, by the conſtant Labour of Rowing, keep almoſt equal ſpeed with the Gallies. About Noon they arriv'd at Britain with all their Ships, but there was not any Enemies to be ſeen in that Place; for, as Cæſar learn'd afterwards from the Priſoners, the Britains had been there with great Forces, but were terrified with the vaſt Multitude of the Ships, which, with Veſſels of Proviſion and others upon private Accounts, amounted to above Eight Hundred; ſo that the Britains had quickly left the Shore, and retired into Places more remote. Cæſar having Landed his Army, and choſen a fit Place for his Camp, as ſoon as he learn'd from the Priſoners in what Place the Enemy's Forces were Encamped, about the Third Watch of the Night marched toward them, being not concern'd for his Ships, becauſe he left them at Anchor in a ſafe and bold Shore, with Ten Cohorts, and Three Hundred Horſe to guard them, under the Command of Q. Atrius. But Marching that Night about Twelve Miles (towards Chilham in Kent, as is ſuppos'd) he at laſt ſaw the Enemies Forces, who with their Horſe marching down to the River Stoure, lying between them, began [from the higher Ground] to aſſail the Romans, and to give them Battel; but being repulſed by the Horſe, they convey'd themſelves into the Woods, where having a Place ſtrongly Fortified, as well by Art as Nature, and which it ſeems they had before provided during their own Domeſtick Wars; for all the Avenues to it were cloſ'd up with Trees laid overthwart the Paſſages. The Britains fought ſtraggling out of the Woods, and hinder'd the Romans from entring within the Fortification: But the Souldiers of the Seventh Legion making a * Teſtudo, did by a Mount raiſ'd againſt their Fortification ſoon take it, and drove them out of the Woods, having themſelves receiv'd very little Loſs; but ſince they fled, Cæſar forbad to purſue them too far, becauſe he was ignorant of the Place; and a great part of the Day being ſpent, he would employ the reſt of it for the Fortifying of his Camp.

(* i. e. A kind of an Arch made with their Shields clap'd cloſe to each other, like the back of a Tortoiſe, from whence it had its Name.

The next Day, early in the Morning, he ſent his Foot Souldiers and Horſemen, being divided into Three Bodies, upon another Expedition, that they might now purſue thoſe that fled: But before they had march'd any great diſtance of Ground, the Enemy being in ſight, ſome Horſemen came from Q. Atrius to Cæſar, telling him, that a great Tempeſt having riſen the Night before, almoſt all the Ships were ſhatter'd and caſt on Shore, neither the Anchors nor Cables being able to hold them, nor could the Maſters of the Veſſels nor Mariners withſtand the Force of the Tempeſt; ſo that by the Ships falling foul upon each other, great Damage was receiv'd; which when Cæſar knew, he return'd to his Ships, and he himſelf beheld what he had heard from the Meſſengers; ſo that about Forty Ships being loſt, the reſt might be refitted, though not without much Labour. Therefore he choſe ſome Carpenters out of the Legions, and Commanded others to be ſent for from the Continent, and he writ to Labienus, that he ſhould by the help of thoſe Legions he had with him, ſpeedily get ready as many Ships as he was able, whilſt he himſelf (although it was a buſineſs of great Toyl) thought it was moſt convenient to have all his Ships haled on Shore, and to encloſe them within the ſame Fortification with his Camp; in which Work he ſpent about Ten Days without any Intermiſſion of Labour Day or Night. The Ships being thus drawn up, and the Camp ſtrongly Fortified, he left the ſame Forces to guard them as before, whilſt he himſelf marched forward to the ſame Place from whence he had laſt return'd: When he came thither, he found much greater Forces of the Britains, there aſſembled from all Parts. The Chief Command for managing this War being by their common Conſent committed to Caſſibelan, whoſe Territories the River Thames divided from the Maritime States, being about Eighty Miles diſtant from the Sea. There had been in former Times perpetual Wars between him and the Neighbouring Cities. But the Britains being now terrified by this ſecond Invaſion, had given him the Supreme Command over them all. Anno ante Chriſt. LII.

Now from hence you may ſee the Falſhood of Geoffrey of Monmouth, who makes this Iſland to have bin a Monarchy before Cæſar's coming, and Caſſibelan to have bin the Sole King; whereas we find him only to have been a ſmall Inland Prince, and the reſt of the Iſland divided into many Petty States or Principalities. The reſt of what Cæſar here tells us concerning the Manners of the Britains, as alſo the Situation of this Iſland, theſe being either already related, or elſe needleſs, as ſufficiently known, I ſhall paſs over, and return to Cæſar's Actions, as he relates them in the ſame Book.

In this March the Britiſh Cavalry and Charioteers fought ſharply with the Roman Horſemen, yet neverthele ſs theſe were Superior in all Places, and drove them to the Hills and Woods, many being ſlain; but the Romans purſuing them too eagerly, loſt ſome of their own Men. Some time after this the Enemy on a ſuddain ſallied out from the Woods, the Romans not being aware of them, (being buſie in Fortifying their Camp) and charged briſkly upon thoſe who were upon the Guard before the Camp. But two Cohorts (the chief of two Legions) being ſent by Cæſar to their aſſiſtance, whilſt they made a halt, as being ſurpriz'd with their new way of Fighting; the Enemy boldly charg'd back again through the midſt of them, without the loſs of a Man: So that Day Quintus Laberius Durus, a Tribune, was kill'd; but the Enemy, upon the ſending out of freſh Cohorts, were repell'd, and forc'd to ſave themſelves by flight.

This Skirmiſh thus fought before the Camp, and in the Eyes of all Men, made it evident, that the Legionary Soldiers, being neither able, for the weight of their Arms, to purſue thoſe that retreated, nor yet daring to go far from their Enſigns, were no equal Match for ſuch a kind of Enemy; and that the Horſe fought with much greater Danger, becauſe the Britains oftentimes retired on purpoſe, and when they had drawn the Romans a little from the Legions, leap'd from their Chariots and fought on Foot, to the great Diſadvantage of the Romans. But the manner of their Cavalries fighting brought the ſame or equal Danger to thoſe that retir'd, as to thoſe that purſu'd: To which you may add, that they never fought in cloſe Order, but ſcatter'd, and at ſome diſtance, and had their Men ſo Poſted, that they could eaſily Succour each other, freſh Men ſtill relieving thoſe that were wounded or weary.

The next Day the Enemies made a ſtand upon the Hills at a diſtance from the Camp, and began to ſhow themſelves leſs frequently, being not ſo forward to Skirmiſh with their Horſe as they were the Day before; but about Noon, when Cæſar had ſent out the Three Legions with C. Trebonius, bonius to Forage, they ſuddenly on all ſides ſet upon the Foragers, and charg'd up after them to the very Legions and Enſigns, whilſt the Romans charging them with great Courage, repell'd them. Nor made they an end of chaſing them, until the Horſe, who were ſupported by the Legions behind them (and not giving them time either to ſtand ſtill to rally, or to get down from their Chariots as they were wont) had ſlain a great many of them. After this Rout the Britiſh Auxiliaries which had come from all Parts return'd home; and from that time the Britains never fought the Romans again with their whole Forces: But Cæſar gueſſing their Deſigns, drew his Army toward the River Thameſis into the Confines of Caſſibelan's Territories, which River was only fordable (and that very hardly) in one place: At his arrival he found great Forces of the Enemy's there Encamp'd, and the Bank Fortify'd with ſharp Stakes, and many of the ſame ſort were alſo fix'd under Water, which being made known by the Priſoners and Fugitives, the Horſe being ſent before, he order'd the Legions immediately to follow; but the Soldiers march'd with that Courage, that, though their Heads only appear'd above Water, yet the Enemy, not enduring the Force of the Horſe and Legions, quitting the Banks committed themſelves to flight. This Ford is ſuppos'd by Mr. Cambden in his Britannia, to have been at Coway-Stakes near Lalam in Middleſex, where the remainder of thoſe Piles plac'd by the Britains were of late Times ſtill to be ſeen, being bound about with Lead, and of the thickneſs of a Man's Thigh; and ſome of them have been of late Years pull'd up, as hindring the Paſſage of the Barges.

Caſſibelan having now loſt all hopes of doing any good by downright Fighting, having diſmiſs'd the greater part of his Forces, retain'd only about Four Thouſand Charioteers, who obſerv'd the Roman Marches; and going a little out of the way, hid themſelves in woody and intricate Places, driving away the Men and Cattle into the Woods: But in thoſe Parts of the Country where he knew the Romans were to march, whilſt the Horſe were diſperſed abroad into the Fields, either for Forage or Booty, he ſent out his Charioteers from the Woods, by all the known ways, and there fought the Roman Horſe-Men, putting them in great hazard; whereupon Cæſar ſtrictly commanded them not to march too far from the Legions, and that they ſhould only burn and deſtroy the Country as far as the Legionary Soldiers alone could ſafely perform it in their Marches. In the mean time the Trinobantes, being one of the ſtrongeſt States of all thoſe Parts, ſent Ambaſſadors to Cæſar, promiſing to ſubmit themſelves to him, and perform his Commands, deſiring that he would defend Mandubratius from the Injuries of Caſſibelan, and would ſend him to them, that he might receive the Supreme Authority of their State. This Mandubratius being a young Prince, had fled to Cæſar in Gallia; for his Father Immanuentius had been King of that Country, but having been ſlain by Caſſibelan, his Son avoided the like Fate by flight. Whereupon Cæſar ſent him to them, enjoyning them to give him Forty Hoſtages, and Corn for his Army; they ſpeedily perform'd his Commands, and ſent him that number of Hoſtages, as alſo the Corn. The Trinobantes being defended from the Violence of the Soldiers, the * Segontiaci, Anacalites, Bibroci, and Caſſi, having alſo ſent Embaſſies, ſubmitted themſelves to Cæſar: By theſe he underſtood that the Town of Caſſibelam (ſuppos'd to be Verulamium) was not far off, being ſtrongly Fortified with Woods and Bogs, in which a great number of Men and Cattle was got together.

* I ſhall not undertake to Engliſh theſe Names, becauſe they are very uncertain.

Anno ante Chriſt. LII.

You may here alſo obſerve Cæſar's Deſcription of a Britiſh Town: The Britains, ſays he, when they have taken in ſome woody Place, and encloſed it with a Ditch, or Rampire, call it a Town, to which, to avoid the Incurſions of their Enemies, they are wont to retreat, But thither Cæſar marched with his Legions, and found the Place ſtrongly Fortified both by Art and Nature; yet when he began to Storm it on both ſides, the Enemies not enduring the Aſſault of the Roman Legions, threw themſelves out from another Part of the Town, and ſo made their Eſcape, whilſt many were kill'd as they fled: Here Cæſar found great Multitudes of Cattle.

Whilſt theſe things were doing, Caſſibelan ſent Meſſengers into Kent, in which Parts were four petty Princes, (whom Cæſar, for his own Glory, calls Kings,) viz. Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus and Segonax; theſe he orders, that with all the Forces they could make, they ſhould aſſault upon the ſudden, and take the Romans Naval Camp. Theſe Princes, with their Forces, marching to the place, the Romans ſallying out upon the Britains, killed many of them, and taking Cingeterox, a noted Leader, Priſoner, returned again to their Camp without any Loſs. Caſſibelan hearing of the Succeſs of this Fight, having had his Borders thus waſted, and received ſo conſiderable Loſſes, but being chiefly terrified with the Defection of ſo many States, ſent Ambaſſadors to Cæſar, by the Mediation of Comius of Arras, to treat about a Submiſſion: Cæſar being reſolved to paſs the Winter in the Continent, becauſe of the ſudden Commotions in Gaul, and that there was not much of the Summer left, and which might be eaſily ſpun out, demanded Hoſtages, and ſet how much yearly Tribute the Britains ſhould pay to the People of Rome; and having farther forbad Caſſibelan, either to moleſt Mandubratius, or the Trinobantes, Hoſtages being taken, Cæſar marched back his Army to the Sea-ſide, where he found all his Ships re-fitted; but becauſe he had a great number of Priſoners, as that alſo ſome of his Ships were loſt by the Tempeſt, he reſolved to tranſport his Army at two ſeveral Returns; yet it happen'd, that out of ſo great a number of Ships, in ſo many Voyages to and fro, neither in this, nor the former Year, any Ship that carried the Soldiers was wanting; whereas, of thoſe which were ſent him empty from the Continent, and which afterwards Labienus had taken care to have new-built, (being to the number of Sixty) very few reached the Port; almoſt all of them being loſt, or driven back; Theſe when Cæſar for ſome time had in vain expected, leſt he ſhould be debarr'd from going over by the Seaſon of the Year, becauſe the Æquinox now approached, he was forced to crowd his Soldiers the cloſer together; and having found a calm Seaſon, about the Second Watch of the Night he ſet Sail; and by Break of Day reached the Continent.

M.

This is the Account which Cæſar himſelf gives us of both theſe Expeditions: Howbeit, other Ancient Writers have ſpoken more doubtfully of Cæſar's Victories here, and that in plain Terms he fled from hence; for which that noted Verſe in Lucan, with divers Paſſages here and there in Tacitus, are alledged. Paulus Oroſius, who took what he wrote from an Hiſtory of Suetonius, now loſt, writes, That Cæſar in his firſt Journey being entertained with a ſharp Fight, loſt no ſmall number of his Foot; and by Tempeſt, nigh all his Horſe: But be it as it will, Pliny tells us, That at his Return to Rome, as from a glorious Enterprize, he offered to Venus, the Patroneſs of his Family, a Breaſt-plate embroider'd with Britiſh Pearls.

I ſhall

Anno ante Chriſt. XL.

I ſhall not much trouble you with the Relation of Caſſibelan's Actions after Cæſar's Departure, ſince we have no other Account of them, but from Geoffrey of Monmouth: But, according to his Relation, Mandubratius (whom he calls Androgeus) was not reſtored to the Kingdom of the Trinobantes; whether through the ill Will of Caſſibelan, or the general Hatred the People had to him, is uncertain: So that leaving Britain, he again betook himſelf unto Cæſar, and attended him to Rome, where he was entertain'd as a King of Britain, and a Friend to the Roman Commonwealth. Caſſibelan, after the Departure of the Romans, is ſaid to have reigned Ten Years; which Time he employed in revenging himſelf upon the Cities and States that had revolted from him during the Wars with Cæſar.

After whom, until the Time of the Emperor Claudius, the Britains were free from the Roman Yoke, living under their own Kings, and being govern'd by their own Laws: So that for a while we muſt take our Farewell of the Roman Hiſtory, collecting it only as we find it ſcatter'd here and there, and follow the Succeſſion of the Britiſh Kings, according to Geoffrey.

Then Theomantius, or Tenantius, Nephew of Caſſibelan, is ſaid by him to have ſucceeded his Uncle, having before enjoyed the Principality of Cornwall; far remote from the Troubles of theſe Times, and by that means not engaged in the Quarrel, was not obliged, either to take into the Roman Intereſt; or by aiding Caſſibelan, to juſtifie his Violences; by which indifferent Carriage, by the general Applauſe of the People he is ſaid to come to the Crown.

Anno ante Chriſt. XL.

In this King's Reign it is ſuppoſed, that Octavius (the Grand-child of Julia, Cæſar's Siſter) obtain'd the Empire of Rome: But before he had fully poſſeſſed himſelf of it, Geoffrey relates, That Tenantius ſent his Son Kynobelin to attend him in his Wars; hoping thereby to ingratiate himſelf with Auguſtus, and obtain a Relaxation of the impoſed Tribute: And that Kynobelin ſo well behaved himſelf, that he grew into ſpecial Favour with the Emperor, and accompanied him to Rome, where he was ſaluted by the Name of FRIEND of the Commonwealth; and that during his Reſidence there, Tenantius paid no Tribute at all; which (as the Britiſh Hiſtorian relates) was in reſpect of his Son's great Favour with Auguſtus. But the Roman Authors ſeem rather to make the Troubles of the Empire, and the Bandyings of the Factions againſt each other, after the Death of Julius Cæſar, the Cauſes of the Quiet of the Britains during thoſe Civil Diſſentions.

But Auguſtus Cæſar, who ſucceeded his Uncle Julius in the Empire, either contemning this Iſland, as a place of no Importance, and whoſe Enmity or Friendſhip conduced nothing to the good or ill Fortune of the Empire; or as Tacitus, in his Life of Agricola, relates, becauſe of the Civil Wars that had lately happen'd, cauſed a long Quiet to Britain: * Yet we find Auguſtus once advanced as far as Gallia, in order to the Reducing of Britain under his Obedience; and had not a Revolt in † Pannonia diverted him, he had certainly attempted it. Yet about Seven Years after, with the ſame Reſolution, he once more drew down into Gallia; but the Britains hearing thereof, ſent their Ambaſſadors thither to him, to beg Peace; which for the preſent he accepted of, becauſe it required ſome Time to ſettle his Affairs in Gaul, which were then much out of order: The Year following, he again reſum'd his Reſolutions of making an Expedition into Britain, becauſe they had not perform'd their Articles with him; but he was again hinder'd by freſh Inſurrections in Spain. The Cantabrians and Aſturians being revolted, Tenantius having reigned in Britain Thirty two Years; then dying, was ſucceeded by

* Kymbelein, or Kynobelin, who, if he was not educated at Rome, yet the good Correſpondence between the Romans and Britains about theſe Times, gave fair Occaſion to the Britiſh Writers to feign it: For now, it ſeems, the Britains began to learn the Roman Arts, to flatter for Advantage, and by Gifts to appeaſe a powerful Prince, and buy off a War. So they ſent their Tribute to † Auguſtus, with Offerings and Sacrifices to the Roman Gods, to be offered in the Capitol; where, in the Temple of Mars, they ſwore Fidelity to the Senate and and People of Rome. Which Obſequious Addreſſes, as I ſuppoſe gave Occaſion to || Horace to write thus:

Nay, ſo conformable to the Roman Cuſtoms was this Kynobelin himſelf, that he cauſed Coins to be ſtamped after the manner of the Romans, ſome of which are ſtill to be ſeen; whereas before, all Payments among the Britains were made with Rings of Iron, and Plates of Braſs, of a certain Weight: And his Image was made after the manner of the Emperors; and on the Reverſe is CAM: ſignifying Camolodunum, (now Maldon) his Royal Seat: And it is to be ſuſpected that Tribute was paid with it; for in a Coin of his, TASCIO is found in Great Letters, with a Man on the Reverſe, ſitting Hammering of Metal: Which Word implieth Tribute, as you may find in that Collection of Coins before Mr. Camden's Britannia.

The Emperor Tiberius, who ſucceeded Auguſtus, being given up to Eaſe and Luxury, thought it beſt to obſerve * Auguſtus's Advice, of contracting, rather than enlarging the Bounds of the Empire: So that as he had no Deſire to trouble the Britains, they had alſo as little to provoke him; though 'tis certain that they ſtill paid their uſual Cuſtoms and Tolls for thoſe Commodities they tranſported to the Romans, into Gaul; and exchanged with them Things wrought in Ivory, for Chains and Trinkets of Amber, which they wore for Pendants and Bracelets. The Roman Cuſtomers collected them at firſt after a precarious manner; and (as Strabo writes) not daring to compel them. Beſides, their Courteſie to Germanicus's Soldiers, who had been Ship-wrack'd on the Britiſh Shore, and had been by them ſent back to their General, produced a like kind Return from the Romans.

Whereupon, as if the whole Iſle had been yielded up to him, he ſent magnificent Letters to Rome, giving a ſtrict Charge to the Couriers, that they ſhould drive their Chariots into the Forum, to the very Curia; and ſhould not deliver their Letters, but in the Temple of Mars, and and in a full Aſſembly of the Senate. But Caligula, after this, marched his Army to the Belgick-Shore, making as if he would paſs over into Britain; but being (as is ſuppos'd) aſſur'd that the Britains were ready to oppoſe his Landing, if he ſhould attempt it, * thereupon he thought it ſafer to let them alone: Yet however, he put out to Sea in a Galley; and after he had row'd a little diſtance from the Shore, return'd again to Land; and then mounting on an high Tribunal, ordering the Trumpets to ſound a Charge, gave his Soldiers the Signal of Battel; then all on the ſudden commanded them to gather their † Helmets and Laps full of Cockles, Muſcles, and other Shells: Having gotten theſe Spoils (as he call'd them) of the Ocean, (as wanting others to adorn his Trophies,) he grew as proud as if he had conquer'd the Ocean it ſelf; and rewarded his Soldiers for this great Victory, with a Donative of an Hundred Denarii a Man, bidding them all depart Rich and Happy. After which, he erected an high Tower on the Belgick Shore, out of which, as from a Pharus, Lights might direct Mariners to ſteer their Courſe by Night; the Ruins of which Pharus are ſuppoſed, even to this Day, to be ſeen at very low Tides, on the Coaſt of Holland; being call'd by the Inhabitants, to this Day, Britten Huis. Nor did Caligula ſtop here; but was ſo vain, as to carry theſe Shells to Rome, (together with the Galleys in which he went out to Sea;) where, when he had required a Triumph for this noble Enterprize, finding the Senate averſe to it, he had Thoughts of murthering them all for refuſing him Triumphal Honours; but he was not long after murther'd himſelf.

But that we may return again to the Affairs of Britain, which remain'd in Peace till the Reign of Claudius; and then Cynobelin (according to Geoffrey) after Threeſcore Years happy Reign, died, (not long before the Roman Invaſion.) This Prince had many Sons; (viz.) Adminius, who, as we have already heard, was baniſh'd by his Father: As alſo, Togodumus, who is thought to be the ſame with him whom Geoffrey calls Guidar, or Guinder; and whom he ſuppoſes to have reign'd, ſome ſay Four, and others Eight and Twenty Years; in whoſe Reign, Claudius the Emperor invaded Britain. But * Dion Caſſius makes no Mention of this Prince, and only names Togadumnus and Caractacus, being Brothers, to have reign'd in this Iſland; but whether with Equal, or Subordinate Authority, he does not mention; only gives us an exact Relation of the Invaſion by Claudius, the Occaſion of which he thus relates: That one Bericus, (though what he was, he doth not further ſay) having been driven out of this Iſland by a certain Sedition, and highly reſenting it, was the Man who excited Claudius to invade his Country: And that the Britains being provok'd at the Receipt of theſe Fugitives, and their not being given up when demanded, thereupon forbad all Commerce with the Romans. So a War being reſolv'd on, Plautius, then Prætor in Gaul, was immediately order'd by the Emperor to tranſport thoſe Legions he had with him, into Britain: But the Prætor, who was to carry over this Army, could very hardly get them out of Gaul; being much concern'd that they were to make War (as it were) in another World; ſpending a great deal of Time in Delays, before they would yield to go along with him. But when Narciſſus, (Claudius's Freed-Man) being ſent by him to perſuade the Army to march, had aſcended the Tribunal, and went about to make a Speech to them, the Soldiers being inflam'd with Indignation, began preſently to cry out, Io Saturnalia; (for in the Feaſt of the Saturnalia, it Anno Dom. XLIII. is the Cuſtom for Slaves to act the Part of their Maſters:) Yet nevertheleſs, they were at laſt perſuaded to follow Plautius, and go on Ship-board. But the Forces being divided into Three Parts, leſt coming all to one place, they ſhould be hinder'd from Landing, were kept back in their Paſſage by contrary Winds, and ſuffer'd great Hardſhip: Yet, taking freſh Courage, becauſe a Meteor had ſhot from Eaſt to Weſt, (the very Courſe they were to ſteer,) they at laſt reach'd the Iſland, no body hindring them; for the Britains not believing the Romans would have come over, (for the Reaſons you have already heard,) had prepar'd no Forces to prevent them; and therefore, not drawing together, had hid themſelves in the Woods and Marſhes, with Hopes of drawing on the Romans by Delays, as had before happen'd under Julius Cæſar: So that Plautius ſpent much Time in finding them out; but after he had once found them, he overcame firſt Caractacus, and afterwards Togadumnus, the Sons of Kynobelin, (their Father being dead ſome time before:) For the Britains did not enjoy a Popular Liberty, but were then ſubject to divers Kings: Yet all theſe being put to flight, he receiv'd a part of the Boduni into his Subjection, who before obey'd the Catuellani; and a Garriſon being left there, he march'd to a certain River which the Britains ſuppos'd the Romans could not paſs over without a Bridge, and ſo lay there the more careleſly encamp'd on the other ſide: Wherefore Plautius ſent over the Germans firſt, who being accuſtom'd in their Armour to ſwim over the ſwifteſt Rivers, ſet upon the Enemy on a ſudden, but kill'd none, only wounded the Horſes which drew their Chariots; wherewith they were ſo gall'd, that they would not endure their Riders. Then Plautius ſent Flavius Veſpaſian, (who afterwards was Emperor,) together with Sabinus, his Brother, as his Lieutenant; who alſo paſſing the River, kill'd many of the Britains at unawares; yet did not the reſt, for all this, run away, but the next Day renew'd the Fight with doubtful Succeſs, until C. Sidius (tho' he had like to have fallen into the Enemy's Hands) ſo routed them, that although he had never been Conſul, he had nevertheleſs Triumphal Honours beſtowed upon him.

From hence the Britains retired to the Mouth of the River Thames, and eaſily paſs'd it, knowing all the Fords and Shallows; whither the Romans following them, were in great danger: But when the Germans had again ſwum over, and that ſome others had likewiſe paſs'd by a Bridge that lay higher, the Britains being every where routed, they made a great Slaughter of them; though purſuing the Reſidue too raſhly, they fell into the Marſhes, and many were loſt. For theſe Reaſons, and becauſe the Britains were not, by the Death of Togadumnus, (who was kill'd,) now at all diſcourag'd, but rather more eager to revenge his Death, Plautius doubting the Succeſs, would not proceed farther; but putting Garriſons into thoſe Places he had conquer'd, ſent notice to the Emperor Claudius, who had before order'd him to do ſo, if any thing extraordinary or unexpected ſhould happen.

Anno Dom. XLIV. Claudius having receiv'd this Meſſage, immediately got all things ready (together with divers Elephants) for this Expedition; and being now the Third Time Conſul, and having choſen Britain for his Province, he committed the Care of the City and Soldiers to L. Vitellius, his Collegue, (who was Father to A. Vitellius, afterwards Emperor.) Anno Dom. XLIV.

then on the Coaſt of Liguria; yet landing, he paſs'd through Gaul, as far as Geſſoriacum, (now Bologne;) where again embarking, he paſs'd over into Britain, and joyn'd his Forces that expected him near the Thames; then paſſing over the River, he fought with the Britains in a pitch'd Battel, and obtain'd the Victory; taking Camolodunum, the Royal Seat of Kynobelin, together with many Priſoners, ſome by Force, and ſome by Surrender. For theſe Exploits, he was oftentimes by his Soldiers ſaluted Imperator, or General, though againſt the received Cuſtom of the Romans; for it was not lawful before to aſſume that Title more than once in the ſame War. Claudius having thus diſarm'd the Britains, leſt them to the Government of Plantius; ordering him to ſubdue thoſe that remain'd unconquer'd: But as for thoſe that ſubmitted, he remitted the Confiſcation of their Eſtates; which ſo oblig'd the Britains, that they built him a Temple, and ador'd him as a God. But whilſt he return'd towards Rome, his Sons-in-Law Pompeius and Silanus were ſent before with the News of his Victory, which was accompliſh'd in Sixteen Days. For no longer ſtay'd he in Britain, and that with ſo little Noiſe, that it gave occaſion to Suetonius (thô erroniouſly) to write, that he ſuddu'd Britain without ever a Battel, or any Blood-ſhed.

Claudius returning thus Triumphantly to Rome (from whence he had been abſent but Six Months in all) the Senate decreed his Son the Sirname of Britannicus, to himſelf a Triumph, and annual Games, with two Triumphal Arches, one in the City, the other in Gaul, from whence he had paſſed into Britain. In his Triumph (performing all things according to Cuſtom) he aſcended the Stairs of the Capitol on his Knees, his two Sons-in-Law ſupporting him on each ſide; he then beſtow'd on thoſe who had ſerv'd with him in this Expedition (not only ſuch who had been Conſuls, but even bare Senators) Triumphal Ornaments. I ſhall not trouble you with the reſt of this Solemnity, ſince it is not much to the Matter in hand, and alſo tranſacted out of this Iſland, only I ſhall S. Remark, That it appears this Conqueſt of Britain was look'd upon as ſo conſiderable, that the Senate thought fit to Decree as high Honours to the Emperor, who had now ſubdu'd but part of this Iſland; as they had done for any former Conquerors, and the Sirname of Britannicus, was eſteem'd as Glorious as that of Germanicus, Africanus, or Aſiaticus: And even in the heighth of the Roman Grandure it was eſteem'd ſo conſiderable a part of the Empire, that it was held not Inferior to any of the forementioned Provinces, and coſt more Legions in gaining and preſerving it than all Aſia, and was never forſaken by the Romans, but in their laſt Extremity.

I ſhall now by the way take a little notice of Geoffrey of Monmouth's Relation of this Britiſh War, which is much different from the Roman Accounts of it, he making Claudius to Land at Portcheſter in Hampſhire, and to have Beſieg'd that Town, to the Relief whereof Guiderius, or Guider (the above-mention'd King of the Britains) quickly came, and that a Battel enſuing it went on the Britains ſide; until Hamo, a Roman, diſguiſing himſelf like a Britain, ſlew the King; whereupon Arviragus his Brother, (leſt the Britains ſhould be diſcourag'd) conceal'd the King's Death, and arming himſelf in his Armour, continued the Battel, and ſo obtain'd a great Victory, and then ſucceeded his Brother Guider. But ſince none of the Roman Hiſtorians make any mention of theſe Kings, nor of Hamo (who is here ſuppos'd to have kill'd Guider) it is probable, that their very Succeſſion is as Fabulous as Arviragus his Encounters with Hamo; and his Marriage with Genuiſſa, a ~~ſuppoſed~~ Daughter of Claudius; as likewiſe his Treaty with that Emperour and homage done to him; Therefore leaving ſuch Fables, we will come to what the Romans performed in this Iſland after Claudius his departure to Rome. Which is thus related by Tacitus and Suetonius.

Anno Dom. XLIV. feigned

Tacitus Annal. Lib. XIII. c. 32.

Aulus Plautius being left by Claudius as his Lieutenant in Britain, after the Emperour's departure, diligently proſecuted the War; and ſo behav'd himſelf in quieting the revolting Countries, and gaining new Conqueſts as far as the Weſtern parts of the Iſland, that Claudius allow'd him an * Ovation, and at his Entrance into Rome, himſelf went to meet him, giving him the Right hand both in going and coming. Neither were the Actions of Veſpatian (afterwards Emperour) leſs remarkable in this War; for partly under the Conduct of Claudius himſelf, and partly of Plautius, he fought Thirty Battles with the Britains, and brought two moſt powerful Nations, and above Twenty Towns, together with the Iſle of Wight, under his Subjection; for all which noble Actions he received Triumphal Ornaments, and a little while after two Sacerdotal Dignities, together with the Conſulſhip: His Son Titus, then ſerving under him in the quality of a Tribune, was much renowned for his Valour and Diligence; he had alſo the good fortune to reſcue and relieve his Father: And his modeſt Behaviour was as ſignal, as his Courage; as appears by many Inſcriptions, under his Image, diſperſed through divers Provinces.

Sueton. in Veſpaſ.

An. XXV. Id. Annal. Lib. XII. c. 31.

Oſtorius Scapula ſucceeded Plautius in the Quality of Proprætor, a Man no leſs experienced in Martial Affairs: At his firſt entrance into his command he met with many Commotions and Troubles; for that part of Britain, which was not yet ſubdued broke in upon their Neighbours, who had entred into League, or made any ſubmiſſion to the Romans, waſting their Country; and with ſo much the more Vigour, for that they thought this new General (as not yet acquainted with his buſineſs, nor having Experience of his Army) would not be ſoon able to revenge it; eſpecially conſidering that Winter was near, and that a Seaſon unfit for Action: but Oſtorius, knowing that the firſt Succeſs makes the greateſt Impreſſion of Fear, or Confidence, reſolved to put a ſtop to their Inroads betimes, before they proceeded too far; and for that end he quickly took with him ſome of his lighteſt Cohorts, and unexpectedly ſeting upon them, killed many, following thoſe that fled ſo cloſe, that he gave them no time to rally; and leſt for the future a treacherous unſtable Peace might prove more dangerous, and troubleſome, as well to himſelf as his Souldiers; he diſarmed all whom he ſuſpected moſt likely to revolt, and ſet Garriſons on the two Rivers, Severn and Antona (now Avon,) thereby to hinder the Incurſions of the Britiſh Army: By this means he reduced the moſt Southerly parts of the Iſland into the form of a Province; having alſo planted there a Colony of Veterane Souldiers, and to ſecure his Conqueſt the better, he gave ſeveral Cities to Cogidunus, to be held as Tributary to the Roman Empire, under the Title of King: by which he ſtrongly engaged him to its intereſt; it being an antient and received Policy of that State (as Tacitus well obſerves) to make Kings the Inſtruments of it's Ambition, as well as of their own Servitude.

Anno Dom. XLIV.

But the Iceni, (who Inhabited what we now call Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntington-ſhires) a potent Nation and not yet waſted by War, becauſe they had voluntarily entered into alliance with the Romans; not brooking theſe proceedings of Oſtorius, took Arms, and by their Example encouraged many of their neighbouring Nations to do the like: this done, they encamped in a place choſen for that purpoſe, caſting up a Rampire of Earth; leaving a very narrow Entrance, for fear, leaſt the Enemy's Horſe ſhould break in upon them.

Oſtorius, although he had not his Legions, but only his Auxiliaries with him; yet reſolved, if he could, to break down this Fence, which he perceived was but rudely thrown up, and ſetting all his Cohorts to work, the Horſe alſo alighting to that Service, he himſelf giving the Signal, at once they flung down the Works, and drove the Enemy from their Fortreſs: But the Britains, as well through the Conſciouſneſs of their Rebellion, as becauſe all ways of eſcaping were blocked up, made a notable Defence: In which Battel, M. Oſtorius the Son of the Lieutenant, gained the honour of having ſaved a Citizen.

Tacit. An. lib. 12. cap. 32.

The Iceni thus overcome; the other States, who hitherto ſtood in a doubtful Poſture between War and Peace, were confirmed in their Obedience by their ſufferings. After this Succeſs, Oſtorius marched into the Country of the Cangi (who they were is not well known) where he plundered and laid waſte their Fields, they not daring to give him Battel; and if at any time they ventur'd out of their Coverts to fall on his Rear, they always met with ſharp entertainment: At laſt he approached near the Iriſh Sea, where news was brought him of ſtirs among the Brigantes, (ſuppoſed to have been the Inhabitants of Torkſhire, Lancaſhire, and the other Northern Countries). Upon this he reſolves to return, intending not to attempt any new Deſign, till he had fully quieted thoſe Commotions behind him: and indeed the Brigantes were ſoon quieted; thoſe few who took Arms being all Slain, and the reſt pardoned. But the Nation of the Silures (the Inhabitants of the now South Wales) were not to be won by Clemency, or terrified by Severity; but would needs have a War, and if ſubdued, were to be kept in obedience by Garriſons of Legionary Souldiers.

† Ib. cap. 33.

So he marched againſt theſe Silures, who, beſides their natural Fierceneſs, were much exalted with the Opinion they had of the Courage and Conduct of Caractacus, who by many doubtful, and ſome Fortunate Attempts, had raiſed himſelf to a greater Reputation in Arms than any of the Britiſh Generals: he finding himſelf over-matched in Strength made uſe of Policy: he knew his Advantage lay in choice of Ground, to that end he transferr'd the War to the rough unacceſſible Country of the the Ordovices (now thoſe of North Wales) chuſing for the Seat of the War, a place, whoſe Avenues were moſt difficult to the Romans, and eaſieſt of Acceſs to themſelves: there he raiſed a Fortification with great Stones on the tops of the Mountains: and where a River running near made a dangerous and uncertain Ford, placed a range or breaſt-work of larger Stones to defend the paſſage: which place (as Mr. Camden Conjectures) has ſtill from him the Name of Caer Caradoc, lying on the Weſt edge of Shropſhire: Caradoc being in the Britiſh Tongue ſuppoſed to be the ſame with Caractacus in the Latin. Oſtorius having drawn hither all his Forces (ſince Caractacus reſolved here to Fight it to the laſt) the Officers went about, encouraging their Men, diminiſhing their Fears, and enlivening their Courage by all the Rhetorick of War. But Caractacus notably beſtir'd himſelf, and with quick motions going from place to place, Cry'd out, this was the Day, and this the Field, which would be either the recovery of their Liberty, or the beginning of a new and perpetual Slavery: and then invoked the Names of his glorious Anceſtors, who had driven out Cæſar the Dictator; and by whoſe Valour they had hitherto been freed from the Roman Axes and Tributes; and ſtill kept their Wives and Children preſerved from diſhonour.

At theſe, or ſuch like Speeches, the Army teſtified their Joy by loud Shouts and Acclamations; and every one, according to his Country Superſtition, bound himſelf by Oath, that neither Force nor Wounds ſhould make them yield.

Tacit. An. lib. 12. cap. 35.

This Couragious alacrity in the Enemy ſtartled the Roman General: eſpecially when he deſcried the River before him, and the Rampire made upon its Banks, both of great difficulty to be paſſed; whilſt the ſteep Hills full of Armed Men hanging over their heads, gave a diſmal proſpect, and made a terrible Scene of War: but the Common Souldiers being eager for Battel required the Signal; Crying out, nothing was impregnable to Valour: This impatience was increaſed by the Prefects and Tribunes, who were of the ſame Opinion. Then Oſtorius having firſt tried which Fords were paſſable, and which not, led them on as inſenſible of Danger; who with no great difficulty wading through the River, when they were come near to the Rampire, and that it came to be diſputed with Darts and Javelins, greater loſs followed on the Roman than Britiſh ſide: So that not being able longer to endure it, the Legionary Souldiers joyning cloſe together made a Teſtudo; whereupon this rude Fortification of rough Stones being thrown down, and the Romans meeting with them hand to hand, the Barbarians ſoon fled to the tops of the Mountains: but thither alſo the heavy as well as the Light-Armed Souldiers quickly followed them; whilſt the Britains aſſaulting them with their Darts, theſe received them in cloſe order, whereby their Ranks were ſoon broken, who made uſe of no defence, either of Breſt-plates or Helmets: So that, if they could have reſiſted the Auxiliaries, yet they were beat down by the Swords and Darts of the Legionary Souldiers; and if they turned from theſe, they were again routed by the broad Swords and Spears of the Auxiliaries. The Victory was very remarkable, the Wife and Daughter of Caractacus being taken Priſoners, and his Brethren ſubmitting to Mercy.

Ib. cap. 36.

But though he had committed himſelf to the Fidelity of Cartiſmandua Queen of the Brigantes, (yet as unſafe Counſels prove commonly unfortunate) he was by her, delivered bound to the Victors in the Seventh Year (according to Tacitus,) but indeed in the Ninth Year after this War was begun in Britain. Nevertheleſs Caractacus his Fame being carried through all the Neighbouring Provinces, was alſo Celebrated as far as Italy, and they deſired to ſee the Man that had for ſo many Years deſpiſed the Roman Forces: ſo that the name of Caractacus became famous at Rome it ſelf; and Cæſar whilſt he extoll'd his own Victory, added glory to the conquered; for the People being ſummoned as to ſome ſolemn Spectacle, the Prætorian Cohorts ſtood to their Arms in the Field, which lay before their Camp; The King's Servants marched before, bearing Anno Dom. XLIV. bearing his Gold Chains and other Ornaments, with what ever elſe he had gained in Foreign Wars; preſently after came his Brethren with his Wife and Daughters, and laſt of all He himſelf: The behaviour of others, through fear was mean and degenerate; he only neither in Countenance, Word, or Action, appeared dejected: But ſtanding at the Tribunal of Cæſar, Spoke to this purpoſe.

If my mind, O Cæſar, had been as moderate in the Heigth of Fortune, as my Birth and Dignity was Eminent, I might have entred as a Friend, rather than a Captive into this City; nor couldſt thou have diſliked one for a Confederate, ſo Noble by Deſcent, and Ruling ſo many Natinos. My preſent Eſtate, tho to me diſgraceful, to thee is Glorions: I had once Riches, Horſes, Arms, and Men; no wonder if I was not contented to loſe them, but if you will extend your Empire over all others; then of neceſſity all others muſt obey you: If I ſooner had been brought to yield, my Miſfortune had been leſs notorious, your Conqueſt leſs renowned: but by a ſevere treatment of me, both will be ſoon forgotten: if you grant that I may Live, I ſhall live a laſting Monument of your Clemency.

Cæſar mov'd at ſo ſad a Spectacle of Fortune, but eſpecially at the Nobleneſs of his bearing it, gave him Pardon, as alſo to his Wife and Brothers; they being all unbound went alſo to do the like Reverence to the Empreſs Agrippina; who ſat not far off on another Throne, no leſs conſpicuous: a new indeed, and unwonted ſight, far different from the Manners of the ancient Romans, to ſee a Woman in her Feminine Pride, preſiding over the Roman Enſigns; but indeed ſhe looked upon her ſelf as a Companion, and Sharer of the Empire obtained by her * Anceſtors.

Tacit. An. lib. 12. cap. 38. The Senators being then alſo ſummon'd, made long and pompous Diſcourſes upon this taking of Caractacus; ſaying, it was no leſs famous than when P. Scipio ſhewed Scyphax, or L. Paulus, Perſeus, or any other General, who had expoſed Captive Kings to the view of the People of Rome; ſo that they decreed to Oſtorius all the Enſigns of a Triumph.

After this, Affairs continued ſome time proſperous; but preſently after became more doubtful: either becauſe that Caractacus being now remov'd, he thought the Britains as good as ſubdued, and ſo the Wars was leſs eagerly purſued; or whether the Enemy in Compaſſion of ſo great a King burnt more fiercely with Revenge; for they had beſet the Governour in his Camp, and fell upon the Legionary Cohorts, who had been left to build Forts among the Silures; and unleſs Aſſiſtance had come in to them ſpeedily from the Neighbouring Garriſons and Caſtles, the whole Army had then periſhed; nevertheleſs the Governour with Eight Centurions, and the moſt forward Souldiers of each Company were cut off, and not long after they routed thoſe that were Forraging, as alſo ſome Troops ſent to their Relief.

Then Oſtorius drew forth his Light Armed Cohorts, nor had he thereby put a ſtop to his Mens flight, unleſs the Legions had alſo engaged in
Ib. c. 39. the Fight, by whoſe Force it firſt became equal, and at length quite turned the Scale; for the Enemies fled, thô with ſmall Loſs, becauſe the Day was declining; afterwards followed frequent Skirmiſhes, more like Robberies than Fights, they often meeting in the Woods or Marſhes, as Deſign or Chance gave them opportunity; often commanded, ſometimes without any command: all which proceeded from the remarkable obſtinacy of the Silures, whom that common ſaying of the Roman General had much provoked, That as the Sicambri had been formerly deſtroyed, ſo alſo the very name of the Silures ought wholly to be extinguiſhed. Therefore they intercepted two Auxiliary Cohorts, who through the Avarice of their Officers were too ſecurely pillaging: and beſtowing the Priſoners and Spoils on certain neighbouring Nations, drew them alſo into a Revolt: When Oſtorius being now worn out with Cares and Troubles ended his Days. The Britains rejoycing, that thô not a Battle; yet a lingering War had taken off ſo great a Souldier.

But Cæſar underſtanding the Death of his Lieutenant, leſt the Province ſhould remain without a Governour, ſent A. Didius in his room, who quickly arriving there, found Affairs but in an ill Condition; for in the mean while there had happened an unſucceſsful Engagement of that Legion over which Manlius Valens commanded: the Fame of which Exploit being alſo much increaſed by the Enemy's reports, that thereby they might terrifie the new General, which was alſo much increaſed by himſelf, that if the War were well ended he might win the greater Glory, or if otherwiſe, he might gain the eaſier pardon. But the Silures had already done much miſchief, and made Incurſions all abroad, until by Didius's meeting of them they were repelled; which being one of the laſt Actions that happened in Claudius's Reign, I ſhall only take notice that he lived about Three Years after his ſending Didius hither, and died (as is ſuppos'd) of Poyſon given him by his Wife Agrippina; therefore ſince by his Conqueſt of ſo great a part of Britain, he is accounted by moſt Authors as the Sovereign power thereof; I ſhall for the future give you the Names of all the Roman Emperors his Succeſſours, that ruled here, till their quitting of this Iſland, whether they were here in Perſon or not. Claudius was ſucceeded by Nero his Wive's Son by Birth, and his own by Adoption, of whoſe Reign I ſhall ſay nothing, but what relates to the particular Hiſtory of this Iſland. Therefore ſince Tacitus tells us, that thoſe things, which were done under the two Prætors, Oſtorius and Didius, for the ſpace of many Years, he had for their better remembrance put all together; It plainly appearing, that moſt of thoſe things he there treats of, are to be referr'd to Nero's Reign; I ſhall make bold to place in the beginning of his Time that long War between the Romans and Venutius, which Tacitus thus relates.

Id. Ibid.

After Caractacus was gone, Venutius a Prince of the Jugantes, was the moſt remarkable for Military skill, having continued faithful hitherto; being defended by the Roman Arms, as long as he kept Queen Cartiſmandua for his Wife; but a Quarrel happened between them, and preſently after a War; in which he at laſt took up Arms againſt the Romans, to which Tacitus tell us in another place, he was highly provoked, not only upon the account of his natural Fierceneſs, but by the injuries of the Queen his Wife; who, being proud of her Nobility, had increaſed her power, after her taking of Caractacus, as you have heard; ſo that abounding in Wealth, and wallowing in Luxury, ſhe deſpiſed her Husband Venutius, and made Vellocatus his Armour-bearer the partner of her Bed and Kingdom: So that upon this, immediately the whole State became divided; on the Husband's ſide were the inclinations of the Nation; for the Adulterer, the Queen's Luſt and Violence; from whence proceeded a Civil War among themſelves; for Cartiſmandua by her Stratagems had intercepted the Brother and Kinſman of Venutius: whence thoſe of his party were the more provoked; meer ſhame egging them on, leſt they ſhould be ſubject to the command of a Woman*:* whereupon a ſtrong Party of the choiceſt Troops Invade her Kingdom, which being foreſeen; and certain Cohorts being ſent to her aſſiſtance, they fought a ſharp Battel, whoſe beginning though doubtful, yet the Concluſion proved proſperous, thô the Legion which Ceſſius Naſica Commanded, fought with different Succeſs.

Hiſtor. III.

But Tacitus tells us in another place, that Venutius ſending for more Supplies (I ſuppoſe from his own Kingdom,) as alſo by a general defection of the Brigantes themſelves, brought Cartiſmandua into extream hazard; ſo that ſhe was forced to ſeek Aid of the Romans, whoſe Cohorts, though in diverſe Battels they freed the Queen from danger, yet was the Kingdom ſtill left to Venutius, and the War continued on the Romans: I ſuppoſe Tacitus means this, during the times of all other Lieutenants, though not expreſly mentioned by him; for he tells us in his Life of Agricola, That Veranius ſucceeded Didius, and dying within the Year, that then Suetonius Paulinus found aſſairs proſperous for the firſt Two Years: yet it ſeems could not drive Venutius out of his Kingdom. But thô Tacitus afterwards in the Third Book of his Hiſtories relates this Story of Cartiſmandua, as if it had fallen out in the time of Vitellius, and that the Diſcord and Civil Wars which then happened in the Roman Empire, had encouraged the Britains to take Arms under the Command of Venutius; yet it is evident from what he hath already ſaid in his Annals, that this War with Venutius muſt have been begun in Nero's time, ſince Didius was the firſt Lieutenant in Britain, who ſent any aſſiſtance to Cartiſmandua; and who muſt be ſuppoſed to have been dead, or remov'd ſome time before the Death of Nero; or elſe there would be no room left for his two Succeſſors above mentioned; the latter of which ended his Government with the Reign of Vitellius.

Annal. [illegible].

But to return to our Hiſtory, it is certain that Veranius the Succeſſor of A. Didius did little, except his waſting the Silures by many ſmall Incurſions; being hindred by Death from carrying the War any further. A Man of great reputation for his Diſcipline, but, as appears by his laſt Words in his Teſtament, guilty of manifeſt Vanity and Ambition; for after many things ſpoken in Flattery of Nero, he ſaid that he would have ſubjected all, viz. Britain, to him, if he might have lived but two Years longer.

Ibid. c. 38.

After him Paulinus Suetonius governed Britain, being in Reputation and Military Skill a Commander equal to Corbulo; but ſince in Paulinus's Time the Romans received ſo great a blow in Britain, Let us take Tacitus's account of it.

Anno Dom. LXIII.

This General deſiring to equal Corbulo's glory in recovering Armenia, by taming the Britiſh Rebels; endeavoured to Conquer the Iſland Mona (now called Angleſey), ſtrong in People and a Receptacle of Fugitives. To which end he built many flat bottomed Veſſels, for that ſhallow and uncertain Shore*:* his Foot thus waſted over, his Horſe waded, or ſwom, where thick upon the Strand ſtood ſeveral groſs bands of Men well Armed; many Women like Furies running to and fro in diſmal Habits, with their Hair hanging looſe about their Shoulders, held Torches in their Hands: The Druids (who were their Prieſts, of whom we have ſpoken in another place) with Hands liſt up to Heaven, ſtood m uttering direful Imprecations: All which ſo aſtoniſh'd the Soldiers with the Novelty of the Sight; that at firſt they yielded themſelves, without any Reſiſtance to their Enemies Blows; but then being encourag'd by the Exhortations of their General, and encouraging one another, that they ſhould not fear this Womaniſh, Phanatick Rout, they led on the Enſigns; and routing all they met, ~~overturn'd~~ them into their own Fires. flung After this, a Garriſon was impos'd upon the Conquer'd; and the Groves, ſacred to their cruel Superſtitions, were cut down; for they look'd upon it as piece of Religion to ſacrifice Captives, and to conſult the Gods by inſpecting Humane Entrails. But whilſt Suetonius was thus in Action, Word is brought him, that a ſudden Defection had happen'd in his Province; the Occaſion of which is thus farther related by our Author.

Anno Dom. LXIII.

* Praſutagus, King of the Icenians, abounding in Wealth, had left Cæſar Co-heir with his two Daughters, thereby hoping to have ſecur'd from Wrong both his Kingdom, and his Family; which fell out far otherwiſe: For, under Colour to Overſee and take Poſſeſſion of the Emperor's new Inheritance, his Kingdom became a Prey to the Centurions; his Houſe to ravenous Officers, his Wife Boadicia being violated with Stripes, and his Daughters raviſh'd: And, as if the Romans had gotten the whole Kingdom as a Legacy, the cheifeſt Men of the Icenians are turn'd out of their ancient Eſtates, and thoſe of the Royal Family treated like Slaves. By which Indignities, and for fear of greater Evils when they ſhould be reduc'd into the Form of a Province, they took Arms. The Trinobantes were alſo moved to rebel, whilſt others who were not as yet reduced to Servitude conſpir'd with thoſe that were, to regain their former Liberty. This proceeded from a cruel Hatred againſt the Veterane Soldiers, who being planted in the late Colony of Camalodunum, drove Men from their Houſes and Eſtates in the Country, calling them Slaves and Captives: The other Soldiers alſo encouraging this Violence of the Veteranes, as well through a Likeneſs in Manners, as through an Hope of the ſame Licenſe. To which may be alſo added, That the Temple dedicated to Claudius was look'd upon as a Badge of their Eternal Slavery; and the Prieſts ordain'd for it, under a Shew of Religion, ſeiz'd upon divers Men's Eſtates. Nor did it ſeem difficult to deſtroy a Colony, defended by no Fortifications; which was but little fore-ſeen by the Roman Commanders, who rather had ſtudied their Pleaſure, than Safety.

* Tacit. lib. 14.

To all which Provocations, † Dion alſo adds, That Catus Decianus the Procurator, endeavour'd to bring all Men's Goods under the Compaſs of a new Confiſcation; by diſavowing the Remiſſion of Claudius himſelf. Laſtly, Seneca (only in his Books a Philoſopher) having drawn in the Britains to borrow of him vaſt Sums, upon fair Promiſes of an eaſie Loan; and for Re-payment, to take their own Time; all on a ſudden compell'd them to pay both Principal and Intereſt at once, with great Extortion: Which you will find in * Tacitus, expreſſed at large, in a long Speech by the injur'd Britains.

Thus provok'd by the heavieſt Sufferings, and invited by Opportunity in the Abſence of Paulinus, the † Icenians, and by their Example the Trinobantes, and as many more as hated Servitude roſe up in Arms; but of theſe enſuing Troubles many foregoing Signs appear'd, among which the Image of Victory at Camalodunum fell down of it ſelf, with the Face backward, as if ſhe had turn'd to the Enemy: And certain Women, in a kind of Ecſtaſie, foretold great Calamities to come: In the Council-Houſe by Night, ſtrange Noiſes were heard; and in the Theatre, hideous Howlings; but in the River Thames, horrid Appearances were ſeen, as of a Colony deſtroy'd, but what theſe were, Dion tells us more plainly, viz. That in that River there were diſcover'd the Ruins of Houſes under Water: Beſides, the Ocean ſeem'd of a bloody hue, whilſt at the Ebb appear'd the Shapes of human Bodies left upon the Sands: All which as it rais'd in the Britains new Courage, ſo in the Romans it cauſed unwonted Fears: Therefore ſince Suetonius was now far off, they deſired from Catus Decianus ſome Aſſiſtance; but he ſent them ſcarce above Two Hundred Men, and thoſe ill Arm'd.

There was within the Town a moderate Garriſon of Soldiers, who truſted in the Strength of the Temple; but ſome who were conſcious of the intended Rebellion, had perplex'd their Councils, and hindred them from drawing any Line about the Place; nor were the Old Women and Children turn'd out, and the Fighting Men (as they ought to have done) only left behind. Thus the Romans being ſecure, as in the midſt of Peace, were circumvented by a Multitude of Barbarians, ſo that all Places were quickly Spoil'd and Burnt at the very firſt Aſſault; the Temple, in which the Soldiers had gotten together, held out Two Days, but was at laſt taken. The Britains being thus Victors, marched out to meet Petillius Cerialis, Lieutenant of the Ninth Legion, then coming to their Succour, they routed his Legion, and killed all the Foot; but Cerialis with the Horſe eſcaped into the Camp, which was defended by the Trenches. Catus Decianus the Procurator, whoſe Covetouſneſs, and the hatred of the Province that enſued upon it, had been the Cauſe of this War, fled like a Coward into Gaul.

Ibid. cap. 33.

But Suetonius not diſmay'd with this ſad News, marched through his Enemy's Country to London, which, thô not honoured with the Title of a Colony, yet was then famous for the great Concourſe of Merchants, and plenty of all Proviſions; where being arriv'd, he was doubtful whether or no he ſhould make it the Seat of War; but having conſider'd the ſmall number of his Soldiers, and taking warning from Cerialis, he reſolved to preſerve the whole by the loſs of this one City: So that he was not moved by the Crys and Tears of thoſe who implored his Protection, from giving his Men the Signal of Departure; only taking thoſe into his Army, who would or could march along with him; they who, through weakneſs of Sex, or Age, or love of the Place, ſtay'd behind, were deſtroy'd by the Enemy, as was alſo Verulam, a Roman Municipium, or Free City: For the Barbarians omitting Forts and Caſtles, pillag'd the richeſt Places firſt, and then went eaſily forward to others more eminent for Strength: So that, as it afterwards appear'd, about Seventy Thouſand Citizens with their Confederates in the Places above-mentioned, loſt their Lives: None might be ſpared, none ranſom'd; but they endeavour'd by Gibbets, Fire, Croſſes, and all other ways of Slaughter, to return thoſe Puniſhments they had ſuffered, and prevent any Revenge that was to be taken upon them.

Dion here alſo adds, That the Roman Wives and Virgins being hung up naked, had their Breaſts cut off and ſow'd to their Mouths, that even dead they might be ſeen to eat their own Fleſh; whilſt the Britains Feaſted in the Temple of Andate, their Goddeſs of Victory.

Anno Dom. LXIII.

† Suetonius having then with him the Fourteenth Legion, with the Standard Bearers of the Twentieth, which, together with the Auxiliaries, made in all about Ten Thouſand Men ; reſolving to lay aſide all Delays, prepar'd to joyn Battel, having choſen a Place acceſſable, only by a narrow Lane, and defended behind by a Wood ; knowing well enough that the Enemies could do nothing but upon his Front, and that the open Plain was without danger of an Ambuſcade : he drew up the Legionary Soldiers in cloſe Order, and being defended on each ſide with the light Arm'd Men, and the Horſe that made both the Wings. But the Britiſh Forces being drawn up here and there in ſmaller Companies and Squadrons, appear'd a great Multitude; being ſo fierce and confident of Victory, that they carried their Wives along with them in Wagons to behold it, which were placed in the outward Borders of the Field.

† Tacit. Ibid. chap. 34.

Let us here alſo add what * Dion ſays of Boadicia, the Widow of Praſutagus, who chiefly ſtired up and perſwaded the Britains to make this War upon the Romans. Boadicia (ſays he) was a Britiſh Lady of a Royal Race, who did not only Govern with great Authority in Peace, but alſo order'd the whole War : Her Diſpoſition was more Maſculine than became a Woman, being of a tall Stature, and a ſevere Countenance, having a harſh Voice and yellow Hair, which being let looſe, hung diſhevel'd below her Waſt, wearing a great Gold Chain about her Neck, and having on a looſe Coat wrought with divers Colours, and a thick Mantle button'd over it, holding a Spear in her Hand. Having now gotten together an Army of an Hundred Thouſand Men, which were drawn up ready to fight, the Queen getting up on a high heap of Earth, made a Speech to her Soldiers, which, ſince it is tedious and moſt likely to be made only to ſet out the Eloquence and Invention of the Author, I ſhall paſs over, and ſhall rather give you what ſhe is ſuppos'd to have ſaid, out of || Tacitus ; as being ſhorter and more to the Purpoſe ; who relates it thus.

Boadicia carried her Daughters with her in a Chariot, in which being driven about to every Nation that compos'd her Army, ſhe ſpoke to this Effect : " That ſince it was no new thing for the Britains to make a " War under the Conduct of a Woman, therefore for her part, thô " deſcended of Noble Anceſtors, ſhe ſought not ſo much to Revenge " the loſs of her Kingdom and Treaſures, but rather (as one of the " Common People) the loſs of her Liberty, the bruiſing her Body with " Stripes, and the violated Chaſtity of her Daughters. That the Roman Luſt was ſuch, that they did not leave either old Age or Virginity undefil'd : That the Gods had hitherto favour'd her juſt Revenge, " one Legion being already cut off, which dared to fight; the reſt having hid themſelves in their Camps ſought how to run away, as not " being able to endure the Shouts and Clamours of ſo many Thouſands, " much leſs their Power : So that if they would but conſider their own " great Forces, they ought either to overcome or die in that Battel.

* Neither was Suetonius ſilent in ſo great a Danger ; and although he truſted much in his Soldiers Valour, yet thought good to give them ſome Encouragement, to this effect ; That they ſhould deſpiſe the empty, noiſy Threats of thoſe Barbarians ; That they beheld more Women, than Fighting Men among them ; That being unwarlike, and unarm'd, they would preſently give way, as ſoon as they felt the ſharp Swords and Valour of their Conquerors, by whom they had been ſo often routed ; and

Anno Dom. LXIII. That of ſo many Legions, a few would ſerve to gain the Victory; and that it would be an Addition to their Honour, if ſo ſmall a Force could obtain the ſame Glory as if it were an entire Army. His Advice then was, That they ſhould keep cloſe together; and having caſt their Darts, ſhould afterwards continue the Slaughter with their Pikes and Swords, not minding the Spoil, ſince the Victory once obtain'd, all would be their own. The Soldiers were ſo encouraged with this Speech, that the Veterane Soldiers, experienc'd by many Battles, urged Suetonius to give the Signal.

† Tacit. c. 37. † Yet all the Legion ſtood unmov'd, keeping that ſtrait Entrance as a Defence before them: But when the Enemy had approached nearer, and had ſpent their Darts, the Legion ſallied forth all at once upon them, in the form of a Wedge. The like Aſſault was alſo made by the Auxiliaries; whilſt the Horſe, with their Spears, routed all that ſtood before them: The reſt turn'd their Backs and fled, but could hardly eſcape, becauſe their own Wagons had cloſed up all the Avenues: But the Soldiers gave no Quarter, not ſo much as to the Women; and the very Draught-Cattel being run thorough, increas'd the Heap of the dead Carcaſes. This Victory was very eminent; and the Glory of it equall'd thoſe of Ancient Times, ſince it is related, that not leſs than 80000 Britains were then ſlain; but of the Roman Soldiers, not above 400, and about as many wounded. Boadicia ended her Life by Poyſon: And Pænius Poſthumus, the Commander of the Second Legion, when he heard the good Succeſs of thoſe of the Fourteenth and Twentieth, ſince he had defrauded his own Men of the like Glory; and had alſo, contrary to the Rules of War, refuſed to obey the Orders of his General, run himſelf through with his own Sword.

The Army, after a general Review, ſtill kept the Field, to make an end of the War; and Suetonius increaſed his Forces with 2000 Legionary Soldiers, and 8 Cohorts of Auxiliaries, together with 1000 Horſe ſent out of Germany; by whoſe coming, the Ninth Legion was recruited: Whereupon, all thoſe Cohorts, with ſome others, were put into Winter-Quarters: Whatſoever Nations continued either Enemies, or Neuters, were now deſtroy'd with Fire and Sword. But nothing afflicted them ſo much as Hunger; having been careleſs to ſow Corn, becauſe they reckon'd upon the Roman Proviſions as their own; all their Hands being employ'd in the War. But theſe fierce Nations were the leſs inclin'd to treat of Peace, becauſe Julius Claſſicianus, who ſucceeded Catus, differing with Suetonius, their private Animoſities hinder'd the publick Good; the former giving out, that a new Lieutenant was to be expected, without the Rancour of a Conqueror, and who would treat thoſe that ſubmitted to them with Mercy and Clemency: Having alſo written to Rome, that there was no End to be expected of this War, unleſs Suetonius were remov'd; attributing all Miſcarriages to his ill Conduct; and any happy Succeſs, to the good Fortune of the Commonwealth.

* Ibid. cap. 39. * Polycletus therefore, one of Nero's Freed-men, is ſent to inſpect the State of Britain, with great Hopes that he might by his Authority, not only procure an Agreement between the Lieutenant and the Procurator, but alſo work the Minds of the Barbarians to a Peace. Polycletus, after having been burthenſome, both to Italy and Gaul, with his great Retinue and having croſs'd the Ocean, did not omit to become terrible alſo to the Roman Soldiers. This gave Matter of Sport to the Enemy, who then enjoying Liberty, had not yet known the Power of theſe Freed-men; but wonder'd that ſo great a General, and an Army who had fought ſuch Battels, could obey Slaves. But though all things were ſoften'd, and fairly repreſented on the General's behalf; yet becauſe (whilſt he was otherwiſe employ'd in Affairs) he had loſt a few Galleys near the Shore; he was commanded, though the War yet laſted, to deliver up the Army to Petronius Turpilianus, who was then juſt out of his Conſulſhip; who, neither provoking the Enemy, nor being provoked by them, gave his own Slothfulneſs the honourable Title of Peace.

* But Tacitus alſo, in the Life of Agricola, having given a ſhort Relation of this War with Boadicia, (whom he there calls Voadicia) owns, that Britain had been loſt if Paulinus had not ſpeedily come to its Aſſiſtance, moſt of which he reſtor'd by one Battel to its ancient Subjection; though many ſtill continued in Arms, whom either the Guilt of Rebellion, or the Fear of the Lieutenant, ſtill kept out; who, though he was a worthy Man, yet carried himſelf too haughtily toward thoſe that ſubmitted; and, as a Revenger of his own Injuries, impoſed too hard Terms upon the Vanquiſhed: Therefore Petronius Turpilianus was ſent in his ſtead, as being more exorable; who, as one altogether ignorant of the Enemy's Failings, would be more eaſie to their Repentance; but all former Differences being compoſed, he durſt do nothing farther; and ſo deliver'd the Province to Trebellius Maximus; who being a Man of an unactive Temper, and no Experience in Military Affairs, govern'd the Province by a Softneſs and Complaiſance; yet nevertheleſs, he continued ſtill in the Government till the Reign of Vitellius.

Anno Dom. LXIX.

But † Tacitus here farther tells us, That the Britains had now learnt to approve of the pleaſant Vices of the Romans, whilſt the Intervention of their Civil Wars gave them a juſt Excuſe for their own Cowardice.

But one thing is by no means to be paſſed by without particular Notice; that it was in the Reign of one of theſe Emperors, either Claudius, or Nero, though uncertain in which, that Gildas, as do divers other later Authors, ſuppoſes the Goſpel to have been firſt preached in this Iſland; though by whom, is alſo unknown, no ancient Church-Hiſtorian making any mention of it: And indeed, there is much difference in the Accounts of latter Writers about it; ſome attributing it to St. James, the Son of Zebedee; ſome of the Modern Greek Eccleſiaſtical Writers, to Simon Zelotes, or St. Peter; others of them, to St. Paul, who is ſaid to have Ordain'd one Ariſtobulus, (afterwards a Martyr) to be a Biſhop in Britain; as you may ſee at large in the firſt Chapter of Archbiſhop Uſher's Antiquities of the Britiſh Churches. But though he there underſtands thoſe Paſſages in Gildas, where he ſpeaks of Chriſt, the true Sun's affording his Rays, i. e. the Knowledge of his Precepts, to this Iſland, then ſhivering with Icy Cold, as if it referr'd to the very firſt Preaching of the Goſpel, in the Reign of Tiberius; yet the learned Dr. Stillingfleet, now Lord Biſhop of Worceſter, hath very ingeniouſly ſhewn us in his learned Work, called * Origines Britanicæ, that the Word intereà, in the mean time, (with which Gildas begins this Diſcourſe) is to be referred to the Times before-mention'd by him, (viz.) that fatal Victory over Boadicia and the Britains, by Suetonius Paulinus; and the Slavery they afterwards underwent in Nero's Reign. So that the Doctor ſuppoſes Gildas to ſpeak of a double Shining of the Goſpel; one more general to the Roman World, the other more particular to this Iſland: The former, he ſays, was in the End of

Anno Dom. LXIX.

Tiberius's Reign, the latter was interea, in the time that is between Plautius's coming over in the Time of Claudius, and the abovementioned Battel between Boadicia and Suetonius; and this the Dr. thinks to be moſt probably the Time which Gildas has there pitched upon, for the firſt Preaching of the Goſpel in this Iſland. Since therefore there is ſo great a difference between thoſe Authors, who have taken upon them exactly to aſſign the time when it was firſt Preached (as you may find by the Citations given us by the ſaid Archbiſhop, it were to no purpoſe croud this Hiſtory with thoſe uncertain Relations, and therefore I ſhall refer you to the ſaid Learned Work, if you ſhall deſire any further Satisfaction.

To which period of Time may be alſo referred the Story of Joſeph of Arimathæa's and his Twelve Companions coming to Preach the Goſpel in Britain, which, thô it wholly depends upon ſome Legends and Traditions of the Monks of the Abbey of Glaſtenbury, for no ſuch thing is to be found in Gildas, Nennius, or any ancient Britiſh Author; yet ſince they have been ſo commonly receiv'd, it deſerves a particular Notice, thô the ſaid Archbiſhop in the * Book but now cited alſo tells us, That he believes thoſe Stories to be not antienter than the coming in of the Normans, as ſmelling plainly of the Superſtition of thoſe latter Ages: For Will. of Malmsbury in his Treatiſe concerning the Antiquities of the Church of Glaſtenbury, is the firſt that mentions it; when drawing its Hiſtory from the Apoſtles, he relates, that St Philip coming into France to Preach the Goſpel of Chriſt, and being willing to ſpread it further, choſe Twelve of his Diſciples, over whom he ſet his dear Friend Joſeph of Arimathæa, and ſent them to Preach the Word in Britain; and that coming over hither in the Sixty-third Year after Chriſt's Paſſion, he faithfully Preach'd the Goſpel; but a Britiſh King (whom he does not name) hearing things ſo new and unuſual, utterly refus'd to hearken to their Preaching, nor would change the Traditions of his Forefathers: yet becauſe they came from far, and ſhew'd great Simplicity of Life, he granted them a certain Iſland to inhabit, encompaſſed with Woods and Marſhes, called by the Inhabitants Iniſwitrin; where, by a Viſion of the Angel Gabriel, they built a ſmall Church, making the Walls with Wattles, in Honour of God and the Virgin Mary, where theſe Twelve Holy Men ſpent their Time in Devotions to God and the Bleſſed Virgin, by Faſting and Praying. Theſe things he ſays he had received from a Charter of St. Patrick's, as alſo from the Writings of the Antients; but that Charter is by the Learned Dr. Stillingfleet prov'd to be a meer Forgery of the Monks of Glaſtenbury: And as for ancient Writers, thô Malmsbury there cites Freculphus as an Author, who relates Philip's ſending Joſeph hither, yet the Archbiſhop there ſhews us, that this Author whom Malmsbury cites, had only taken a Paſſage from Iſidore's Book concerning the Fathers of both Teſtaments: But in both thoſe Authors it is only thus, That Philip Preached Chriſt to the Gauls, and Converted many Barbarous Nations lying near the Sea, to the Knowledge of the Goſpel; but ſays not one word of Joſeph's coming hither. So that, thô Cardinal Baronius hath placed this coming over of Joſeph in his Annals, and ſays, That he took it from a Manuſcript Hiſtory of England, which was in the Vatican Library; yet the Archbiſhop proves in another Place, that Hiſtory to have been written in Modern Times. So that all the Romiſh Writers on this Subject have borrow'd their Legends one from another, as the firſt of them did from our William of Malmsbury.

* Chap. III.

Anno Dom. LXIX.

The ſaid Archbiſhop there likewiſe tells us, as does alſo Sir Henry Spelman in the Firſt Volume of his Britiſh Councils, That in their time there was kept at Wells, in the Houſe of Sir Thomas Hughs, Knight, a brazen Plate, which was formerly faſtned to a Pillar of Glaſſenbury Church, wherein was Engraven this Story with divers Additions, too long to be here ſet down: Therefore I refer you to the ſaid Authors Works, where you may find it word for word, with the draught of it, as it was taken from the Original, where you may alſo ſee that he there conclude; from the modernneſs of the Character, as well as divers other Circumſtances in the Inſcription it ſelf, that it could not be above Three Hundred Years old, and ſo plainly betrays the Forgery of thoſe Monks, who ſet it up, and contriv'd the Story of St. David's Hand being pierced through with our Saviour's Finger, as it ſtands related in the ſaid Inſcription. But whoſoever is not ſatisfied with this, that is here ſet down, but deſires farther Satisfaction in the uncertainty of this Story of Joſeph of Arimathæa, may, if they pleaſe, conſult the ſaid Doctor's above-cited Treatiſe; where you will find all the Authorities that have been further made uſe of for this Story, learnedly confuted.

Anno Dom. LXIX.

The ſhort Reign of Galba affords us nothing relating to Britiſh Affairs, ~~no more~~ than that of Otho; only, that during this laſt Emperor's Reign, [*] Tacitus relates, That whilſt Trebellius Maximus govern'd Britain, he fell into the Hatred and Contempt of his Army, for his ſordid Covetouſneſs; and that this Averſion againſt him, was heightned by Roſcius Cælius, Legate of the Twentieth Legion, an old Enemy of his, inſomuch, that oftentimes by flight and hiding himſelf, he eſcaped the Fury of his Army: and that thus debaſing himſelf in a mean and abject manner, he exercis'd a precarious Authority, as if he and his Army ~~had~~ had agreed, that they ſhould enjoy a Licentiouſneſs of Living, and he his own Eaſe and Safety. But when the Civil Wars broke out between Otho and Vitellius, then began Trebellius and Cælius to fly into greater and more open Diſcords: Trebellius laying to Cælius's Charge the ſpreading of Sedition, and drawing the Soldiers from their Diſcipline and Obedience; whilſt on the other ſide, Cælius upbraided him of defrauding and Pillaging the Legions. Amidſt thoſe ſhameful Contentions, the Modeſty of the Army was ſo Corrupted, and their Inſolence grown to that height, that the Auxiliary Forces ſtuck not publickly to ſpeak ill of their General, and moſt of the Cohorts openly deſerting him, went over to Cælius. Trebellius being thus forſaken, preſently fled to Vitellius, who being then Emperor, received him but coldly, without Reſtoring him to his Command. After his Departure the Province remain'd for a time quiet, though without a Lieutenant; the Commanders of the Legions Governing with equal Authority; yet Cælius was moſt powerful, becauſe moſt daring.

Anno Dom. LXX.

But Vitellius not long after he came to the Empire, ſent hither Vectius Bolanus to ſucceed Trebellius: And it alſo appears by ſeveral paſſages in Tacitus, that no ſmall number of Britiſh Forces were Commanded over Sea, to ſerve in thoſe Bloody Civil Wars between Otho and Vitellius; eſpecially when he and Veſpaſian contended for the Empire; and particularly the Fourteenth Legion, called the Conquerors of Britain, having been removed from hence by Nero, to the Caſpian War; were again ſent into Britain by Vitellius, but recalled by Mutianus, on the behalf of Veſpatian.

But

But Bolanus during the Civil Wars, was not able to keep the diſcipline, much leſs to attempt any thing upon the Britains; ſince the Factions continued as great in the Army, as in the time of Trebellius; only with this difference, that Bolanus was Innocent, and not hated for any publick Vices; and carried himſelf ſo obligingly, that though he had not the Authority of a General, yet he Ruled by the Affections of the Souldiers. But now Vitellius fearing the power of Veſpaſian, whoſe Forces began daily to encreaſe; wrote to Bolanus for ſupplies: but he deferred it, partly becauſe the Britains were not ſufficiently quieted; ~~but~~ who taking the advantage of theſe diſſentions among the Romans, raiſed continually new Commotions, by the inſtigation of Venutius; who had hitherto carried on the War againſt the Romans, ever ſince they took part with his Wife Cartiſmandua; but chiefly becauſe the Souldiers of the Fourth Legion being incenſed againſt Vitellius, had ſent over privately Letters of Submiſſion to Veſpaſian. In this condition was Britain, during the Government of Bolanus, when Vitellius was depoſed about the Tenth Month of his Reign.

Anno Dom. LXXI.

Tacit. vita Agricol. 17.

Veſpaſian ſucceeded him, and as ſoon as he was declared Emperour, his great Reputation eaſily brought over the Legions in Britain to his Intereſt; for he had ſerved from a Youth in the Britiſh Wars, and being Lieutenant of the Second Legion, under Claudius, had fought many Battles, and taken many Towns from the Britains.

But as ſoon as Veſpaſian was acknowledged in Britain, as well as in the reſt of the Provinces; Famous Generals and great Armies were ſent hither, whereby the Enemies hopes were quite defeated: For the Emperor preſently ſent into Britain, Petilius Cærialis one of Conſular Dignity, as his Lieutenant; under whom Valour found not only a room to ſhow it ſelf, but alſo an Example in himſelf: For in the firſt place, he attack'd the State of the Brigantes, which is counted the moſt Populous in the whole Iſland, in which Expedition many Skirmiſhes happen'd, though ſometimes not without much Blood-ſhed; he taking in a great part of their Country by Conqueſt: But when Cærialis had indeed both eclips'd the Fame, as well as prevented the Care of a Succeſſor; Julius Frontinus ſucceeded him, who did as worthily ſuſtain that great Charge, being a very brave Man; he ſubdued the Silures, overcoming both the difficulties of Places, and the Valour of the Enemies.

Anno Dom. LXXVII.

In this State was Britain, when the Emperor ſent hither Agricola as his Lieutenant, who had learned his firſt Principles of War in Britain, under Paulinus a Mild, yet diligent General, who made him his Tent-fellow; neither did Agricola after the manner of ſome Young Men, turn Warfare into Wantoneſs, or made uſe of the Command of a Tribune, only for Pleaſure and Luxury; but made it his buſineſs to know the Province; to be known to the Army; to learn from the more Skillful; to imitate the Beſt; to undertake nothing ~~for~~ out of Vain Glory; to refuſe nothing for Fear; but at once to Act both Cautiouſly and Stoutly. For Cærialis, had from the beginning enured him to Labours and Dangers; and at laſt communicated a ſhare of Reputation, often times for a Tryal, giving him the Command of ſome part of the Army, and ſometimes encouraging his former Succeſs, by giving him the Command of greater Forces.

Anno Dom. LXXVIII.

This is the Character, which Tacitus gives us of this Great Man, whoſe Daughter he had Married, and this was the State of Affairs in Britain, when Agricola came over about Midſummer: When the Soldiers having laid aſide all thoughts of any Expedition, were grown ſecure, and the Britains on the other ſide were as watchful for Advantages, the Ordovices a little before the coming of this new General, had lately almoſt deſtroyed a whole Squadron of Horſe, that was Quarter'd in their Country, few eſcaping; whilſt thoſe Britains, who were deſirous of War, approved the Example; and others of them ~~rather~~ obſerved the Temper of the new Lieutenant: Then Agricola, although the Summer was ſpent, and the Souldiers diſperſed into their Winter Quarters, expecting nothing but Eaſe for the reſt of the Year; and though he conſidered the difficulties of beginning a War at that Seaſon; (moſt of his Officers thinking it ſufficient to defend what was weakeſt, and leaſt to be defended; yet he reſolved rather to obviate danger, than to expect it; ſo he gathered together ſome of the chief Legionary Cohorts, with a ſmall band of Auxiliaries. But becauſe the Ordovices durſt not come down into the Plains; he Lead the Army againſt them himſelf; that by expoſing his own perſon to equal Dangers, he might make them all a like Couragious: and having fought the Ordovices, he almoſt cut off their whole Nation.

But Agricola, knowing that reputation is chiefly gained by ſucceſs; and that as this firſt Enterprize ſucceeded, ſo it would give a countenance to thoſe that followed; He reſolved therefore to ſubdue the Iſle of Mona, from the Conqueſt of which Paulinus was recalled by the revolt of the Britains, as you have already heard; but wanting Ships for this Expedition, which was undertaken on the ſudden: He uſed this Policy for the Tranſporting his Men; he commanded them all to lay aſide their Baggage, ſending over firſt the chief of the Auxiliaries; who were acquainted with their ſhallows, and whoſe Countries uſe had taught them to Swim, govern their Horſes, and Fight all at once, which was executed ſo on the ſudden, that the Britains, who expected Fleets, and thought without Shipping nothing could attack them, were now ſurprized and daunted; ſince they believed nothing was difficult or invincible to Men, ſo reſolutely prepared for War; whereupon they deſired Peace, and delivered up the Iſland.

This ſudden Succeſs gained Agricola a great Reputation; eſpecially ſince he employed even his firſt Entrance into his Province, in labour and War; which by other Governours was ſpent in Ceremonies, or beſtowing of Commands; nor did he make uſe of his Proſperity for Oſtentation, or call this Expedition a Conqueſt; but only that he had reduced thoſe to Obedience, who had been before ſubdued; neither did he ſo much as adorn his Letters to Rome with Laurels: (as the cuſtom was) Yet even by this, ſlighting of Fame and Reputation, he at the ſame time encreaſed it; all Men admiring that, having ſuch great preſumptions of future ſucceſs, he could thus conceal ſuch noble Actions. Ibid. cap. 19 Having thus overcome the Britains, the next thing he ſet himſelf about, was to underſtand the Minds and Inclinations of the People; having learned by long experience, that little good was to be done by force, whilſt open injuries and oppreſſions were permitted; therefore he reſolved to cut up this War by the very Roots, ſo beginning with his Domeſticks, he firſt of all reformed his own Family, which is not leſs difficult to ſome than to Govern a Province; he acted nothing of publick concern by

by his Freedmen or Servants; nor did he nominate his Officers by his own private inclinations; nor on the bare recommendations, or intreaties of others; but ſtill choſe the moſt Vertuous and Faithful; he would both know and do all things himſelf; as for ſmall faults he pardoned them, but puniſhed great ones; nor was he always ſatisfied with puniſhment, but more often with Repentance; putting into Offices and Commands, rather ſuch who would not offend at all, than puniſh them when they had: He alſo rendered the payment of Corn and other Tributes more eaſie by the equality of the Taxation; cutting off thoſe exactions which were invented for private gain, and which were often more grievous, than the Taxes themſelves: for the People had been compelled to attend at the publick Granaries, which were on purpoſe kept locked againſt them; and when opened, the Publicans obliged them to take greater quantities of Corn than their neceſſities required, and ~~th~~at an ~~at~~ extravagant rate, and which they were often conſtrained to ſell again at a lower price to make Money for other neceſſaries, or the payment of their Tribute; the Purveyors alſo commanding them, when they pleaſed to carry it not to the neareſt, but remoteſt Markets, compounding with ſuch as would be excuſed: thus cauſing a ſcarcity where there was none indeed, they made a particular gain to themſelves: the reforming theſe abuſes in the very Firſt Year of his Government, brought Peace into Reputation; which either by the careleſneſs or connivances of his Predeceſſors, had hitherto been not leſs dreadful than War.

Geoffrey of Monmouth, and thoſe that follow him do about this time make Arviragus a Britiſh King, ~~now~~ to have reigned in ſome part of this Iſland; and then dying, that he was ſucceeded by one Marius, whom ſome will have to be the ſame with Gogidunus; all which being as uncertain, as whether there was ever any ſuch a Man or not; I ſhall not trouble my ſelf to diſpute, ſince this Arviragus, whom they ſuppoſe to have been his Father, lived in the Reign of Domitian, as I ſhall prove when I come to it.

About this time dyed the Emperor Veſpaſian, and was ſucceeded by his Son Titus, who rather exceeded, than equal'd his Father in Valour and Worth: He continued Agricola in the Government of Britain: who when Summer was once come drew together his Army, praiſing the good Diſcipline of his Souldiers, whilſt they keept cloſe to their Enſigns, and puniſhing the Straglers; he himſelf always chuſing the places whereon to Encamp; and before hand ſearched the Woods, and Sounded the Fords they were to paſs; by which means he not only hindred the Enemy from taking any reſt, but ſo continually allarmed them with freſh Excurſions, that he prevented the pillaging of the Roman Territories: Having thus ſufficiently terrified them; he then began by ſparing them to ſhow them ſome allurements to Peace; by which means many Cities that before ſtood upon Terms, now laid down their Arms, gave Hoſtages, and received Garriſons; which were all placed with ſuch care and foreſight, and in ſuch places of advantage, that never any of them were attempted; whereas before no new fortified place in all Britain eſcaped unattacked.

Ib. c. 20.

The following Winter was wholly ſpent in a wiſe and profitable deſign; for to the end, that the Britains who then lived rude and ſcattered, and ſo apter to make War, might be accuſtomed to pleaſure, and living at eaſe; he privately encouraged, and publickly promoted the building of Temples, Houſes, and Places for Publick Aſſemblies; commending the Readineſs of ſome, and quickening the Slowneſs of others, whilſt Emulation of Honour wrought more than Compulſion among them. He alſo cauſed the Noble-Men's Sons to be inſtructed in the Liberal Sciences: And by commending the Wits of Britain before theſe of Gaul, he brought them, who before hated the Roman Language, to grow in love with the Latin Eloquence. And now came the Roman Garb to be in faſhion; and the Gown no Stranger among them. Thus came in by degrees all the Allurements of Vice and Voluptuous Living; as Porticoes, Baths, with the Luxury of Banquets; which was by the Ignorant called Good Breeding, and Civility; when, indeed, it was but a Badge of their own Slavery.

hitherto unknown to the Romans

†In the Third Year's Expedition, Agricola diſcover'd ~~new~~ Nations, waſting the Countries as far as the Frith called the Taus. Thus by the Terrour of his Marches he ſo aw'd the Enemy, that though his Army was much haraſs'd by bad Weather, yet durſt they not attack him; ſo that he had time enough to build Forts: And thoſe that were skilful took notice, that no other General did more prudently chuſe Places fit to be fortified. So that no Caſtle of Agricola's was ever taken by Force, or deſerted: But from theſe, being well provided with Proviſions for a Years Siege, his Men made frequent Sallies. So ~~that~~ much the Enemy, who before uſed in Winter to re-gain what in Summer they had loſt, were now alike in both Seaſons ſtraitned and kept ſhort. Neither did Agricola, as too covetous of Honour, attribute to himſelf things done by others; ſince every Officer or Centurion had him for an impartial Witneſs, as well as Judge of his Actions; And though he were taxed by ſome, as too bitter in his Reproofs, yet muſt it be granted, that as he was gentle to the Good, ſo he was moroſe to the bad; but his Anger did not laſt long: Nor needed one to have fear'd his Silence, or Reſervedneſs; for he thought it much better to diſpleaſe a Man, than hate him.

The Emperor Titus, for theſe great Atchievments of Agricola, was fifteen times ſaluted Imperator, or General: And the Honour he got by the Actions of ſo great a Commander, he rewarded with Triumphal Ornaments. Not long after which, Titus (ſtiled for his Goodneſs, Deliciæ humani generis, The Delight of Mankind) dyed (as was ſuſpected) by Poyſon.

Anno Dom. LXXXI.

Domitian, his Brother (a Man as wicked as the other was vertuous) ſucceeded ~~to~~ him. It was now the Fourth Year of Agricola's Government in Britain; which was alſo ſpent in ſecuring what the Summer before had been gotten in this Iſland: And had the Courage of his Soldiers been anſwerable to the Conduct of the General, and the Fortune of the Commonwealth, he had now reach'd the utmoſt Bounds of Britain; for Glota and Bodotria (now Dunbritain and Edinburgh-Fryths) running from both Seas, far into the Continent, and being diſ-joyn'd by a narrow Neck of Land; theſe, together with all the Creeks and Havens on this ſide of the Streight, were held by Roman Gariſons, and the Enemies, as it were, confin'd in another Iſland.

Anno Dom. LXXXII.

* Ibid. cap. 24.

* In the Fifth Year of his Government, and as ſoon as the Seaſon would admit paſſing over the Bodotrian Frith, he ſubdued divers Nations, (until then unknown) in frequent and proſperous Battels; placing Gariſons in that part of Britain that lies over againſt Ireland, though more in hopes of a new Conqueſt, than for fear of any Invaſion: For Ireland lying in the midſt, between Britain and Spain, lies convenient for the Anno Dom. LXXXII. Gallick Sea, and would have united the vaſt Members of the Empire, and render'd them highly uſeful to each other. This Iſland, if compared to Britain, is much leſs; yet exceeds all the Iſlands of the Mediterranian Sea: The Soil and Climate, together with the Diſpoſitions and Mannners of the Inhabitants, being not much different from thoſe of the Britains; but its Havens are better known to Traders, by reaſon of its greater Commerce. Agricola had receiv'd one of the petty Kings of this Nation, who had been expell'd by a Domeſtick Sedition; and retain'd him under a Shew of Friendſhip, till a fit Occaſion. Tacitus further ſays, That Agricola told him, that he believ'd Ireland might be both conquer'd and kept with only one Legion; and that it might be uſeful even againſt Britain, if the Roman Arms were extended thither, and Liberty were once, as it were, baniſh'd quite out of ſight.

This, though it be a Digreſſion from our Hiſtory of Britain, yet I thought good not to omit, becauſe it gives the beſt and moſt particular Account we have in any ancient Hiſtorian concerning Ireland: As alſo, the Reaſon why ſo great a General as Agricola thought it worth his Conqueſt.

Anno Dom. LXXXIII. † Ibid.cap.24. † But the next Summer, which was the Sixth Year of his Command, he firſt diſcover'd by his Fleet thoſe large Countries lying beyond the Bodotrian Frith; and Incurſions of all thoſe Nations lying beyond it, were much fear'd by him. This Fleet was by Agricola alſo made uſe of, to aſſiſt his Land-Forces; and therefore ſtill follow'd him, making a dreadful Shew as it ſail'd along. The War was thus carry'd on, both by Sea and Land; Nay, often in the ſame Camp, the Foot, with the Horſe-men, and Marine Forces, would meet, and make merry together; where each in his Turn would extol their own Feats and Adventures; comparing the Dangers of the Woods and Mountains, with the Accidents and Hazards of the Waves and Tempeſts; and that as the Britains by Land, ſo the Ocean it ſelf was by them ſubdued: Thus they boaſted in a Soldier-like way. But, as Agricola afterwards heard from ſome Priſoners, the Sight of his Fleet ſo much diſhearten'd the Britains, as that the utmoſt recesses ~~Secrets~~ of their own Seas being now diſcover'd, the Conquer'd had even loſt their laſt Refuge. But then the Caledonians made great Preparations for War, though with greater Fame than Reality; as it is uſual for it to relate too much of things unknown, giving out, as if they had aſſaulted and taken ſome Roman Fort. This News made ſome afraid, who being Cowardly, under the Shew of Prudence, took upon them to adviſe the General, that they ought to retreat to the other ſide of the Frith; and that they ſhould rather do it voluntarily, than by conſtraint. But when Agricola knew that the Enemy would invade him in many diſtinct Parties, leſt he ſhould be environ'd by Numbers far exceeding his own, he himſelf divided his Army into Three Detachments.

* Ibid.cap.26. * Which, when it was known to the Enemy, changing their Deſign on a ſudden, they in one entire Body broke in by Night upon the Ninth Legion, as being the weakeſt, and killed the Centinels between ſleeping and waking; and now they fought in the very Camp. When Agricola, having by Scouts learnt the Enemy's March, follow'd them at the Heels, and commanded the ſwifteſt of his Horſe and lighteſt Foot-men to charge upon their Rear, whilſt the whole Army preſently ſeconded them with Shouts. The Britains hearing the Enemy behind them, were diſhearten'd; eſpecially when the Day appearing, diſcover'd the glittering Enſigns of the Romans, who then took heart, and renew'd the Fight; not as Men doubtful of Victory, but ambitious of Honour: For now might be ſeen ſome of the Roman Soldiers getting into their own Camp, whilſt others ſought to get out; both contending, which ſhould have the moſt Glory; the one, in bringing a timely Aſſiſtance; the other, in not ſeeming to have needed it. In this Fight the Britains were routed; and had they not betaken themſelves to their old Refuge, the Woods and Bogs, that Day had put a Period to the War.

Anno Dom. LXXXIII.

* By this conſtant Succeſs, the Army gain'd freſh Courage; and they now all cried out, That nothing was impoſſible for their Valour; that Caledonia was to be paſſed through; and that at laſt they would fight their Way to the utmoſt Bounds of Britain: And they who were lately ſo wiſe and cautelous, now ſeem'd as forward, and talk'd as big, after this Succeſs, as the beſt. And this, indeed, is the hard Fate of War; All challenge a Share in the Succeſs, whilſt Misfortunes are laid upon a ſingle Perſon. However, the Britains would not own themſelves beaten by the Courage of the Roman Soldiers, but by the Cunning and Conduct of the General; and therefore they had no meaner Thoughts of themſelves than before, but made new Levies, in order to proſecute the War; and beforehand carried their Wives and Children into Places of Safety, ſending about, through all their Cities, to enter into new Confederacy; which was afterwards ratified with ſolemn Rites and Sacrifices: And ſo their Spirits being thus heightned, they at preſent return'd home.

* Ibid. cap. 27.

The ſame Summer, a Cohort of Veſpaſian's, raiſed in Germany, and ſent into Britain, having ſlain a Centurion, and other Soldiers that were appointed to exerciſe them, deſerted, and went to Sea in three Pinnaces; and having kill'd two of the Maſters whom they ſuſpected, the other they conſtrain'd to do his Duty. Having thus eſcaped, and none knowing what was become of them, and having no Pilotes, they were carried at random, as the Tides and Winds drove them to and fro. Thus compaſſing the Iſland, they practis'd Piracy where they landed; and often fighting with the Britains, who defended their Goods, were ſometimes Victors, and ſometimes worſted; till at laſt they were driven to that great Extremity for want of Proviſions, that firſt they devour'd the weakeſt of their own Men; and then drew Lots, who of them ſhould be eaten afterwards. Thus having floated round Britain, and loſt their Ships for want of Skill to ſteer them, getting on Shore, they were taken, and ſold as Pirates, firſt by the Suevians, and afterwards by the Friſians, till at laſt they were ſold into Britain; where the ſtrangeneſs of the Accident render'd this Diſcovery of the Iſland more famous.

Anno Dom. LXXXIV.

† Ibid. cap. 28, 29.

† But Agricola having in the beginning of this Summer loſt a young Son, made uſe of War as a Remedy to vent his Grief; therefore he ſent his Fleet before, which by ſpoiling many Places on the Coaſt, ſtruck a greater Terror into the Enemy: He himſelf with a flying Army conſiſting chiefly of Britains, whoſe Courage and Faith he had long experienced, following it, marched as far as the Grampian Hills, upon which the Enemy had Poſted themſelves; for the Britains nothing daunted with the ill Succeſs of the laſt Fight, and expecting nothing but Revenge or Slavery from their new Leagues and Confederacies, were got together Thirty Thouſand ſtrong, more being daily expected; nay, the aged themſelves would not be exempted from this Days Service, but as they had been brave Men in their time, ſo every one of them bore ſome Badge or Mark of his youthful Atchievements. Among theſe was Galgacus, chief in Authority and Birth; who when the Army cry'd out for the Signal of Battel, is brought in by Tacitus, making a long yet noble Oration; which thô it is likely he never ſpoke, and that it is contrary to my Deſign to ſtuff theſe Annals with long Speeches, yet ſince there is a great deal of good Senſe and ſharp Satyr expreſſed in it againſt his own Nation, I ſhall contract ſome part of it, and render the reſt word for word.

Ibid. c. 30, 31, 30.

Galgacus his Speech to the Britains.

he

"In the firſt place ~~having~~ ſet forth the Occaſion of making War upon the Romans, from the Neceſſity of avoiding Slavery, as being the laſt People of Britain that were yet unconquer'd, and that beyond them there was no more Earth nor Liberty left: That now the utmoſt Bounds of Britain were diſcovered, and no other Nations but them left to employ the Roman Armies, whoſe Pride they might ſeek to pleaſe in vain by Services and Submiſſions; thoſe Robbers of the World, who having left no Land unplunder'd, ranſack even the Ocean it ſelf. If the Enemy be Rich, they are greedy of his Wealth; if Poor, they covet Glory; whom neither the Eaſt nor Weſt could ever ſatisfie; the only Men in the World who purſue both the Rich and the Needy with equal Appetite: To Kill and Plunder, they call Governing; and when they have brought Deſolation on a Country, they term it Peace. That Nature, by neareſt ties, had link'd their Children and Relations to them, yet even theſe were taken away and preſſed into their Service: That their Wives and Siſters, if they eſcap'd their Violence, yet could not avoid Diſhonour; ſince when they came as Gueſts into their Houſes, they were ſure to Debauch them: Their Goods and Fortunes they made their Tributes; their Corn, ~~their~~ Proviſion to ſupply their Granaries; and wore out their Bodies in cutting down Woods, ~~and~~ draining Fens, and paving Mariſhes; nay, and all this amidſt a Thouſand Stripes and Indignities: That Slaves who are born to Bondage, were ſold but once, and afterwards kept at their Maſters Charges; but Britain daily bought its own Bondage, and maintain'd it too.

[illegible]

He then proceeds to exhort them to be tenacious of their Liberty, leſt (like the laſt Slave in a private Family, who is the Sport and Scorn of his Fellows when conquer'd) they ſhould be flouted by thoſe who had been uſed as Drudges long before, adviſing them to take Courage and Example from the Brigantes, who under the Conduct of a Woman had almoſt quite deſtroyed the Romans, and might have driven them out of Britain, had they not failed in the Attempt by their too great Security and Succeſs. Then magnifying the Valour and Strength of his own Nation, and leſſening that of the Romans, as made up of divers Nations, who unwillingly ſerved them, and as ſoon as they durſt would turn againſt them; he concluded with ſhewing what Advantages they had above the Romans, to make them hope for Victory, and the miſerable Slavery they were like to undergo if they were vanquiſhed; and therefore going now to Battel, adviſed them to remember the Freedom of their Anceſtors, as well as the Danger of Slavery to themſelves and their Poſterity.

‖ Ibid. c. 33, 34.

‖ The Britains received this Speech with great Teſtimonies of Joy, ſuch as Songs and confus'd Clamours, after the Cuſtom of their Country; all which ſhew'd their Approbation, and now their Arms began to glitter, and every one to put himſelf in Array, when Agricola, ſcarce able to repreſs the Heat of his Soldiers, yet thinking it convenient to ſay ſomething thing to them, made a Speech to this Effect, (for, being ſomewhat long, I ſhall make bold to Contract it:) Firſt he told his Soldiers, That this was the Eighth Year that their Valour, protected by the Fortune of the Roman Empire, had ſubdu'd the Britains in ſo many Battels, and that as he had exceeded his Predeceſſors in Succeſs, ſo they had all former Armies. That Britain was now no longer known, only by Fame and Report; and that as they have had the Honor to diſcover, ſo likewiſe might they to ſubdue it: That he had often heard them ask, When they ſhould meet the Enemy? but now they had their Deſires, now was the time to ſhew their Valour, and that as every thing would happen as they could wiſh if they Conquer'd; ſo all things made againſt them, if they were overcome. That if it was Great and Noble to have Marched ſo much Ground, to have paſt ſo many Woods, and both the Friths, yet if they fled, the very ſame things would be their Hindrance and Deſtruction: That as for his part he had been long ſince ſatisfied, that to run away was neither ſafe for the Soldier nor General; and that a Commendable Death was to be preferr'd before the Reproaches of an Ignominious Life; that Safety and Honour were now inſeparably conjoyned: And let the worſt happen, yet how glorious would it be to die in the utmoſt Bounds of the World and Nature? Then putting them in mind of their late Victories, and repreſenting theſe Britains they were now to fight with, as the Meaneſt and moſt Raſcally of all the Nations they had Conquer'd, ſo he doubts not but they will afford them an occaſion of a memorable Victory. Then concludes, in adviſing them to make an end of the War, and to Fifty Years Labours add one great concluding Day, by which means they ſhould approve themſelves to their Country; and that it ſhould never be juſtly laid to their Charge, that they had Protracted the War, nor let ſlip any Opportunity of compleating their Conqueſt.

Anno Dom. LXXXIV.

The Subſtance of Agricola's Speech.

Whilſt Agricola was yet ſpeaking, the Soldiers expreſſed great Signs of their Eagerneſs and Reſolution, but the Concluſion of his Speech was received with loud and joyful Acclamations, whilſt every Man ſtood to his Arms, and ſhewed his Impatience to march on. Agricola order'd the Battel after this manner; his Main Body was made up of Eight Thouſand Auxiliary Foot, and Three Thouſand Horſe were placed in the Wings, the Legions being ſet in the Rear before the Camp, for the greater Glory of the Victory, if it could be won without any loſs of Roman Blood; if otherwiſe for Succour and Aſſiſtance.

The Britiſh Army, for the greater ſhew and Terror, was drawn upon a riſing Gound; the firſt Battalion ſtood on the Plain, the next a degree higher, as the Hill aſcended, the Field rang with the Clattering Noiſe of Chariots and Horſemen rangeing up and down. Agricola perceiving the Enemy exceeded him in numbers, and fearing leſt they might attack him in the Front and Flanks at once, ſtretch'd out his Front in length; and although by that means his Van-guard was ſomewhat thin, and that many Councelled him to take the Legions into it, yet he ſtood firm to his firſt Reſolution, and alighting from his Horſe, placed himſelf at the head of the Foot before the Enſigns.

Ib. cap. 36.

*The Fight began at a diſtance, with miſſive Weapons, wherein the Britains ſhew'd wondrous Skill and Conſtancy, for with their broad Swords and ſhort Targets they either avoided the Darts, or ſhook them off, and in return liberally beſtow'd whole Showres of their own; Agricola perceiving this Diſadvantage, commanded Three Batavian Cohorts, and Anno Dom. LXXXIV. Two of the Tungrians, that they ſhould bring it ſpeedily to dint of Sword, which they eaſily performed, as being fitted for it by long exerciſe, but the Britains on the other ſide having little Targets, and huge unwildy Swords without points, lay under a great diſadvantage, nor could endure a cloſe down right fighting; ſo that when the Batavians came to exchange blows with them, and to make at their Faces with the Pikes of their Targets, they eaſily bore them down, and proſecuting their Victory, advanced to the ſide of the Hill; the reſt of the Cohorts being ſpurr'd on by Emulation, and ſtriking at all that were near them, run on in the ſame courſe, leaving for haſt many behind them, ſome half Dead, others untouch'd; in the mean while as the Horſe-men fled, the Chariots brake in upon the Foot; ſo they who had lately terrified others, were now diſtreſſed themſelves, being penn'd in by their own cloſe Ranks, as well as the unevenneſs of the Ground.

But the manner of this Battel was not like a looſe skirmiſh of Horſemen, but all keeping their Ranks, endeavoured by the weight of their Horſes to bear down the Enemy, and now might be ſeen Chariots without Drivers, and the affrighted Horſes running to and fro, without Riders, overturning all that met them, or thwarted their way.

But when thoſe Britains, who had not yet engaged, but on the tops Ibid. 38. of the Hills deſpiſed the paucity of the Romans, began to draw down by degrees, and taking a compaſs to fall upon them in the Rear; Agricola having foreſeen their deſign, with Four Squadrons of Horſe, which he had reſerved for ſuch a purpoſe, oppoſed their Deſcent, and driving them back with as great haſt as they had come forward, put them totally to flight; ſo that now this project of the Britains was turned upon themſelves; ſome Troops of Horſe being by the General's order taken from the Front of the Battel, and ſent to charge the Enemy in the Rear; then might have been ſeen in the open Plain a great and diſmal Scene of War, ſome purſuing, wounding, taking, and then killing thoſe that were taken; when other freſh ones came in the way; now whole Regiments of the Britains, according to their ſeveral diſpoſitions, though Arm'd, and more numerous turning their backs, whilſt others though unarm'd ran deſperately upon the Swords of their Enemies; the whole field was covered with ſcattered Arms, Dead Bodies, with mangled Limbs and Blood; whilſt many wallowing in their own gore, ceaſed not to give ſome proofs of their laſt Anger and Revenge: But when the Britains, by running away, had got nearer the Woods, rallying again, they circumvented thoſe that purſued them, as being unwary and ignorant of thoſe places: Agricola (who was every where) prevented this by ſending out ſome Light Arms, yet ſtrong Cohorts, and as alſo by Commanding ſome of his Horſe-men to alight, and ſcoure the thickeſt parts of the Wood; theſe might have ſuffered conſiderably for their raſhneſs: But when the Britains once ſaw that the Romans followed the purſuit cloſe, and in good order, they all fled, thô not as before in whole Troops and Companies; but diſperſed and ſtragling into remote and by-places until Night, and the ſatiety of ſlaughter put an end to the chaſe: Of the Britains Ten Thouſand were Slain: Of the Romans Three Hundred and Forty; amongſt which was Aurelius Atticus, Commander in chief of a Cohort; who through Youthful heat, and the over-much mettle of his Horſe, was carried into the midſt of the Enemy. The Night was ſpent with Ib. 38. Joy by the Romans; being now fluſh'd with Victory and Spoil; but the

Britains

Anno Dom. LXXXIV.

Britains ran wandring up and down; Men and Women howling together, ſome lug'd on the Wounded, whilſt others cryed for help, to thoſe that were not hurt; ſome forſook their Houſes, and of their own accord ſet Fire on them, ſearching out holes to hide themſelves in for ſafety, which they as quickly left, to find out others; ſometimes in conſult together they entertained ſome glimmerings of hope, and then again fell into deſpair, being ſometimes diſpirited, and ſome times enraged at the ſight of their deareſt Relations; and it is certain, that many out of a cruel compaſſion laid violent hands on their Wives and Children to ſecure them from the cruelty of the Romans: But Day appearing gave a plainer proſpect of their Victory; every where reign'd deſolation and ſilence; the Hills being forſaken, and the Cottages ſmoaking afar off: when the Scouts brought word that no body appear'd, only that they found the uncertain Footſteps of their flight. Whereupon Agricola, becauſe the Summer was far ſpent, and that no fit Seaſon to divide his Forces; brought them in an entire body into the borders of the Horeſti: (ſuppoſed to be the Inhabitants of Eske-Dale in Scotland) where having received Hoſtages, he Commanded the Admiral of his Fleet to Sail round about Britain; furniſhing him with all things neceſſary, but the terrour of the Navy was gone before, whilſt he with ſlow and eaſie marches, to the end he might ſtrike the greater terrour into the new Conquer'd Nations, arrived at his Winter Quarters, whilſt the Navy with proſperous Winds and good Succeſs, ſafely arrived at the Port Trutulenſis (ſuppoſed by Mr. Somner, to be Richborough, near Sandwich) in Kent from whence it had ſet out, and coaſting along the neareſt ſide of Britain returned thither again.

And now the Romans firſt diſcovered the Iſles of Orkeney, which others, with leſs Reaſon following Oroſius, aſcribe unto Claudius.

Ib. ch. 39.

Agricola, having ſent a plain account of theſe Tranſactions (and that without any vain Glory or Amplification) the Emperor, as his manner was, received them with a ſhew of Joy, thô with an inward Trouble of Mind; for he was Conſcious to himſelf, that his own Counterfeit Triumph over the Germans was a ridiculous piece of Pageantry (to ſet out which, for want of real Captives, he was forced to buy ſuch as by their Hair and Attire might perſonate them); whereas the great and real Victorys of Agricola, where ſo many Thouſand were Slain, being applauded by all Men, would give him a vaſt Reputation: Thinking it therefore dangerous, that the Glory of a private Man ſhould Eclipſe that of his Prince, He ſecretly deſign'd his Ruine, thinking it in vain to have ſuppreſſed the Study of Oratory, and other Liberal Arts, thereby to depreſs other Mens Fame; if he ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be thus ſurpaſſed in the Art of War, which he eſteemed the peculiar honour of an Emperour, being daily tormented with theſe Cares, and much alone in his Cloſet (which was always with him ſtill a ſign of ſome enſuing miſchief) he thought it beſt for the preſent to hide his reſentments, till the noiſe of Agricola's Victory, as well as the Love of the Army towards him, was a little abated; he continued him therefore in his Command for ſome time, and with all ſhews of acknowledgments for ſo great Services, and ordering the Senate to decree him Triumphal Ornaments, with the honour of a Statue; himſelf ſpeaking highly in his Favour.

Dion. lib. 67.

Ib. c. 40.

He alſo cauſed a Report to be ſpread abroad, that the Province of Syria, then void by the Death of Attilius Rufus, and reſerved for Perſons Anno Dom. LXXXIV. of the higheſt Rank, ſhould be beſtowed upon Agricola; and it was alſo commonly believed, that a Freed-man imployed in the Emperours moſt ſecret Services, was ſent to Agricola with a Commiſſion for the Government of Syria with private Orders, if he were then in Britain, that it ſhould be delivered: But that the Meſſenger meeting Agricola at Sea, never ſo much as ſaluting him, returned again to Domitian; whether this were true or only feigned (as agreeable to the humour of this Prince) is uncertain.

Anno Dom. LXXXV. However, Agricola delivered the Province peaceabl~~y~~e and quiet to his Succeſſour; and leaſt his entrance into the City ſhould be too remarkable, by the croud of thoſe that might go out to meet him, he came (as he was ordered) by Night into the Palace, where being received with a ſhort ſalute, and no particular diſcourſe, he preſently drew off amongſt the croud of attendants.

But tho' it is not to our preſent Deſign, give me leave to wait on this Great Man to his Grave, and give you Tacitus's laſt Account of him, ſince he is ſo great an Example of Moderation in Proſperity, as well as of Patience under the Slights and Affronts of an inſolent Tyrant.

Ibid. 41, 42. * But Agricola, though he thus ſtriv'd to leſſen his own great Reputation, which is ever grievous to thoſe that are lazy and unwarlike, yet by his Retirement he increaſed his own Glory, as well as his Vertues; ſtill continuing modeſt in his Garb, eaſie of Acceſs, and never accompanied with more than one or two Friends: So that moſt People, who are accuſtom'd to eſteem Great Men only by Titles and outward Appearances, when they ſaw Agricola thus private, wonder'd at his great Reputation, and few underſtood his Vertues. And though, not long after, when abſent, he had been accuſed to Domitian, yet he was alſo acquitted; there being no Crime alledg'd againſt him, unleſs it were to have liv'd under a Prince who was an Enemy to all Vertue. Beſides, Had thoſe worſe ſort of all Enemies, Flatterers prevail'd; there happen'd afterwards ſuch Times which would not permit Agricola's Fame to be conceal'd, ſo many Armies being loſt in Germany, Pannonia, and other Provinces, through the Raſhneſs or Cowardice of the Commanders, that Agricola was again deſir'd by all Men to command, comparing his Conſtancy and Experience in War with the Sloth and Cowardice of others. Which Diſcourſes coming often to the Ears of Domitian, whilſt ſome of his Freed-men fairly repreſented his Merits, and others of the worſt ſort, through Envy and ill Will, as much miſrepreſenting them, it provoked this Prince, too apt of himſelf to do evil: So that Agricola, by his own Vertues, as well as the Vices of others, was often near Ruin. And though ſome time after, when the Proconſulſhip of Africa was void by the Death of Civica lately ſlain, the Command of this Province was ſeemingly offer'd him, whilſt ſome were privately to offer their Aſſiſtance in making his Excuſe; and others, more bold and open, both perſuading, and alſo terrifying him, brought him into Domitian's Preſence; who being already prepar'd to diſſemble, haughtily (though willingly) accepted his Excuſes; nay, ſuffer'd himſelf to be thank'd for his Accepting them; nor bluſh'd at his own Envy of ſo ſmall a Benefit; nor did he ſo much as beſtow upon Agricola, ~~who~~ the w~~a~~nted ~~a~~ Salary, which had been uſually allow'd to thoſe that had been Proconſuls; as either being offended that it was not asked him, or out of Guilt, leſt he ſhould ſeem to have ~~b~~ſought that which he did not deſire; ſince it is the Property of too many many Mens Natures to hate thoſe that have too much oblig'd them; yet Domitian, though prone to Anger, and (by how much the more hidden, ſo much the more dangerous) was nevertheleſs mollified by this rare Moderation and Prudence of Agricola, ſince he did neither augment his own Fame, by any vain Boaſting of his Merits; nor yet accelerate his Fate by Contumacy or Sullenneſs. So that all thoſe whoſe Cuſtom it is, only to believe things dangerous, unlawful, may be convinc'd that great and good Men may often live ſafe under the worſt of Princes; and that Obſequiouſneſs and Modeſty, attended with Prudence and Induſtry, do far exceed all that Glory to which many by violent Courſes, but for no publick Benefit to the Commonwealth, and by a too much ſought for Fate, have endeavour'd to attain. However, thus much is certain, That not long after this, Agricola died, (whether by Poyſon, or not, is uncertain,) to the common Grief of his Friends, as well as Strangers; and even Domitian himſelf appear'd to be concern'd at his Loſs, though he could more eaſily diſſemble his Joy, than Fear. Thus died the famous Agricola, who carried the Roman Eagles to the utmoſt bounds of Britain; Conquering more Nations than all his Predeceſſours before had done, and had alſo ſubdued Ireland, had not the Jealouſie of Domitian too ſoon recalled him: If Tacitus, or ſome other faithful Hiſtorian had given us as exact an account of the Actions of theſe other Lieutenants, that were ſent into Britain, during the Reign of this Emperour and his Succeſſours, then we might have had a compleat Hiſtory of thoſe times; But we are now at ſo great an uncertainty, that we cannot tell, who it was to whom Agricola reſigned his Command; only we read in Suetonius of one Saluſtius Lucullus, to have been Legate of Britain, in the days of this Emperour; but nothing can be found of any others or of him, more than that he was ſlain by Domitian, for giving his own name to a ſort of Spears which he had invented.

Domitian.

But this ſeems more certain, that not long after Agricola's departure; the Britains recovering freſh Strength and Courage, under the Conduct of Arviragus, rebelled againſt the Romans, as ſome gather from that Speech, which Frabricius Veiento, is ſuppoſed by Juvenal to ſpeak in flattery of Domitian:

> Omen habes inquit, magni clarique triumphi;
> Regem aliquem capies, aut de temone Britanno
> Excidet Arviragus——
> ——See the Mighty Omen, ſee,
> He cries, of ſome Illuſtrious Victory;
> Some Captive King, thee his new Lord ſhall own,
> Or from his Britiſh Chariot headlong thrown,
> The proud Arviragus come tumbling down.

As I find it Elegantly tranſlated in Mr. Dryden's Juvenal. lib. 1. Sat. 4. v. 125.

Dion alſo mentions C. N. Trebellius to have governed Britain, though in what time is uncertain; but Tacitus in his Proem, to his Firſt Book of Hiſtories, ſpeaks of Britain, as though formerly Conquer'd, but as then loſt; which though it might be true, yet that it was again recovered is alſo as certain; ſince during the Reigns of the ſucceeding Emperours, we find Britain, as far as the Friths of Dunbritton and Edinburgh, entirely reduced into the form of a Roman Province, which was not governed by any particular Prætor or Proconſul, but was eſteemed Præſidialis; that is, under the immediate protection and Eye of the Emperour, and held by his Gariſons, and thus it continued as long as Britain remained a Member of the Roman Empire.

Anno Dom. now LXXXII.

But about the end of Domitians Reign, Arviragus is ſuppoſed by Geoffrey to have deceaſed; and that his Son Marius, called by the Britiſh Hiſtorians Meurig, ſucceeded him.

I have no more to obſerve during the Reign of Domitian, than that in his time, Claudia Rufina, a Britiſh Lady, was the Wife of Pudens a Senator, and ſhe is famous in that Elegant Epigram of Martial for her Beauty, Wit and Learning; but more excellent was ſhe for her profeſſion of Chriſtianity, if ſhe were the ſame Woman St. Paul mentions in his Second Epiſtle to Timothy, as ſome of our Engliſh Hiſtorians have (though without any great certainty) aſſerted, for it is certain that St. Paul wrote this Epiſtle to Timothy, in the Reign of Nero; and therefore it is not likely that this Claudia ſhould be ~~found~~ famed for her Beauty, in the latter end of the Reign of Domitian; or elſe of Trajan, above Twenty Years after, ſince by that time, ſhe muſt certainly have been a Woman of more Years than Beauty.

Anno Dom. XCVI.

The ſhort Reign of the Emperour Nerva, affords us nothing of certainty, concerning the Affairs of Britain, only that in his Reign, as alſo in that of Anno Dom. XCVIII.

Trajan his Succeſſour, There were great Commotions in this Iſland, which may be alſo gathered out of Spartianus's Hiſtory. But in the Reign of this Emperour, the Britains are ſaid by him to have Revolted; yet were ſoon reduced again to Obedience. To his Reign, we may alſo refer, that War which Geoffrey of Monmouth mentions, to have been made by Roderick King of the Picts; who aiding the Caledonians, was overcome and Slain by this King Marius above mentioned; which Victory, although it be only related by this Hiſtorian; Yet Arch-biſhop Uſher in his above cited * Work, does not think it unlikely; ſince William of Malmesbury, before ever Geoffrey had publiſhed his Hiſtory, makes mention of this Marius, in theſe words, There is in the City of Luguballia (now called Carliſle) a Room Arch'd with Stone, which can neither by Weather or Fire be deſtroyed, the Country is called Cumberland, and the Inhabitants Cumbri; and in the Front of this Room, there is to be Read this Inſcription, Marii Victoriæ; but though Mr. Cambden (ſpeaking of this place) ſays, he has found it written Marti Victori in ſome Copies, yet thoſe could not be true, as being quite contrary to Malmesbury's meaning; who preſently after adds, What this ſhould mean I much doubt, unleſs perhaps ſome part of the Cymbrians planted themſelves in theſe parts, after they had been driven out of Italy by Marius: But Ranulph of Cheſter in his Polychronicon, doth thus rectifie this miſtake of Malmesbury, "As "who not having ſeen the Britiſh Hiſtory, attributed this Inſcription to "Marius the Roman; when it indeed belonged to Marius the Britiſh King. This Battel is ſuppoſed to have been fought in the great Moore, now called Stanmore, in Weſtmoreland; as a Monk of Malmesbury, in the Book called Eulogium, hath written.

* De Eccleſ. Brit. Antiquitat.

We have nothing to Remark in the Reign of Trajan, unleſs it is what Geoffrey of Monmouth relates to have been performed in Britain in his time: Which I ſhall here give you. The publick ways (ſaith he) Trajan repaired by Paving them with Stone, or raiſing Cauſeways, even ſuch places as were wet and boggy, or by grubbing and clearing ſuch as were rough and over grown with Buſhes and Woods; making Bridges over Rivers, where the way was too long; where by reaſon of ſome ſteep Hill, the way was difficult, he turned it aſide through more level places; or if it ran through Forreſts, Waſtes and Deſerts, by drawing it from thence, through places inhabited.

Anno Dom. XCVII.

Ælius Hadrian, ſucceeded his Unkle Trajan in the Empire; he was alſo a Spaniard, and theſe two were the Firſt Emperours, who were not by birth Romans; he differed from Trajan in his policy of extending the Empire, and rather to imitate Auguſtus his Rule, in reſtraining its limits to render it ſtronger and more united, in ſo much, that he excluded on the Eaſt all Armenia, Media, Perſia and Meſopotamia, being the Conqueſts of Trajan: yet excepted Britain alone from this retrenchment; which Province he by no means would part with, although he ſomewhat ſtreightned it, as ſhall be ſhewn by and by. Under him Julius Severus was Lieutenant, an excellent Soldier; and upon that account called away to ſuppreſs the Jews then in Rebellion.

Dion. Lib. 68.

Anno Dom. CXX.

After his departure, the Britains till then kept in, had entirely revolted, had not Hadrian made a Journey hither in the Second Year of his Empire, being then thrice Conſul; where he reformed many things, and ſeems by Force of Arms to have reduced the Britains to Obedience; as Mr. Camden well obſerveth, from a piece of Money of his Coyning, where there is the Figure of that Emperor, with Three Soldiers on the Reverſe, whom he judges to repreſent the Three Legions, of which the Roman Army in Britain then conſiſted, and under them this Inſcription, EXER: BRITANNICUS, and another of the ſame Prince with this Motto, RESTITUTOR BRITANNIÆ; but the greateſt work done by him in this Iſland was the building of a Wall Fourſcore Miles in length, croſs the Iſland, from Solway Frith upon the Iriſh Seas to the Mouth of Tine by New Caſtle, on the German Ocean, laying the Foundation thereof with huge Piles, and Stakes driven deep into the Earth, and faſtned together in manner of a ſtrong Rampire or Mound; this he did to keep out the Caledonians from infeſting the Roman Province; who could not it ſeems be contained within thoſe farther Fortifications, raiſed by Agricola, between Glota and Bodotria, now the Friths of Edinburgh, and Dun Britton; by which the Northern, and more Barbarous Britains had more room to inhabit, and quitting thoſe colder Countries, incloſed only the warmer and richer parts of the Iſland; by which means the bounds of the Empire, as well in Britain, as the Eaſt, were reduced to more convenient compaſs.

Spartian in Adriano.

In the Reign of this Emperour, Priſcus Licinius, was alſo Proprætor or Lieutenant in this Iſland, as appeareth by an Antient Inſcription, lately found near this Wall; which mentions this Licinius to have been not only Proprætor of Britain; but alſo before of Capadocia, and to have been Præfect over the Fourth Legion, as alſo to have been honoured with a Military Banner, by Hadrian in his Jewiſh Expedition, as may be ſeen at large in this Inſcription in Mr. Camden's Britannia. I have nothing to add in this Reign relating to Britain, more than that Geoffrey of Monmouth makes King Marius to have dyed, about the Year of our Lord 132, and to have left the Kingdom to his Son Coil, who loved the Romans, and was honoured by them; ſo that paying his Tribute, and receiving their protection, he filled up a long and peaceable Reign, governing Britain many Years.

To Hadrian ſucceeded Antoninus Pius, at whoſe firſt coming to the Throne that Law was made, whereby all the Subjects of the Roman Empire, were made free Citizens of Rome; by which Edict the Southern Britains, within Hadrians's Wall, as well as other Provinces, enjoyed that Priviledge; but the Brigantes ever leaſt patient of Foreign Servitude, breaking in upon Genoani; (which Camden gueſſes ought to be read Guinethia, or North Wales, (then part of the Roman Province) were with the loſs of much of their Territory, driven back by Lollius Urbicus, Lieutenant here, who drew another Wall made of Earth and Piles, beyond the former Wall of Adrian, and (as Mr. Camden proves) from Capitolinus) extending it ſelf between the Friths of Dunbritton and Edinburgh, kept out the Incurſions of the Northern Britains: for theſe Atchievements, this Emperor received the Sir Name of Britannicus; thô the War was managed by his Lieutenant, it is alſo recorded in the Digeſt, that Seius Saturninus, had then the charge of the Roman Navy on the Britiſh Shore.

In Eumenius capitolinus.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (called alſo the Philoſopher) ſucceeded Antoninus Pius, having been before, by him adopted and declared Cæſar; in whoſe Time, Britain impatient of Foreign Subjection, again raiſed new Commotions; for the appeaſing whereof Calphurnius Agricola was ſent Lieutenant; the Sir-name of Agricola no doubt, was terrible to the Britains, who could not but remember the great overthrows they had received formerly under a General of that Name; and indeed, theſe Commotions laſted not long after his arrival, but ſeemed to have been ended with Fortunate ſucceſs; for which it is likely there was made that Inſcription, Ingratititude to the Syrian Goddeſs, which has been of late Years dug up out of the Earth, near Adrian's (now called the Picts) Wall; but this is more certain, that the glory of having diſpatched this War ſo ſoon, is by Fronto the Roman Orator, aſcribed to this Prince in a Panegyrick made in his Praiſe; where he tells him, that although ſitting at home, in his Pallace at Rome; he had given Commiſſion to another General for the War; yet like the Pilot of a Galley ſitting at the Stern, and guiding the Helm, he deſerved the Honour of the whole Expedition: Nothing elſe is recorded of Britain, during Antoninus his Reign, ſaving that Helvius Pertinax, afterwards Emperour, was employ'd in theſe Wars; being called hither from his Service, againſt the Parthians, and here for ſome time afterwards remained Lieutenant.

About the end of this Emperours Reign (according to Geoffrey,) Coil the Tributary King of the Britains dying, left his Son Lucius for his Succeſſor, who by Nennius is called Lhes, and Sir-named by the Britains Lever Maur, that is, the Great Light.

Bede lib. 1.

* Chap. III.

To Marcus Aurelius ſucceeded Commodus his Son, having before been made partner of the Empire with his Father, in the beginning of whoſe Reign King Lucius (above mentioned) is by Bede ſuppoſed to have ſent to Eleutherius, then Biſhop of Rome, deſiring that by his means he might be made a Chriſtian, the relation you may find more at large in Arch-Biſhop * Uſhers De Brit. Eccleſ. Ant. from the old Book of Landaffe, which relates this King ſent Two Embaſſadours to the Pope, beſeeching him, that by his means he might be made a Chriſtian, and he did not long after obtain his requeſt; and ſo the Britains till the time of Diocleſian, maintained the Chriſtian Faith without any diſturbance; this is the Account which Bede hath given us, though there are other, (but more Modern Hiſtorians) that take upon them to give a much different and larger relation of this matter; and do not only take upon them to tell us the Meſſage, but alſo who where the Meſſengers that carried it: The old Book of Landaffe, as alſo divers other Monkiſh-writers, call them Eloanu and Medwinus; but Will. of Malemsbury in his Antiquities (lately printed at Oxford) of the Monaſtery of Glaſtenbury, calls them Faganus and Deravianus, and others Faganus and Damianus; yet though they differ about the Names of theſe Men, they all agree that theſe being ſufficiently inſtructed in the Chriſtian Faith, and Baptized, were ſent back to Preach the Goſpel here; who at their return converted King Lucius, and his whole Kingdom to Chriſtianity; but as for the ſtory it ſelf, it is thought by ſeveral learned Men to be of very ſuſpicious Credit; for thô Bede places Lucius his writing to the Pope, in the Year of our Lord, 156: and in the Reign of Marcus Antoninus, Verus and Aurelius Commodus his Brother: yet it is certain from the beſt accounts in Chronology, that neither Antoninus then ſucceeded to the Empire, nor was Eleutherius choſen Pope, till near Twenty Years after that time; and beſides all this, there is ſo great a difference amongſt our Hiſtorians, as well Antient as Modern, about this matter, that Arch Biſhop Uſher has given us above Twenty different accounts, ſome whereof differ from this of Bede, as alſo from each other; ſome Twenty, ſome Thirty Years, nay ſome Forty, and others near Fifty Years; only this muſt be acknowleged, that they all agree that ſuch an Embaſſie was ſent by Lucius, in the Papacy of Eleutherius, and that the Pope returned ſuch an anſwer to it; now it is certain that he was not choſen Pope till the Year of our Lord, 171 at the ſooneſt; or according to Euſebius's Chronicle, till 176, and ſo Lucius's Converſion muſt have happened in the Time of Marcus Aurelius, to which time the Engliſh Saxon Annals, as alſo Bede himſelf, with divers others of our Ancient Hiſtorians, as well Foreign as Engliſh, do refer it; though Roger of Wendover, and other Authors about the ſame Age, refer it to Anno Dom. 184; which falls out in the Second or Third Year of the Emperour of Commodus, which ſeems moſt likely, if it were ever done at all.

But that there was never any ſuch King, ſeems to ſome learned Men very probable; ſince Gildas makes no mention of any ſuch thing; but ſays the time of Chriſt's being firſt Preached in this Iſland, was as early as the firſt Conqueſt of it by the Romans; beſides which the Monks (who have ſince new dreſt up this Story) not only make him to have been King of all Britain, but to have ſettled Chriſtianity in all parts of his Dominions; and inſtead of Flamens and Arch-Flamens in the chief Cities, as London, York, &c. to have placed the Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops in their rooms, which is impoſſible to be true: ſince the Title of Arch-Biſhop was not then known in the Church; nor could Lucius ſettle Chriſtianity all over Britain, which was then either under the power of the Romans, or elſe what remained unconquered, was abſolutely Heathen and Barbarous at the time of this ſuppoſed converſion.

But however I think we may ſafely follow * Arch-Biſhop Uſher, and † Doctor Stillingfleet, in allowing the common Tradition of King Lucius, and that he had Regal Authority under the Romans, in ſome part of this Iſland; ſince the two Coins ſeen by the ſaid Arch Biſhop, the one of Gold and the other of Silver, with the Image of a King on them, and the Letters LVC, with a Croſs, do ſufficiently evidence it: But in what part of Britain he governed, whether as Succeſſour to Praſutagus among the Iceni, or elſe was King of the Belgæ, or was Succeſſor to Cogidunus, over the Regni, in thoſe parts that we now call Surrey and Suſſex; I will not take upon me to determine, thô I rather incline to the laſt, (being Dr. Stillingfleet's Opinion) for the Reaſons and Conjectures, he gives us in the ſame Chapter; but as for the Letters pretended to have been writ by Pope Eleutherius to King Lucius, thô they are inſerted among the Laws of K. Edward the Confeſſor, and are alſo to be found in an old Book of the Conſtitutions of the City of London; I ſhall not trouble you with the Contents of them, ſince they plainly diſcover their Impoſture to any Man at all verſed in Antiquities.

I have no more to add concerning this King, but that the Griſons make him to have been their Apoſtle, and to have firſt preached the Goſpel in their Country, and ſhew his Tomb at Coir to this Day, which can by no means agree with our Britiſh, as well as Engliſh Hiſtorians; who all ſuppoſe that he dyed in his own Country without any Children.

Dion. Hiſt. lib. 72. about Anno Dom. CLXXXVII.

But to return again to the civil Hiſtory of Britain, we further find, that under the Emperour Commodus, Britain as well as other Countries was much infeſted with Wars and Seditions, for Xiphiline in his Epitomy of Dion relates, that the Britiſh War was the greateſt of all others, becauſe the Britains having broken through the Wall, which divided their Territories from that of the Romans, had laid waſt many places, and had cut off the Roman General together with his Army; whereupon Commodus terrified with this Rebellion, ſent Ulpius Marcellus againſt them, who was a ſober and modeſt Man, and lived after the rate of a Common Souldier, he was alſo Stout and Magnanimous in his Warlike Expeditions, but thô he was not to be corrupted with Money, yet was not at all complaiſant in his Converſation; but as for the other examples, this Author gives us of his great Vigilance and Temperance, they are ſo trivial, that they do not merit any particular relation; and I could have wiſht that Xiphilin his Epitomator would have been more ſparing in his Character, and larger upon the Actions of this great Man; for all he tells us further of him, is, that he did very great miſchief to the Barbarous People in Britain, for which he was very near being made away by Commodus, becauſe of his Vertue; yet that nevertheleſs he let him alone.

Britain being again brought to Obedience by ſo worthy a Commander, after he was recalled, began to fall into more dangerous Commotions; for Ælius Lampridius in his Life of this Emperour, tells us, That now ſtubbornneſs began to break into the Roman Camp, and the Military Diſcipline of the Britiſh Army, being relaxed, the Souldiers began to refuſe to Obey Commodus, and would have ſet up another Emperour againſt him; for Perennis, who was than in higheſt power with his Prince, removing Senators, ſet Men only of the equeſtrial Order to Command the Britiſh Army; which being made known by their Lieutenant, Perennis was declared a publick Enemy by the Souldiers; for as Dion farther relates the Army in Britain mutinying againſt Perennis, ſent no leſs than 1500 of their own number into Italy, to repreſent their Grievances at Rome, and being admitted to the Emperour's preſence, they told him that the reaſon of their coming, was to let him know, that Perennis had conſpired againſt him, and endeavoured to make his Son Emperour; to which Commodus giving credit, at the Inſtigation of Cleander, immediately delivered up Perennis (thô then Præfectus Pretorii) to the power of the Pratorian Bands, whom he then commanded, who ſoon diſpatched him; but Commodus liſted thoſe 1500 (who were ſent out of Britain) among thoſe Bands, who were his Guards. Perennis being thus diſpatched, Commodus ſent Helvius Pertinax (afterwards Emperor) in to Britain, though he was then employ'd againſt the Parthians, who when he came hither, did what he

he could to hinder the Soldiers from Sedition; who would rather have had any other Man for their Emperor than Commodus, and eſpecially Pertinax himſelf; yet he then underwent the Cenſure of an envious Perſon, becauſe he was ſaid to have accuſed Antiſtius Burrhus and Ariſtius Antonius to Commodus, of affecting the Empire; ſo that though he quell'd ſome Seditions in Britain, yet he eſcaped a great danger, being almoſt kill'd in a Mutiny of one of the Legions, and left for dead among the ſlain; which Fact, though Pertinax ſeverely revenged it upon the Mutineer, yet afterwards he asked leave to be diſmiſs'd of his Government, alledging, that the Legions were diſpleaſed with him for holding them too cloſe to Diſcipline: Having thus received a Succeſſor, he was, after ſome time, made Proconſul of Africa.

Idem in Albino.

After the death of Pertinax, Clodius Albinus, a Man of great Birth and Valour, was made Lieutenant of Britain. He had before got himſelf a great Reputation, whil'ſt he govern'd Gaul; ~~but~~ routing the Friſians, ~~and~~ & when after his coming into Britain, Commodus would have created ~~him~~ Cæſar, and have given him the Honour of wearing the purple Robe, even in his preſence, though without the Golden Embroideries; as appears by the Letters he wrote, recited at large in this Author.

Albinus, having received theſe Letters, yet knowing how odious Commodus was, becauſe of his Vices, by which he not only deſtroyed the Common-wealth, but diſgraced himſelf; fearing, leſt the Emperor being killed, ~~himſelf~~ he might Periſh with him; he therefore prudently refuſed theſe Honours, ſaying, That Commodus ſought either who ſhould periſh together with him, or whom he might upon ſome jealous pretence deſtroy: Yet however he ſtill commanded the Britiſh Army; but hearing, by a falſe Report, that Commodus was ſlain, thereupon going out to the Soldiers, he made them a Speech to this effect:

"That if the Senate of Rome had ſtill preſerved its ancient Power, and
"the Supream Authority had not been intruſted to a ſingle Perſon,
"the publick Management of Affairs had never come into the hands of "ſuch as Nero, Vitellius, and Domitian: Then reckoning up the greateſt

"of Conſuls; and ſetting forth the great Additions the Senate had made "to the Roman Empire by their Lieutenants, and that they maintained
"their Authority to the days of Nero, whom they had not feared to con"demn as a wicked Prince: And concluded, that he utterly renounced
"the Name of Cæſar, which Commodus had profer'd him.

S.

And yet this great Common-wealths Man, when time ſerved, did not afterwards ſtick to aſſume the Titles and Honour, which now for private Reaſons he refuſed, and againſt which he ſo much declaimed; and died in aſſerting to himſelf the Imperial Purple againſt Severus, the wearing whereof he now ſo much reproved. This Oration being brought to Rome, as it pleaſed the Senate, ſo it highly incenſed the Emperor, who thereupon preſently wrote Letters to all his Pretors and Prefects, wherein he let them know, "That he ſuppoſed they had heard, that it was given "out that he was ſlain by a Conſpiracy: And had likewiſe ſeen that "Oration of Albinus to his Soldiers, wherein he ſo much ingratiated with "the Senate, and (ſays he,) not without Reaſon, for he who denies "that there ought to be one Prince over the Common-wealth, and aſſerts

So Commodus, immediately upon this, ſent Orders to diſmiſs Albinus from the Government of Britain, and to deliver it up to Junius Severus.

But Commodus being not long after poyſoned by Martia his Concubine, Helvius Pertinax, was thereupon created Emperor, who is ſuppoſed to have confirmed Albinus in his Command of Britain; but being within the ſpace of Three Months, ſlain by the Prætorian Bands, Didius Julianus bought the Empire of them for ſo much Money, to be given each Souldier; but kept it but Two Months, and was then overcome, and ſlain by Severus; who upon the news of the Death of Commodus, had been ſaluted Emperor by the Pannonian Army; as was alſo Peſcenius Niger in Syria: ſo that Albinus in thoſe troubleſome times, under the ſhort Reigns of Pertinax, and Didius Julianus, found means ſtill to retain the Government of Britain, nor would ſurrender it to Junius Severus, whom Commodus had before ſent to take it, nor yet to Heraclitus, whom Septimius Severus, after he was ſaluted Emperor, ſent alſo hither to take poſſeſſion of it.

Capitolin in Albino.

It is ſaid of Albinus, That the Senate made Addreſſes to Pertinax, that he would make him his Aſſociate in the Empire, which Pertinax refuſed; fearing his ſecret Ambition, and publiſhed that Letter which Commodus had before written to the Prefects, that he might thereby bring Albinus into hatred and diſgrace with the Souldiers; who hated a Common-wealth, by which action Albinus was ſo incenſed, that it is ſaid, he ſecretly excited Julian to Murder Pertinax, as hath been already related.

Spartianus in Nigro.

But Severus having got poſſeſſion of Rome (the principal ſtrength of the Empire) and having now the Senate on his ſide, reſolved firſt to make War againſt Peſcenius Niger; but knowing himſelf too weak to contend both with him and Albinus at once, was reſolved at the preſent to keep fair with the latter, as knowing him to be a Man of great Riches and Power, fearing leſt he ſhould take Rome, whilſt himſelf was buſied in making War againſt Niger in the Eaſt; therefore he thought it beſt under a ſhew of Friendſhip to draw him to his Party, wherefore he gave him the Title of Cæſar, anticipating his Ambition, by this voluntary Communication of Power; and ſent him very ſmooth Letters, “ beſeeching “ him that he would take care of the Empire, which now ſtood in need “ of ſuch a worthy Perſon in the prime of his Years; that as for him- “ ſelf he was now Old, and troubled with the Gout, his Sons being as “ yet but Infants; to which fair Pretences Albinus giving Credit, joyfully received the Title of Cæſar, telling his Souldiers in a Speech, he made them upon this occaſion; “ That though he had refuſed the “ Title of Cæſar, when offered by Commodus, yet now muſt obey in this “ the Emperour's Commands, as well as their own deſires; ſince it could “ not be denied, but that the Common-Wealth might be well govern'd “ by one ſingle, Valiant and Good Man: So much was his Mind charged by his Intereſt, ſo well was he pleaſed, that he had obtained his wiſhes, without any danger; but Severus to make what he did appear more credible, cauſed Statues to be erected, and Money coyned with the Image of Albinus, and alſo made what he had done to be confirmed by the Senate.

Herod in Albino.

After which he marched againſt Niger, and having overcome and ſlain him, he had now Albinus only left to deal with, and whom, as not thinking him for his turn, he was reſolved by any means to remove out of the way; therefore in the firſt place he raiſed a Report that Albinus carried himſelf inſolently, and ungratefully towards him; and that there were divers of the chief Senators, who had wrote to Albinus, to return and ſeize upon Rome in his abſence: Nevertheleſs Severus thought it not the ſafeſt way to act againſt him by open War, eſpecially when there appeared no ſufficient grounds for it; and therefore he ſent certain truſty Meſſengers to him, who were privately ordered, that when they had delivered their Letters, they ſhould tell him, That they had ſomething more to ſay to him in private: But as ſoon as they had him alone, that they ſhould be ſure to diſpatch him; and beſides, gave them Poyſon whereby they ſhould make him away, if they could not ſucceed by open force. Albinus being warned of theſe treacherous Ambaſſadours, ſtood upon his guard, and would not admit them till they had laid aſide their Swords; but when they deſired to ſpeak with him in private, he then ſeemed more ſuſpicious, and having examin'd them by Torture, forced them to confeſs the whole deſign, and then having puniſhed theſe Conſpirators, he immediately declared War againſt Severus, and took upon him the Titles of Emperour and Auguſtus.

Anno Dom. CXCVIII.

Herod. l. 3.

Which as ſoon as Severus heard, he was extreamly incenſed, and thought it not fit any longer to conceal his Anger; but having made a ſharp Oration to his Army againſt Albinus, and which was received with great Acclamations; he preſently began his Expedition againſt him, who to defend himſelf, with the flower of Britain entred Gaul, and marching as far as Lyons, he and Severus there met at the head of their Armies; when the Battle being joyned, Albinus had at firſt the better, the Britiſh Souldiers not yeilding to the Illyrians, either in ſtrength or courage; ſo that part of the Army, which Severus Commanded, being routed, he himſelf was knocked down from his Horſe, and caſting away his Purple Robe, was for ſome time ſuppoſed to be ſlain; when Lætus Severus Lieutenant General, ſuppoſing him to have been killed, came in with freſh Forces, with an intention to gain the Victory for himſelf, for which treachery, he was afterwards by Severus put to Death: However, at preſent by his aſſiſtance, he won the Victory, and put his Enemies to flight, purſuing and killing them with great ſlaughter; whereupon the City of Lyons being taken, Albinus was forced to fly from thence; but being purſu'd by Severus's Souldiers, and driven into a Houſe near the River Rhoſne, was there forced to run himſelf through with his own Sword, or (as others relate) cauſed one of his Servants to do that office for him; but however he was taken, and brought to Severus before he was quite dead, who quickly diſpatched him, and cutting off his head, ſent it to Rome, to be ſet over the place of publick Execution; but he let the Body lye before the Prætorium till it ſtunk, and was devoured by Dogs. A mean revenge, for ſo great an Emperour, to take upon ſo Valiant a Perſon.

Digeſt Lib. 28. Tit. 6.

But now Severus having by this Victory, obtained the whole Roman Empire; and finding that Britain was a Province too great and powerful to be truſted in the hands of one Man, he divided it into two Governments; committing the North part thereof to Virius Lupus, as Proprætor and Lieutenant (whom Ulpian nameth Preſident of Britain) and to Hera- clitus the Southern parts, as Mr. Speed gathereth by a Coyne of Severus Minted in his Second Conſul-ſhip, which fell in the Year of our Lord, 198, from whence it appears, that after the Death of Albinus, Britain was not reduced under the ſubjection of Severus, until he had won it by the Sword, the memory of which he left to poſterity in this Medal wherein is the Goddeſs of Victory repreſented, as ſitting upon ſpoils, with this Inſcription, Victoria Britanniæ; but this Victory muſt have been then won by his Lieutenant, and not by himſelf.

Herod. lib. 3.

But Virius Lupus, who had the Government of the Northern parts, was forced to buy Peace of the Meatæ at a great rate, becauſe the Caledonians, who had promiſed to check the Incurſions of the Meatæ, had not performed that Article of their Agreement: This Author likewiſe tells us, that the former of theſe Nations, lived next the Wall that divided the South of the Iſland from the North; ſo that Lupus finding himſelf unable alone to curb their Inroads, after great loſſes ſuffered from them, ſent for Severus, but he being at that time taken up with other Wars, Lupus was forced to buy this Peace of the Meatæ, as we have ſaid; only ſome Roman Priſoners were then ſet free: The Memory of this Virius Lupus is preſerved, in an Altar dug up, dedicated to the Goddeſs Fortune; upon the occaſion of his repairing a Bath, or Hot-houſe, at a Town called Levatriæ (now Bows) upon Stanmoor, in Richmond ſhire: This was done for the ſake of the Thracian Cohorts, who lay there in Gariſon with the Romans.

Vid. Camden Britan. in Yorkshire

Then ~~But~~ Lupus hearing that Severus had at laſt put an end to his other Wars; he wrote him plainly the ſtate of things here, that the Britains of the North made War upon him, broke into the Province, and harraſſed all the Countries nigh them; that there needed ſuddenly either more aid, or himſelf to come in perſon.

Ibid. lib. 3.

Severus was not much diſpleaſed at this news, being in his own nature greedy of Glory, and ~~being~~ alſo deſirous after ſo many Victories in the Eaſt, to raiſe alſo new trophies for the Britains; and beſides he thought it beſt to withdraw his Two Sons from the pleaſures of Rome, and inure the Young Men to hardſhip and Military Diſcipline.

So this Emperour, though Old and much troubled with the Gout, yet with as great Courage as any Young Man, made this expedition into Britain; and taking his Journey for the moſt part in a Litter, ſtaid long in no place; ſo that having finiſhed his Journey by Land, and having croſſed the Sea ſooner than could be expected, he entred Britain, and having Muſter'd his Soldiers, and brought great Forces together, he prepared for War: But the Northern Britains, daunted with the Report of ſo great Forces brought over with him, and that more were preparing, ſent Ambaſſadours to treat of Peace, and to excuſe their former doings. The Emperour now loath to return home, without ſome memorable Action, whereby he might aſſume to his other Titles the addition of Britannicus, delay'd his Anſwer; but quickens his preparations, till in the end, when all things were in a readineſs to follow them, they were diſmiſſed without effect; when he arrived, his principal care was to have many Bridges and Cauſeways laid over Bogs and Moors, that his Souldiers might fight on firm ground, for many parts of Britain, were at that time over run with Bogs and Marſhes, (as Ireland was ſome Years ago) now the Britains uſed to wade through theſe Marſhes up to the middle, not valuing it, becauſe they went naked: But Severus prepared all things which might be of any uſe for the Souldiers, or a damage to the Britains: And when he found all ~~were~~ ready to his Mind, ~~la~~ying his Younger Son Geta to govern the more Southern part of the Iſland, by the help of Papinian, the great Lawyer; taking his Eldeſt Son Baſſianus along with himſelf, he marched againſt the Britains, and having paſſed the Wall that divided their Territories, there only happen'd ſome tumultuary Skirmiſhes, in which thô the Romans were ſtill Conquerours, yet the Britains found an eaſie retreat, by hiding themſelves in the Woods and Bogs, which were well known to them, which contributed very much to prolong the War. Yet did not Severus deſiſt, till he had paſſed to the very fartheſt part of the Iſland, and had compell'd the Enemies to make Peace upon this Condition, That they ſhould give up great part of their Territory, although he loſt in this Expedition, by the ſudden Aſſaults and Ambuſhes of the Britains, as well as by Diſeaſes, near Fifty Thouſand Souldiers; which is alſo confirm'd by * Dion, who further tells us, That he fought no ſet Battel, nor yet ſaw any Forces of the Enemies in Battell Array; but that they did often leave their Sheep and Oxen on purpoſe, that the Romans going out of the way to ſeize them, might be the more eaſily taken and overcome: beſides all this, the want of Water much troubled the Romans, and Ambuſhes were laid for thoſe that went about ſtragling to find it: And when they were not able to march any further for want of it, they were killed by their fellow Souldiers, leaſt they ſhould be taken by the Enemy.

* Lib. 76.

But in this Expedition, the wicked cariage of Baſſianus gave Severus perpetual trouble, not only becauſe he lived debauchedly, but alſo for that it was evident, as ſoon as he had Power he would kill his Brother; and had alſo made ſome attempts againſt Severus himſelf; for he ran once all of a ſudden out of his Tent, crying out that he was much injur'd by Caſtor, who was the worthieſt Man in Severus's Court, and was privy to his moſt ſecret Councils, being the chief of his Bed-chamber, (the ſame ~~with the~~ as Lord Chamberlain with us.) Now there were before ready prepared ſome Soldiers on purpoſe, who upon Baſſianus's thus crying out came to his Aſſiſtance, and (as Herodian ſays) proclaim'd him Auguſtus; whereupon Severus immediately made himſelf to be carried to the Tribunal, and having order'd all thoſe Officers, and Souldiers who had been engaged in this Action, as alſo his Son (who had taken upon him the Name of Auguſtus) to appear before him, He commanded them all except his Son to be put to Death, when they all begging pardon for their offence, fell down proſtrate before him; upon which he pardon'd them, then touching his own Head with his Hand, ſaid, At laſt you'l find that it is a Man's Head, and not his Feet that Govern; but Dion ſays, he did put ſome of the moſt Seditious of them to Death; who alſo further relates, that at another time when both the Father and the Son were marching together into Caledonia, Baſſianus did openly endeavour to kill his Father, for as they rode at the head of the Army, the Enemies Forces being in ſight, he ſtopp'd his Horſe, and privately drew his Sword, that he might run his Father into the back; which when thoſe perceived who followed them, they preſently cryed out, at which Baſſianus being ſtartled ſtopt his blow; but Severus thereupon turning about, ſaw his Sword drawn, yet then ſaid nothing; but returning to the Camp, went into the Prætorium, and there called before him his Son (together with Papinian and Caſtor) then Commanding the naked Sword to be laid before them, he ſharply reproved him, that not only now in the ſight of his Army; but alſo at other times he had attempted ſo great a wickedneſs, concluding thus, “ if thou deſireſt to “ kill me, kill me now, for thou art Younger and in full ſtrength, and “ I am Old and can ſcarce ſtir, which if thou refuſeſt to do with thine “ own Hand, here is Papinian our Prefect, whom thou may'ſt command to kill me, for he will do what ever thou bidſt him, ſince thou art already Emperor. Thô Severus ſaid all this, he did no more to his Son, notwithſtanding he had often blamed Marcus Aurelius, that he had not put his Son Commodus to Death; but Severus, ſaid this only in his paſſion, for his Son was dearer to him than the good of the Common-wealth, thô by this means he did as good as Sacrifice his Younger Son to the Elder: ſince he might eaſily gueſs what would happen when ever he ſhould die. Herodian confirms the ſame Story, and that though ſeveral Grave and Wiſe Men had perſwaded him to put his Son to Death, yet he refuſed it, too much indulging his paternal Affection.

The War being thus happily ended, Severus in Memory of theſe Victories, cauſed Coins to be Stamp'd with this Inſcription, Victoria Britannica: and upon the Frontiers of what he had now Conquer'd, built a Wall croſs the Iſland, from Sea to Sea, which our Author judges to have been the moſt magnificent of all his undertakings, and that he thence received the Stile of Britannicus. It was in length 132 Miles; Oroſius makes it fortified with a deep Trench, and at certain Spaces, by many Towers.

Buchanan in his Hiſtory of Scotland, will needs place it in Scotland between the Friths of Bodotria and Glotta, in the ſame place which Lollius Urbicus, and Agricola had fortified before, whilſt * Mr. Camden affirms it to be only Hadrianus's Wall re-edified, and which paſſes through the higher parts of Cumberland, between the Rivers Tine and Eske; and brings very good Authorties for this Opinion out of the Roman Authors, as well as Inſcriptions near the ſaid Wall; in which the name of Severus is particularly mentioned: which Wall is called by the Engliſh, the Picts Wall, by the Britains, Gual Sever, and by the Scots, Mur Sever; all which denominations do manifeſtly denote the name of its Founder: whereas the name of Greames Dike, by which the preſent Scots call the Ruins of that Wall or Trench, which is ſtill to be ſeen in Scotland, doth no way denote Severus to have been its founder. There is alſo another Argument that this was the place where he built this Wall we now treat of; for between Dun Britton, and Edinburgh Friths, although there be many Ruins of continued Fortifications; yet are they not ſo viſible as this of ours: nor doth the Wall in Scotland ſeem to have been of that ſtrength and ſolidity, as this of Severus is related by all Authors, and as by its Ruines ſtill appears to be. But the former Wall or Trench ſeems to have been only faced with Stone about Two Foot thick, and then lined within with Earth: there are alſo divers other Arguments to prove it was the ſame with Hadrian's there built before, as firſt the number of Miles, which Spartianus hath truly reckon'd to be Eighty; whereas between Edinburgh, and Dunbritton there is not half that diſtance; but if any ſhall object that Eutropius hath reckon'd the length thereof to be but Thirty Five Miles, and Aurelius Victor Thirty two; yet how even this can agree with the diſtance between the Friths of Edinburgh and Dunbritton, let them conſider, who maintain this Opinion, ſince even that will not agree with the diſtance between thoſe two Rivers; and thô it is true, that Aurelius Victor

(one of the moſt authentic Authors that writes of this Matter) makes the ſpace that this Wall extended it ſelf between the two Seas to be 30 Miles, and Eutropius 35, whilſt ſome later Authors have ſtretch'd it to 132 Miles; yet Arch-Biſhop Uſher, in his Learned Work already cited, hath ſhewn us, that theſe different Accounts may be reconciled, by ſuppoſing, that both Victor and Eutropius at firſt writ LXXXII. Miles in Roman Figures, and that afterwards, by the careleſneſs of ſome Tranſcribers, the L. was left out, whilſt by others it was turned into a C, which if added to the following Figures, viz. XXXII, make CXXXII; but with an L. before them, they make only LXXXII. Miles, as they are indeed no more. But to conclude this Subject, on which, I doubt, we have dwelt too long already, if Buchanan had not deſired to have been ſingular, and to have differed not only from our Engliſh Authors, but from his own Country-men, John Fordun, and Major, (who in their Hiſtories of Scotland are both of our ſide) he had never fallen into this Miſtake.

Dion. Ibid.

Whilſt this Peace with the Northern Britains laſted, it may well be ſuppoſed, that remarkable Meeting between the Empreſs Julia, the Wife of Severus, and the Wife of Argentocoxus a Britiſh King, might have happened; wherein the Empreſs upbraiding the Britiſh Ladies, that they lay with ſo many Men promiſcuouſly, according to their Cuſtom, of one Woman's having ſeveral Husbands, (as hath been already related:) The Britiſh Lady made her this quick Return; "We Britiſh Women do much "better ſatisfie the Deſires of Nature than you Roman Ladies, for we "have to do only with the beſt Men, and that openly, whilſt you com"mit Adulteries with every mean Fellow in a corner. A ſharp Reproof, though no good Excuſe for her Country-women.

Id. Ibid.

But no ſooner was Severus returned into the Roman Province, but the Caledonians and Mæatæ again took Arms, which ſo incenſed the old Emperor, that calling his Soldiers together, he commanded them, (repeating a Verſe of Homer) That they ſhould enter the Country, and kill all they met, both Men, Women, and Children; but being now worn out with Years and Infirmities, he could not go himſelf, but ſent Baſſianus, his Son, againſt them; yet whether he did any thing conſiderable, is uncertain, ſince Severus died not long after: Whoſe End, whether it was haſtened by his Son's wicked Practices, or whether he died of meer Age or Sickneſs, is not truly known, ſince Hiſtorians differ much about it; but before he died, he is ſaid to have ſpoke thus to his two Sons, Baſſianus and Geta; See that you agree between your ſelves, and pay your Soldiers, and then you need care for no body elſe. A notable Maxim, which hath been obſerved not only by them, but by all who are, or deſire to be abſolute Monarchs. He is likewiſe ſaid by Spartianus to have rejoyced before his Death, that he left the Empire to his Sons, according to the Example of Antoninus Pius, who left the two Antonini (his Sons by Adoption) his Heirs; whereas he had left two Sons, gotten by himſelf, Rulers of the Roman Commonwealth. But he was deceived in his Expectation, for the one by the Parricide of his Brother, the other by his own evil Manners, were ſoon deſtroyed; and to expect otherwiſe, ſhew'd him not to have been ſo Prudent in that, as in his other Actions: Upon which, the Author laſt cited, in his Life of this Prince, makes this ſhrewd Obſervation; That ſcarce any great Men had left behind them a Son good for any thing, but either they have had no Children, or elſe ſuch, that it had

Ibid.

Dion tells us, That his Corps being carried out in great Pomp, and laid upon the Funeral Pile without the Walls of York, at a place called to this day Sever's-Hoe, or Sever's-Hill, the Souldiers rid round it on Horſe-back full ſpeed whilſt it was burning, his own Sons having firſt kindled the Fire. Herodian gives us a long Deſcription of his Funeral Pile, and of the manner of burning the Body of a Roman Emperour, which being too tedious to be here recited, thoſe who are deſirous of reading the Deſcription of this Spectacle, may find it at large in this Author. His Bones being put in an Urn of Porphiry, were carried by his Sons to Rome, and placed in the Sepulchre of the Antonines: It is alſo ſaid by Dion, That Severus, a little before his Death, commanded this Urn to be brought to him, and holding it in his hand to have ſpoke thus, Muſt thou hold him, whom the whole World could not contain? Severus is deſcribed by this Author to have been in his old age Corpulent, but of a ſtrong Conſtitution, thô much afflicted with the Gout; of a ſharp and excellent Wit; a Lover of good Letters, in which, thô he was a ſufficient Maſter, yet was more able to expreſs it by Writing, than Words; grateful towards his Friends; moſt cruel to his Enemies; diligent in Affairs, but careleſs of what Men ſaid of him; greedy of Money, which he gathered by all means, yet for that cauſe alone he never put any Man to Death: He was magnificent in his publick Expences, and built many new Edifices, and repaired the old ones; ſo that thô he ſpent vaſtly, yet he left a great Treaſure behind him. But to add ſomewhat farther from others, he was a great Enemy to Incontinence and Adultery, and made ſtrict Laws againſt it; and had certainly as great a mixture of good and evil Qualities as ever were found in any one Man: That he was both Perfidious and Cruel, appears by his Dealing with Albinus, as alſo with the Wife and Children of Niger, whom, thô innocent, he cauſed to be put to Death, whilſt his own Son, who had attempted upon his Life and Empire, he eaſily Pardoned; which whether he did out of Love to him, or wearineſs of Life, as ſated with Honour and Power, may be doubted; and if he had been then a young Man, perhaps he would have acted otherwiſe. I have inſiſted the longer upon the Character of this Prince, as being one of the greateſt and moſt fortunate of all the Roman Emperours.

But having given you an account of the laſt Words and Actions of Severus in Britain, I cannot but here take notice of a notorious Falſhood in Geoffery of Monmouth in this part of his Hiſtory, and whereby you may judge of his Skill in the Roman Hiſtory, and I ſhall give it you in the Words of a Learned Biſhop. Geoffery having found that Severus the Emperour died in Britain, thought it moſt for the Honour of our Country to kill him fairly in Battle, and therefore by power of Fancy he creates one Fulgentius to be General againſt him, who being overpowered here at home, went and fetched in the Picts out of Scythia, and with their Aid fought Severus and killed him, and was killed together for Company: All which was Geoffery's own proper Invention. And then having found that Severus left a Son, Baſſianus, that was his Succeſſor in the Roman Empire, he makes his Britains ſet up this Baſſianus to be their King on his Mother's account, who (muſt be the Siſter of Fulgenius) then having found, that Britain was Governed by Carauſius ſome time after, thô he knew not when, putting both theſe together, he makes the fore-mentioned Emperour Baſſianus (being betrayed by the Picts that came in with his Uncle Fulgenius) to be killed in Fight by this Carauſius, thô there was a diſtance of ſome 70 Years between them: But that was nothing with Geoffery, he writ (I dare ſay) what might be true for ought he knew; nor has Geoffery erred alone, but hath alſo led John Fordun and Hector Boethius, the Scotch Hiſtorians, into the ſame Error, who (as the ſaid Learned Biſhop obſerves) make this Fulgenius, whom they call a Britiſh Conſul, (his Name a little altered into Fulgentius) to have headed the Scots and Picts in this War with Severus: But I need ſay no more of this, for Geoffery being once expoſed, (as he deſerves,) thoſe that write from him will need no other Confutation.

Anno Dom. CXCVIII.

After the Death of Severus, his Sons Baſſianus and Geta (having before taken the Sirname of Antonini,) ſucceeded in the Empire; and althô the Elder pretended to hold it in common with his Brother, yet he preſently began to Reign alone, ſoon ending the War with the Britains, and relinquiſhing the Gariſons; not long after left this Iſland together with his Brother Geta, with whom ~~when he~~ having [illegible] had ſome Quarrels, Julia the Empreſs, together with their Friends and Councellors, patched up a Reconciliation between them, which was only in outward Appearance, and more by Conſtraint than Good Will: So both of them enjoying the like Imperial Honours, paſſed into Italy, leaving Virius Lupus as their Lieutenant in Britain; but as ſoon as they came to Rome, their Hatred to each other breaking out afreſh, Baſſianus coming into his Brother Geta's Bedchamber, when he looked for no ſuch thing, cruelly murdered him in his Mother's Arms; and then beſtowing a great Donative upon the Souldiers to gain their Good Wills, was alone declared Emperour, and his Brother Geta condemned as an Enemy, ~~as~~ for having conſpired againſt him. But one thing is very remarkable; That when he had committed this Parricide, he would have had Papinian, the great Civil Lawyer, to have wrote a Defence of it; but he, like an honeſt Roman, utterly refuſed it, plainly telling him, "That it was eaſier to commit Parricide, than to defend it "when it was committed. But this plain Anſwer coſt him his Life, the Emperour commanding his Soldiers to kill him in his Preſence; which one of them doing with an Axe, the Emperour chid him for it, ſaying, "That he ought to have performed his Commands with a Sword.

The Reign of Antoninus Baſſianus Caracalla affords us nothing tranſacted in this Iſland, only, that after the Death of his Bother Geta, he commanded his Name to be razed out of all Monuments; which was accordingly obſerved in Britain, as appears by an Inſcription dug out of the Earth in Monmouthſhire, which was erected for the Safety of the then Emperor Severus, and Antoninus, and Geta, Cæſars: wherein the Name of Geta, by the tract of Letters, may be diſcovered to have once been there, though now razed out: The like is to be ſeen, in another Stone mentioned by Camden, in Richmondſhire.

Britain, whether it were that the Empire declining apace, good Authors grew ſcarce, or are now loſt; or, which is more probable, that the ſucceeding Princes being advanced by the heady Affection of the Soldiers, and quickly again depoſed and murthered, had no time to perform any thing conſiderable in this Iſland, lying ſo remote. Hence it is that for ſome years we are ~~left~~ in the dark, having only a few Fragments left us, lying ſcatter'd here and there in divers Authors, which give us juſt Light enough to diſcover, that Britain as yet continued a Roman Province, and ſtill had its Proprætors and Preſidents: Nay, Geoffery himſelf hath here left wide Gaps and Interregnums for many years together. Alexander Severus, his Couſin-German, ſucceeded him, having been before declared Cæſar by the Senate. It is thought by ſome, that he made an Expedition into Britain; for Lampridius ſays, he was ſlain in a Town called Sicila, but whether it were in Britain or Gaul he leaves it uncertain; howbeit ſomewhat we find in the ſame Author of his Actions in this Iſland, That he firſt gave unto the Captains and Soldiers near the Marſhes, or Wall of Severus, thoſe Lands which were won from the Enemy; ſo that they ſhould be their Propriety ſo long as their Heirs ſerved as Soldiers, and that they ſhould not revert to private Men, ſuppoſing they would go to the Wars more willingly, and take better Care to defend their own peculiar Poſſeſſions: From whence, as Mr. Camden very well notes, may be deduced either a kind of Feudum or Fee, or at leaſt ~~the~~ the firſt Foot-ſteps we can find of Military Feuds, which were afterwards ſo much in uſe amongſt the Goths, and thoſe Nations derived from them, as the Normans and others. The ſame Author alſo adds, that before his Death a Druid Woman cry'd out to him in the Gauliſh Tongue, Go on, but hope not for Victory, and truſt not thy Soldiers: A good Advice, if he could have taken it, for he Was ſlain by ſome of his own Army, at the Inſtigation of Maximin, who ſucceeded him: The true cauſe of his Death was, that the Soldiers, grown looſe under Heliogabolus, could not endure the Severity of his Diſcipline; ſo that though he were one of the beſt and moſt virtuous Emperors that ever govern'd, yet he found the ſame Fate from his Soldiers as the worſt had done: In ſo ſad a Condition are thoſe Monarchs whoſe Lives or Deaths depend upon the good or bad Humours of a ſtanding Army. The place of his Death is uncertain, for * St. Hierom and Oroſius ſuppoſe him to have been killed at Mentz by the Conſpiracy of his Soldiers, together with his Mother, whoſe covetouſeneſs was a great cauſe of his Ruin.

M. Anton. Gordianus, the Grand-ſon of Gordian the Elder, who was alſo elected Emperor by the Prætorian Bands; by whom though we find nothing done in Britain, yet that he had an Army here under the Command of Nonnius Phillipus, his Lieutenant, appears by an Altar-Stone found in Cumberland, at a place then called Caſtra Exploratorum, with a votive Inſcription for the Health of this Emperor.

Anno Dom. CCXXXVIII

Marcus Julius Phillipus, an Arabian, having depoſed and murthered Gordian, ſucceeded in the Empire, but was himſelf alſo made away by his Army: He is ſaid by Euſebius, Oroſius, and other Authors, to have been the firſt Chriſtian *E*mperor; but this hath been confuted, and ſufficiently exploded by Scaliger, and other learned Men. His Memory is preſerved in Britain by an Inſcription upon a Pyramidal Stone dug out of the Earth not far from Carliſle, which is dedicated to this Emperor, as alſo to his Son Philip then Cæſar.

I ſhall here omit two other Emperors which are mentioned by Zozimus to have reigned at the ſame time with this Philip, one in the Eaſt, and the other in Panonia: And ſhall paſs on to Quintus Trajanus Decius, who was elected Emperor by the Perſian Legions. He was a great Enemy of the Chriſtians, and raiſed the Seventh Perſecution againſt them; but having ſeen his Son Decius, whom he had made his Aſſociate in the Empire, ſlain by the Goths, with whom he fought, being betray'd by Hoſtilian his General, in his Flight, he fell into a Bog or whirle Pool. Publius Licinius Galienus, his Son, Governed in his ſtead, (his elder Brother of the ſame Name, who had been Aſſociate in the Empire with his Father, being dead long before;) this Galienus being given up to Luſt, Gluttony and Riot, and careleſs of the common Danger, and through a haughty Ignorance unapprehenſive of his own, met with that Fate, which commonly attends ſuch Princes: So that in his time the Empire was on all ſides invaded by the barbarous Nations bordering upon it, and had been utterly ruined through his careleſs Neglect, had not divers Generals in ſeveral places undertaken the Defence of it; they were near Thirty together, who all aſſumed the Imperial Purple, and are call'd by Hiſtorians the Thirty Tyrants: Six of them, namely, Lollianus, Victorianus, Poſthumus, the two Tetrici, Father and Son, with Marius, are conjectured to have ruled in this Iſland, as appeareth by many of their Coins found in England, but eſpecially about Colcheſter; whence Porphirius the Philoſopher, (who lived in thoſe Times,) ſaid, That Britain was a Soil fruitful of Tyrants; Gallienus being ſlain by the Treachery of three of his own Captains.

Mar. Aurel. Flau. Claudius was choſen Emperor in his ſtead; who, having performed ſeveral great Actions, and intending to reduce the Roman Empire again under one Head, died ſuddenly as he was making Preparations againſt Tetricus, who then held the Weſtern Provinces, together with Britain.

Anno Dom. CCLXIX.

To whom ſucceeded L. Domitius Aurelianus, who, being choſen Emperor by the Souldiers, and confirmed by the Senate, ſet himſelf immediately to reduce the Empire again under one Head; a Work wherein Claudius his Predeceſſor had been prevented by Death, which was at laſt worthily performed by this Emperor; for Tetricus, who ruled in Gaul and Britain by the Terror of his Arms, being brought to ſubmit himſelf, was led in Triumph through Rome. Aurelian was afterwards killed by Mneſtheus, his Secretary. This Emperor raiſed the Ninth Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians. After him

M. Aurelius Valer. Probus, who ſucceeded him; in whoſe Reign Bonoſus, the Son of a Pretorian Souldier, bred in Spain, (though by Deſcent a Britain,) and a matchleſs Drinker, not ſo much to be blamed, if (as they write,) he were ſtill wiſeſt in his Cups, having attained by the courſe of War to great military Honours, thô at laſt, in his Charge over the German Navy, having (willingly as was thought,) ſuffered the Ships to be burnt, truſting on his Intereſt with the Weſtern Legions, he joined with one Proculus, and ſeizing upon Spain, Gaul, and Britain, made himſelf ~~as~~ Emperor for a time; but after a long and bloody Fight near Collen, being vanquiſhed by Probus, he hang'd himſelf, and gave occaſion of that ſharp Epitaph made upon him for his great Drinking; Here hangs a Tankard.

Zoſimus lib. 1.

After this, Probus prevented a new Rebellion in Britain, by the ſevere Loyalty of Victorinus, a Moor, (one of his Miniſters) at whoſe Recommendation he had placed a Lieutenant here, (whom Mr. Camden ſuppoſes to have been Cornelius Lælianus, ſince his Coins are found in this Iſland, but in no other Countrey,) who rebelled and ſet up for Emperor; but Probus upbraiding Victorinus with the Diſloyalty of him whom he had recommended, he undertook to rectifie this Miſtake; ſo haſtning over hither, and finding the Governor in actual Rebellion, by ſome Contrivance, not mentioned by our Hiſtorians, he privately, in the Night, found means to kill him. Eutropius alſo relates, that Probus was the firſt Emperor who gave leave to the Spaniards, Gauls and Britains, to plant Vines, and to make Wine: But he having ſubdued the Vandals and Burgundians in a great Battel, ſent over many of them to inhabit in Britain, where they did good Service to the Roman Empire, when any Inſurrection hapned in this Iſle: They are ſuppoſed to have had their Camp upon thoſe Hills near Cambridge, commonly called Gogmagog-Hills, where on the top of a Hill may be ſeen at this day a Plain, encompaſſed round with Trenches of a large Circumference, with only one Entrance.

But though this Emperor well deſerved the Name of Probus, yet could he not avoid the Fate of his Predeceſſors, being ſlain by his own Army; the occaſion whereof was that worthy Saying of his, That in a ſhort time he hoped to bring it to paſs, that the Empire ſhould want no more ſtanding Armies: He was thus made away.

M. Aurelius Carus was advanced to the Empire by the Army; he created his two Sons Carinus and Numerianus, Cæſars; to Carinus he gave the Charge of Britain, with the reſt of the Weſtern Provinces, but taking Numerianus along with him into the Eaſt, he invaded the Perſians, where he died ſuddenly, (as ſome relate,) being ſtruck with Lightning; (thô Voſpiſcus* ſaith, he died a natural Death; and that the Souldiers firing his Tent gave occaſion to the former Report:) His pious Son Numerianus was ſlain by Aper, one of his Captains, and he again underwent the ſame Fate by Diocleſian, who alſo in a ſet Battle not long after ſlew Carinus, who by his Riot and Luxury had much waſted Britain, and the other Provinces: All theſe Tranſactions happened within the ſpace of two Years.

C. Aurel. Diocleſian being advanced to the Empire by the Choice of the Eaſtern Army, adopted Mar. Aurel. Maximinianus, Sirnamed Herculius, his Aſſociate in the Empire; five Years after which, the former of theſe Emperours nominated Galerius, and the latter adopted Conſtantius Clorus, Cæſars; conſtraining them to divorce their former Wives, and to marry their Daughters.

Anno Dom. CCLXXXIV.

In the beginning of this Emperour's Reign, Carauſius, a Man of mean Parentage born in Menapia, (that is) about the Parts of Cleves and Juliers, who, through all Military Degrees, was advanced at length to be Governour of Bononia, Admiral of the Belgic and Armoric Seas, then much infeſted by the Francks and Saxons; but what he took from the Pirats, he neither reſtored to the Owners, nor accounted to the Publick, whereby he much enriched himſelf; not ſo much as guarding the Seas, but rather conniving at thoſe Pirats, till at length he grew too great a Delinquent to be leſs than an Emperour; therefore hearing that Maximinian had ordered him to be ſlain, he then took upon him the Imperial Robe, and hearing that this Emperour was marching againſt him with the Fleet under his Command, paſſed over into Britain, where he built a new Fleet after the Roman faſhion, getting into his Power the Legion that was left here in Gariſon, with other Outlandiſh Cohorts; he detained and liſted the very Merchants and Factors of Gaul, and with the Allurements of Spoil, invited great numbers of other barbarous Nations to take his part, and trained them to Sea-Service; wherein the Romans had ſo much loſt their Skill, that Carauſius with his Navy at Sea did what he liſted, robbing on all the Sea-Coaſts, whereby Maximinian not able to come nearer than the Shore of Bononia, (now Boloigne,) was forced to conclude a Peace with Carauſius, and yield him up Britain, as one fitteſt to guard that Province againſt the Incurſions of the Northern Britains: This is the reaſon that in all Carauſius's Silver Coins we find two Emperours taking hands, with this Inſcription on the Reverſe, CONCORDIA AUGG.

But not long after, Maximinian ſent Conſtantius Chlorus, now Cæſar, againſt Carauſius, who in the mean while had made himſelf ſtrong, both within the Land, and without. Geoffery of Monmouth writes, that he made the Picts his Confederates; to whom, as being lately come out of Scythia, he gave Albania (now called Scotland) to inhabit: And it is indeed obſervable, that about his time the Picts are found to be firſt mentioned by Eumenius in his Panegyrick to Maximinian, † where he alſo mentions the Hiberni together with Picts, both which he there calls Half-naked Enemies: But whether by thoſe Hiberni are to be underſtood Iriſh-men, (as that word Gramatically imports,) and as our Engliſh Antiquaries under-

An ~~But~~ (as Nennius relates) Carauſius repaired and fortified the Walls of Severus with Caſtles, and a round Houſe of poliſh'd Stone on the Bank of Carron, which River, he ſaith, was from him ſo called; alſo in Gaul he kept Bononia with a Gariſon, and all the Francks which had by his permiſſion ſeated themſelves in Bélgia were at his command; but Conſtantius haſting into Gallia, beſieged Bononia, (now called Boloigne, as I ſaid before,) and with Stones and Timber blocking up the Harbour, kept out all Relief that could be ſent in by Carauſius; but before Conſtantius with the Fleet which he had prepared could arrive thither, Carauſius was ſlain in Britain by the Treachery of Allectus, one of his chief Friends and Commanders, who likewiſe for three Years uſurped the Empire; when Carauſius worthily (as ſome ſay, or as others, Tyrannically) had Ruled this Iſland 7 Years.

D. ~~CCLXIII.~~

~~But~~ Conſtantius preſently took hold of that Opportunity before Allectus ſhould ſettle his Affairs, therefore, thô the weather were ill, he put his Army to Sea with all expedition, and that from ſeveral Havens, the more to ſpread the Terrour of his Landing, and render it doubtful where to expect him; ſo in a Miſt paſſing by Allectus with the Britiſh Fleet unſeen, that lay cruiſing near the Iſle of Vecta, (now Wight,) he no ſooner got on ſhore but he fired his own Ships, to leave his Men no hopes of Safety but in Victory; then forthwith the poor oppreſſed Britains came flocking in to Conſtantius, offering themſelves, together with their Wives and Children, to him, as their Deliverer ſent them from Heaven; which when Allectus heard, being much diſmayed at this News, he paſſed over to the Britiſh Shore, where landing, he reſolved to try his Fortune in a Battle on the Land; where being encountred by Aſclepiodotus Captain of the Prætorian Bands, and deſperately ruſhing on, being unmindful both of the well-ordering of his Men, and of bringing them all in to fight, (except the noted Acceſſories of his Treaſon, and his Outlandiſh Hirelings:) He was overthrown, and ſlain with little or no loſs to the Romans, but great Execution on the Francks. Allectus having before flung away his Imperial Robes, that he might not be known, his Body was found almoſt naked in the Field; the reſt of his Men flying to London, and purpoſing with the Pillage of that City to eſcape by Sea, were met by another part of the Roman Army, whom the late mentioned Miſt at Sea had ſeparated, and now by chance had brought up the Thames, where landing, they killed almoſt all the reſt; even in the very City, whilſt the Citizens had the pleaſure to behold their own Deliverance. By this Victory, this Province was totally recovered to the Roman Empire, as Eumenius witneſſes in his Panegyrick above-mentioned, after it had been 10 Years in Rebellion. But before I diſmiſs this part of our Hiſtory, I cannot omit what Geoffery of Monmouth alſo adds, thô with no ſhew of probability, to this Hiſtory of Carauſius and Allectus his Succeſſor in this Uſurpation, viz.

That Allectus going about to puniſh thoſe Romans and Britains who had adhered to the Party of Carauſius, and been partakers in his Robberies; who reſenting this Severity, choſe one Aſclepiodotus a Britain to revenge it, exhorting him to ſet upon Allectus then in London, whilſt he was celebrating a Feaſt to his Gods; at whoſe arrival Allectus forſaking his Sacrifice, and marching out with the choiceſt of his Souldiers, joyned Battel with him, but being ſlain, Gallus a Captain of Allectus ſtill held London; to the reducing whereof, Aſclepiodotus (now made King) ſummoned the Dametæ and Venedoti (i. e. the Inhabitants of that part of the Iſland now called Wales) to his Aſſiſtance; with theſe Forces he beleaguer'd the City, and with warlike Engines battered down great part of the Wall. Gallus perceiving himſelf not able to hold out any longer, came to a Parly, and ſurrendered the Town upon condition to march out Armed; which being agreed to, Aſclepiodotus enters Walbrook, ~~whence it had its Name ;~~ but the Venedoti, contrary to the Articles, fell upon Gallus and ſlew him, at a Brook's ſide within the City, now called from his Name Galbrook, or Walbrook. But it is certain, there was never any King of Britain called Aſclepiodotus, who was indeed no more than the Præfect to Conſtantius, nor had he any ſuch Captain as this Gallus as we can any where find, except in this Author.

But Eumenius who then lived, (and was of Conſtantius his Houſehold, and who upon this Victory made the Panegyrick but now mentioned in Praiſe of Maximian and Conſtantius, then Emperours,) relates this to have been done in the courſe of one continued Action: So alſo Sigonius, a Judicious Hiſtorian, thô others allow 3 Years to the Tyranny of Allectus. In thoſe Times there was ſuch great ſtore of good Workmen and excellent Builders in Britain, that during theſe great Diſturbances here, the Æduans in Burgundy entertained them to build their Temples and publick Edifices.

Diocleſian having hitherto ſucceſsfully ſhewed his Valour againſt the Enemies of the Roman Empire, now exerted his Rage in a bloody Perſecution againſt his obedient and harmleſs Chriſtian Subjects; from the feeling whereof, this Iſland (though the moſt remote) was not, it ſeems, yet far enough off from having ſome ſhare of his Rage; for our Hiſtorians, Gildas and Bede, relate, That in this Perſecution, Albanus a Citizen of Verulam ſuffered, as alſo Arron and Julius Citizens of the City of Legions, (now Caerleon upon Uske,) and many others of both Sexes, in divers places, who were put to Death by various Torments. Of the Martyrdom of St. Alban, Bede gives us this particular Account, viz. That he being as yet a Pagan, when the Edict of thoſe Heathen Emperours raged againſt the Chriſtians, received into his Houſe a certain Prieſt who had then fled from his Perſecutors, whom whilſt he beheld imploy'd Night and Day in Watchings and Prayers, upon a ſudden (being touched by the Divine Grace) he began to emulate his Faith and Piety, and being by degrees inſtructed by his ſaving Precepts, at laſt leaving his Idolatry he became a Chriſtian. Now when this Prieſt had lived with him ſome time, it came to the Ears of the Roman Governour, That this Confeſſor (who was not yet to be Martyr'd) lay hid in the Houſe of Alban: The Governour preſently ſent Souldiers to find him out, who when they came thither, Alban offered himſelf to them in ſtead of his Gueſt, in that very Habit he uſed to wear; and being immediately brought before the Judge, who at that ~~very~~ time was ſtanding Anno Dom. CCCIV. at the Altar ſacrificing to his Idols: when he ſaw Alban, he was highly incenſed, becauſe he had voluntarily delivered himſelf up inſtead of his gueſt, ſo commanding him to be drag'd before the Images of thoſe falſe Gods, he was then worſhiping; ſaid thus, "For that thou haſt rather choſen to conceal a Rebellious, Sacrilegious Fellow, than to deliver him up to my Guards; that as a contemner of the Gods he might ſuffer the puniſhment due to his Blaſphemy; whatſoever torments therefore were due to him, thou thy ſelf ſhalt endure, if thou perſiſteſt in this new Superſtition. But Alban, who had of his own accord owned himſelf to be a Chriſtian, did not at all fear the threats of the Preſident; but plainly told him, that he would not obey his commands (the reſt of their Dialogue being ſomewhat tedious, I omit) but the Judge being thereupon more provoked, told him again, that if he intended to live, he muſt imediately offer Sacrifice to their Gods; which he again not only refuſed, but alſo reproved others for ſo doing, and thereupon was condemned to moſt cruel Torments, all which he manfully overcame; and although they did all they could to invent new Tortures for him, yet he endured them all with exquiſite patience, till their wearineſs, not pity made them deſiſt. And here we muſt bewail our want of a true Story of this good Man's Martyrdom, which the Monks have mixed with ſo many improbable Circumſtances, that it is even nauſeous either to read or hear them. But I ſhall proceed to relate what I find in Bede, without paſſing my word for the truth of the following Miracles.

Alban being ſentenced to be beheaded, much People flock'd to the place of his Execution; which was on a Hill (afterward called in Engliſh Holm hurſt) to which they were to paſs over a River, where a narrow paſſage admitted of very few a-breaſt. Alban being to follow after all the company, and perceiving it would be very late before he could attain his deſired End, obtained by his Prayers, that the River parting aſſunder, afforded a free paſſage for a great many together; this Miracle ſo wrote upon him, who was appointed to be his Executioner, that he utterly refuſed the Imployment, deſiring rather to ſuffer himſelf for him, than to offer him any violence: But another ſoon took his place.

Alban being come to the top of the Hill, where he was to ſuffer, found himſelf very dry; when preſently by his Prayer, a Spring brake forth at his Feet, to the amaſement of all that ſaw it, except the Executioner, who notwithſtanding the Miracle, ſtruck off his Head; when inſtantly his own Eyes fell out of his Head, upon the ground, as a juſt puniſhment for his infidelity: and preſently after ſuffer'd alſo the Convert Executioner above mentioned.

The body of St. Alban was privately buried; That Age not knowing the Vertue of keeping Saints Relicks; but many Years after, Offa King of the Mercians, is ſaid to have diſcovered his Bones, and to have removed them into a ſtately Shrine; where he built a noble Church and Monaſtery, as ſhall be particularly ſhown in its proper place.

Not long after the Martyrdom of St. Alban, ſuffered alſo the Prieſt who converted him, and whoſe Name Geoffrey will have to be Amphibalus; thô we had never heard of it at all, but from this Author, that word ſignifying properly not a Man's name, but a long ſhag Cloak, which it is ſuppoſed that good Man wore: I ſhall alſo paſs by the Martyrdoms of many other Chriſtians, ſaid to be at Lichfield, and Wincheſter and other places, as being of very uncertain credit, having no other Authors, but

But the Emperors Diocleſian and Maximinian, having both on the ſame day (thô in different places) reſign'd the Empire to the two Cæſar's above-mentioned, and *Conſtanti~~nus~~*us choosing the Weſtern Provinces (whereof in Britain was one) for his ſhare, came over hither to ſettle affairs in this Iſland; and Eutropius ſuppoſes Helena his Wife to have been a Britain by Birth; whereupon our Geoffrey preſumes further, and makes her to have been the Daughter of one King Coil, whom he ſuppoſes to have ſucceeded Aſclepiodotus: But ſince there is no ground for this fancy in any Authentick Writer, I ſhall wholly ſlight it, eſpecially ſince Nicephorus and other Greek Hiſtorians relate her to be a Bithynian; but to return to that which is more to our purpoſe; it is certain that as ſoon as ~~Auguſtus~~ was declared he immediately put a ſtop to the Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians in his Provinces; and then paſſing over into Britain, Conſtantius not long after made an Expedition againſt the Caledonians, whom he overcame; and not long after died at York: having been all his life time a great favourer of the Chriſtians, though no profeſſed Chriſtian himſelf: to whom ſucceeded

Conſtantine his Son, who came luckily Poſt from Rome to Boloigne, juſt about the time (ſaith Euſebius) when his Father lay Sick upon his Death-bed; where being by him nominated for his Succeſſour, he was immediately after his Father's Funerals, by the whole Army ſaluted Emperour, thô he declined it all he could; concerning whom, there is a great diſpute whether he were a Britain or not; our Britiſh Hiſtorians produce a paſſage out of Eumenius's Oration to Conſtantine, wherein he calls Britain, the moſt bleſſed and fortunate of all Lands, quia Conſtantinum Cæſarem primum vidiſti; which words may yet be thus interpreted, that is, it did not behold Conſtantine Born; but ſaw him firſt created Emperor: which is undoubtedly true, but ſince moſt of our Engliſh Hiſtorians underſtand it in the former Senſe; (there being nothing of concluſive certainty deliver'd by Antient Authors concerning it.) I ſhall leave it as I found it; thô it muſt be confeſſed that the learned Dr. Stillingfleet in his Orig. Britannicæ, Not only from ſeveral paſſages in Eumenius's Panegyrick, but alſo by other Arguments, hath made it highly probable that Conſtantine was born in Britain.

De vita Conſt. lib. 1.

But this is more certain, that Conſtantine before his departure hence, ſeems to have had ſome Bickerings with the Britains in the Northern parts of this Iſland, which having in ſome time compoſed, he paſſed again into Gaul; where leaving a great Army (many of whom were before raiſed in Britain) he from thence went into Italy, and near Rome overthrew the Tyrant Maxentius, who had ſeized that City, together with the reſt of Italy; immediately after which Victory, he declared himſelf a Chriſtian in the preſence of his whole Army, which yet he would not have perhaps ventured to have done, had he not been ſure that a conſiderable Party of his Souldiers had been ſo before.

Anno Dom. CCCX.

About the Fourth Year after, Conſtantine return'd again into Britain, but what he performed here is not left us by any Hiſtorian now extant, more than what * Euſebius tells us in general, That Conſtantine paſſed over to the Britains, (who had it ſeems then revolted) whom, when he had ſubdued, he turned his Eyes to thoſe other parts of the World, that he might relieve thoſe that wanted his aſſiſtance; which this Author ſuppoſes to be the reſt of the Empire then oppreſſed by Maxentius ~~Maxcutius~~, thô all others make him to have been ſubdued in the very beginning of Conſtantine's Reign.

* De vita Conſtant. lib. 1. cap. 25.

Anno Dom. CCCX.

But Geoffery (could he be believed) gives us a very plauſible account, why Conſtantine came now again into Britain, which is to this effect, That Octavius Duke of the Gewiſſes, taking advantage of the Emperor's abſence had ſeized upon Britain for himſelf (the circumſtances of which I omit, to ſhorten the Story) as alſo how one Trahern (who is there ſuppoſed to be this Emperor's Unkle by the Mother) obtained a great Victory over this Octavius; but that upon Traherns being kill'd at Verulam, by the treachery of a Nobleman of Octavius's Party, he again returned into Britain, and making a Confederacy with the Northern Nations, renewed the War; whereupon Conſtantine coming upon Octavius on the ſuddain, ſoon overcame him, yet ſuffer'd him though Conquer'd ſtill to Reign here as a Tributary to the Roman Empire: But it is not likely Conſtantine would have given ſo great an encouragement to Rebellion; nay, what is yet more improbable, he makes this Octavius to have Govern'd this Iſland, even to the days of Gratian and Valentinian, which muſt needs be falſe; ſince the Coyns of all thoſe Roman Emperors, who ſucceeded between Conſtantine and Valentinian are found in this Iſland; whereas no Coyn or Monument of this Octavius, was ever yet to be ſeen; and further none of the Hiſtorians of this Age do mention any ſuch King of Britain, as it is likely they would have done, had they known of ſuch a perſon.

Vid. Breviarium ſexti Ruſi.

But this is more likely, that the Emperour Conſtantine alter'd the Ancient Diviſions of Britain, by adding to the former Provinces, viz. Britannica Prima and Secunda, Two others, viz. Flavia, and Maxima Caſarienſis.

 Vid. Uſſerii Antiquitates Britan. Eccleſ. cap. 8.*

I have no more to add concerning Civil Affairs in this Emperor's Reign; but as for Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, it is certain, the Britiſh Church was now grown ſo conſiderable, that * it ſent divers Biſhops to the Council of Arles in Gallia, which was held in the Year of our Lord 314, as you may ſee in the Firſt Tome of Gallick Councils; where Eborius Biſhop of the City of Eboracum, in the Province of Britain, and Reſtitutus Biſhop of the City of London, and Adelphius Biſhop of the City of Colcheſter appeared as Deputies for the reſt of the Biſhops of Britain.

Id. ibid.

And though in the great Council of Nice, which was aſſembled Anno Dom. 325, there is no expreſs mention of the Names of the Britiſh Biſhops which appear'd there, becauſe the Subſcriptions to that Council are loſt; yet Athanaſius, as alſo Hillary Biſhop of Poictiers do ſufficiently confirm their being there, as well as Conſtantine himſelf, who in his Letter to the Alexandrians, ſays; that Eaſter was obſerved according to the manner preſcribed in that Council, by all the Nations he there mentions, among whom the Britains are reckon'd for one.

Conſtantine dying, divided the Empire amongſt his Three Sons, Conſtantinus, Conſtans, and Conſtantius; to the Eldeſt he gave Britain, France, and Spain, with part of Germany; but he not content with his ſhare in the Empire (though moſt conſiderable) invaded the Right and Poſſeſſion of his Brother Conſtans, and was by him Slain; he is reported to have been kill'd by his Brother's Generals, near to the City of Aquileia in Italy.

But Magnentius, whoſe Father was a Britain, conſpiring againſt this Emperour; and having beſet him in a Town in Gaul, called Hellena as he was hunting thereabouts with a ſmall Retinue, there ſlew him; whereupon, though the Weſtern Empire ought by right to have fallen to Conſtantius; yet Magnentius having poſſeſt himſelf of it, and having drawn in the Britains to ſide with him in his Rebellion, he maintained it for Three Years againſt Conſtantius; the ſucceſs at firſt was various; but at laſt the heat of the Revolt being pretty well over, and Conſtantius ſtill by degrees increaſing upon him, he was no longer able to hold up his Head; ſo that at laſt he ſlew himſelf at Lyons: The peaceable poſſeſſion of this part of Britain being thereupon left to Conſtantius.

Lib. 14.

About this time the General of all the Forces throughout Britain, was Gratianus, Sirnamed Funarius, from his great ſtrength in pulling a Rope from Four Men, thô not long after this (as Ammianus Marcellinus relates) one Paulus a notary was ſent into Britain, that he might enquire what Military Men were engaged in the Rebellion of Magnentius, many of whom he maliciouſly proſecuted, carrying away like a Flood the Fortunes of divers Innocent Men, impriſoning the Free-born Subjects, and putting others into Irons and Fetters, heaping together falſe Accuſations againſt them, by which ſeverity he committed ſuch great oppreſſions, as caſt an eternal blot on the Reign of Conſtantius, who ſupported him in his Cruelties.

But one Martinus then Governing thoſe Provinces as Præfect, grievouſly lamenting the ſufferings of theſe Innocent Men, often beſeeching him, that he would ſpare them; who, when he could not prevail, threatned that he would depart hence, hoping that this malicious Inquiſitor might at laſt ceaſe from his ſo violent proſecution: But Paulus fearing his trade might by this means decay, being cruelly artificial in framing of Counterfeit Plots, (from whence he obtained this Sirname of Catena) brought the Præfect himſelf into a participiation of thoſe very dangers, reſolving to ſend him with divers Tribunes and Priſoners to the Emperour, with which the Præfect being provoked, endeavoured to Stab Paulus; but miſſing his paſs, he thruſt the ſame Sword into his own body, and ſo unfortunately periſh'd this Honeſt Man, who loſt his life in trying to relieve the miſerable Fortunes of others. All which things being thus wickedly perform'd, Paulus ſtain'd with Innocent Blood, return'd to the Emperours Preſence; againſt whoſe coming with his Priſoners, all ſorts of Tortures and Executioners were prepared, ſo that many of them were proſcribed and Out-law'd; ſome baniſhed, and others moſt cruelly put to Death. But God ſome Years after, juſtly puniſh'd this Villain; when by the Command of Julian the Emperour he was burnt alive.

Sometime after this, the Council of Ariminum was called by Conſtantius, being the moſt numerous that ever had yet appear'd, as conſiſting of above Four Hundred Biſhops, both of the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches, Anno Dom. CCCLIX.

and in which Council, by the Emperour's long detaining the Biſhops againſt their wills, till they were quite tired out, the major part of them was forced to ſubſcribe the New Creed, made not long before at the pretended Council of Syrmium, wherein the Word Omoouſios being omitted; the Son of God was declared only to be Omoiouſios, i. e. of like ſubſtance with the Father: I have been the more particular as to this Council, in reſpect to the Biſhops ſent from Britain; to whom, as well as to the reſt, Sulpicius Severus tells us, the Emperour allowed all ſorts of Proviſions, which ſeemed undecent to the Aquitanian, Gallick, and Britiſh Biſhops to accept of; who therefore refuſing the publick allowance, choſe rather to live at their own Charges; only Three Biſhops of Britain for want of Revenues, were forced to make uſe of the publick ſtipend, when they had refuſed a Contribution offer'd them by the reſt, thinking it more honourable for a publick Service to ſubſiſt on the publick Treaſury, than to be burthenſome to private Men; and this muſt be ſaid in commendation of moſt of the Weſtern Biſhops, that notwithſtanding their being out Voted, yet (if Athanaſius tells true) in a Letter he writ to the Emperour Jovian, the moſt part of them ſtill perſiſted in the Faith profeſt by the Council of Nice.

But to return again to Civil Affairs, from whence we have made too long a Digreſſion; about theſe times Alypius, a Heathen, was Lieutenant of Britain, who afterwards beſtowed much labour (thô in vain) to Rebuild the Temple of Jeruſalem; but the Year following this Council, Ammianus Macellinus relates, that the fierce Nations of the Scots and Picts combining together, breaking the Peace, waſted all places near the borders, by a cruel Incurſion; ſo that the fear of it terrified the other Provinces, already wearied out with a continued ſucceſſion of ſo many Calamities: But Julian then lately made Cæſar (who was afterwards Emperour) Wintering ~~then~~ at Paris, hearing this ill news, was diſtracted in his Thoughts what to do, fearing to leave Gaul to the Almans, then preparing for War; therefore he reſolved to ſend Lupicinus, at that time Keeper of the Arms and Warlike Stores, into this Iſland to compoſe theſe Troubles, being a Man Warlike, and well skill'd in Military Affairs; but of a haughty boaſting humour: Beſides, it was much doubted whether he were more Covetous or Cruel. But having raiſed an Army of Light-armed Men, to which were added the * Herculians, Batavians and many companies of Miſians, being now made General, and arriving at Bononia, having put all his Men on Board, paſſed over with a proſperous Wind, and landed at Rutipæ (now called Sandwich, near Richborough Caſtle in Kent,) and from thence marched to London, and there taking Council according to the exigency of Affairs, made haſte to meet the Enemy; but what he did againſt them, it is great pity this Author hath not told us; all he ſays further of this Lupicinus, being only this, that when the Army had ſaluted Julian Emperour, and that a War was like to happen with Conſtantius; Lupicinus was feared (thô abſent,) being ſuſpected as a Man of a haughty Spirit, that if he ſhould know theſe things (ruling then in Britain) he might hinder Julians proceedings, and therefore a notary was ſent to Boloign, on purpoſe to watch that no body ſhould paſs over into Britain: So that all Intelligence being ſtop'd, between this Iſland and the Continent, Lupicinus returning back before he knew any thing of theſe matters, could give him no diſturbance here.

But

Anno Dom. CCCLXI.

But Julian having now taken the Title of Emperour and Auguſtus, marched againſt Conſtantius; who coming out of the Eaſt to meet him, as far as Mopſueſtia, on the borders of Cilicia, there died of a Feaver: Whereupon Julian his Couſin was quietly received as Emperour, even by thoſe who had been of Conſtantius's ſide: who (from his renouncing the Chriſtian Religion) was commonly called the Apoſtate, of whom I ſhall ſay no more (ſince his ſhort Reign affords nothing relating to Britain) than that he was kill'd by an Arrow, in a Battle againſt the Perſians; but whether it were Shot by an Enemy, or by one of his own Chriſtian Souldiers who hated him, is uncertain.

Sozomen, l. 6. c. 3.

Whereupon Jovianus, then an Officer of good note, was choſen Emperour by the Army; but he refuſing to Command Heathens, the Souldiers cried out with one accord, that they were all Chriſtians; upon which he accepted of the Empire; from whence it plainly appears, that his Army was outwardly Heathens before, having complied for fear of the Emperour's diſpleaſure.

But Jovian Reigning but Seven Months, it is not to be expected that any thing conſiderable could happen in Britain in ſo ſhort a Reign; and therefore, all I ſhall ſay further of him is, That in his Journey to Conſtantinople, at a place called Daduſtana on the Borders of Galatia, he died a very unuſual Death; being killed by the damp of a new-plaiſtered Chamber in which he lay, ſome Charcoals having been kindled in it when he went to bed.

Whereupon, not long after, Valentinian was at Nice in Bythinia declared Emperour by the Army, being the Son of Gratian, Sirnamed Funarius, above-mentioned; but Valentinian, not long after he arrived at Conſtantinople, declared Valens, his Brother, to be his Partner in the Empire; in the beginning of whoſe Reign the Almans waſted Gaul and Rhætia; the Sarmatians and Quadi, Pannonia; the Picts, Saxons, Scots, and Attacotti, alſo vexed the Britains with their continual Incurſions.

Not to mention the Irruptions of the barbarous Nations into other parts of the Empire, particularized by Ammianus Marcellinus, who is the firſt Roman Author by whom we find the Scots to have been mentioned: thô St. Hierome (in his Epiſtle againſt Cteſiphon the Pelagian) has given us a much more ancient Paſſage, which he tranſlated out of Porphyrie the Greek Philoſopher, who writ an Age before Ammianus, which is to this effect; That neither Britain, a Province fertile of Tyrants, nor the Scotiſh Nations, nor all the barbarous Nations round about to the very Ocean, did ever acknowledge Moſes and the Prophets: For thô Scaliger in his Notes upon Propertius, and afterwards in his Animadverſions on Euſebius, takes upon him to correct the common Editions of Seneca's Satyrical Comedy upon Claudius, by reading in ſtead of the words Scuta Brigantes, Scoto-Brigantes; thô it be ingenious, and would make better ſenſe in that place; yet it is not to be relied upon, ſince no ancient Manuſcript Copies are found to countenance that Correction; nor do we any where read, that Claudius made War againſt the Scots, or ever paſſed further than the Southern Parts of Britain; nor can we find in Ptolomy, or other ancient Authors, any mention of the Brigantes (much leſs of Scoto Brigantes) beyond the River of Tweed. But as for Dempſter's reading of Scoticas Pruinas in ſtead of Scythicas in the Poet Florus's Verſes to the Emperour Adrian, ſince it is back'd by no ancient Manuſcript that any body ever ſaw but himſelf, it is not to be charged upon his bare word, as the learned Anno Dom. CCCLXIV. ned Arch-Biſhop Uſher in his 16th Chapter of his Ant. Eccleſ. Britan. very well obſerves: But who theſe Attacotti were who are joyned in Ammianus with the Scoti, very much perplexes our modern Criticks, there being ſo many various readings of this Word in divers Copies of this Author, in ſome of whom it is written Attacitti, and in others Attiſcotti; Lib. 2. adverſ. Jovin. and are ſuppoſed by Mr. Camden in his Britannia to be the ſame Nation mentioned by St. Hierome by the Name of Scots, ſome of whom this Father tells us, he ſaw eat Man's Fleſh when he was in Gaul: But in the ancient Notitia Imperii they are called Attecotti juniores, and Attecotti ſeniores, thô in one Edition of the ſaid Notitia they are written Attakotti, (as Monſieur Lablé well obſerves;) whence the Learned Dr. Gale conjectures them to have been a barbarous ſort of Britains living in the North of Scotland about Attarith; but of this, ſince we have no certainty, I leave every Man to take which of theſe Readings he thinks moſt probable.

Am. Marcel. l. 27 c. 8. But how the poor Britains were relieved out of theſe Difficulties, this Author ſays nothing till four Years after, when he relates, That the Emperour Valentinian in his Journey from the Ambiani (in Gaul), to the Anno Dom. CCCLXVIII. Treviri (in Germany,) received the unwelcome News, that Britain was reduced to the laſt Extremity by the joynt Invaſion of the barbarous Nations, and that Nectaridius Count of the Sea Coaſt was ſlain; and Fullaſaudes, another of his Commanders, being circumvented by the Enemies Ambuſcades there periſhed, which when he had heard with a great deal of concern, he immediately diſpatch'd away Severus (then Comes Domeſticorum, i. e. Lord Steward of his Houſhold) to correct theſe Diſorders; who being a little after recalled without doing any thing, Jovinus was ſent into Britain, the Emperour having diſpatched before with all ſpeed all ſuch Proviſions as were neceſſary for a powerful Army, and which the preſſing Neceſſities then required.

But at laſt, upon the News of ſuch ſad and fearful Calamities which then befel Britain, Theodoſius was choſen for this Province, who reſolved to haſten thither with all ſpeed, who being a Man of great Reputation for Martial Actions, and having raiſed a ſufficient number of freſh, youthful Legions and Cohorts, he ſet forward with much Reſolution.

Id. Ibid. At this time the Picts were divided into two Nations, the Decalidonia, (or rather, as Mr. Camden ſuppoſes, Deucaledonii,) and Vecturiones, with whom came alſo the Attacotti (already mentioned,) together with the Scots, who roving up and down through divers places did a great deal of miſchief; whilſt at the ſame time the neighbouring Coaſts of Gaul were grievouſly infeſted by the Francks and Saxons, each of them ſtriving (as it were) who ſhould exceed the other in Rapines, Burnings, killing and taking Priſoners. Theodoſius being ſent hither to put a ſtop to thoſe Incurſions, taking Sea at Bononia, (or Bulloign) landed at Rulpiæ, whence, after the arrival of his Forces called by divers Names according to their ſeveral Nations and Legions, as the Batavi, Herculii, Jovii, and Victores, he marched toward London, that ancient City, (which was afterwards called Auguſta,) and dividing his Forces into ſeveral Parties, fell upon theſe Rovers, whilſt they marched ſcattered up and down laden with Booty, ſo that eaſily routing them, the Plunder and Captives he quickly recovered; and having reſtored all to their reſpective owners, except ſome ſmall Portion beſtowed on the weary Soldiers, he returned to the ſaid City in a triumphant manner; and thô before it laboured under many Difficulties, he hereby reſtored it to its former Splendour, being ememboldened with this Succeſs to undertake greater Matters; entring into a ſerious conſideration what was further to be done, he found by what he got out of the Priſoners and Fugitives, that the Enemy, conſiſting of divers Nations, was too fierce and numerous to be maſtered by downright Force, but rather by Stratagems, and ſudden Attacks: He firſt therefore by Promiſes of Pardon brought moſt of his own Deſerters and Stragglers to return to their Colours; but being himſelf taken up with divers Cares, he ſent for Civilis to govern Britain as Vice-Præfect, a Man of a ſharp Wit, and a ſtrict obſerver of Juſtice, with Dulcitius a Commander, very famous for his Military Skill.

Of which Expedition, the ſame Author gives us this ſhort general Account in another place, That Theodoſius having by his Induſtry got together an Army of well-diſciplined Souldiers, marching from London, he extreamly relieved the Calamities of the Britains, ſeizing upon all Places from which he might infeſt the Enemy, and commanding his common Souldiers nothing which he did not firſt undertake himſelf; by which means he performed both the Duties of a valiant Souldier, and a famous Commander, divers Nations being put to flight, who had before been encouraged by Impunity to aſſault the Roman Territories, and repaired the Cities and Caſtles which had before ſuffered very much; ſo that a firm Peace was hereby eſtabliſhed for a long time.

But the Year following, whil'ſt Theodoſius was thus employ'd, there happen'd a horrid Conſpiracy, which had like to have proved of dangerous Conſequence, had it not been ſtifled in its very Birth: For one Valentinus of Pannonia, a Man of an inſolent and unquiet Spirit, being for ſome great Crime baniſh'd into Britain; this wretch impatient of reſt, contrived a Plot againſt Theodoſius, who was the only Obſtacle to his wicked deſigns; ſo that conſidering by what means he might bring them to paſs, (his Ambitious deſires ſtill encreaſing) he excited ſome Souldiers, and Outlaw'd perſons, by promiſing them both Pardon and Preferment: And now the time drawing near for effecting his Treaſon, the General being informed thereof, and being now become more bold to take Revenge on the Conſpirators, ſeized them, and delivered them all to Dulcius the Preſect to be put to Death; but judging of things future, by that long Military Experience, (in which he excelled all others of his time) he forbid any further enquiry into the reſt of the Plotters, leſt many being thereby made afraid, thoſe troubles which had been already compos'd, ſhould be again revived.

Then falling to the reforming more neceſſary things, now the danger was over, and that it was evident, good fortune attended all his undertakings, he reſtored the Cities and Gariſons (as we have already ſaid) fortifying the Borders with conſtant Watches and Guards, which though now recovered, had been formerly given up to the Enemy; ſo that the Northern Province being reſtored to its former condition, appointing a new Governour over it, he order'd that it ſhould for the future be called Valentia, in Honour of Valentinian the Emperour.

Id. Ibid.

He alſo removed the Areans from their Stations, a ſort of Men Inſtituted in former times to good purpoſe, (thô who theſe Men were we know not, but there ſeems here to be ſomewhat wanting in the Copy,) but our Author tells us, That he had ſaid ſomewhat more of them in the Acts of Conſtans, which Book is loſt; but theſe ſort of Men now fallen into Vices, were openly convicted, that being allur'd by Promiſes and Rewards, they were often wont to betray to the Barbarians whatſoever

ſoever was done among the Romans; though it ought to have been their buſineſs, by running to and fro to give notice to the Roman Generals of the Motions of the neighbouring Nations: So that all theſe actions being ſo well executed, when Theodoſius was recalled, he left this Province in Peace, and being attended with the general applauſe of all Men to the Sea-ſide, he paſſed over to wait upon the Emperour, who received him with great commendations.

Nor can I here omit inſerting that noble Eulogy, which Claudian the Poet hath given this renowned General Theodoſius, in his Panegyrick to his Grandſon Honorius, in theſe Verſes,

In III. Conſulat. Honorii.

Facta tui numerabit Avi, quem littus adusti
Horreſcit Lybiæ, ratibuſque impervia Thule,
Ille leves Mauros, nec falſo nomine Pictos
Edomuit, Scotumque vago mucrone ſecutus,
Fregit Hyperboreas remis audacibus undas.

He ſhall relate thy Granſier's Acts, whoſe name
Burnt Libya dreads, and Thule known by Fame,
Who the light Moores and Painted Picts did tame:
And with his Sword the roving Scots purſu'd, Whil'ſt with bold Oars He Northern Seas ſubdu'd.

By which laſt Verſes he ſeems to intimate that as he tamed the Picts by Land, ſo he purſued the Scots by Sea; but what are meant by thoſe Hyperboriana Waters, whether the Iriſh Ocean, or the Friths of Dunbritton (called in the Old Scotiſh Laws, Mare Scoticum) I ſhall not take upon me to determine.

But thoſe Antiquaries, who would have the Scots to be planted in Ireland in the time of Claudian, do urge theſe Verſes of the ſame Poet in the next Panegyrick to that Emperour; when ſpeaking in praiſe alſo of his ſaid Grandfather, he thus proceeds, Claud. in IV. Conſulat. Honor.

———maduerunt Saxone fuſo,
Orcades, incaluit Pictorum Sanguine Thule,
Scotorum tumulos flevit glacialis Ierne.

The Orcades were moiſtened with a Flood
Of Saxon Gore, and Thule by the Blood
Of Picts was warmed, nor did Ierne fail
Whole heaps of Scots (then ſlaughter'd) to bewail.

Amian. Marcel. l. 29.

And about theſe times the Picts and Scots raiſing freſh diſturbances, the Emp. Valentinian ſent Framarius King of the Almans (whoſe Country had been totally deſtroyed by a late incurſion) into Britain, though with no higher a command than that of a Tribune over a Regiment of his own Country Men, then highly in requeſt for their Valour and Fidelity; but what he did here Ammianus ceaſes to tell us: So that being for the future bereft of the help of good Hiſtorians, we muſt be forced to take up with ſuch ſcraps as we can pick up here and there out of Zoſimus, Oroſius, and with other Epitomators of better Authors, now loſt.

¶. The Emperour ~~now~~ Valentinian, now dying, his Sons Flavius, Gratianus and Fl. Valentinianus ſucceeded him in the Weſtern Empire, in the Fifth Year of whoſe Reign the Emperour Gratian, created Theodoſius Son to the former of that name ~~above~~ mentioned his Partner in the Empire, aſſigning him the Eaſt for his ſhare. In the Ninth Year of Gratian, Maximus a Spaniard by Birth, (or Education at leaſt) thô moſt of our own Writers ſuppoſe him to have been Born in Britain, and one who had long ſerved in the Britiſh Wars, being now General of the Roman Armies, aſſumed the Imperial Purple; being either diſcontented that Theodoſius the Younger, who had ſerved with him in Britain, had been prefer'd before him to the Empire, or (as Oroſius reports) being conſtrained thereunto by the Souldiers, who hated and deſpiſed Gratian. The firſt Eſſays of his uſurp'd power were indeed employ'd to the good, and preſervation of this Iſland; for the Scots and Picts, who with their Inroads continually waſted the Roman Territories, he ſubdued and drove back, the former into their own Country, Ireland; the latter beyond the Picts Wall; and indeed all the Scotiſh Hiſtorians do now acknowledge that the Scots were ſo beaten and quelled by Maximus, that with their King Eugenius they were forced to quit Britain, and did not return again to renew their Kingdom ~~in Britain~~, in Scotla till above Twenty Years after, if they were here at all before that time, which many of our beſt Engliſh Antiquaries utterly deny, as I ſhall ſhew further, when I come to thoſe Times.

Proſper. Chron.

Anno Dom. CCCLXXXIII.

But the Year following, when Gratian had further provoked the Roman Souldiers; who took it very ill that the Allans were liſted for Souldiers. Maximus taking hold of this occaſion, carried over his Army (then much encreaſed with a multitude of Britiſh Youth) and landing at the mouth of the Rhine, were there joyfully received by the Roman Souldiers, in Belgia and Germany, where he made Triers the ſeat of his Uſurp'd Empire; whence he is by called Gregorius Turonenſis, Trevericus Imperator; and then (ſaith Gildas) ſpreading one of his Wings as far as Spain, the other into Italy, with the very terrour of his Name, he brought under his Subjection the yet unconquer'd Germans. Againſt this Uſurper, Gratian raiſed what Forces he could of Mercenary Allans, which the Romans, and eſpecially the Moores, taking for a freſh affront, as if thoſe Barbarians had been prefer'd before them in Courage and Fidelity, they deſerted him, and went over to his Enemy; ſo that Gratian, being quickly put to Flight by the Forces of Maximus, was forced to flye with Three Hundred Horſe towards the Alpes; Maximus, thô glad of this advantage, yet thought it not ſafe to let him eſcape, ſo he diſpatched after him Andragathius, then his Magiſter Equitum (or General;) who following him with all ſpeed, with ſome Light Horſemen overtook him near the Bridge of Singidunum, and there killed him, by which Act he Eſtabliſh'd Maximus in his Uſurp'd Empire. This is the account which Zoſimus gives us of this Action: I know other Writers make a long relation of a Wile that Andragathius invented, to make the Emperour believe that the Empreſs his Wife was coming to ſee him; which he believing, and coming to the Litter where he thought ſhe was; Andragathius leaping out of the ſudden, Murders him: But this dos not ſeem ſo likely as the former Account Zoſimus gives us of it; for if Andragathius were ſtronger, as without doubt he was, What need was there of this device, or who can believe that the Emperour ſhould have no account of his Wives Motion, nor of the Enemies coming in her ſtead?

Anno Dom. CCCXCI.

Anno Dom. CCCXCI.

All things thus ſucceeding, according to his wicked deſires, having ſetled Gaul, and caſhier'd thoſe Officers, (who had ſided with Gratian,) his Son Fl. Victor, having been declar'd Cæſar, and his Partner in the Empire, to which he required (or rather demanded) of Theodoſius to be admitted, which was for the preſent conſented unto by him, ſince he was not in any capacity to reſiſt him; ſo he received from him the Title of Emperour, and his Image was ſent to Alexandria, and ſet up in the publick Market-place, to be reverenced according to the cuſtom of thoſe Times.

Maximus having thus by Treaſon and Murther, made himſelf Maſter of ſo great a part of the Weſtern Empire, he now pretended a great concern for the Catholick Religion, and by that means drew many Pious Biſhops into an acknowledgment of his power; and therefore to ſhew his Zeal, he Sentenc'd Priſcilla, and other Hereticks of his party to Death, who being Condemn'd in the Council of Bordeaux, and appealing to his Tribunal, were by him Sentenced to be beheaded, although diſſwaded from it by St. Martin, that good Biſhop of Tours, alledging it was ſufficient, that they were excommunicated by the Catholick Church, to which in matters of Faith they were only anſwerable: Theſe were the firſt that were ever executed by any Chriſtian Prince, for meer matters of Faith; which practice as it was only fit for ſuch a Tyrant and Uſurper to have begun, ſo it had been well for the Church, if Lawful Princes had not been too much led away by the intemperate Zeal of ſome Church-men to imitate ſo cruel an Example.

Sulpitius Severus Hiſt. Ec. Lib. 11.

Neither did Maximus reſt contented with what he had already got, but then making War upon the Emperour Valentinian, drove him out of Italy; who thereupon was forced to fly Conſtantinople, where he earneſtly ſolicited Theodoſius to undertake his quarrel, who at laſt (thô with ſome difficulty) granting his requeſt, with all his Forces marched againſt the Tyrant, who then lay ſecure at Aquileia, and in two Batles overthrew him; and not long after being beſieged in that City, his Souldiers finding his Affairs in a deſperate Condition, to make their own Peace, delivered him up to Theodoſius, who by Three days after, order'd him to be beheaded: Whereupon Andragatius his Lieutenant, who was then at Sea, hearing this ill News, caſt himſelf head long out of the Ship, and ſo was drowned, and thereby prevented that publick Execution, which he ſo juſtly deſerved, for thus murthering his Sovereign.

Oroſius lib. 7.

I have inſiſted the longer upon the Actions of Maximus, not only becauſe he firſt begun his Uſurpation in this Iſland; but alſo to let you ſee that great and proſperous Villanies do often meet with that puniſhment they deſerve, as well to the actors as contrivers.

But, I cannot quit the Reign of Maximus, without taking notice of that notorious invention of Geoffery of Monmouth, who makes Dionotus Duke of Cornwall (to whom Maximus at his departure committed the Government of Britain) to have ſent over his own Daughter Urſula with no fewer than Eleven Thouſand Noble Virgins for her Attendants, beſides Sixty Thouſand others of meaner Condition, to Conan Duke of Britain, (on whom he with like truth ſuppoſes Maximus had before beſtowed Armorica) Urſula was to be the Wife of Conan himſelf, and the reſt to be beſtowed upon the Britains, who came over with him, of which Virgins a great part periſhed by Sea, and the reſt being taken by Guanius King of the Huns, and Melgas King of the Picts, were either killed or made Slaves: Yet this Fable (as improbable as it is) has been greedily ſwallowed by Card. * Baronius, who cites no better an Author than our Geoffery for it: Though indeed, † Archbiſhop Uſher proves it not to have been he, but one of as little Credit, viz. the Author of the Acts of King Lucius: However this is the only Authority for this Legend, thô the Bones of theſe Virgins are pretended to be ſhown at Cologne to this day.

Zozimus lib. 4. Oroſ. lib. 7.

After the Death of Maximus, Valentinian II. was again reſtor'd to the Empire of the Weſt by Theodoſius, though he held it not long; Eugenius being ſet up againſt him by Arbogaſtes his chief Comes or General, and by whom this Young unfortunate Emperor, was afterwards ſtrangled at Vienne in Gallia: but Eugenius was ſoon overcome by Theodoſius, and put to Death as he deſerv'd, and Arbogaſtes made himſelf away; upon which Theodoſius took the whole Empire to himſelf both of Eaſt and Weſt; thô after this we find little mention made of the Affairs of Britain, more than that during this Emperour's Reign, this Iſle having been ſo lately bereft of its choiceſt Men by Maximus, had for ſome time lain open to the Incurſions of the Picts and Scots, who took this opportunity to invade it; ſo that Chryſanthius the Son of Marcian a Novatian Biſhop, is ſuppoſed to have been ſent over about this time by Theodoſius as his Lieutenant to ſuppreſs them; and governing with great reputation he did very much ſettle and reſtore this Iſland; but not long after, this Emp rour dyed unexpectedly in the prime of his Years, leaving the Eaſtern Empire to his Eldeſt Son Arcadius, and the Weſtern to his Second Son,

Honorius, during whoſe Minority Stilico was appointed for his Governour, a Man of great Reputation, having been an intimate Councellour to his Father, and after his Death defended Britain, and is ſuppoſed by ſome to have ſent a Legion over hither, under the command of Victorinus, to repreſs the incurſions of the Scots and Picts in the beginning of ius * Honorius's Reign, as appears from Claudian the Poet's Panegyrick, upon Stilico's firſt Conſulſhip; where he introduceth Britain, thus ſpeaking in his praiſe;

About An. Dom. CCCXCVI. CCCXCVII.

Me quoque vicinis pereuntem gentibus, inquit,
Munivit Stilico, totam quum Scotus Iernem.
Movit, & infeſto ſpumavit remige Tethys,
Illius effectum curis ne bella timerem,
Scotica, ne Pictum tremerem, nec littore toto
Proſpiſcerem dubiis venientem Saxona ventis.

Me to ill Neighbours long a Prey expoſed,
With ſafety now hath Stilico incloſed,
Whil'ſt the fierce Scots the Iriſh ſhoar Alarms,
And with theſe Vermin all the Ocean ſwarms:
'Tis through his Care no longer Wars I fear;
The Scots and Picts alike now dreadleſs are:
No longer on the Coaſts I quivering ſtand,
Nor fear a Fleet of Saxons on the Strand.

From which words totam quum Scotus Iernem movit, &c. divers of our Engliſh Antiquaries have inferr'd that the Scots were not at this time planted in Britain, ſince tota Ierne here mentioned, ſeems too large a place for one ſingle Province, viz. Strathern in Scotland, which the Scotiſh writers will have to be underſtood by the word Ierne; nor is that Province, or the River that gives name to it, called Ierne in any Ancient Author. But this is a Controverſie which I ſhall not take upon me to decide, being beyond the bounds of our Hiſtory; However this ſeems much more certain, That about this time, according to the moſt Ancient Scotiſh Hiſtorians now extant, the Scots returned again into Britain; "For the Scots (ſays || Fordun in his Scotichron) now made a ſtrict Alliance with the Picts, in order to the recovering their Country, ſince (as they relate) Maximus had made uſe of the Picts to drive the Scots out of Britain, and had put alſo Gariſons among the Picts, to keep them under; ſo that upon this agreement, Anno Dom. 403, in the Sixth Year of Arcadius and Honorius, Fergus the Son of Erk, the Son of Ethodius, Brother of that Eugenius who was driven out by Maximus, came with his Two Brothers Loarnus and Cenegus (in all probability Loarn and Ængus, being the names the Iriſh Annals give to the Brothers of this Fergus) bringing great ſupplies of the Scots from Ireland and Norway, whither they had been driven by the Romans; and then the Picts, to prevent all ſuſpicion of Treachery, ſurrender'd up many of their Forts and ſtrong places to Fergus, Scotichron. l. 3. c. 1.2.

Who thus became King of that part of Scotland, called anciently Albany, North-weſt of the Mountains of Braid-Albain, though the ſame Author confeſſeth it doth not appear whither he obtained theſe places by the Sword, or by any other right, ſince none of his Predeceſſours had any power there before; but the Picts and Scots being thus united, their firſt work was to drive out the Romans and Britains from their Country, and then to Invade the Roman Province, which was at that time left deſtitute of any defence: And ſo by their incurſions they either killed the Common People, or made them Slaves.

From which ſuppoſed return of Fergus with his Scots, Jo. Fordun begins to date the certain Years of their Kings Reigns, for before that time he confeſſes he had not found them any where ſet down; ſo that it ſeems he either had not ſo good Intelligence, or elſe not ſo good an Invention as Hector Boethius, who hath given us the Succeſſion of Forty Five Scotiſh Kings Reigning in Britain, before this Fergus; together with the Years of their Reigns, and the exact time when they began; and this he ſays he had from the writings of Veremundus a Spaniſh Prieſt, who is reported by him to have writ the Hiſtory of Scotland; as alſo from one Cornelius Hybernicus, Authours whom none but himſelf have ſeen as I can yet hear of. But in a certain old Latin Manuſcript, cited in Camden's Britannia, in Scotland, this Action of Fergus is thus related, "Fergus the Son of Erk was the firſt of the Seed of Chonare that enter'd upon the Kingdom of Albany from Brun Albin (or Drum Albin, that is, the Ridge of Scotland) to the Iriſh Sea, and Inch-Gal, and that after him, the Kings of the Race of Fergus Reigned in Brun Albin, or Brunhere, unto Alpinus the Son of Eochal.

P. 933.

So that according to this Author, the Antient Scotiſh Kingdom of Albany, reach'd from the fartheſt ridge of Mountains, called Braid Albain, all along thoſe Countries of Argile and Loghquhaber, &c. now called the Weſtern Highlands: And from whence the Genuine Scots ſtill call all Scotland Albin; perhaps from the Ancient Name of Albion, once given to the whole Iſland.

Anno Dom. CCCCIII.

But to return to our Hiſtory, from whence we have made too long a digreſſion; it muſt be confeſſed that the Hiſtory of this Iſland is very obſcure and uncertain, (eſpecially in point of time when things were done) from the Death of Maximus, to the coming in of the Saxons; for Gildas and Nennius either being wholly ignorant of the Emperours that Rul'd here, from that time to the Reign of Vortigern, ſuppoſe the Britains to have from that very time caſt off all Subjection to the Roman Empire, which is not ſo, as hath been already ſhewn, and ſhall be made clearer by and by.

Lib. 1. c. 2.

For Bede is more exact, and takes notice of ſome of thoſe Princes that Reigned in Britain, from the Death of Maximus to the coming in of the Saxons, which Gildas and Nennius had omitted.

Anno Dom. CCCXCIII.

But thus much is agreed on by Gildas, Nennius, and Bede, that Britain owed its firſt Ruine to Maximus his carrying over ſo great a number of Britains and Romans into Gaul; from which time Britain being bereft of all its Military Forces and choiceſt Youth who followed that Tyrant, and never returned again, being either ſlain, or elſe planting themſelves in Armorica; ſo that (as Gildas ſaith) the Iſland was thenceforth left to ſuch cruel Rulers as ſtayed behind, who being unexperienced in Warlike Affairs, were ſtill tormented by two tranſmarine Nations, the Scots from the Northweſt, and the Picts from the North. But Bede expreſly tells us, that he calls thoſe, Tranſmarine Nations, not becauſe they then dwelt out of Britain, but becauſe they were divided from its Southern Parts by two Streights or Bays of the Sea; whereof one from the Weſt, and the other from the Eaſt, doth ſeparate the Regions of Britain, ſo that they do not joyn to each other; theſe are the two Streights which were then called Glotta and Bodotria, (now the Friths of Edinburgh and Dunbritton;) from which Paſſage of Bede it is evident, that he ſuppoſed the Scots to be at this time ſetled in this Iſland: Whereupon the Britiſh Nation being unable any longer to bear the continual Incurſions of the Scots and Picts, ſent Ambaſſadors to Rome with lamentable Letters, deſiring ſome Military Forces to be again ſent to defend them; which if it were performed, and the Enemy once repulſed, they vowed perpetual Subjection to the Roman Empire; whereupon Stilico being at that time Tutor to the Emperour Honorius, immediately diſpatched to their Aſſiſtance a Legion ſufficiently furniſhed with Arms, and all Things neceſſary, which arriving in this Iſland, and fighting with its Enemies, killed a great many of them, and drove the reſt out of the Britiſh Borders, and ſo delivered the Inhabitants both from Spoil, and inevitable Captivity.

Id. Ibid.

Anno Dom. CCCXCV.

This Action, thô confounded by Gildas with the ſecond Succours that were ſent in the time of the Emperour Honorius, ſeems moſt likely to be ſent by Stilico in his firſt Conſulſhip, as hath been already ſaid. The Britains being thus relieved, the Roman General, whoſe Name is not told us, thô Camden ſuppoſes him to be called Victorinus, commanded them to build a Wall croſs the Iſland between the two Seas, which might be a Terrour to the Enemies, and a Defence to the Natives; but the Britains not building it with Stones, but Turfs, as not having Artificers ſufficient for ſo great a Work, it ſerved to no purpoſe, thô they drew it between the two Streights or Bays already mentioned for many thouſand Paces; and where the Defence of Water was wanting, there they defended their Borders from the Irruption of the Enemy with a Trench; of which Work, Bede relates there remained moſt evident Tokens

In Dr Stillingfleet*'s Antiquities of the* Britiſh Churches, chap. 5.

Bede, l. 1. c. 12.

Anno Dom. CCCXCV. kens in his time: “ For (ſays he) it begins near the ſpace of two Miles “ from the Monaſtery of Abercorne towards the Eaſt, in a place which “ is called in the Picts Tongue Penvahel, in the Engliſh Penvellum, and “ which running towards the Weſt, ends near the City of Aldcluith: So far Bede. This I have ſet down to ſhew, that as yet the old Bounds were continued between the Picts and the Britains.

Anno Dom. CCCXCVI. But this Legion returning home with great Joy and Triumph, the ſame Enemies, as ſoon as they ſaw the Roman Souldiers, departed, paſſing over in their ſmall Veſſels or Curroughs, entering the Borders, deſtroyed all before them.

How long they continued ſo to do, is hard to determine; but this is Id. ibid. certain, that freſh Ambaſſadours were thereupon again diſpatched to Rome, imploring new Aids; and that they would not ſuffer this miſerable Country to be deſtroyed, nor a Roman Province, which had So been long ~~ſo~~ famous, to be over-run by barbarous and foreign Nations; whereupon another Legion was again ſent over, which coming unlook'd-for in the time of Autumn, made great ſlaughter of the Enemies, and drove out all thoſe who eſcaped beyond the Friths abovementioned, over which they were wont to carry their Prey without any reſiſtance. But the Romans being now reſolved to return home, plainly told the Britains, That they would not be any more wearied out in ſuch laborious Expeditions for their Defence, admoniſhing them to take Arms, and to undergo themſelves the Toil of encountering their Enemies; nor ſhould the Roman Enſigns march ſo far by Sea and Land to curb a few unwarlike wandering Robbers, but that for the future they ſhould defend themſelves by fighting manfully for their Country, in defending their Wives and Children, and, which is more, their own Lives and Liberties; and that they might do what good they could to theſe Confederates, whom they were now forced to deſert, they made them build a Wall of Stone from Sea to Sea, with Towers, near the Shore, to hinder the landing of the Enemy; and having exerciſed them in Arms, then took their Leave of them, telling them, They muſt expect their return Lib. 1. c. 12. no more. This is the ſubſtance of Gildas his Relation, with whom Bede alſo agrees; yet adds, that the Romans at their departure did not only give this ſluggiſh People freſh Encouragements by Words, but alſo left them Patterns of the Arms and Weapons they would have them make; and then gives a more particular deſcription of this laſt Wall, and ſaith, That it was 8 Foot in breadth and 12 in height, and that it ſtood where the Wall of Severus was before, being made all of Stone, and not of Turf, as that unſerviceable Wall was, which the Britains had before, without any Skill, built by themſelves, betwixt the two Friths, Glotta and Bodotria.

But before I quit this Subject, I cannot but take notice of the great miſtake of the Scotiſh Hiſtorian Buchanan, who perſiſting in his former Errour, will needs have this laſt Wall to be built in Scotland, in the ſame place where he (thô falſly) ſuppoſes Severus's Wall to have been, and where Bede makes the Turf Wall already mentioned to have been built: Brit. Eccleſ. Antiq. c. 15. But Arch-Biſhop Uſher plainly proves in his above-cited Work from the Authority of ancient Authors, that Severus's Wall was built in the ſame place where Adrian's was before, viz. between the Rivers Tine and Eſk: So that if (as Bede ſaith) this laſt Wall was built in the ſame place where the Wall of Severus ſtood, it muſt alſo have been between thoſe two laſt menti-

on'd Rivers, and not between the two Friths,(as Buchanan would have it;) who, if he had but carefully peruſed Bede, would have found, that he ſufficiently diſtinguiſhes between the place where this laſt Wall was ſeated, and that of the former, which he ſuppoſes to have begun near Abercorne, and reached to Alcluid, (now called Dunbritton;) for in ſeveral other places † of his Hiſtory he plainly ſhews, that by the Wall of Severus, he meant that which is now called the Picts Wall, which began from the River Tyne; but ſince the Paſſages in which he ſhews this to have been his meaning, are too long here to be ſet down, I have ~~put~~ cited them in the Margin, for which the Reader may conſult the Author if he pleaſes. So that Bede is only miſtaken in this, that being deceived with the equivocal uſe of the words Murus and Vallum, which, as Arch-Biſhop Uſher very well proves, were uſed promiſcuouſly in Roman Authors either for a Trench or a Wall, when he ſuppoſes that of Severus to have been no more than a Vallum or Trench caſt up of Earth and Turfs; whereas it was indeed a Wall of ſolid Stone, (as hath been already ſhewn;) nor does the Arch-Biſhop think this Author leſs miſtaken, in ſuppoſing the firſt Wall of Turfs to have been in Scotland, but this laſt of Stone to have been in England; whereas it was not at all likely, (as the Arch-Biſhop very well obſerves,) that the Britains ſhould have retreated above 100 Miles backward, and have quitted ſo great an extent of Ground as lies between the two Walls, if it could have been as eaſily maintained and fortified as the other,much more when it was ſo much eaſier to be done, the ſpace between the two Rivers Tine and Esk being above thrice as large as that between the two Friths above-mentioned, had they not found that they could not keep thoſe Countries; and therefore were reſolved to give thoſe Nations that invaded them as much Elbow room as poſſible, ſo that they might have no occaſion to invade their Territories.

† As Bed. Hiſt. l. 3. c. 2. Ibid. c. 21, 22.

Lib. 1. c. 12.

But to return to our Hiſtory, from which I hope we have not made too long a Digreſſion, ſince it hath ſerved not only to confute a Miſtake in ſo celebrated an Hiſtorian as Buchanan, but alſo to ſettle ſo conſiderable a Point in Antiquity. I ſuppoſe it was to this ſecond departure of the Roman Legions, that Claudian deſigned theſe Verſes in his Poem De Bello Getico, when deſcribing the Forces which were muſtered together for that VVar, to the General Rendezvous he alſo mentions who came from this Iſland.

Venit & extremis Legio prætenta Britannis,
Quæ Scoto dat frena truci, ferroque notatas
Perlegit exangues Picto moriente figuras.

Hither the Legion too from Britain came,
VVhich curbs the Scots, and does fierce Nations tame;
VVho whilſt the painted Picts expiring lie,
Surveys thoſe bloodleſs Figures as they die.

But before I diſmiſs the Hiſtory of theſe Affairs, give me leave to take notice of a great Errour in Hector Boetius and Buchanan as concerning this laſt VVar between the Romans and the Britains, where, in the Year of our Lord 403, he does not only make one Maximinian to have then commanded the Roman Legion laſt mentioned, but alſo to have fought againſt againſt Fergus King of the Scots, and Durſtus King of the Picts, together with one Dionethius a Britain, whom, againſt all Reaſon and Probability, he makes to have brought them Aids againſt his own Countrymen, and a Fight enſuing, that the Scots were repelled; and yet that this Maximinian having but few Souldiers then in his Army, was forced to retreat into the inland parts of his Province, whilſt Dionethius made himſelf King of the Britains, (without any Subjects to make him ſo;) but that Maximinian being vexed at this Diſgrace, reinforcing his Troops with freſh Supplies, marched againſt the Scots and Picts; where a great Battel enſuing, Fergus and Durſtus were ſlain, but King Dionethius (whom I ſuppoſe to be the ſame with Geoffery's Dionatus Duke of Cornwal, already mentioned,) was carried off much wounded. But of this King, neither Gildas, Nennius, nor Bede, no nor ſo much as Geoffery, ſays any thing; and therefore not being to be found in any Hiſtorian before Hector, all this Tale concerning this imaginary King, is to be looked upon as a pure Invention of his own.

Anno Dom. CCCXCVI.

But this is certain, that the Britains being thus deſerted by the Romans, for 19 Years after the Death of Maximus, (as Zoſimus relates,) viz. about the Year 406, or 407,) the Britiſh Army all in a mutiny Elected one Marcus to be their Emperour, a Man of great Power in this Iſland, (and perhaps Lieutenant here) whom, not anſwering their Expectations, they ſoon took off, and then ſet up one Gratianus, making him put on the Imperial Purple, who ſeems to be a Native of Britain, for ſo much  Oroſius* his words imply, when he calls him Municeps ejuſdem Inſulæ; but he not pleaſing them, after 4 Months Reign, they deprived him both of his Life and Empire. * Of him, Nennius ſaith nothing, but mentions one Severus, between Maximus and Conſtantius, whom others omit; but † Geoffery of Monmouth makes this Gratian to have aſſumed the Royal Authority as ſoon as he heard of the Death of Maximus, and that he was ſo Cruel and Tyrannical, that the common People roſe up and killed him; and that after his Death, the Britains ſent to Rome to beg Help againſt the Picts and Scots. But Zoſimus and Oroſius both relate, That after the Death of this Gratian, the Roman Britains ſet up one Conſtantine an ordinary Souldier, (chiefly for the good Omen of his Name,) yet Procopius differs ſomewhat from the former Authors, and calls this Conſtantine no obſcure Man, but whether he meant for Valour or Nobility, I will not determine; but however he being by them declared Emperour, gathered what Forces together he could, (being the remainder of thoſe that had been carried away before by Maximus,) and putting to Sea from Britain, landed at Bologne, and by the Terrour of his Name, and the Numbers of his Followers, eaſily brought over to his Party all the Roman Forces on this ſide the Alps: Valentia in France he manfully defended againſt the Puiſſance of Honorius; the Rhine, which long time before had been neglected, he fortified with Gariſons; and even upon the very Alps, and towards the Sea-Coaſts, wherever the Paſſages lay open, he built Forts and Caſtles; whilſt in Spain, under the Conduct of his Son Conſtans, (whom of a Monk he had made Cæſar) he waged War with the like good Fortune.

Anno Dom. CCCCVII.

Whilſt with the like Succeſs his Son Conſtans, by the Conduct of Gerontius his General, he brought all Spain under his Obedience.

But when Conſtans upon ſome Suſpicions turned Gerontius out of his Command, (for the Cauſe is not expreſſed,) the Affairs both of the Father and Son preſently declined; for as he returned from Conſtantine out of Gaul into Spain, by the way he received the unwelcome News of Gerontius's having revolted from his Obedience, and ſet up one Maximus, one of his own Creatures, for Emperour, and that having raiſed a powerful Army, conſiſting of divers barbarous Nations, that he was upon his march againſt him. Conſtans allarmed with theſe Tydings, immediately diſpatched away one Eddobeccus unto the Germans, whilſt himſelf attended with Decimius Ruſticus (who of the Maſter of his Offices was advanced to be Præfect,) and accompanied with an Army of Francks, Almans, and other Nations, paſſed into Gaul, intending with all ſpeed to return again to his Father; but being intercepted by Gerontius, and by him beſieged in Vienna, (in Dauphine,) the City being taken, he was there ſlain. Then Gerontius marching to meet Conſtantine, found him at Arles, againſt which City he laid cloſe Siege, but was hindred from taking it by the ſudden coming of Conſtantius Comes, whom the Emperour Honorius had newly made his General; at whoſe arrival with an Army out of Italy, Gerontius, being deſerted by his own Souldiers, retired into Spain, where growing alſo into Contempt and Hatred with thoſe few that remained, his Houſe in the Night being beſet by them, he with his own Servants manfully defended himſelf, and ſlew above 300 of them; and when his Darts and other Weapons were ſpent, thô he might have eſcaped at a back Door as his Servants had done, yet out of kindneſs to his Friend Allan, and his Wife Nunnichia, he refuſed it: and having firſt cut off the Head of his Friend, (as was agreed between them,) he then ſlew his Wife, (thô with great Reluctancy,) being prevailed upon by her Importunity ſo to do, refuſing to out live her Huſband, and deſiring to be freed from the Violence of the inraged Multitude; for which her Reſolution, Sozomen the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian gives her great Commendations: This done, Gerontius turned his Sword againſt himſelf, but failing in his Deſign, he finiſhed it with his Dagger. This Man being ſuppoſed to be a Britain, I have been the more particular in his Hiſtory; and Humphrey Lloyd, in his Diſcourſe concerning Britain, makes him to have been ſo famous here, as to be celebrated by the Britiſh Bards, whoſe Verſes upon his Death he there gives you.

But in the mean while, Conſtantine now ſtreighten'd on all ſides, and diſcouraged with the ill Succeſs of Eddobeccus, (who was ſlain but a little before,) after having been beſieged 4 Months with his other Son Julian in the City of Arles, there flings off his Purple Robes and entred into Prieſts Order, hoping under that Protection to ſecure his Life, and ſo not long after ſurrendred the Town. But his new Habit proved no Sanctuary to him, for he was carried into Italy, and there beheaded by the Emperour's Order, together with his Son Julian, and Brother named Sebaſtian. Whilſt theſe Things were acting, the Scots, Picts, and Vandals, taking advantage of the Negligence of Conſtantine, (who whilſt he ſtayed at Arles, and minded his Pleaſures more than publick Affairs) invaded his Territories, the latter breaking into Gaul, and then invading

Britain; but the Britains now deſtitute of the Roman Aids, and kept under by them who had not Power to protect them, (as Zoſimus relates,) as well the Gauls as Britains, forthwith took Arms, and reſolving to ſtand on their own Defence, renounced all further Obedience to the Roman Empire, which they believed they might juſtifie, being then left without its Protection. Being thus harraſſed by their wonted Enemies, having before ſent Meſſages to Honorius for Relief, but all to no purpoſe, for he at that time not being able to defend Rome it ſelf, (which the ſame Year was taken by Alaric King of the Goths,) the Emperour permitted them by his Letters to provide for their own ſafety, acquitting them of the Roman Juriſdiction. as obſerved

But ſince the Chronology of theſe Times we are now Treating of is very perplexed and obſcure, by reaſon of the great ſcarcity of good Authors; and ſince ſome Writers place the Britains caſting off their Subjection to the Roman Empire immediately after the Death of this Conſtantine above-mentioned, and others defer it 20 Years later, give me leave here to ſubjoyn what the Learned Dr Stillingfleet hath ſaid in his above-cited Treatiſe concerning the time when this great Change happened in this Iſland, for it hath been already ~~proved; for~~ though all Authors agree, that the Britains petitioned the Emperour Honorius for the firſt Supplies againſt the Picts and Scots that then invaded them, yet they differ about the time: I ſhall therefore firſt take notice what Bede ſaith concerning this matter, who makes Gratianus Municeps to be ſet up two Years before the ſacking of Rome by Alaric, which happened Anno Dom. 410; and he alſo therein follows Oroſius's Relation concerning Conſtantine, and his Son Conſtans, without ever mentioning their continuing to Govern here, and much leſs loſing their Lives in Britain, (as Nennius falſly ſuppoſes;) but then he applies that Paſſage in Gildas concerning that lamentable condition of the Britains, and there firſt demanding Help from the Romans to the Times immediately following the Death of Conſtantine; whereas Gildas indeed mentions it as happening upon the Uſurpation of Maximus, and his withdrawing the Forces from hence; and that therefore this firſt Invaſion of the Picts and Scots was between the Death of Maximus, and the ſetting up of Gratianus Municeps, when the Britains ſo earneſtly ſuing for Aſſiſtance, had a Roman Governour and a Legion ſent to their Relief. And Mr. Camden, in his Introduction to his Britannia, ſuppoſes, that Claudius Rutilius mentions Victorinus as a Roman Governour here about that time; but this is very uncertain, when he there only ſpeaks of the taking Tholouſe by the Goths, which was done by Ataulphus ſome time after the Death of Alaric, and therefore could not be before the time of Gratian and Conſtantine.

De laud. Stilic. l. 2. v. 25.

Now that the firſt Supplies that were ſent over into Britain were all of them ſent before the Death of Stilico, the ſaid Learned Dr. Stillingfleet in his above-cited Treatiſe goes on to prove in the ſame place: "It is evident (ſays he) from many Paſſages in † Claudian, that Stilico took particular care of ſending Supplies to the Britains againſt the Scots and Picts, but Stilico was killed by the Army when Baſſus and Philippus were Conſuls, Anno Dom. 408, before the firſt Siege of Rome by the Goths, and therefore the Roman Forces ſent by him muſt be before the

" Uſurpation of Gratianus and Conſtantine; Stillico being killed the ſame
" Year, that theſe Uſurpers were ſet up in Britain, it is not poſſible he " ſhould do it after their Death; and it ſeems not probable, that any " Supplies ſhould be ſent through Gaul, while Conſtantine remained Maſter
" there; the Army in Gaul then taking part with him againſt Honorius;
" and withal Gildas ſaith, That the Roman Legion having driven out the " Picts and Scots, returned in Triumph. And ſo much is confeſſed by Bede: But at what time can we ſuppoſe that to have happen'd? Is it likely that after the Uſurpation of Conſtantine, a Roman Legion ſhould return in ſo much Triumph? For immediately after Conſtantine's Uſurpation, the Roman Empire began extreamly to decline in thoſe parts, through which they were to paſs; Gaul being upon Compoſition * not long after delivered up to the Goths by Honorius, and beſides, the Franks and Burgundians making continual incurſions there: I conclude it therefore moſt probable, that the firſt ſupplies ſent to the Britains, were not after Conſtantine's Uſurpation, but between the Death of Maximus, and the ſetting up of Gratianus Municeps.

* Jornand. 30. Paul diac. l. 14. Seigeb. Chron. Anno Dom. 412.

Now let us ſee if we can hence diſcover when the ſecond Aſſiſtance was ſent to the Britains, for which we muſt own our ſelves beholding to the aforeſaid learned Doctor in the ſame place, where he thus makes it out.

The Second time, the diſtreſſed Britains were forced to ſollicite the Romans for ſupplies, is placed by Arch-biſhop Uſher, Anno Dom. 426; when Gallio of Ravenna was ſent hither, (as he ſuppoſes;) becauſe the next Year Proſper ſaith, that Gallio was ſent againſt Bonifacius in Africa; but then the Arch-biſhop makes the firſt ſupplies to have been ſent in the latter end of Honorius's Reign, for which the Doctor ſays, he can ſee no reaſon; for the Lord Primate grants that immediately after the Death of Maximus, the Scots and Picts did waſte Britain, and that then Stillico did ſend aſſiſtance to them. Why then ſhould the firſt waſting of the Iſland, mentioned by Gildas, and the Legion ſent thereupon, be that in the latter end of Honorius his Reign, and not rather in the beginning? ſince the latter was very perplexed and troubleſome, the Alani, Swevi, and Vandali, having poſſeſſed themſelves of great part of Spain, whil'ſt the Franks, Burgundians and Goths had all Gaul; ſo that Honorius, the Year before his Death, was forced to ſend his Forces under Caſtinus into Spain, againſt the Vandals, as Proſper in his Chronicle affirms: And that alſo prov'd the occaſion of new Troubles in Africa, by the difference between Caſtinus and Bonifacius, who for his own ſecurity ſent over the Vandals thither. Is it not therefore moſt probable, that the firſt Supplies of the Britains ſhould be ſent in the latter end of Honorius's Reign, eſpecially ſince the learned Primate confeſſeth, that Honorius did not in his time recover the Province of Britain: and he proves it againſt Sabellicus, from Procopius's Authority, a much more ancient Authour, beſides that of Bede; ſo that the ſingle teſtimony of Sigebert, that Honorius ſent aſſiſtance to the Britains at the ſame time that he did to the Spaniards, (when Proſper, Idatius, and Caſſiodore, who all mention the latter, ſay not one word of the former) cannot bear down the more weighty Reaſons on the other ſide.

Ant. Brit. cap. 11. P. 318.

But it is certain that in this interval between the ſending of the two ſupplies, the Roman Affairs became ſo deſperate, That the Saxon Annals, as well as Ethelward in his Chronicle, relates, that now the Romans hid their Treaſures in the Earth, or elſe carried them away with them into Gaul; ſo that it ſeems moſt likely during all the reſt of the Reign of the Emperour Honorius, the Britains did no more return to his Obedience; thô notwithſtanding, they did again endeavour to put themſelves under the protection of the Roman Empire, in the time of his Succeſſour Valentinian III. as the learned Dr. above cited makes it more than probable in the ſame place, from divers other Circumſtances too long to be here particularly ſet down.

Anno Dom. CCCCXVIII.

So that the ſecond ſupplies which were ſent upon the mighty importunity of the Britains, were in all probability in the beginning of the Reign of Valentinian III. after that Aetius had ſomewhat recovered the credit of the Roman Empire in Gaul; for after his ſucceſs there, both againſt the Goths and Franks, he had liberty enough to ſend over a Legion to the aſſiſtance of the Britains, who were again miſerably haraſſed by the Scots and Picts: And at this time it was that Gildas ſaith, the Romans upon the ſad repreſentations of the Britiſh Ambaſſadours, ſent them ſpeedy ſupplies. So far we have been beholding to the learned Dr. Stillingfleet, now Lord Biſhop of Worceſter; but if I may interpoſe my own Opinion, I ſhould aſſign the ſending of theſe laſt ſupplies by the Romans, to have been in the Year of our Lord 435; when Aetius had good ſucceſs againſt the Burgundians in Gaul: To which Year alſo the Saxon Annals refer the ceaſing of the Roman Empire in Britain; only the Compiler was miſtaken in two things, the firſt in making Rome to have been taken this Year by the Goths; the other in ſuppoſing the time of the Romans ruling here, to be but 470 Years; whereas indeed it was 488 Years, as I ſhall preſently make out.

Anno Dom. CCCCXXXV.

So that from this laſt departure of the Roman Legion, (which no doubt was done by the Emperour's expreſs Order,) I think, I may very well date the total dereliction of Britain by the Romans; who now by refuſing them their protection, left them by the Laws of Nature to provide for, and defend themſelves. And from hence I may alſo date the final period of the Roman Empire in this Iſland; which had now laſted from Julius Cæſar's ſecond landing in Britain, in the 53d Year before Chriſt, to this Year (being the 435th Year after Chriſt) the ſpace of 488 Years; but if you account from the more abſolute Conqueſt of it by Claudius, in the Forty Fourth Year after Chriſt, it continued but 391 Years.

But that the Britains were at laſt very unwillingly cut off from being any longer a part of the Roman Empire, appears by the laſt meſſage they ſent to Aetius, again imploring aſſiſtance; which the Emperour not being able to grant, they had no other way left, but to provide for themſelves as well as they could; which ſince it happened after the time that I ſuppoſe the Roman power to have ceaſed in this Iſland, I ſhall refer the further Relation of it to the next Book.

But before I conclude this, I ſhall give you a ſhort account of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs in this Iſland, in theſe Two laſt Centuries; where, after the laſt Perſecution under Diocleſian, Bede tells us, the Britiſh Church enjoyed a perfect Peace, till the Arrian Hereſie over-ran the whole World, and at laſt infected this Iſland, though divided from the reſt of it; but though neither Gildas nor Bede hath ſet down the Year when this Hereſie firſt began to ſpread it ſelf here, yet he ſeems to refer it to the Reign of Conſtantius, when this Peſtilent Opinion carried the face of Authority, as having been confirmed in ſeveral pretended Councils.

But in the beginning of this Century, though the Year be uncertain; yet between the Years 402, and 406, Pelagius a Britiſh Monk (whoſe Welſh Name is ſuppoſed to have been Morgan, as being of the ſame ſignification with the Latin Name of Pelagius,) broached his Hereſie, for abſolute Free will, without the aſſiſting Grace of God; which Opinion was afterwards condemned by divers Councils in France and Africa, and was alſo confuted by St. Auguſtine: About which times alſo flouriſhed Feſtidus, a learned Biſhop (if not an Arch-biſhop) of Britain, who writ a Pious Treatiſe, De Vita Beata, and who by ſome late Romiſh Writers hath been accuſed of Pelagianiſm, from which imputation, he is juſtly vindicated by the ſaid Reverend Dr. Stillingfleet, in his above cited work.

Nor did this Iſland remain long free from this Pelagian Hereſie; for he having (as it is ſuppoſed) perverted divers of his Country-men abroad, they afterward returning home, brought it over and diſperſed it here, and was eſpecially propagated by one Agricola, the Son of Severian a Pelagian Biſhop, (as Bede informs us) who farther ſays, that the Britains when they would by no means receive ſo perverſe a Doctrine, that blaſphemes the grace of Chriſt, nor yet were able by diſputing to refute ſo ſettled an Errour, they took a ſafer courſe, to ſend for aid in this ſpiritual warfare, from the Biſhops of France; for which cauſe a great Synod being there aſſembled, it was propoſed, who was moſt fitting to be ſent to ſuccour the true Belief then aſſaulted; when by the common votes of them all, Germanus Biſhop of Auxerre, and Lupus Biſhop of Troyes, were choſen to go and confirm Britain in the Catholick Faith; who, when they had received the command of that Church, paſſed the Sea, and * landed here, though not without great danger from Storms, which Bede ſuppoſes to be raiſed by the Devil, and which, he alſo ſays, were to be lay'd by the Prayers of Biſhop German; as ſoon as they landed, they were joyfully received both by the Clergy and People, to whom they forthwith preached not only in the Churches, but alſo in the High-ways and Streets, whereby the Faithful Chriſtians were confirmed, and many Hereticks brought back to the Truth; at which the Heads of the Heretical party being very much concern'd, though they lay for a great while private, yet at laſt, fearing their ſilence would be interpreted as a quitting of their cauſe; a publick diſputation was agreed upon between them, which was (as ſome of our Authours relate) at Verulam, where the Hereticks appeared in a ſplendid garb, and encompaſſed with a great number of Followers; ſo that there met a great multitude of People on both ſides, to be as well Spectators as Judges; where in the firſt place Germanus and Lupus allowed their Adverſaries a full liberty of diſputing, which took up much time to little purpoſe; then the Biſhops with a Torrent of proofs drawn from the Holy Scriptures, bore down all before them, backing their Reaſons with Divine Authorities, whereby the Pelagians being nonplus'd, had nothing to reply; ſo that the People (being the Judges) could ſcarce refrain their Hands from them, and teſtified their reſentment by their great clamour againſt them.

Nor did theſe Biſhops think this enough; but, as Bede further relates from one Conſtantius (who lived within Fifty Years after this was done) they thought fit likewiſe to confirm their Doctrine by Miracles; for a certain Magiſtrate bringing his Daughter of Ten Years Old, being Blind, offer'd her to the Pelagians to be cured, who refuſing to undertake it, the Conſtant. lib. 1. ch. 13.

Anno Dom. CCCCXXXV.

Biſhops were deſired to do it; who, (as this Authour relates) after Prayers to God reſtored the Girl to ſight, by the Application of certain Saints Relicts to her Eyes; whereupon the People were ſo aſtoniſhed, that baniſhing all Errour from their Minds, they followed the Doctrine of theſe Holy Biſhops; who it ſeems, were not however very fond of theſe Relicts, but (as the ſame Authors have it) opening the Tomb of St. Alban at Verulam, buried them all therein, to the intent that one Grave might contain the Bones of all thoſe Saints, collected from ſo many ſeveral Regions, who being equal in merit, the ſame Heaven had alſo received; this done, Germanus only took away in exchange a ſmall lump of Earth, which was yet ſtained with the Blood of the Martyr.

I ſhall paſs over the reſt of the real or pretended Miracles of theſe Biſhops, though related by Bede, as being of leſs moment, and come to that famous Victory, which he from the ſame Authours relates, to have been obtained by their means, which was thus; That not long after their coming, the Picts and Saxons made a fierce Invaſion upon the Britains, who marching out againſt them, and miſtruſting their own Forces, ſent to Germanus and his Collegue to help them, repoſing more confidence in the Spiritual ſtrength of thoſe Two Holy Men, than in their own Thouſands; ſo theſe Biſhops being arrived, their preſence in the Britiſh Camp ſeem'd not leſs than if a whole Army had come to ſecond them: It was then the time of Lent, and the People inſtructed by the daily Sermons of theſe Paſtors, came flocking to receive Baptiſm, to which purpoſe a ~~place~~ in the Camp was made up of Green Boughs like a Church, againſt the Day of the Lords Reſurrection; the Army being there Baptized march'd out to Fight, and contemning the Defence of Arms, only expected Divine aſſiſtance; the Enemy hearing how they were imploy'd, ſeem'd aſſured of the Victory; when Germanus, who alſo had intelligence of their approach, undertook to be their Captain, and riding out with ſome ſelect Troops, to diſcover what advantages the place might offer, happen'd on a Valley encompaſſed with Hills, through which the Enemy was to paſs, and placing there an ambuſh, warned them, that what words they heard him pronounce aloud, the ſame they ſhould all repeat with an univerſal ſhout: the Enemy march'd on ſecurely, and German Thrice aloud cryed Halelujah, which being anſwered by the Souldiers, with a ſudden noiſe and clamour, was alſo much encreaſed by the Ecchoes from the Neighbouring Hills and Woods; the Scots and Picts ſtartled hereat, and ſuppoſing it the ſhout of a Mighty Army, flung down their Arms and fled, and for haſt many of them were drowned in that River they had newly paſſed. The Victory thus obtained without fighting, yielded the Britains great ſtore of ſpoil, and procured to Biſhop German greater Authority and Reputation than before: The place of this Fight is reported to have been near a Town called Gniderac in the Britiſh Tongue, but in the Engliſh Mould in Flintſhire, and the place is called Maes German, that is German's Field to this Day: But there are two Objections to be made againſt the Truth of this Relation. The firſt is, how the Britains could fight againſt the Saxons, before their arrival here under Hingiſt, which was not till above Twenty Years after: Secondly, how the Britains, who had been Chriſtians for above Three Hundred Years, ſhould need to be new Baptized. To the former of theſe Objections, Arch biſhop Uſher in his Ant. Brit. Eccleſiæ, gives us a ſatisfactory anſwer, viz. That before the coming in of the Saxons to ſettle here; it appears, that they made ſeveral Incurſions by Sea, as hath been already proved from divers Authorities; and further Paulus Diaconus in the Relation of this ſtory expreſly ſays, That whil'ſt theſe Biſhops were here, a ſtrong Army of Scots and Picts Invaded Britain.

Anno Dom. CCCCXXVI.

But as for the reſt of the Miracles and Actions of Germanus and Lupus in Britain, ſince they are only related by Nennius, and ſome of our Engliſh Monks from certain Legends of little or no Credit, as written long after thoſe Times, I ſhall wholly omit them; only could wiſh that the Writers of this Story, would have given us as exact a Relation of Civil Affairs in this Iſland, as they do of thoſe concerning the Religion of this Age, that we might have known what Kings or Governours the Britains had, from the time of the laſt departure of the Romans, to the making of Vortigern King; the want of which no doubt was a great encouragement to Geoffery of Monmouth to forge ſo many Fictitious Princes, during this interval.

But for the other Objection, it is, I confeſs, ſomewhat harder to be anſwer'd; ſome Modern Writers ſuppoſe, that in that ſad Confuſion and Corruption of Manners, that happen'd after the departure of the Romans, a great many of the Britains turned Idolaters, or elſe (which is moſt likely) were Chriſtians but in Name; and ſo had never been Baptized at all till now.

Anno Dom. CCCCXXIX.

I ſhall now conclude with the reſt of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of theſe Times: This Year as our Saxon Annals (from Proſper's Chronicle) relate, Palladius the Biſhop was ſent by Pope Cæleſtine to the Scots, to confirm their Faith, or as Bede in his ~~Epitome~~ Histor, Lib. I. *cap.*13 as well as in his Epitome at the end (under the Year CCCCXXX.) expreſſes it almoſt in the words of Proſper, viz. Palladius was ſent the firſt Biſhop by the ſaid Pope, to the Scots still believing in Chriſt, but in one of the * Copies of the Saxon Annals (now in the Cottonian Library) it is thus: This Year Palladius was ſent by Pope Cœleſtine to Preach Baptiſm (i. e. Chriſtianity to the Scots), in which it agrees with Nennius, who ſpeaking of this matter, ſays, "That "this Biſhop was firſt of all ſent by the ſaid Pope to convert the Scots "to Chriſt: But being hinder'd from God by certain Tempeſts, de"parted from Ireland, and arrived in Britain, and there died in the Coun"try of the Picts; in which he is alſo followed by Probus and Joſeline, in their Lives of S. Patrick; who, tho they agree, that Palladius was ſent to Convert Ireland, yet differ from him in the account how he came to fail in his deſign, laying the fault upon the obſtinacy of the Iriſh, who would not receive his Doctrine; but they both agree with Nennius, that thereupon he left Ireland, and dy'd in the confines of the Picts.

* Vide the various Lections in the margin of the Oxford Edition of these Annals.

Cap. 54.

This difference in theſe Copies hath bred a great diſpute between the Engliſh Antiquaries on the one ſide, and the Scotiſh Hiſtorians and Antiquaries on the other; the former ſuppoſing from the Authority of Nennius, and the above cited Copy of the Saxon Chronicle, beſides that of the Iriſh Annals, that the Scots were not converted to Chriſtianity, till the Year above mention'd, and conſequently were not made Chriſtians ſo early as their Hiſtorians relate; which Opinion hath been ſtrenuouſly aſſerted by Arch-biſhop Uſher, in his Britan. Eccleſ. Antiquitat. as alſo by the Biſhop of St. Aſaph (now Biſhop of Litchfield) in his Hiſtorical account of Church Goverment, and been alſo further improved by the learned

Dr. Stillingfleet (now Biſhop of Worceſter) in his Antiquity of the Britiſh Churches, who all conclude, that the Scots were converted to Chriſtianity long before their planting in Britain, which they ſuppoſe not to have happen'd till about the end of the Fifth, or the beginning of the Sixth Century.

Againſt which Opinions, though aſſerted by ſo many learned Men, Sir George Mackenzy (late Lord Advocate of Scotland) hath Written two Treatiſes, which he calls a defence of the Royal-line of Scotland; in the former of which written againſt the ſaid Biſhop, as well as the latter againſt Dr. Stillingfleet, he alters the ſtate of the Controverſie from an Eccleſiaſtical to a Civil diſpute; making it a crime of læſe Majeſty ſo much as to queſtion the reality of the Kings of Scotland, before Fergus the Second; but omitting the Proofs that he produces for the Antiquity of the Scotiſh Kings before that time, as alſo what he writes for the Scots Converſion,as performed in Scotland, and not in Ireland; being beyond the bounds of our Hiſtory, I ſhall leave the Reader for his farther ſatiſfaction to peruſe thoſe Treatiſes, if he think fit, being writ with great Wit and Smartneſs.

But ſince I found the time of Palladius's being ſent by the Pope to the Scots, mentioned not only in Bede, but in our Saxon Chronicles, I could not well omit putting it down; yet without taking upon me poſitively to determine whither the Scots of Scotland, or thoſe of Ireland are there meant; ſince I confeſs the Words are Ambiguous, and the Copies differ, as I have already ſhewed.

But the Year after Palladius's being ſent to the Scots (whether in Ireland or Scotland) the Saxon Annals tell us, that Patrick was ſent by the ſame Pope Cœleſtine, to Preach Baptiſm (i. e, Chriſtianity) to the Scots: Although I find in ~~the~~ Notes ~~of~~ —— upon Nennius, p. 129; a Chronicle noting, Anno Dom. 475, Venit S. Patricius ad Hiberniam. &c.

Now that theſe were the Scots of Ireland, is agreed on by all; yet this Controverſie is made more intricate, by what Ranul. Higden writes in his Polychron. (l. 4. c. 33. Celeſtinus Papa miſit S. Patricium, ad Hiberniam Convertendam; *& Palladium Romanum Diaconum, ad Scotos Convertendos, Anno Scil. For which laſt Notes I muſt own my ſelf obliged to the Learned Doctor Gale; but on the other ſide, if the Scots, to whom Palladius is ſaid to have been ſent, were not the ſame with thoſe in Ireland, but the Scots than living in Scotland; it muſt then be confeſſed that the promiſcuous uſe of the Name of Scotia, ſometimes for Ireland, and ſometimes for Scotland, and of Scoti, ſometimes uſed by Bede, and other Writers of thoſe times for Iriſh Men, and ſometimes for Native Scots, have ſo confounded the Hiſtories of both theſe Nations, that no Man without other Circumſtances can tell when they mean the one, or the other.

But ſince the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Britain in theſe Times is very obſcure, and deficient, there being ſo little to be found concerning it, either in Bede, or any other Writer, and the Age alſo being become very Corrupt and Ignorant, during the frequent Wars and Revolutions that happen'd in this part of the Iſland; It is not to be expected that we ſhould be able to ſet down the Names of any Biſhops, or others, Remarkable in this laſt Age for Piety or Learning: So having given as good an Account as I am able, and as the broken Hiſtory of thoſe Times will allow, of the Riſe and Fall of the Roman Empire in Britain, and the State of Affairs, as well Eccleſiaſtical as Civil, during the ſpace of near 490 Years that the Romans had to do here; I ſhall in the next Book give you a Proſpect of the lamentable State of this part of Britain, after the departure of the Romans, and that the Britains had ſet up Princes of their own Nation.

BOOK III.

From its Deſertion by the Romans, to the Preaching of Chriſtianity by AUGUSTINE the Monk, being One hundred Sixty two Years.

BEING now come to the Third Period of this Firſt Volume, it is fit we ſay ſomewhat by way of Introduction before ſo great a Change as you will here find to have followed the Deſertion of Britain by the Romans: For with the Roman Empire fell alſo what before were chiefly Roman, Learning, Valour, Eloquence and Civility, and conſequently Hiſtory too, which is but the Product of theſe; all which at firſt encreaſing by means of the Roman Power and Encouragement, did alſo diminiſh and decline upon its Departure, till it was at laſt quite extinct by the coming in of the Pagan Saxons, and the long cruel Wars they made upon the Britains, as you may obſerve from the barbarous Latin of Gildas and Nennius, which are the only Authentick Britiſh Hiſtorians that are now extant.

As for the Engliſh Saxons, they were at firſt ſo, illiterate, that it is much doubted, whether they had the uſe of Letters and Writing among them or not, ſince we have no Hiſtories or Annals of their Times elder than their receiving Chriſtianity; for thô there are ſome few Stones to be found in England inſcribed with the ancient Runick Characters, (as appears from the late Engliſh Edition of Mr. Camden's Britannia,) yet that they are wholly Daniſh Monuments, and made after the time of their Converſion, I need only refer you to the Inſcriptions themſelves as they are to be found in the ſaid * Britannia, with the Additions that follow it; ſo that it ought not to ſeem ſtrange, that the Saxon Annals are ſo ſhort and obſcure in many places, and that the Relations of Things done before the entrance of Chriſtianity among them are contradictory to each other in point of Time, and other Circumſtances; ſince they were only delivered by Memory and Tradition, which muſt be acknowledged for a very uncertain Guide in Matters of Fact, as well as of Doctrine.

Tit. Cumberland.

Nor is this Uncertainty to be found only in the Saxon Chronicles, but alſo in thoſe of the Britains of that Age, ſince from the Reign of King Vortigern to that of Cadwalladar is indeed the darkeſt and moſt confuſed part of all the Britiſh or Welſh Hiſtory: Hence it is that we are forced in this Period, not only to make uſe of Authors who lived long after the Things they treat of were done, but alſo are otherwiſe of no great Credit; ſuch as Nennius, and Geoffery of Monmouth, whom we ſometimes make uſe of for want of thoſe of better Authority. As for the Engliſh Saxon Hiſtory, we have nothing more ancient than Bede, and the Saxon Chronicle, which we ſhall here give you almoſt entire, ſince it ſeems to be writ faithfully as far as it goes, yet being only Annals, (extracted out of Bede as far as he goes,) they barely relate the Succeſſion of their Kings with their chief Wars and Actions, without expreſſing the Grounds or Cauſes of either, or giving us any Account of their particular Laws, and original Conſtitutions; ſo that I confeſs, they cannot prove ſo Inſtructive to Humane Life, as is required of a juſt Hiſtory.

Gildas, and Bede, l. 1. c. 12.

Britain being thus deſerted by the Romans, as you have ſeen in the laſt Book, with an intention to return no more; and having cauſed the Britains to rebuild the Wall in the manner already related, the Scots and Picts, thô in Manners differing from each other, yet ſtill unanimous to rob and ſpoil, hearing that the Roman Forces were withdrawn, landed in Shoals out of their Curroghs or Leathern Veſſels, in which they paſſed over that part of the Iriſh Sea, which lying next Britain, is called by Gildas, The Scythic Vale; theſe (upon the Aſſurance that the Romans would never return) becoming more bold than ever, took poſſeſſion of all the Northern Parts, even from the outmoſt Bounds of the Land as far as the Wall already mentioned; in the mean time, the Guards which were placed upon it to defend it being cowardly in Fight, and unable to fly, ſtood trembling on the Battlements, keeping their Stations day and night to little or no purpoſe, whilſt the Enemy from below with long Hooks pluck'd them down, and daſhed them againſt the Ground, thus preventing by a ſpeedy Death thoſe languiſhing Torments which attended their Countrymen and Relations. In ſhort, both the Wall and the Towns adjoyning to it being deſerted, the Inhabitants ſaved themſelves by flight, which yet could not long ſecure them, for the Enemy purſuing them, a freſh Slaughter quickly followed more bloody than the former; and, which was worſe than all the reſt, being tormented with Famine, to get Subſiſtence, they fell upon and robbed each other; for they who came from the North, (as may probably be ſuppoſed,) and had fled from the Enemy, being unable to pay for their Quarters when they came into the Southern Parts, ſeized what they could find; from whence roſe Diſcords and Quarrels among them, and thence Civil Wars; for this Nation, tion, (as Gildas obſerves,) thô feeble in repreſſing Foreign Enemies, yet in home-bred Quarrels was very bold and obſtinate.

Anno Dom. CCCCXLV.

But whilſt they thus for ſome Years wore themſelves out with continual Acts of mutual Hoſtility, the Famine grew General upon all, ſo that thoſe half-ſtarved Men that remained were forced to maintain their Lives with what they could get by Hunting; ~~ſo that~~ at laſt the miſerable Remnants of this afflicted People having now no other Remedy left, were conſtrained to write doleful Letters to Aetius*, then the Emperour's Lieutenant in Gaul, directed, To Aetius, thrice Conſul, the Groans of the Britains; wherein they thus complain: “The Barbarians drive “us to the Sea, whilſt the Sea driveth us back to the Barbarians; “between theſe two ſorts of Deaths, we muſt be either ſlain, or drown'd. What Anſwer they received is uncertain, but Gildas expreſly tells us, That they received no Aſſiſtance by thoſe Letters, becauſe Aetius then expected a War with Attilla King of the Huns.

Gild. Bede, lb. c. 12, 13.

* In ſome Manuſcripts and Printed Copies it is written Agitius, but in the Bodleian Manuſcript it is written right, as thus.

And indeed about theſe Times a terrible Famine invaded not only Britain, but extended it ſelf as far as Conſtantinople, where the Famine, together with the corrupt Air, produced a great Peſtilence; whilſt this Scarcity prevailed in this Iſle, it forced many of the Britains to yield themſelves up to their Enemies, that they might get wherewith to ſuſtain Nature, thô others of them choſe rather to ſally out and reſiſt them, from the Woods and Mountains to which they retreated; yet now it was, (as Gildas tells us) that not putting their Truſt in Man, but in God alone, they firſt of all made ſome ſlaughter of their Enemies which had preyed upon their Country for ſo many Years; but thô the Boldneſs of their Enemies was abated for a while, yet ſo was not the Wickedneſs of the Britains, “Who (as the ſame Author deſcribes them) were very back- “ward to perform the Duties proper to Peace, viz. Juſtice and Truth, “but were prone to Lies, and all Wickedneſs; ſo that (ſays he) thô “theſe impudent Robbers (the Iriſh) went home, yet it was to return “again within a ſhort time whilſt the Picts remained, being both then, “and long afterwards, in the farther Parts of the Iſland, ſometimes “taking Prey, and making Incurſions; ſo that during the Truce, whilſt “this Wound was ſlightly skin'd over, another Malady more Conta- “gious was breeding.

“For thô, during this ſhort interval of Peace, there ſucceeded ſo great a “Plenty of all ſorts of Proviſions that no Man's Memory could paral- “lel, yet was it attended with great Luxury, and all ſorts of Wicked- “neſs began alſo to increaſe, but chiefly Cruelty, together with the “Hatred of the Truth, and the Love of Lies, the taking Evil for “Good, and the Love of Darkneſs rather than Light; ſo that what “was pleaſing to God, or not pleaſing, with them, weighed both alike; “and the worſt ſide of the Cauſe moſt commonly prevailed, whilſt all “Things were done contrary to the Publick Good and Safety; ~~nay~~, “not only by Secular Men, but even the Clergy (whoſe Example ſhould “have guided others) were grown Vicious and Corrupt, many of them “being given to Drunkenneſs, or ſwoln with Pride, or elſe full of En- “vy and Contention; indiſcreet and incompetent Judges of what in the “common Practice of Life was good or evil, lawful or unlawful.

This is the general Character that Gildas and Bede give us both of the Britiſh Clergy and Laity of theſe Times; from whence we may eaſily conclude, that People of this temper were not fit to be truſted with the

Anno Dom. [illegible]

Government of themſelves: but being more fond of the Name of Liberty, than apprehenſive of the Charge of Governing well, they grew heady and violent in their Affairs, and poſitive in what they underſtood not, none being more ſtout and daring in Councels, none ſo fearful when it came to Action, all pretending to know what ought to be done, yet all drawing back in the Performance. Thus in a ſhort time, when the Heat of Liberty was once ſpent, and the Enemy daily encreaſed, they quickly found their old Temper returning upon them, a ſlaviſhneſs of Mind, and ſlothfulneſs of Body, then they might have perceived it was not meer Stomach, or a hot and ſudden Love of Liberty that could protect them; but that Diligence, Wiſdom, and a publick Spirit, were ſtill wanting; ſo that they ſhrunk by degrees into their former tameneſs of Mind, and grew as weary of their new-tried Liberty, as they had been of their old Subjection, which made them write thoſe Abject Letters to Aetius, but now mentioned.

What particular Kings or Governours the Britains ſet up after they were ſet free from the Roman Empire, is hard to determine, only Gildas tells us in general, " That Kings were by them anointed, but none of " God's anointing, but ſuch as were moſt cruel, who were ſoon after as " inconſiderately laid aſide without any Examination of the Truth, " whilſt ſome were put to Death by their Anointers, to ſet up others " more Fierce and Tyrannical; but if any of them ſeemed Milder, and " more inclined to the Truth, againſt him as the Subverter of his Country, the general Hatred of all Men was preſently directed.

So that the Office of a King ſeems to have been a very dangerous Employment in thoſe wicked and turbulent Times, thô by what we can gueſs by Gildas's Epiſtle ſetting forth the Faults of all Orders and Degrees of Men, there had been divers Kings ruling in Britain at once, not only in his own, but in former Times, but who they were, he does not particularly mention.

But to fill up this Interval, Geoffery of Monmouth furniſheth us with one Conſtantine, Brother of Adroenus King of Armorica. This Conſtantine he makes to have been elected King, and crowned at Cirenceſter, and being killed by a Pict, was ſucceeded by his eldeſt Son Conſtans, who from a Monk at Wincheſter, was made King; and that he being made away by the Procurement of Vortigern, he cauſed himſelf, being at that time Conſul or Count of the Geviſes, to be elected King in his room; but if you pleaſe to look back into the former Book, you will there find how Conſtantine the Uſurper, with his Son Conſtans the Monk, the one being made Emperour, and the other Cæſar, periſhed in France, may eaſily confute the falſhood of this Story.

An. Dom. ~~CCCCXLV.~~ CCCCXLVI.

But ſince neither Gildas, Nennius, nor any other Britiſh Hiſtorian, make mention of this Conſtantine or his Son, all that we can conclude to be true in this Relation, is, That the Britains about this time finding themſelves quite deſerted by the Romans, and being now without any Head, and hard preſſed by the Scots and Picts, choſe this Vortigern, being then a popular Man, (thô he proved neither Wiſe, Valiant, nor Virtuous,) for their King; in the beginning of whoſe Reign God was willing to purge his Family, (as Gildas words it;) the Britains not being amended with ſo many Corrections, were again frighted with a freſh Rumour, that the Scots and Picts were returning with greater Forces than ever, and that they threatned the Deſtruction of the whole Country, try, and intended no leſs than to plant themſelves from one end thereof to the other; but before their arrival, as if the Inſtruments of Divine Vengeance were at ſtriſe, which ſhould firſt deſtroy a wicked Nation, "The reſidue that the Sword and Famine had left alive, were now "ſwept away with a ſore Peſtilence, inſomuch that the living ſcarce "ſufficed to bury their Dead; but neither were the Britains at all amended for all this, for now it ſeems the time drew near, that the meaſure of their Iniquities were full.

But before we relate how this Vengeance was executed, we ſhall here ſet down from the aforeſaid Authors, * ~~Conſtantius~~ and † Bede, Germanus's Second Voyage to Britain; the ſubſtance of which is, That it being told Germanus that Pelagianiſm prevailed here again, thorough ſome promoters of it, the Britiſh Clergy (too weak it ſeems at diſpute) renewed their addreſſes to him, that he would come over and defend God's Cauſe, which he had once before undertaken; which Petition he readily granted, taking along with him as an aſſiſtant not Lupus, but his Scholar Severus, who being ordained Biſhop of Triers, then preached the Goſpel to the Germans; as ſoon as it was divulg'd, that Germanus was come over, one Elaphius a Principal Magiſtrate of that Country, brought a Youth, (a Son of his) the Sinews of one of whoſe Legs had been long ſhrunk up, and deſired Germanus that he would reſtore them, who granting his requeſt immediately upon his ſtroaking the place with his hand his Leg was reſtored, as the other, whereupon both the Prieſts and the People who had followed Elaphius to the place, being aſtoniſhed at the Miracle were again confirm'd in the Catholick Faith, which was followed by an admonition Germanus made them to amend their errours; but the Authors of this apoſtacy, being by the ſentence of them all baniſhed the Iſland, were delivered up to the Biſhops to be carry'd into the Continent, that ſo the People might quietly enjoy the benefit of this Reformation, who for the future perſiſted in the true Faith.

Gildas.

But after this the Britains being again preſſed and over power'd, by freſh invaſions of the Scots and Picts, King Vortigern called a Council to conſider what was to be done, and where they might beſt ſeek aſſiſtance to repel theſe frequent and cruel Invaſions of the ſaid Nations; whereupon all his Councellours together with the King (being as it were blinded) found out ſuch a defence as indeed proved the deſtruction of their Country, which was that the Heathen Saxons, who were then hateful both to God and Man, and whom when abſent they fear'd almoſt as bad as Death it ſelf, ſhould be ſent for to repel theſe Northern Nations, "which ſeems to have been ordained by Divine providence, to take "vengeance on ſo wicked a People, as the event more evidently prov'd. Though at preſent the Council ſeem'd very ſpecious, becauſe the Saxons were then a Nation who were very terrible to all others: this Council being thus approved of, Ambaſſadours are immediately ſent into Germany, repreſenting to the Saxons the Britains requeſt, and promiſing them very advantagious Conditions, if they would come over to their aſſiſtance; Witichindus an ancient German Writer, in his Hiſtory De geſtis Saxonum, repreſents theſe Ambaſſadours making a long Speech, wherein they promiſed an abſolute ſubjection to the Saxons; but this being not at all likely, nor agreeable to the Britiſh account of it, I omit; only this is certain, that the Saxons were very well pleaſed with this Propoſal, and their Country being then overcharged with People, beyond what it was able to bear, immediate-

Theſe leaders together with their followers arriving in Britain at a place called afterwards Ypwine's Fleot, are welcomed with great joy and applauſe both of the Prince and People, the Iſle of Thanet, (where they landed) being given them for their habitation; and a League was made with them on theſe Conditions, that the Saxons fighting for, and defending the Country againſt Foreign Enemies, ſhould receive their Pay, and Maintenance from thoſe for whom they Fought; this is ſaid to have happen'd in the beginning of the Reign of the Emperour Martian, and in the Four and Twentieth Year of Pharamond, firſt King of the French: Anno Dom. 449, as the Saxon Chronicle, and almoſt all our Hiſtorians agree. What the number was of theſe Saxon Auxiliaries now brought over, is not related in the Saxon Annals, or any other; but certainly they could not be above 1500, ſince they all came over in Three Ships, and 500 Men was as much as one of thoſe ſmall Veſſels could well be ſuppoſed to carry.

But before I proceed further in this Hiſtory, 'tis fit we ſhould give ſome account of the Name, Original, and Manners of this Great and Warlike Nation of the Saxons, whoſe Poſterity enjoy this Kingdom to this very day.

Lib. 1. cap. 26.

Bede in the firſt place tells us, that theſe People came from Three Valiant Nations of Germany, viz. the Saxons, Angles, and Jutes; from which latter were derived the Kentiſh Men, and the Inhabitants of the Iſle of Wight, and of the Province lying over againſt the ſaid Iſle, (now called Hampſhire) and which was afterwards part of the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons, was alſo Peopled by the ſame Nation. From the Saxons (that is the Country which was then called old Saxony) came the Eaſt Saxons, South Saxons, and Weſt Saxons, and from the Angles, that is, that Country which is called Angulus, and which lyes between the Countries of the Jutes and Saxons, are derived the Eaſt Angles, the Middleland Angles, or Mercians, together with the whole Nation of the Northumbrians, that is, thoſe Northern People which live beyond the River Humber, ſo far Bede: But Ethelwerd, one of our moſt ancient Hiſtorians in his Chronicle, tells us more plainly, that Old England is ſeated between the Saxons, and the Jutes, having for its Capital City that which is called in the Saxon Tongue Sleſwic, but by the Danes Heathaby, and that Britain taking its Name from its Conquerors, is now called England.

But as for the Bounds and Extent of Old Saxony, there is a great difference between the Writers about it; yet that it bordered upon Old England they all agree: " Arch-biſhop Uſher ſuppoſes Old Saxony to be that " Country, that beginning with the River ^ ~~Elbis~~, is extended towards " the North, and was afterwards called Northalbingia, being bounded in " its lower parts by the Rivers Albis, Billa and Trava, and in its upper " by the Rivers Eidora, and Slia; for Ptolemy appoints the ſame Southern " Bounds to his Saxons, placing them between the Bounds of the River " Albis and Caluſus, or Trava (which runneth by Lubec) but the Northern " bounds Egenhardus hath given us in his Annals, in the Year of our " Lord 808; where (ſpeaking of Godefrid, King of Denmark) he ſets

" it out thus: He reſolved to fortifie the Limits of his Kingdom which looked towards Saxony with a deep Trench, in ſuch a manner, as that from that Eaſtern Bay of the Sea which they call Oſterſalt, as far as the Weſtern Ocean, this Trench ſhould defend all the Northern Banks of the River Eidor. And Adam of Bremen, in his Treatiſe concerning the Situation of Denmark, and other Northern Nations, divides Denmark from the Inhabitants of Saxony (whom he calls North Elbings) by the River Eidor; of which Tranſelbian Saxons, in another Book, he reckons up three Nations: The firſt, of Dithmars, lying upon the Ocean, whoſe chief Church was Mildenthrope; the ſecond, Holſteiners, through which runs the River Sture, whoſe chief Church was Scolenſield; the third, who were more noble, are called Stormars, whoſe Metropolis is Hamburgh; ſo that this Country was the fartheſt part of Old Saxony. Herewith agreeth the Anonymus Geographer of Ravenna, writing thus of the Saxons; The Saxons came into Britain under their Prince, by Name Anſehis, i. e. Hengiſt. And then in another place, having ſpoke of the Friſians: After them (ſaith he) are the Saxons, and on the back of them certain Iſlands; then followeth the Country of the Nortmanni, which is alſo called Dania. Thoſe Iſlands Ptolemy calls Inſulæ Saxonum. And therefore it was not Weſtphalia, as Theodoric Engelhus, Wernerius, Lazius, Albert Kantz, and others of the Moderns have ſuppoſed; yet the Archbiſhop does not deny, but that in following Times that Country (as well as Frizeland) might be alſo poſſeſt by the Poſterity of the ancient Saxons, but was then rather that which is now the Dutchy of Holſtein, comprehending Dithmars, Stormar, and Wagria, in breadth from Sleſwick to the City of Hamburgh, ſeated in the further part of Old Saxony; and in length is extended from the Weſt to the Eaſtern Sea, or from the German Ocean to the Baltick Gulph, having Old France next adjoyning to it, then lying between the Mouths of the Elb and Rhine; for as Ammianus Marcellinus teacheth us, the Franks then reached as far as the River Rhine, yet ſo, that they had the Saxons next Neighbours to them; and Julian, in his Oration in Praiſe of the Emperour Conſtantius, calls both theſe Nations the moſt Warlike of all thoſe that inhabit beyond the Rhine and Weſtern Ocean.

Here give me leave to add what the Learned Dr. Stillingfleet, (now Lord Biſhop of Worceſter) in his Antiquity of the Britiſh Churches, has given us on this Subject, Chap. 5. where he tells us, that Mr. Camden is of another Opinion, who, in the Introduction to his Britannia, ſaith, That the Saxons originally came from the Cimbrick Cherſoneſe in the time of Diocleſian; and after paſſing the Elb, they partly went into thoſe Parts of the Suevi, which is ſince called Saxony, and partly into Friſia and Batavia; from whence he ſaith, All the Inhabitants of the German Shore, who uſed Piracy at Sea, were called Saxons; by whom he underands, the People from Jutland to Holland, for which he produces the Teſtimony of Fabius Ethelwerd's Chronicle, one of the Saxon Blood-Royal, who ſaith, "That the Saxons lived upon the Sea-Coaſt, from the Rhine, as far as Denmark. But Ammianus Marcellinus makes them in his me to border upon the Parts of Gaul, which is much behither the ounds of Jutland, Holſtein, or Sleſwick. And the ſame Author farther ys, That the Chamavi (whom he makes a part of the Saxons) had the Command of the Rhine, that Jutland made Peace with them, becauſe without their leave Corn could not be brought out of Britain; as alſo

Ubbo Emmius a Learned and German Hiſtorian, gives this Account o the Saxons and their Neighbouring Nations, who inhabited on the North Parts of Germany. That the Friſii dwelt from the middle Stream of th Rhine, about Utrecht, to the River Amaſus, (or Emes;) from thence t the Elb lived the Chauci, divided into the Greater and Leſſer by the Weſer; a great part of theſe leaving their Native Soil, joyned with the Sicambri on the Rhine, who from their affecting Liberty were called Franks beyond the Elb were the Saxons, and the Cimbri; the Saxons being preſſe by the more Northern People, or for their own Conveniency, came Southwards, and took poſſeſſion firſt of thoſe Places where the Chauc dwelt; and by degrees prevailing over all the other People, who joyne with, or ſubmitted to the Saxons, they were called by their Name, an among the reſt the Friſii, from whoſe Coaſts he ſuppoſes, the two Brothers, Hengiſt and Horſa, to have gone into Britain; and returning thither, carried over a far greater Number with them, not ſo much to figh as to inhabit there; therefore he thinks it moſt probable, that Hengi and Horſa, by their deſcent, were originally Saxons; but that the greate part of the People, who went over with them, were rather Friſians, tha Saxons; which he proves, not only from the greater facility of Paſſag from the Coaſt of Friſeland, and the Teſtimony of their own Annals, bu from the greater Agreement of the Engliſh Language with theirs tha with the Saxon, or any other German Dialect; and alſo, becauſe Be reckons the Friſians among thoſe from whom the Engliſh Saxons are derived; and Wilfrid, Wickbert, and Willibrod, all preached to the Friſians i their own Tongue, as Marcellinus, in his Life of Suidebert, relates. Bu this Author ſaith further, That the Affinity of their Language continue ſtill ſo great, that from thence he concludes many more to have gon out of Friſeland into Britain, than either of the Saxons, Jutes, or A gles.

Lib. 5. cap. 10.

Ibid.

But to all this, our Learned Primate anſwers, That Hengiſt and Hor might be truly called Friſians, there being a Friſia in the Southern Par of Jutland, which Saxo Grammaticus calls the Leſſer Friſia, and is parte by the Eidore from the Country of the Angli on the Eaſt, and the Saxo on the South; yet even Ubbo Emmius quits the Point upon Bede's Gene logy, and grants they were really Saxons, as being derived from Wode from whom the Race of Kings of many of thoſe Northern Parts a deſcended. But yet for all this it may probably be, that thô the Princes were not Native Friſians themſelves, yet ſome of thoſe Natio that followed them, and were in a large acceptation called Saxons, mig come from Friſeland, and the reſt of the Sea-Coaſt as far as Old Saxo properly ſo called. I omit what other German Authors have ſaid up this Subject, becauſe I would not be tedious; but whoever deſires f ther Satiſfaction herein, may conſult the Reverend Doctor abo mentioned, to whom I muſt own my ſelf beholding for what I ha now ſaid concerning the Countries from whence the Engliſh Saxons ori nally came.

Anno Dom. CCCCXLIX.

But as for the Original of theſe Saxons that now came into Britain, there is a much greater Diſpute. Cluverius in his ancient Germany, as alſo our Country-man Verſtegan, in his Treatiſe, called, A Reſtitution of decayed Intelligence, Chap. 2. would needs have them to be derived from the Germans, which is denied by the Learned Grotius in his Prolegomena to the Gothic Hiſtory, as alſo by Mr. Sherringham, in his Treatiſe De Anglorum Gentis Origine, where he undertakes to prove, that they were a Branch of the ancient Getæ, who were the Poſterity of Japhet; and coming out of Scythia into Europe, firſt fixed themſelves under the Conduct of one Eric their King in the ancient Scandinavia or Gothland, which is now called Sweden and Norway; and from thence ſome Ages, after under the Conduct of Berig, another of their Kings, ſent out Colonies into all the Iſles of the Baltic Sea, and the Northern Coaſts of Germany, as far as the Cimbric Cherſoneſe, now Jutland; ſo that the Swedes, Danes, and Saxons, had one and the ſame Scythic Original, as the Learned Grotius in his ſaid Prolegomena hath fully proved; as alſo Mr. Sherringham, in Chap. 7. of his laſt-cited Treatiſe, as well from the ancient Gothic Chronicles written in that Language, both in Proſe and Verſe; as alſo from Jornandes de Rebus Geticis, Chap. 4. that theſe Getæ or Goths multiplying more than thoſe Countries could well bear, in the time of Filemar the 5th King after Berig, great multitudes of them under his Conduct removed their Dwellings into the Aſiatic Scythia, called Oudin in their Language; from whence in proceſs of Time they ſpread themſelves as far as the Palus Mæotis, and the Northern Countries near the Euxine Sea, even to Thracia and Mæſia towards the South, where they ſtill retained the Name of Getæ or Gotti, thô they were alſo from the Countries where they lived often called Thracians or Mæſians, being divided into ſeveral Tribes, viz. Viſigoths or Weſtern Goths, and Oſtrogoths or Eaſtern Goths; the former of which invaded Spain, and the latter Italy.

But ſome Ages before this, (as the Norwegians and Swediſh Annals, cited by Mr. Sherringham relate,) one Woden, King of a Territory and City in Aſia, called Aſgard, near the River Tanais, led back a great multitude of theſe Goths out of the Aſiatic Scythia into Europe, and partly by good will, and partly by force, ſeized on all thoſe Countries afterwards called Saxony; but that afterward leaving his Sons Princes of thoſe Regions, he returned into Swedeland, where after many Travels he ended his Days, being counted a great Magician as well as Warriour, ſo that after his deceaſe his Subjects and Deſcendants worſhip'd him as a God. But divers Daniſh and Swediſh Authors do very much doubt, whether this Woden, whom they thus worſhip'd, were the ſame with him from whom the Saxon Princes drew their Pedigrees; ſince thereby it appears, that Hengiſt and Horſa were the Sons of Witgilſus, who was the Son of Witta, and he the Son of Vecta, and he the Son of Woden. So that theſe Princes were no more than three Deſcents removed from him, which could not amount to above 200 Years, and conſequently was too ſhort a time for their multiplying into ſuch great Multitudes, much leſs for their worſhiping him for a God; yet this is very probable, that moſt of the Goths that came along with this Woden changed their Names to that of the Saxons, and Peopled all thoſe Countries already mentioned; and thô there may be a great deal of Fabulous Stuff in this Story, as it is related in the Old Swediſh and Iſelandiſh Hiſtories called Eddas; yet thus much is certain, that there was ſuch a Prince who brought back the Goths out of Aſia

* Excerpt. Legat. p. 15. Eunapius Sardianus ſaith, That the Saxons in Julian's time had the Command of the Rhine. Nor was this only a ſudden Incurſion, ſince in Valentinian's time (when Ammianus wrote) they ſtill bordered upon Gaul.

Rer. Friſic. l. 1. Ubbo Emmius a Learned and German Hiſtorian, gives this Account o the Saxons and their Neighbouring Nations, who inhabited on the Nort Parts of Germany. That the Friſii dwelt from the middle Stream of th Rhine, about Utrecht, to the River Amaſus, (or Emes;) from thence to the Elb lived the Chauci, divided into the Greater and Leſſer by the Weſer; a great part of theſe leaving their Native Soil, joyned with the Sicambri on the Rhine, who from their affecting Liberty were called Franks: beyond the Elb were the Saxons, and the Cimbri; the Saxons being preſſed by the more Northern People, or for their own Conveniency, came Southwards, and took poſſeſſion firſt of thoſe Places where the Chauci dwelt; and by degrees prevailing over all the other People, who joyned with, or ſubmitted to the Saxons, they were called by their Name, and among the reſt the Friſii, from whoſe Coaſts he ſuppoſes, the two Brothers, Hengiſt and Horſa, to have gone into Britain; and returning thither, carried over a far greater Number with them, not ſo much to fight as to inhabit there; therefore he thinks it moſt probable, that Hengiſ and Horſa, by their deſcent, were originally Saxons; but that the greateſ part of the People, who went over with them, were rather Friſians, tha Saxons; which he proves, not only from the greater facility of Paſſag from the Coaſt of Friſeland, and the Teſtimony of their own Annals, bu from the greater Agreement of the Engliſh Language with theirs tha
Lib. 5. cap. 10. with the Saxon, or any other German Dialect; and alſo, becauſe Be reckons the Friſians among thoſe from whom the Engliſh Saxons are derived; and Wilfrid, Wickbert, and Willibrod, all preached to the Friſians i their own Tongue, as Marcellinus, in his Life of Suidebert, relates. Bu this Author ſaith further, That the Affinity of their Language continue ſtill ſo great, that from thence he concludes many more to have gon out of Friſeland into Britain, than either of the Saxons, Jutes, or Angles.

Ibid. But to all this, our Learned Primate anſwers, That Hengiſt and Hor might be truly called Friſians, there being a Friſia in the Southern Par of Jutland, which Saxo Grammaticus calls the Leſſer Friſia, and is parte by the Eidore from the Country of the Angli on the Eaſt, and the Saxo on the South; yet even Ubbo Emmius quits the Point upon Bede's Genealogy, and grants they were really Saxons, as being derived from Wode from whom the Race of Kings of many of thoſe Northern Parts a deſcended. But yet for all this it may probably be, that thô the Princes were not Native Friſians themſelves, yet ſome of thoſe Natio that followed them, and were in a large acceptation called Saxons, mig come from Friſeland, and the reſt of the Sea-Coaſt as far as Old Saxon properly ſo called. I omit what other German Authors have ſaid up this Subject, becauſe I would not be tedious; but whoever deſires fa ther Satiſfaction herein, may conſult the Reverend Doctor abov mentioned, to whom I muſt own my ſelf beholding for what I ha now ſaid concerning the Countries from whence the Engliſh Saxons ori nally came.

Anno Dom. CCCCXLIX.

But as for the Original of theſe Saxons that now came into Britain, there is a much greater Diſpute. Cluverius in his ancient Germany, as alſo our Country-man Verſtegan, in his Treatiſe, called, A Reſtitution of decayed Intelligence, Chap. 2. would needs have them to be derived from the Germans, which is denied by the Learned Grotius in his Prolegomena to the Gothic Hiſtory, as alſo by Mr. Sherringham, in his Treatiſe De Anglorum Gentis Origine, where he undertakes to prove, that they were a Branch of the ancient Getæ, who were the Poſterity of Japhet; and coming out of Scythia into Europe, firſt fixed themſelves under the Conduct of one Eric their King in the ancient Scandinavia or Gothland, which is now called Sweden and Norway; and from thence ſome Ages after under the Conduct of Berig, another of their Kings, ſent out Colonies into all the Iſles of the Baltic Sea, and the Northern Coaſts of Germany, as far as the Cimbric Cherſoneſe, now Jutland; ſo that the Swedes, Danes, and Saxons, had one and the ſame Scythic Original, as the Learned Grotius in his ſaid Prolegomena hath fully proved; as alſo Mr. Sherringham, in Chap. 7. of his laſt-cited Treatiſe, as well from the ancient Gothic Chronicles written in that Language, both in Proſe and Verſe; as alſo from Jornandes de Rebus Geticis, Chap. 4. that theſe Getæ or Goths multiplying more than thoſe Countries could well bear, in the time of Filemar the 5th King after Berig, great multitudes of them under his Conduct removed their Dwellings into the Aſiatic Scythia, called Oudin in their Language; from whence in proceſs of Time they ſpread themſelves as far as the Palus Mæotis, and the Northern Countries near the Euxine Sea, even to Thracia and Mæſia towards the South, where they ſtill retained the Name of Getæ or Gotti, thô they were alſo from the Countries where they lived often called Thracians or Mæſians, being divided into ſeveral Tribes, viz. Viſigoths or Weſtern Goths, and Oſtrogoths or Eaſtern Goths, the former of which invaded Spain, and the latter Italy.

Chap. 11.

But ſome Ages before this, (as the Norwegians and Swediſh Annals, cited by Mr. Sherringham relate,) one Woden, King of a Territory and City in Aſia, called Aſgard, near the River Tanais, led back a great multitude of theſe Goths out of the Aſiatic Scythia into Europe, and partly by good will, and partly by force, ſeized on all thoſe Countries afterwards called Saxony; but that afterward leaving his Sons Princes of thoſe Regions, he returned into Swedeland, where after many Travels he ended his Days, being counted a great Magician as well as Warriour, ſo that after his deceaſe his Subjects and Deſcendants worſhip'd him as a God. But divers Daniſh and Swediſh Authors do very much doubt, whether this Woden, whom they thus worſhip'd, were the ſame with him from whom the Saxon Princes drew their Pedigrees; ſince thereby it appears, that Hengiſt and Horſa were the Sons of Witgilſus, who was the Son of Witta, and he the Son of Vecta, and he the Son of Woden. So that theſe Princes were no more than three Deſcents removed from him, which could not amount to above 200 Years, and conſequently was too ſhort a time for their multiplying into ſuch great Multitudes, much leſs for their worſhiping him for a God; yet this is very probable, that moſt of the Goths that came along with this Woden changed their Names to that of the Saxons, and Peopled all thoſe Countries already mentioned; and thô there may be a great deal of Fabulous Stuff in this Story, as it is related in the Old Swediſh and Iſelandiſh Hiſtories called Eddas; yet thus much is certain, that there was ſuch a Prince who brought back the Goths out of Aſia

Anno Dom. CCCCXLIX. into thoſe parts, ſince the Swedes, Danes, Norwegians and Saxons worſhip'd him as their common Deity, and all agree in the ſame Tradition concerning him.

Ibid. Yet ſince Cluverius, and Verſtegan have both affirmed the Saxons not to be derived from the Goths, but Germans; and that the former has endeavoured to prove that the ancient Getæ or Gothes were not the ſame Nation, I ſhall here give you the ſum of thoſe Arguments, which Grotius and Mr. Sheringham have given us to prove, the ancient Getæ, and Gothi to have been all one Nation, and that the Saxons were deriv'd from them: For the firſt, they alledge the Teſtimony of the moſt ancient Latin and Greek Authours that make any mention of the Goths, as Voſpicus in his Life of the Emperour Probus, to whom may be alſo added divers Chriſtian Writers, as Origen, St. Hierome, and St. Auguſtine; and of the Greeks, Procopius, Photius the Patriarch, [redacted] Georgius Syncellus, not to mention the Gothic Writers themſelves, as Jornandes and Iſſidore in his Gothic Chronicle; who all agree that the Goths were anciently called Getæ, and that they were one and the ſame Nation; Secondly, from the places where theſe ancient Getæ or Scythians firſt inhabited, that they were the ſame from whence the Goths afterwards came, who over-ran the Roman Empire, (viz.) from the Countries about the Palus Mæotis, which are now poſſeſſed by the Chrim Tartars; Laſtly from their great agreement in Language; and Grotius in his ſaid Prolegomena brings divers Inſtances (too long here to be recited) to prove that the ancient Scythic or Gothic Tongue was the Mother of the German, which ſeems to be further made out by Mr. Sherringham, from the Etymology of divers Scythian Words which are found to be the ſame with the Gothic and Saxon: Epiſt. 4. Laſtly Busbequius in his Turkiſh Epiſtles, mentions ſome remainders of the ancient Goths who dwell among the Tartars in the Cimbric Cherſoneſe, ſome of whom he met and diſcours'd with at Conſtantinople, and gives you not only their names of numbers, but alſo above Forty Words which are very near the Dutch and Engliſh, ſignifying the ſame things, and which argue a derivation from the ſame Gothic Original; and thô this Authour there doubts, whether theſe Goths were not ſome remainders of the Saxons, brought thither by Charles the Great; yet Grotius in his ſaid Prolegomena fully removes that difficulty, and ſhews from the Teſtimony of Joſophat Barbarus a Noble Venetian, who had lived among them, that theſe People called themſelves not Saxons but Goths, and their Country Gothland; which is alſo confirmed by the learned Scaliger in his * Canon Iſagog.; where he relates that they ſtill lived under the Precopian Tartars, and have the Bible in the ſame Characters, which were invented by Ulphilas their Biſhop.

* Lib. 3.

But the learned Dr. Hicks hath given us much greater light into this matter, in his Engliſh Saxon, and Mæſogothick Grammar; as alſo by reprinting the Iſeland Grammar of ~~Randolph~~ Jones, in both which, by comparing the radical Words of the Engliſh Saxon Tongue, as alſo the Declenſions of the Verbs, and Pronouns, any Man that will but take the pains to peruſe it, muſt needs think that not only the Old Mæſogothic, and Scandian Gothic, were one and the ſame Language, the latter being derived from the former, but that our Engliſh Saxon comes from ~~one, and~~ the ſame Original.

But if the Getæ and Gothi were one and the ſame Nation, and if all the Daniſh, Swediſh, and Saxon Writers have it that Woden was a Goth, it will alſo follow that all thoſe who came into Germany along with him, were alſo Goths, and from whom that part of it was called at firſt Reid Gothland, now Jutland; in which, as Grotius tells us, there is a River called Guden Aa. i. e. the Goths River, which Country being deſerted, by its ancient Inhabitants, the Jutes and Angles, was not long after ſeized by the Danes, who poſſeſs it to this day, and who, as we find by their Hiſtories, had maintained Wars upon that account with the Saxons for many Ages before: I ſhall not here trouble the Reader with the particular Arguments and Objections that Verſtegan and Cluverius have brought to prove, that Sweden, Denmark, Norway and Saxony, were Peopled from Germany, and not vice verſa; ſince it is not the part of an Hiſtorian to dwell too long on Arguments pro and Con; ſo having given you, I hope, ſufficient authorities for this Opinion, I refer you for the more particular Anſwers to their Objections, to Grotius's forecited Prolegomena, and to Mr. Sherringham's ſaid Treatiſe,

But, farther the very Name of Jutes, the ancient Inhabitants of Juteland, may be uſed as another Argument, to prove their deſcent from the Getæ or Goths; ſince they are called by no ~~Names~~ other in our ancient Saxon Hiſtorians, then Giotas or Jutes, and in King Alfred's Saxon Tranſlation of Bede's Hiſtory, they are called Geatuln, i. e. Getes.

Names

As for the Angles (who afterward gave their name to all the reſt of the Saxon Nations of this Iſland) they are ſuppoſed to be derived from the ancient Cimbri, and to have paſſed by that Name in Julius Cæſar's Time, or elſe they might then make a part of the Swevi, whom he in his Commentaries calls the moſt warlike of all the Germans, and whom Tacitus and Ptolemy ſubdivided into divers Nations, the latter making them three diſtinct People, (viz.) the Swevi Langobardi, the Swevi Semnones, and Swevi Angili; whom Tacitus and other Latin Authours call'd Angli, and who, * Saffridus, in his Treatiſe De Origine Friſiorum, tells us, had as many denominations with the Name of Angli added to them, as there were Countries into which they were diſperſed, and there reckons up a great many; and though this Nation was not at firſt the ſame with that of the Saxons, nor dwelt in the ſame Inland Country, in which they are placed by Ptolemy, yet they might, according to the ancient cuſtom of the Germans, change their ſeats after Ptolemies Time (as Strabo obſerves they often did) and ſo removing their dwellings from the Banks of the Elbe into Holſtein, they might be there conquered by the Saxons, and after make up one Nation or Common-wealth with them, though ſtill retaining their ancient Name, as the ancient Britains, or Welſh, do among us at this day; ſo that I confeſs it remains a great doubt, why they were at firſt called Angles; for thô moſt Writers think it ſufficient to derive their Name from the Latin Word Angulus a corner, becauſe forſooth they lived in a corner of Germany, yet this ſeems very forced, ſince Tacitus and Ptolemy mention them by that Name, as then well known and given them a long time before they came to be ſo called by the Romans; ſo that I ſtill believe that this Name may be derived from ſome Gothic Original, though what it was, is now hard to determine.

* Lib. 2. c. 10

As for the name of Saxons in general, there is a great diſpute about it amongſt learned Men; Goropius Becanus, and Mr. Camden from him, ſuppoſe them to have been firſt called Sacaſons, i. e. the Sons or Poſterity

Anno Dom. CCCCXLIX. of the Sacæ, from whom he imagins them to be derived; but this Etymology is proved by Mr. Sherringham, in his ſaid Diſcertation, not only to be forced, but alſo falſe in matter of Fact; for firſt the name of theſe People was never written, or pronounced Sacaſons in the Plural, but Sacen or Saxons, nor can we find in Strabo, Ptolemy, or any other ancient Authour, that ever the Sacæ ſent any Colonies out of Aſia, where they were planted near the Caſpian Sea, not far from Bactria; but Strabo tells us to the contrary, that this whole Nation being ſet upon by the Perſians at unawares, were totally deſtroyed.

Iſidore hath found out another derivation of this Name, from the Latin Word Saxum a Stone, or Rock, becauſe they were a ſtrong and hardy Race of Men, excelling all others in piracy; which were not improper, if this Name could be proved to have been firſt given them by the Romans; whereas this Nation was ſo called by their Neighbours (thô not by themſelves) many Ages before the Romans had any knowledge of them; ſo that the moſt likely Etymology of this Name, ſeems to be that which Verſtegan hath given us in his ſaid Treatiſe, from the Opinion of the learned Lipſius, that it was firſt given them by their Neighbours, from their wearing a ſort of long Daggers, or ſhort crooked Swords, like Cymeters, called in their Tongue Saexen, and whence from their particular uſe of it, they were called Saxons, and in the Dutch, Welſh and Iriſh Tongues, the Engliſh are called Sacen to this day; and from whence probably the Arms of Saxony are two ſuch crooked Daggers, placed Saltire-wiſe, as Pontanus hath very well obſerved.

But whenceſoever this name is derived, it is certain they are firſt mentioned by Ptolemy, by the Name of Saxons, and he places them at the back of the Cimbrians; thô they were not commonly known to the Romans by this Name, till the Fourth Century after Chriſt, when they grew terrible by reaſon of their many Piracies; Ammianus Marcellinus, and Claudian the Poet, (whoſe Verſes concerning them, I have given you in the former Book,) being the firſt Roman Authours, who make mention of them; and the ~~latter~~ former ſays, that the Saxons are formidable above all other Enemies. After him, Oroſius ~~ſays~~ makes, The Saxons ~~were~~ terrible, by reaſon of their Valour; but in the Time of the Emperour Theodoſius, I. they were grown ſo formidable, that there were Ships and Watch-houſes appointed on purpoſe in the Coaſt of Britain to hinder their depredations, and the Commander over them was called Comes littoris Saxonici, in which times they became more known to the Romans.

Vide Not. [illegible] Imperii.

As for the ancient Saxons Religion, it is likewiſe another great argument of their Gothic Original, ſince the Danes, Swedes and Norweigans (who all derive themſelves from the Goths) worſhip'd the ſame Gods in Common with the Saxons, (viz.) Thor the God of Thunder, who anſwer'd the Roman Jupiter, (though he was not the ſame.) Woden, who was their God of War, together with his Wife Friga or Frea, who was their Goddeſs of Love and Pleaſure: So that whoever will but conſider their Names of the Days of the Week, from which ours are derived at this Day, will eaſily perceive the chief Gods they worſhip'd, and from whom thoſe Names are deriv'd, to have been all the ſame; only I deſire the Reader to take notice, That whereas Verſtegan, to prove the Saxons to come from the Germans, would make our Tueſday to be derived from Twiſto the God of the Germans; Mr. Sherringham proves that Opinion not to be at all likely; ſince the Germans (whoſe peculiar God this Twiſto is ſuppoſed ſuppoſed to be) do not call it Tweſday, but Dinſday, or Zinſtag, and the Swedes and Danes, Triſdag and Driſdag, and therefore Angrimus Jonas in his Hiſtory of Iſeland, rather derives it from Tyr the Son of Woden, from whom the Iſlanders call it to this day Tyſdag, or Tyrſdag in their Language; but Ol. Wormus in his learned Work, De monumentis Danicis, would rather derive this Name from a Gothic Goddeſs, called Dyſa or Thiſa, the Wife of Thor, and whom the ancient Swedes and Danes made their Goddeſs of Juſtice, who had her Temple at Upſal; as for the Name of the laſt day of the Week, though Verſtegan would derive it from a God called Seater (whom the Danes call Crodo) yet whither he was the ſame with the Roman Saturn, may be very much doubted; ſince the Danes, Swedes, and Saxons Worſhip'd theſe falſe Gods, before they ever had any thing to do with the Romans.

Vide Sherringham de Anglor. Gent. Orig.

Beſides theſe Seaven greater Deities, from whom the days of the Week take their Names, the ancient Saxons and Angles had many other leſs Gods and Goddeſſes, ſuch as * Hertha, who was the ſame with the Goddeſs Tellus; among the Romans, Rheda, from whom they call the Month of March Rhed Monach; Eaſter, from whoſe Feaſt falling out in April, our Eaſter is derived; as alſo Mara, which was a Spectre, ſuppoſed to have haunted People in the Night, and from whence comes our Word Mare, or Diſeaſe ſo called; as for what Worſhip and Sacrifices they paid theſe falſe Gods, they are very uncertain, only we find that the Swedes, and Danes (and it is likely the Saxons too) ſacrificed Men to Thor before any great enterprize; but whoever deſires to know more on this Subject, may conſult Verſtegan, Wormius, and other German and Daniſh Writers.

But it is now time to return to our Engliſh Saxon Hiſtory, from which I doubt we have made too long a digreſſion; the Saxons being thus arrived in Britain, as you now have heard, ſtreight joyned their Forces with the Britains, and marching together againſt the Picts and Scots, who were then entred into the Country, as far as the hither part of that Province we now call Lincoln-ſhire, and near Stanford they joyned Battle with them, where the former fighting with Darts and Launces, but the Saxons with Battle-Axes and long Swords, they had very much the advantage; ſo that the Picts could not bear their Force, but provided for their ſafety by Flight, the Saxons obtaining a clear Victory with the ſpoil of the Field.

what he ſhould ask of the King for his Daughter; they all agreed that he ſhould demand the Country of Kent, which was preſently granted him, one Guorangonus then Ruling there, being ignorant that his Goverment was given away to the Saxons: So the Damoſel being by her Father given to the King, he Married her, and grew ſo extreamly fond of her, that he Divorced his former Wife, by whom he had ſeveral Sons of great hopes.

But Hengiſt, not ſatisfied with this, told the King farther, That being now his Father-in law, he muſt take upon him to adviſe him; and therefore, if he would not ſlight his Counſel, he need not fear being overcome by any other Nation, as long as that of the Saxons was ſo potent; That therefore he would ſend over for his own * Son and his Nephew, who being War-like young Men, would fight ſtoutly againſt the Picts and Scots, if the King would beſtow upon them thoſe Countries in the North lying near the Picts Wall. So the King gave him leave to ſend for Octa and Ebuſa with 40 Veſſels, who ſailing round about the Picts Country, coaſted the Iſles of Orcades, and came and poſſeſſed many places on the other ſide of the Frith or Streight, even to the Borders of the Picts; Hengiſt ſtill ſending by degrees for more Men and Ships, 'till at laſt the Countries from whence they came were left almoſt without any Inhabitants: And now they being ſufficiently increaſed in Number and Strength, they wholly planted the Country of Kent with Jutes. But by the flocking in of ſuch numerous Troops into this Iſle, of all the above-mentioned Nations, they began ſo exceedingly to increaſe, that they ſoon became a Terror to thoſe who had invited them over, and now began to pick Quarrels with their Entertainers, ; and firſt they demanded larger Allowances of Corn, and other Proviſions, openly declaring, unleſs this were allowed them, they would break the League, and waſte all parts of the Country.

The Britains refuſing to give them what they demanded, deſired them to return home, ſince their Numbers were increaſed beyond what they were able to maintain: Whereupon the Saxon Commanders reſolved to break the League, and having made Peace ſecretly with the Picts, they immediately turn'd their Arms againſt their Confederates, waſting the Country with Fire and Sword from the Eaſtern to the Weſtern Sea, none being able to hinder them, ſo that they over-ran almoſt the whole Iſland; the Buildings, as well publick as private, were ruined; the Prieſts were commonly ſlain at the very Altars, and the Biſhops were deſtroy'd without any Reſpect, together with the People; nor were ſcarce any left to bury the dead: Whilſt ſome of the miſerable Remains of the Britains, being taken among the Mountains, were ſlain in Heaps, others pined away by Famine, yielded themſelves to their Enemies, and to get Food were forced to undergo perpetual Servitude, if they could ſo preſerve their Lives; others being forced to ſeek for Refuge among Foreign Nations; but thoſe that remained at home, living in perpetual Fear, led a hard and miſerable Life among the Woods and Mountains. Will. of Malmesbury ſuppoſes the League between the Britains and Saxons to have laſted Seven years; and the firſt Battel between them is placed in the 6th year after; but it is moſt likely that they fell out ſome time before that.

This Flight of theſe Britains not only our own, but Foreign Writers relate; for ſome fled to Armorica, and peopled it (as ſome ſuppoſe,) with Britains, from whom it was called the Leſſer Britain; though others think it was called ſo long before, either by the Gift of the laſt Conſtantine the Great, or elſe of Maximus, to thoſe Britiſh Forces who had ſerved them in their Foreign Wars: To whom came thoſe alſo that did not miſcarry with the latter Conſtantine at Arles, and now laſt of all by theſe Exiles, driven out by the Saxons, who fled thither for Refuge.

chap. 5. p. 35

But that the Britains of Armorica were ſetled there long before the Britains here were driven out by the Saxons, is proved by the above-cited Doctor Stillingfleet in his Antiquities of the Britiſh Churches, which he proves by theſe Authorities; Firſt, from Sidonius Appollinaris, in whom there are two Paſſages, which tend to the clearing this matter: The firſt is concerning Arvandus, accuſed at Rome of Treaſon, in the time of Anthemius; for perſuading the King of the Goths to make War upon the Greek Emperour, (i. e. Anthemius,) who then came out of Greece: And upon the Britains on the Loir, as Sidonius Appolinaris expreſly affirms, who lived at that time, and pitied his Caſe. This hapned about Anno Dom. 467, before Anthemius was the ſecond time Conſul; from whence it appears, not only that there were Britains then ſetled on the Loir, but that their Strength and Forces were conſiderable, which cannot be ſuppoſed to conſiſt of ſuch miſerable People as only fled from hence for fear of the Saxons; (and not being able to keep their own Country, it is not likely they could that of others:) And it is farther obſervable, that about this time Aurelius Ambroſius had ſucceſs againſt the Saxons, and either by Vortimer's Means, or his, the Britains were in great likelihood of driving them quite out of Britain; ſo that there is no probability, that the Warlike Britains ſhould at that time leave their native Country. A ſecond Paſſage is concerning Riothamus, a King of theſe Armorican Britains, in the time of Sidonius Appollinaris, (and to whom he wrote,) who went with 12000 Britains to aſſiſt the Romans againſt Euricus King of the Goths, but were intercepted by him, as Jornandes relates the Story; and Sigibert places it Anno Dom. 470: Now, What clearer Evidence can be deſired than this, to prove, that a conſiderable number of Britains were there ſetled, and in a condition not only to defend themſelves, but to aſſiſt the Romans? which cannot be imagined of ſuch as meerly fled thither for Refuge after the Saxons coming into Britain. Beſides, we find in Sirmondus's Gallican Councils, Manſuetus, a Biſhop of the Britains, ſubſcribing to the firſt Council at Tours, which was held Anno Dom. 461, by which we ſee the Britains had ſo full a Settlement then, as not only to have Inhabitants, but a King and Biſhops of their own; which was the great Encouragement for other Britains to go over, when they found themſelves ſo hard preſs'd by the Saxons at home: For a People frighted from hence would hardly have ventured into a Foreign Country, unleſs they had been ſecure before hand of a kind Reception there; And if they muſt have fought for a Dwelling, had they not far better have done it in their own Country? From whence I conclude, that there was a large Colony of Britains in Armorica, before thoſe Numbers went over upon the Saxon Cruelties, of which Eginhardus, and other Foreign Hiſtorians ſpeak: Though how it ſhould come to be ſetled there, unleſs ſome Colonies were carried over before by Maximus, or Conſtantine, the laſt Uſurper of the Empire, I know not, but as for this, it being very obſcure, I determine nothing.

Nen. c. 33.

K. Vortigern, nothing bettered by theſe Calamities, is ſaid to have added this to his other Crimes, that he took his own Daughter to Wife, who brought forth a Son, who (according to Nennius) was called Fauſtus, and

and proved a Religious Man, living in great Devotion by the River Rennis in Glamorganſhire; but for the reſt of his Stories concerning the Dialogue between Vortigern and St. German, and that the King was condemn'd for this Inceſt, in a great Synod or Council of Clergy-men and Laicks, in which St. German preſided, is certainly falſe; he being then dead, (as appears from the beſt approved Authours,) the year before the Saxons arrived in Britain. And indeed this whole Story of Vortigern's committing Inceſt with his own Daughter ſeems altogether unlikely; for when ſhould he do it? Not before he married Rowena, for Nennius places it afterwards; nor could it well be during the time of his Marriage with her, ſince, as the ſame Authour relates, ſhe continued his Wife long after, when he was taken Priſoner by Hengiſt; and it is very ſtrange he ſhould fall in love with his own Daughter, when at the ſame time he had another Wife, whom he is ſaid to have loved ſo well, that he was divorced from his firſt Wife for her ſake.

Geoffery of Monm.

Nennius, c. 38.

Geoffery of Monmouth relates, That the Nobles of Britain being highly diſpleaſed at King Vortigern for the great Partiality he ſhewed to the Saxons, and for the ill Succeſs that followed it, beſeeched the King wholly to deſert, ~~him~~; but he refuſing ſo to do, they depoſed him, and choſe his Son Vortimer King, who following their Advice, began to Expel the Saxons, purſuing them as far as the River Dervent, or Darent, in Kent, where obtaining the Victory, he made a great Slaughter of them; beſides which, that he fought alſo another Battle with them near the Ford which is called in the Saxon Tongue Episford, and in the Britiſh Tongue Sathenegabail; which is alſo confirmed by the Saxon Annals, which ſay, That Hengiſt and Horſa fought with King Vortigern at a place called Eglesford (now Aylesford) in Kent, and that Horſa was there ſlain (Nennius ſays by Cartigern the Brother of King Vortimer,) * and that afterwards Hengiſt and his Son Æsk obtained the Kingdom of Kent; and Matthew of Weſtminſter relates, that after the Death of his Brother Horſa, the Saxons choſe Hengiſt for their King, being 8 Years after his arrival in England.

Anno Dom. CCCCLV.

And yet after this, † Nennius ſuppoſes Vortimer to have fought a third Battle with them in a Field which was near the Stone Titulus, which was fixed near the Shore of the Gallic Sea, which place Arch-Biſhop Uſher will have to be Stonar in the Iſle of Thanet; but Mr. Somner, in his Treatiſe of the Roman Ports and Forts in Kent, ſuppoſes it ſhould be written Lapis Populi, in ſtead of Tituli; and then Folkſtone in Kent is moſt likely to be the place where this Battle was fought, it having the ſame Signification as Lapis Populi in the Latin. Geoffery of Monmouth, and from him Mathew Weſtminſter, further relate, That Hengiſt not being able to withſtand the Valour of K. Vortimer, was made to retire into the Iſle of Thanet, whither he was alſo purſued by the Sea; and that at laſt the Saxons being forced on board their Ships, returned into Germany. Nennius adds, That they durſt not return again into this Iſland till after the Death of Vortimer, which, thô not mentioned in our Engliſh Saxon Annals, yet is very likely to be true; ſince Bede relates, That about this time the Saxon Army returned home, when the Natives, thô before driven out or diſpers'd, began again to take freſh Courage, and come out of their Hiding-Places and Retreats.

This Year Vortimer having obtained many Battels againſt the Saxons, is ſuppoſed by our Britiſh Hiſtorians to have died. Geoffery makes him to have been poiſoned by the Procurement of his Mother-in-Law, Rowena; and Nennius adds, That Vortimer lying upon his Death-bed, deſired his Servants to bury him near the place where the Saxons uſed to land, ſaying, If that were done, thô they might take ſome other Haven in Britain, yet they ſhould never have that; but notwithſtanding, he is ſaid (contrary to his own will) to have been buried at Lincoln. After whoſe Deceaſe, Nennius and Geoffery make Vortigern to have been again reſtored to the Throne.

Anno Dom. CCCCLVII

It is much more certain which the Saxon Annals relate, that Hengiſt and his Son Æsk this Year fought againſt the Britains in a place which is called Creecanford, and there killed four principal Men, (but in Florence of Worceſter's and Ethelwerd's Copy of theſe Annals, which ſeems to have been trueſt, it was 4000 Men;) and the Britains then left Kent, and fled in great fear to London. but who was then King or General of the Britains is not mentioned

From which Victory, Ran. Higden in his Polychronicon dates the beginning of the Kingdom of Kent under Hengiſt, who Reigned Twenty four Years.

Nennius, cap. 47.

For Hengiſt being now returned out of Germany, (as it is related by Nennius,) King Vortigern ſtill maintained the War againſt the Saxons, who thereupon took Council, how they might intrap Vortigern and his Army; wherefore they ſent Ambaſſadours to him offering Peace, and that the former Friendſhip might be renewed between them; whereupon, Vortigern, taking Advice with his wiſe Men, they all agreed to make Peace: So it was conſented to on both ſides, That the Britains and Saxons meeting together without any Arms, a firm League ſhould be made between them. Ibid. c. 48. But the treacherous Hengiſt commanded all his Followers to take their Daggers or Seaxes along with them under their Coats, and that when he gave the Word, and cried out in his own Tongue, Nimed your Saexes, that is, Pull out your Daggers, that they ſhould then fall upon the Britains and kill them, but ſpare their King, and (for his Wife's ſake) only take him Priſoner, becauſe it would be more for their advantage ſo to do, that he might be Ranſomed. And thus being met according to Agreement at a Feaſt, or Drinking-bout, they talked at firſt very Friendly together, being placed every Saxon by a Britain; but Hengiſt giving the Word, they roſe up on a ſudden and diſpatched 300 (Geoffery ſays 470) of the Britiſh Nobles. Vortigern alone being then taken alive and put in Fetters, was forced for his Ranſom to ſurrender to the Saxons all thoſe Countries that were afterwards called Eaſtſex, Middleſex, and Suſſex; which is alſo recited by William of Malmesbury, who adds, That at this Entertainment the Company growing in drink, Hengiſt on purpoſe pick'd a Quarrel, and ſome hard Words paſſing, they fell to blows, where the Britains were ſlain.

Anno Dom. CCCCLXV

But here being a conſiderable Interval in the Saxon Chronicle, we may very well fill it up with Britiſh Affairs, for it is about this time that the Welſh Chronicles ſuppoſe, that Aurelius was elected General of the Britains, Vortigern being as yet King, thô but in Name, having retired (as Nennius relates) to a Caſtle built by him in South-Wales. And to this time we may refer that Paſſage in Gildas*, That when thoſe cruel Robbers the Saxons were gone home, the Remainders of the Britains being ſtrengthened by GOD, came together from divers Places, and praying to to him with all their Hearts, that he would not totally deſtroy them, choſe Ambroſius ~~Aurelian~~, a modeſt Man, for their General, and who alone was found ſtout and faithful, as being of Roman Race, who in ſo great a confuſion remained alive, his Parents who had enjoyed the Crown having been killed; but whether by the Scots and Picts, or elſe (which is moſt likely) were murdered by their Subjects, he leaves it uncertain. But Nennius* ſaith little more than that Vortigern was afraid of him; and then immediately he confounds himſelf with Merlin, who being a Boy, tells Vortigern, (after the Story of his being born without a Father,) That he had concealed his Father's Name out of fear, but that he was one of the Roman Conſuls; whereupon Vortigern gave him a Caſtle, together with all the Weſtern Parts of Britain, which is as true as being born without a Father. But if Geoffery were to be believed, he tells us very plainly, That he was one of the Sons of Conſtantine King of Britain, who was forced to fly from Vortigern after the murder of their Brother Conſtans by his contrivance: but we know that Conſtantine, and his Sons Conſtans and Julian, were killed abroad many Years before; and it is not probable the Romans would have permitted any one of his Sons to have remained here; or if they did, this Ambroſius muſt have been by this time near 60 Years of Age, ſuppoſing him to have been but One Year old when his Father died. And beſides, it is certain that Conſtantine was ſlain in the Reigns of Honorius and Theodoſius the Second, An. Dom. 411; and Aurelius is not ſuppoſed to be choſen General, or King of the Britains, till the Year 465.

Gildas.

But immediately after Aurelius was thus made General of the Britains, it is certain that he obtained a great Victory over the Saxons, thô the place where be not named by Gildas.' But afterwards (he ſays) ſometimes his Country-men and ſometimes their Enemies prevailed, and that thus it continued till the Year of the Siege of Mount Badon, where was the lateſt and not the leaſt ſlaughter made of the Pagan Saxons; but that the Saxons about this time received a great defeat, their own Annals intimate, though they are aſhamed to confeſs it in expreſs words, being thus related under this very Year, [Hengiſt and Æſc fought with the Britains near Wippedes Fleat, and there ſlew Twelve Britiſh Commanders; but loſt one Man of note on the Saxons ſide, whoſe Name was Wypped (who it ſeems left his name to that place) H. Huntington adds, that this Victory was very fatal even to the Saxons themſelves, both parties being thereby ſo weakned, that neither the Saxons durſt enter the Britiſh borders for a long time; nor yet the Britains preſume to Invade Kent, however the Britains, thô Foreign Wars were now for a time intermitted, did not ceaſe to raiſe Civil ones among themſelves: But this much appears even from the ſilence of Saxon Annals, that for Twelve Years following, there was no conſiderable action paſſed on either ſide, or elſe that the Britains had the better of it, under the conduct of Aurelius Ambroſius, which is moſt agreeable to Gildas's Relation.]

It is alſo very probable which Geoffery of Monmouth now relates, and which is followed by many of our Engliſh Hiſtorians, that Aurelius Ambroſius after his firſt Victory over the Saxons, called the Princes and Great Men together at York, and gave Order for the repairing the Churches which the Saxons had deſtroyed; and that after due care taken in other places, he marched to London, which had ſuffered as well as other Cities; and having called the diſperſed Citizens together went about the repairing of it; all his deſign being the reſtoring the Church and Kingdom; from thence he went to Winchester and to Salisbury, doing there as he had done at other places: But in the paſſage thither Geoffrey launches out to purpoſe in his Hiſtory of Stonehenge, tranſlated (ſays he) by Merlin out of Ireland, to make a Monument for the Britiſh Nobles ſlain there by Hengiſts Treachery: Which is ſuch an Extravagancy that it is to be wondered any ſhould follow him in it, and yet Mat Weſtminſter tranſcribes the main of it, and * Walter of Coventry ſets it down for Authentick Hiſtory; but he adds two Circumſtances, which make it ſeem probable that Stonehenge had ſome relation to Ambroſius, (viz.) that here Ambroſius was Crowned, and was not long after buried: Polydore Virgil makes it the Monument of Ambroſius; and John of Tinmouth in the Life of Dubricius, calls it Mons Ambroſii; and the name of Ambreſburg, a Town near it, doth much confirm the probability, of its being founded by Ambroſius, rather than either by the Romans or Danes, as ſome of our late Antiquaries and Architects have ſuppoſed. But I ſhall not inſiſt any longer on this Subject; Geoffery adds yet further concerning Eccleſiaſtical Matters in his time, that at a ſolemn Council he appointed two Metropolitans for the two Sees, at that time vacant, (viz.) Sampſon one of Eminent Piety for York, and Dubricius for Caer-leon; but Mathew Weſtminſter ſaith, that Sampſon was afterward driven into Armorica, and there was made Arch-biſhop of Dole, among the Britains, which is very likely to be true, being confirmed by Sigebert in his Chronicle, Anno Dom. 566.

* MS. Penes R. Episc. Wigorn.

It is obſerved by H. of Huntington that after the Britains had a little reſpite from their Enemies, they fell into Civil diſſentions among themſelves, which is very agreeable to what Gildas hath ſaid; of this Geoffrey gives us no improbable account, when he relates that one of Vortigerns Sons called Paſcentius, raiſed a Rebellion in the North againſt Ambroſius among the Britains, who were overcome by him and put to flight; what became of Vortigern is uncertain, nor can the Britiſh Writers themſelves agree either about the time or the manner of his Death; Nennius, hath two ſeveral ſtories about it, the one certainly falſe, and the other very improbable; The firſt is, that St. German followed him, into a Country in South Wales (which was called by his own Name Guorthigernian) where he lay hid with his Women in a Caſtle which he had built, called Din Guortigern, near the River Thebi; to which Caſtle when St. German came, he prayed, and faſted there with his Clergy three whole Days and Nights (it ſeems without any intermiſſion) when the Caſtle about Midnight was ſet on Fire from Heaven, and Vortigern with his Wives and Family were all burnt, and this Nennius ſays, he found in the Book or Legend of St. German; yet he declares, That others relate how that Vortigern becoming hateful to all ſorts and degrees of Men, none would keep him company from the greateſt to the leaſt; till at laſt, as he wandred from place to place, his Heart was broken (I ſuppoſe for grief) but Geoffery of Monmouth with more probability relates, that Vortigern, being again depoſed, was beſieged and burnt in this Caſtle by his Succeſſour Aurelius Ambroſius, who ſet it on Fire.

the Welſhmen vaniſh'd before the Engliſh like Stubble before the Fire, as the Saxon Chronicle words it.

After this there is no more ſaid of any Victories gained by Hengiſt; but now after Four Years interval, began the Kingdom of the South Saxons; for Ælla with his Three Sons, Cymen, Wlencing, or Pleting, (as Huntington calls him) and Ciſſa, landing in Britain at a place called Cymens ora (which ſignifies in the Saxon Tongue Cymens Shore or Coaſt,) there they ſlew a great many Britains, and made the reſt fly into the Wood or Forreſt, called Andredes Leage (ſuppoſed to be part of the wild of Kent, and the Woody parts of Suſſex) where now are, or were lately Aſhdowne, and Arundel Forreſts, with ſeveral others now disforreſted. Henry Huntington giveth a large account of this Action, and tells us that upon the Saxons firſt landing, a great many Britains immediately drew together at the Alarm, and ſtreight ways a great Fight was begun, but the Saxons being taller and ſtronger Men, received them couragiouſly; and the Britains coming on very raſhly in ſmall ſtragling Parties were killed by the Saxons, who were drawn up in cloſe Order, and ſo the Britains were routed upon the firſt encounter; whereupon theſe Saxons poſſeſſed themſelves of all the Sea Coaſt of Suſſex, enlarging their Territories more and more, until the Eighth Year after their coming; when Ælla fought againſt the Britains, near Mearcredes, Burnamſtede or Mecredeſburne (but where it lies is uncertain) now it ſeems (as H. Huntington relates) all the Kings and Princes of the Britains were got together, and fought with Ælla and his Sons, where the Victory remained doubtful, for both Armies returned home very much weakned; whereupon Ælla ſent unto his own Country for freſh ſupplies.

Vid. Dr. Powel's Catalogue of the Kings of Wales

The ſame Year alſo Aurelius Ambroſius, is ſuppoſed by the Welſh Chronicles to be choſen King (having been before only General) of the Britains, and to have Reigned Nineteen Years. Nennius tells us, That he being King of all Britain, beſtowed Buelt, and another Country in South Wales, upon Paſcent Son to Vortigern.

Anº Dom. CCCCLXXXIX.

About Three Years after this, Hengiſt King of Kent dyed; For this Year (as the Saxon Annals relate) Æſc (who is alſo called Oiſc, and by our Hiſtorians, ~~called~~ Oſric) his Son began his Reign, which continued Twenty Four Years; but of Hengiſt his Father, Will. of Malmesbury very well obſerves, that he obtained a Crown by Craft, as much as Valour; but Æſc his Son (who ſucceeded him) maintained his Kingdom by the Valour of his Father, rather than his own Merit, and did not much encreaſe his Dominions: This happened in the Time of Zeno the Emperour. Nor can I here omit what Geoffery of Monmouth, and (from him) Mathew of Weſtminſter falſly relate, concerning the Death of Hengiſt; That fighting againſt Aurelius Ambroſius, he was taken Priſoner near Coninsburgh in Yorkſhire; and not long afterwards beheaded by Eldol (a feigned) Duke of Glouceſter; which ſince it is not found in the Saxon Chronicle, nor in any other Authentick Hiſtorian, deſerves little credit.

Anno Dom. CCCCXC

Ælla and Ciſſa having now received freſh recruits out of Germany (wherein they much confided) did this Year beſiege Andredeſceaſter (ſuppoſed to be that we now call Newenden in Kent) and took it by Force, putting all the Britains to the Sword; but H. Huntington is very particular in the manner of this Siege, and tells us that the Britains raiſed a great Army to relieve it, and made many aſſaults upon the Saxons Rear, whil'ſt they lay before the Town; who thereupon raiſing the Siege, turned all their Forces againſt the Britains; whil'ſt they being more nimble, preſently ran away to the Woods, when the Saxons returning again to the Siege, they were as ſoon upon their backs; by which means the Saxons being for a time tired out, received a great loſs, till they divided their Army into two bodies; ſo that whil'ſt the one aſſaulted the City, the other ſhould defend the Aſſailants: whereby at laſt the Citizens being quite ſpent with hunger and fatigue, could no longer endure the Force of the Beſiegers, and all periſhed by the Sword, even to the very Women and Children, none eſcaping; and the Saxons quite deſtroyed that City, which remained a vaſt heap of Ruins in his Time, thô the Town of Newenden was afterwards built where it ſtood in the Reign of Edward the I.

But news being carried into Germany, of the good ſucceſs of the Saxons, it gave occaſion for new Commanders, together with their Armies to come over hither to try their Fortunes; and thus Five Years after began the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons.

Anno Dom. CCCCXCV.

For now Two Commanders, viz. Cerdic, and Cynric his Son, landing in Britain, with Five Ships at a place, called Cerdiciſora, (i. e. Cerdic's Shore) the ſame day fought with the Britains: this Cerdic was the Tenth in deſcent from Woden; His pedegree (which is needleſs here to be recited) I have referred to another place; but in Six Years after their coming, he and his Sons conquered all the Country of the Weſt Saxons: This Cerdic reigned Twenty Five Years; to ~~his Son Cynric whom ſucceeded, him.~~ leaving the Kingdom to his Son Cynric, who succeeded him.

Then follows, in the Saxon Annals, the whole Succeſſion of theſe Kings as far as K. Edward (called the Martyr,) Son of Edgar, which I have omitted, becauſe it ſerves for no other uſe, but to let us ſee about what time theſe Annals were drawn into the form we now have them; but to return to the Hiſtory, H. Huntington further informs us, that the ſame day in which Cerdic landed, there aſſembled a great multitude of Britains to oppoſe him; the Saxons ſtanding in Battel array before their Ships, the Britains boldly aſſaulted them, but were forced to return without any great Execution, becauſe the Saxons could not be over come, though they fought till Night parted them; whereupon the Britains finding the Saxons too ſtrong to be dealt with, were forced to retreat, it proving a drawn Battel; but after this, Cerdic and his Son ſeiſed all the Countries upon the Sea Coaſt, though not without divers Battels.

Anno Dom. DI.

But about Six Years after came over to their aſſiſtance, Porta with his Two Sons Bleda and Megla, who landed in Britain with two Ships at a place, which (from him) is ſtill called Portſmouth: Here as ſoon as they landed, they ſlew a Young Britiſh Prince, or Commander, who (as H. Huntington relates) being then Governour of this Province, advancing with a great multitude, without any Order they all periſhed in the twinckling of an Eye, ſo that Port and his Sons obtained a great Victory; but ~~in Anno Dom. 500.~~

Aurelius Ambroſius King of the Britains, is ſaid by the Welſh Chronicles to have dyed this year, Being poyſoned as (Geoffery relates) by the procurement of Paſcent, Son to Vortigern, who had before rebelled againſt him; Thô who ſucceeded him is uncertain: for as to his ſuppoſed Brother Uther Pendragon, whom Geoffery of Monmouth would here bring in, he is looked upon even by the Britiſh Antiquaries, as a mere imaginary King of his own; Therefore this muſt be owned for the moſt obſcure time of all the Welſh Hiſtory; but this is certain, that for about the ſpace of Seven Years, there is no mention made of any Wars between the Saxons and the Britains, until

Anno Dom. DVIII.

Cerdic and Cynric ſlew the great Britiſh King, Natanleod or Nazaleod, together with 5000 Men, from which time that Province is called Natanleage, as far as Cerdicsford; but H. Huntington is more particular in this War, and tells us, That this Natanleod was the greateſt and moſt powerful King of the Britains; who having gathered together his whole Forces, Cerdic and his Son were fain to ſend for aid to Æſc King of Kent, and Ælla King of the South Saxons, as alſo from Port (who came lately over) and that before the Battel, the Saxon Army was divided into two bodies, whereof Cerdic Commanded the one, and his Son Cynric the other; that the Battle being begun, King Nazaleod, ſeeing the Saxons Right Wing to be the ſtrongeſt, fell upon it with all his Forces, and immediately routed it; whereupon Cerdic being put to flight, there happned a great ſlaughter on that ſide, which, when it was perceived by his Son Cynric from the Left Wing, he ruſhed upon the backs of the purſuers: So that the Battle being again renewed, King Nazaleod was Slain, and his Army totally defeated, whereby the Saxons obtaining a great Victory, remain'd undiſturbed for a long time, and then came to them ſome Years after many Valiant aſſiſtants out of Germany.

But to make ſome Reflections upon this Story, before we proceed further, it is worth our enquiry, who this Nazaleod was; ſome think him to be Ambroſius above mentioned, but others take him for his pretended Brother Uther Pendragon, whil'ſt others again ſuppoſe him not to be any King at all, but only the General of the King of the Britains, thô what King that was, remains as uncertain, and ſince it is ſo much in the dark, I ſhall not undertake to determine it.

It is alſo as uncertain who ~~new~~ ſucceeded this Nazaleod; moſt of the * Welſh Annals here leave an inter-regnum of about Six Years, and do not begin the Reign of K. Arthur, till the Year 514, or 515. So likewiſe, whether he was ſole King of the Britains is much queſtioned; ſince ſome ancient Manuſcripts, Welſh Chronicles and Poems,* make him to have been only King of Cornwall. As to his Father, Arch-biſhop Uſher very well conjectures, that this Uther, who is ſaid to have been his Father, was no other than Nazaleod above mentioned; who for his great Actions was called in Welſh, Uther, which ſignifies as much as Wonderful or Terrible; and thus (as Nennius tells us) Artur (whoſe name ſignifies in Welſh an horrible bear) was alſo called Mabuter, that is a horrible Son, becauſe in his Childhood he was very cruel, or rather becauſe he was the Son of this Nazaleod, Sirnamed Uther: out of which Geoffery of Monmouth forged the Name of Uter Pendragon; if this could be proved, as it is an ingenious conjecture of the learned Lord Primate, it would go a great way to clear the Britiſh Hiſtory of theſe obſcure times: But ſince we are now treating of King Arthur, and that it is certain he gained many conſiderable Victories over the Saxons, thô the particular Years are not ſet down by Nennius, or any other Author; I ſhall here ſet them down altogether as they are found in Nennius; his firſt Battle was fought near the Mouth of the River, which is called Glein or Gleni (which is ſuppoſed by ſome to have been in Devonſhire, but by others (and that more likely) to have been Glein in Lincolnſhire): the Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth Battels were near another River called Duglas, which is in the Country of Lin or Linnis, (by ſome ſuppoſed to be the River Dug or Due, in Lincoln-ſhire, but others place it in Lancaſhire, where there is a River called Dugles near Wigan;) the Sixth Battel was by a River called Baſſas (which is ſuppoſed to run by Boſton in Lincoln-ſhire) the Eighth Battel was near the Caſtle of Gunion or Guinion, in which Arthur carried the Picture of Chriſt's Croſs, and of the Virgin Mary upon his back, or (~~as~~ according to Mat. Weſtminſter) has it painted on his Target; and the Pagans were that day put to flight, and many of them ſlain, ſo that they received a very great overthrow, the Ninth Battel was fought near the City of Legions, that is in the Britiſh Tongue Kaer-Leon, ~~(now Cheſter~~;) the Tenth was near a River called Ribroit or Arderic; the Eleventh was upon the Mountain, which is called Agned Cath Reginian (which is ſome place in Somerſet-ſhire, but by Humphrey Lloyd it is ſuppoſed to have been Edinburgh;) H. Huntington confeſſes theſe places to be unknown in his time, and therefore can be only gueſſed at in ours: As for the Twelfth Battel, ſince the certain time of it is fixed, we ſhall ſpeak of that by and by: but the learned Dr. Gale (to whom we are beholding for this laſt Edition of Gildas, and Nennius printed at Oxon, as alſo for the various readings, and Notes at the end of him) ſuppoſes that all the Battels here reckoned up, were performed in the ſpace of Forty Years, aforegoing, and althô they may be here attributed to King Arthur, yet might be fought under Vortigern, Ambroſius and others; but that ſome of theſe Battles were really fought by King Arthur, againſt the Saxons, is acknowledged by all our Engliſh Writers; and Ranulph Higden in ~~his Polychronicon expreſly~~ relates, that it is found in ſome ancient Chronicles, that K. Cerdic fighting often with Arthur, thô he were overcome, yet ſtill came on again more fiercely; until Arthur being quite wearied out, after the Six and Twentieth Year of Cerdic's coming over, gave him up Hampſhire and Somerſetſhire; which Countries he then called Weſt-Sexe: And Thomas Rudburne, in his greater Chronicle about this time we now treat of, relates, That Cerdic fought oftentimes with King Arthur, who being at laſt weary of War, made a League with Cerdic, who thereupon granted to the Corniſh-men to enjoy the Chriſtian Religion under a Yearly Tribute; which is likely enough to be true, ſuppoſing, as we have already ſaid, that he was only King of Cornwal, and which ſhews this Prince not to have been ſuch a mighty Monarch, as Geoffery of Monmouth would make him. Which is likewiſe confeſſed by the Welſh Hiſtorian Caradoc of Lancarvan, in his Life of Gildas; where he relates, That Glaſtenbury was in Gildas his time beſieged by King Arthur with a great Army out of Cornwal and Devonſhire, becauſe Queen Gueniver, his Wife had been raviſh'd from him by Melvas, who then Reigned in Somerſetſhire, and that ſhe was there kept by him becauſe of the Strength of that Place; whereupon King Arthur raiſing a great Army out of Cornwal and Devonſhire, marched to take the Town, when the Abbot of Glaſtenbury accompanied with Gildas went between the two Armies, and perſwaded Melvas ~~his King~~ to reſtore the raviſh'd Wife; which being done, both Kings were reconciled: Which plainly ſhews this Arthur to have been but of ſmall Power, as well as Reputation, who could thus tamely ſwallow ſuch an Affront. But to return to the Saxon Annals, which relate, [That Stufe and Withgar (Nephews to King Cerdic) arrived in Britain with three Ships at the Port called Cerdics-Ora, and fighting againſt the Britains, put them to flight. H. Huntington makes a long Deſcription of this Battel, which, ſince it is not much to the purpoſe, poſe, I omit, only he tells us, That the Britiſh Army was drawn up on a Hill ſide, as alſo in the Valley; which at firſt put the Saxons in much fear, till recovering themſelves, they put them all to the Rout. Under this Year alſo Ranulph Higden, in Polychron, places the Death of Æſc the Son of Hengiſt, to whom ſucceeded Otta his Son, who Reigned 22 Years, without any thing related of him, either in the Saxon Annals, or any other Hiſtory.

About this time alſo, (thô without aſſigning the Year,) the ſame Author places the Death of Ælla King of the South-Saxons, who had all the Kings and chief Men in Britain under his Command, to whom ſucceeded his Son Cyſſa; but in a ſhort time, his Poſterity (whoſe Names are no where mentioned) grew weaker and weaker, till they became ſubject to other Kings.

This Year Cerdic and Cynric took upon them the Title of Kings of the Weſt-Saxons, and the ſame Year fought againſt the Britains at a place called Cerdice's-Ford, (now Charford in Hampſhire,) from which time the Royal Race of the Saxon Kings have reigned there; and the ſame Year the Emperour Juſtin the Elder began to reign.

It ſeems King Cerdic was hitherto very modeſt, for tho he had now been a Conquerour for 24 Years, yet did he never take upon him the Title of King till now, when he had gained a very large Territory, and his Affairs were well eſtabliſhed by this great Victory at Cerdice's-Ford; but the Time when this Kingdom began is the more obſervable, becauſe at laſt it conquered all the other ſix Saxon Kingdoms, and ſo obtained the ſole Command of all England; ſo that (ſays H. Huntingdon) the Times of all other Kingdoms being applied to theſe Kings, may be by them the better diſtinguiſhed.

In this Year, as all the beſt Britiſh Manuſcripts, as well as printed Chronicles, relate, was fought the great Battel of Badon-Hill, (which is ~~ſuppoſed~~ to be the ſame with Baneſdown near Bathe,) where the Britiſh Writers ſuppoſe King Arthur to have Commanded in Perſon; thô divers of our Authors make him to have been only General to Aurelius Ambroſius, which is not at all likely; ſince according to the beſt Britiſh Accounts Aurelius died above 20 Years before this Battel, This Nennius makes to be the twelfth Battel he had fought with the Saxons; yet ſince Mr. Milton, as well as others, have been pleaſed to queſtion, whether there was ever any ſuch King who Reigned in Britain, it were not amiſs if we did a little clear and eſtabliſh that Point before we proceed any further, ſince ſo great and remarkable a part of the Hiſtory of the Britiſh Kings depends upon it. The Objections that are made againſt Arthur's being a King in Britain are theſe: Firſt, That Gildas makes no mention of him. Secondly, That he is not ſo much as mentioned by any ancient Britiſh Hiſtorian, except Nennius, who lived near 300 Years after, and whom all grant to have been a very credulous, trivial Writer, and to have vented a great many Fables. Thirdly, That thô William of Malmesbury and H. Huntington both make mention of this Arthur, and his Victories over the Saxons, yet that the latter took all he has written concerning him from Nennius, as the former did either from him, or elſe from ſome Monkiſh Legends in the Abby of Glaſtenbury; and that he knew no more of this Arthur above 500 Years ago, when he wrote his Hiſtory, than we do at this day. Laſtly, That the pretended Hiſtory of Geoffery of Monmouth hath made ſuch incredible Romances concerning

this Prince's Actions and Conqueſts, not only in Britain, but in France, Scotland, Ireland, Norway, and other Countries, as are ſufficient to ſhock the Credit of his whole Hiſtory: It being a likely matter, that he, who could not maintain his own Country, ſhould have Forces and Leiſure ſufficient to conquer the Kingdoms of ſo many Foreign Princes.

To each of which Objections we ſhall return theſe Anſwers. That in the firſt place, as to Gildas his not mentioning him, it is at the beſt but a Negative Argument, ſince it is evident that he did not deſign any exact Hiſtory of the Affairs of his Country, but only to give a ſhort Account of the Cauſes of the Ruine of it by the Scots, Picts, and Saxons, the chief of which he aſcribes to GOD's Vengeance upon the Britains for their great Wickedneſs, and corruption of Manners; nor does he mention any Kings or Commanders of thoſe Times, except Vortigern, and Aurelius Ambroſius. As for Nennius, thô what is objected againſt him be true, yet ſince he lived near 300 Years after Arthur's Death, (as appears by the Preface to his Hiſtory,) it is highly probable he ſet down what he there wrote, if not from ſome other more ancient Writers, yet at the leaſt from the general Tradition of his Country-men at that time, who can never be ſuppoſed to have been able to forge this whole Story of K. Arthur, and the Battles he fought; and thô it be true, that the Saxon Annals make no mention of this King, yet if theſe were alſo written from Traditions long after theſe Things were done, being not put into the Form we now have them till long after the Saxons became Chriſtians, it is no wonder if there be no mention made of him; eſpecially ſince they could not do it without Recording to Poſterity the many Defeats he gave them; but notwithſtanding this, divers of our beſt and moſt ancient Engliſh Hiſtorians, as Radulphus de Diceto, ~~and Thomas Rudburn~~, do & others mention King Cerdic's fighting divers Battles with King Arthur. But as for William of Malmesbury and H. Huntington, thô it might be true, they neither of them knew any thing of them, but what they had from Nennius, or the Legends of Glaſtenbury; yet are not the ancient Regiſters of that Monaſtery to be wholly ſlighted as falſe, ſince King Arthur was there buried: But William of Malmesbury, in his Book of the Antiquities of that Church, makes King Arthur to have begun his Reign over the Britains in the Tenth Year of King Cerdic, in which he is alſo followed by Ran. Higden in Polychronicon, and Joh. Tinmuth in his Golden Hiſtory; and ies thô the Tomb of King Arthur was not found in the time of William of Malmesbury, yet was it ſome Years after diſcovered, about the end of the Reign of Henry the Second, as Giraldus Cambrenſis relates at large, both in his Book De Inſtitutione Principis, and in his Speculo Eccleſiaſtico; where he gives a large Account of the manner of finding his Coffin, (which was made out of a ſolid Oak,) as alſo of the largeneſs of his Bones which he ſaw and handled; together with an Inſcription upon a Leaden Croſs of about a Foot long, fixed to the lower ſide of a broad Stone laid three Foot above the Coffin, on which was inſcribed this Epitaph, Hic jacet ſepultus inclytus Rex Arthurus in Inſula Aualonia; which Croſs being preſerved in the Monaſtery of Glaſtenbury till Leland's time, he ſaw and took a Copy of it, and is the very Inſcription which Mr. Camden hath given us the Draught of in his Britannia.

But as for the laſt Objection, thô it be true what William of Malmesbury very well obſerves, that the Britains had vented a great many Fables of him, yet he ſtill acknowledges him to have been a Prince more worthy to be celebrated in true Hiſtories, than Romances; and thô it muſt be confeſſed, that the Stories the Welſh had then made of him, encouraged Geoffery of Monmouth to write thoſe incredible Fables of his Conqueſts; yet does it not therefore follow, that all that is written of him muſt be Lies; ſince a true Hiſtory may be corrupted, and yet the Subſtance of it remain true. But whoever deſires to ſee more in juſtification of the Hiſtory of King Arthur, how much of it is true, and what moſt likely to be falſe, may, if they pleaſe, conſult Dr. Stillingfleet's Antiquities of the Britiſh Churches. King Arthur died this Year, (as all the Britiſh Writers agree,) but as for the manner of his Death, it is uncertain. The Britiſh Chronicles ſuppoſe him to have been ſlain in a Fight at Camala againſt his own Nephew Mordred, who had uſurped the Crown in his abſence. It is ~~more~~ uncertain who ſucceeded him; Geoffery of Monmouth makes Arthur at his Death to have bequeath'd the Crown to one Conſtantine his Couſin, Son of Cador Duke of Cornwal, whom he makes to have fought ſeveral times with the Sons of Mordred, that he ſlew them, and after 4 Years Reign died: But divers of the ancienteſt Britiſh Chronicles we have ſeen make no mention of this Conſtantine, but leave here an Inter-regnum of near 11 Years. Let us now look back to the Britiſh Affairs: King Conſtantine being ſuppoſed by Geoffery to have died about this time, he makes his Nephew Aurelius Conan to have ſucceeded him, who Reigning about two Years, was followed by Vortipore; who alſo dying four Years after, was ſucceeded by Malgo, (called by Gildas, Malgoclunus,) and is ſuppoſed to be the ſame with Maelgwn Guined, (ſo often mentioned in the Welſh Annals;) ſo that according to Geoffery, theſe three Princes reigned ſucceſſively after one another, which can by no means be reconciled with Gildas's Epiſtle, who ſpeaks to all of them, as living and reigning at one and the ſame time; ſo that it is moſt likely that Malgo, or Malgocunus, was only King of North-Wales, or elſe of the Northern Parts of Britain, (as ſome of the Welſh Chronicles affirm;) but that Vortipore was King of that part of South-Wales called Demetia, Gildas himſelf relates, whilſt Aurelius Conan ruled in Powis Land, or ſome other Southern Province, (as Arch-Biſhop Uſher with preat probability ſuppoſes;) but Gildas's Epiſtle, wherein he ſo ſharply inveighs againſt all theſe Britiſh Kings above-mentioned, is to this effect.

Anno Dom. DXLIV.

" Britain has Kings, yet Tyrants; it has Judges, but preying upon, " and oppreſſing the Innocent; their Kings have Wives of their own, yet " are Whoremongers; often Swearing, yet as often Perjuring themſelves; " often making Wars, but thoſe unjuſt, or Civil Ones; proſecuting " Thieves, yet having the greateſt near them, even at their own Tables; " ſitting in the Seat of Juſtice, yet not obſerving the Rules of right " Judgment; deſpiſing the Innocent and Peaceable, and countenancing " the Bloody and Adulterous; keeping Men in Priſon, whom they have " put there rather out of Malice, than Deſert. And then proceeds particularly to all the Kings then reigning, beginning with Conſtantine, whom he calls The Tyrannical Whelp of an impure Damonian Lioneſs; and accuſes him this very Year, in which he wrote that Letter, to have been guilty of murdering two innocent Youths of Royal Blood at the very Altar, and under the Cope of the holy Abbot: (Theſe are ſuppoſed to have been the two Sons of Mordred.) He likewiſe accuſes this Prince, that being polluted with frequent Adulteries, he had, contrary to Chriſt's Precept, put away his own Wife.

In the next place, applying himſelf to Aurelius Conan, he accuſes him of the like, if not worſe Parricides, beſides Fornications and Adulteries; and that hateing the Peace of his Country, he had out of deſire of Prey fomented Civil Wars.

In the third place he comes to Vortipore, whom he calls The wicked Son of a good Father, and Tyrant of the Demetæ, (that is, South-Welſhmen) and whom he accuſes of the like Faults; and that thô his Head were then grey, yet he was guilty of Adultery, his Wife being put away; him he alſo adviſes to Repentance.

Next he proceeds to Cuneglaſus, (who is ſuppoſed by ſome Antiquaries to have been King of the Northern or Cambrian Britains;) but this is to be obſerved, that Geoffery of Monmouth takes no notice of him; which ſhews, that either he never ſaw this Copy of Gildas, or elſe, if he did, knew not where to place this Prince; having already made as many Kings to ſucceed each other, as the Time he had to beſtow upon them would allow: But whoever he was, Gildas accuſes him for fighting both againſt GOD and Men; againſt Men, by taking Arms againſt his own Country-men; againſt God, by infinite Wickedneſs; and beſides his other Faults, that having put away his own Wiſe, he had married her Couſin who had vowed perpetual Chaſtity.

Then he concludes with a ſharp Reproof of Maglocunus, whom he calls the Iſland Dragon, and the Expeller of many other Tyrants; he alſo accuſes him of Sodomy, asking him, Why, being taller in Stature, and greater in Power than all the reſt of the Princes in Britain, he had made himſelf, in ſtead of being better, far worſe than they? Upbraiding him, that in his Youth he had murdered the King his Uncle, with many of his Men. After many other Reproofs, threatens him with ſpeedy Deſtruction unleſs he repent.

This is the Subſtance of Gildas's Reproof to the Britiſh Princes; from which all that we can gather is, Firſt, that there were no leſs than five Kings at this time in Britain, thô by what Means or Title they came to the Crown is uncertain; more than that it ſeems probable, ſome of theſe Princes here mentioned were deſcended from Aurelius Ambroſius; thô (as Gildas obſerves) highly degenerated from the Virtue of their Anceſtors: But what great Actions theſe Kings did during their Reigns, or what good Qualities they were indued with, is not known, ſo that there is but a ſlender Account of them in the Rolls of Fame; which may make us ſuſpect they were guilty of but very few good Qualities, becauſe we here find a large Catalogue of their bad Ones. Who ſucceeded each of theſe Kings in their diſtinct Territories, the moſt authentick Britiſh Chronicles do not mention * and therefore, thô Geoffery makes one Careticus to have now governed that part of Britain which was ſtill left unconquered by the Saxons, and whom he will have to ſucceed Malgo; and that thereupon the Saxons ſent for one Gormund an African King with a great Army of his Countrymen, who making a League with the Saxons, ſet upon Careticus, and beſieged him in the City of Circeſter, and taking and burning it, afterwards fought with Careticus, and forced him to flie beyond the Mountains of Wales: Yet ſince neither in our Saxon Annals, nor any other good Hiſtorian, there is any thing to be found concerning theſe Kings, or any Africans that ever invaded Britain, it is to be looked upon as no better ~~than one of the bold Inventions of this Author~~.

Shall theſe amend thee, who* (as the Prophet ſays) weary themſelves in commiting Iniquity? Shalt thou ſee with their Eyes, which regard only thoſe ways that lead to Hell; leave them rather, (as bids our Saviour), leaſt ye fall both blindfold into the ſame Perdition. But are all thus? Perhaps not all, or not ſo groſly: But what did it avail Eli, to be himſelf blameleſs, whil'ſt he connived at his Sons, that were wicked? Who of theſe hath been envied for his better Life? Who of them have hated to conſort with ſuch, or withſtood their entring into the Miniſtry, or zealouſly endeavoured their caſting out? This is the Senſe of what he there ſays, it being not only tedious, but impoſſible to Tranſlate Verbatim, ſo barbarous and obſcure a Writer, thô otherwiſe he ſeems to have been a Man of great Wit, and ardent Piety, above what that Age would admit of: But hence we may learn what the State of the Government and Religion among the Britains was in that long Calm of Peace, which the Victory at Badon Hill had produced.

Alſo at the end of his Hiſtory, he gives a farther account of the ſad ſtate of Affairs, and great corruption of Manners in thoſe Times;

And complains, “That the Cities of his Country were not then inhabited, as before, but lay ruined and deſerted; for though Foreign Wars were ceaſed for a time, yet ſo were not the Civil, ſo that there did ſtill remain upon the face of the Iſland evident marks of ſo miſerable a deſtruction; but that alſo as long as the memory of that unlooked for aſſiſtance laſted, their Kings, as well as their Biſhops and Prieſts did pretty well obſerve due Orders; but thoſe deceaſing, as the next Generation ſucceeded, which had not ſeen the former Calamities, and were only ſenſible of the preſent Proſperity, all the Principles of Truth and Juſtice were totally ſhaken and ſubverted: So that ſcarce any footſteps remained of them in all the Orders and Degrees of Men above mentioned, except ſome, and thoſe but few, very few in reſpect of thoſe who go to Hell; ſo that although they are the only true Sons of our Mother the Church, yet by reaſon of the ſmallneſs of their number, ſhe can ſcarce take any notice of them, albeit they lye in her very Boſome.

This much may ſuffice to give an account, as well of this Epiſtle of Gildas, as of his Hiſtory, which Caradoc of Lancarvon in his Legendary Life of this Author ſuppoſes to have been writ whil'ſt he lived at Glaſtenbury. * But theſe paſſages, I thought good to Tranſcribe from him, as not unuſeful to be inſerted in theſe Annals; not out of any deſire to rip up, or expoſe the faults of the ancient Britiſh Clergy or Nation, much leſs to inſult over their Calamities; but rather to ſerve as a warning to us, who live in this looſe and corrupt Age, that we may avoid the like Sins, leſt we provoke God to ſend the like Judgments upon us: But to return to the Saxon Chronicle;

[This Year began the Northumbrian Kingdom, or in the Words of our Annals; Ida began to Reign, from whom is derived the Royal Family of the Northumbrian Kings; the Saxon Annals here give us a long pedegree of this Ida, who reigned Twelve Years, and built Bebbanburgh (now Bamborough Caſtle in Northumberland) which was at firſt encompaſſed only with a Trench, and afterwards with a Wall.

H. Huntington ſays, This Prince was always in War, and Will. of Malmesbury, and Mat. Weſtminſter, make him to have had Twelve Sons partly by Wives, and partly by Concubines: And the latter alſo tells us that he together with his Sons came into Britain, and landed at Flensburgh with Forty Ships.

Will. Malm. lib. 1. cap. 3.

But though Ida was the firſt that took upon him the Title of King, yet there were Princes of the Saxons, in that Country many Years before; for the ſame Authors tell us, That Hengiſt had long before ſent his Brother Ottha, and his Son Ebuſa, Men of great Experience in War, to Conquer the North Parts of Britain; who purſuing his directions, met with a ſucceſs anſwerable to their endeavours; for fighting often times with the Natives of the Country, and conquering all thoſe who indeavoured to reſiſt them, they received the reſt into their Protection, and ſo enjoyed the fruits of Peace. But though they had by their own induſtry, as well as the conſent of their Subjects, gained ſome Power in thoſe Parts; yet did they never till now take upon them the Title of Kings, the ſame moderation deſcending alſo to their Poſterity: So that for near an Hundred Years, the Princes, Earls, ~~or Dukes~~ of Northumberland lived like Vaſſals, under the Protection of the Kings of Kent. But this Nation being naturally haughty, in the Year above recited, (that is Sixty Years after the Death of Hengiſt) this Principality was changed into a Kingdom, Ida firſt reigning there; who without doubt was a very gallant Man, being then in the prime of his Youth; but whether he enjoyed that Principality in his own Right, or whether he had it by Election, our Author will not take upon him to determine, becauſe the Truth was very obſcure; only it was certain, that thô he was deſcended of an Ancient and Royal Family, yet by his Great and Noble Qualities, he added much to the greatneſs of his Birth, and that being invincible in War, he tempered the Severity of Kingly Majeſty with his own natural affability. After Five Years, Cynric fought againſt the Britains, at a place which is called Searebyrig (i. e. Old Sarum) and put the Britains to flight; then follows a Repetition of his Pedigree, as far as King Ethelbert, who was the firſt Chriſtian King; which ſhews that theſe Annals were continued by ſeveral hands, at ſeveral times long after thoſe Kings lived.]

About this time, ſome Britiſh Chronicles place the Death of Malgoclunus, or Mailgwn Gwined, thô Mr. R. Vaughan a Learned Welſh Antiquary would rather underſtand this of his Civil than Natural Death; that is, to his reſigning the Crown, and profeſſing himſelf a Monk, as Gildas in his Epiſtle ſaith he did; For it is certain he lived and reigned long after; and he is in the Welſh Annals reckoned as the Supreme, or ſole King of the Britains; being, (as it ſeems) after the breach of this Vow, Choſen by the Welſh Nobility and People to that Dignity, ſome Years after: So that divers of the Welſh Chronologers, begin his Reign over all Wales and Cumberland from this very Year, thô Humphrey Lluyd in his Deſcription of Britain, out of an ancient Britiſh Law-Book, begins it about the Year 560, which is moſt likely. He is ſaid by John Roſſe, in his Hiſtory, to have built Bangor near the River Menai, where now is an Epiſcopal See. But to return to our Saxon Annals,

Sax. Ann. Ann. DLVI.

'This Year Cynric, and Ceawlin his Son, fought a Battle againſt the Britains at Berinbyrig, (now Banbury in Oxfordſhire,) and put them to flight. H. Huntington is very large in the Deſcription of this Battle, relating, That the Britains having gathered together all their Forces to revenge the Loſſes they had received for five Years aforegoing, marched as far as Beranbury, where they drew up their Men in nine Diviſions; but the Saxons being drawn up in one great Body, and ſetting boldly upon them, having broken their Lances, finiſhed the Victory with their Swords, which remained doubtful till night drew on. Some Years after this, (viz.)

Anno Dom. DLX.

'Ceawlin began alſo to reign over the Weſt-Saxons in the room of Cynric his Father; the ſame Year Ida dying, Ælla began to reign over the Northumbers. His Pedigree likewiſe follows, thô needleſs to be inſerted; but it terminates in Woden, thô from another Anceſtor than Ida's.

Sax. An.

'But you are here to obſerve, That now the Northumbrian Kingdom became divided into two, for this Ælla reigned over the Kingdom of Deira, while Adda, the eldeſt Son of Ida, reigned at the ſame time over the Bernicians, (as Florence of Worceſter teſtifies.)

'This Year alſo Ethelbert ſucceeded in the Kingdom of Kent, which he held for 53 Years. In his time Pope Gregory ſent us Baptiſm, (that is, made the Engliſh Saxons Chriſtians,) in the 32d Year of this King's Reign.

Anno Dom. DLXV.

This Year (as Bede, and alſo the Saxon Annals relate,) Columba the Prieſt or Presbyter came out of Ireland, (which in his Epitome he alſo calls Scotland,) to preach the Word of GOD to the Northern Picts, that is, thoſe that were divided from the Southern by a large Tract of high Mountains; for the Southern Picts had been already converted from Idolatry to the Chriſtian Faith by Nynias, a Reverend Biſhop of the Britiſh Nation, (as hath been already declared.) But Columba came into Britain in the 9th Year of the Reign of Bridius the Son of Meiloch King of the Picts, and having converted the ſaid Nation to the Chriſtian Faith, received the Iſland [of Hy], therein to build a Monaſtery. Then Bede, after giving us a ſhort Deſcription of this Iſland and Monaſtery, has this remarkable Paſſage, viz. "But this Iſland (viz. Hy,) is always "wont to have for its Governour the Abbot, ~~or~~ a Presbyter, to whoſe Authority all the Province, and even the Biſhops themſelves, after an unuſual Order, ought to be ſubject, according to the Example of their firſt Teacher, who was never a Biſhop, but a Monk. But the Saxon Chronicle is more expreſs, and ſays, "That there muſt be always in Hy an Abbot, and not a Biſhop, and that all the Biſhops of Scotland ought to be ſubject to him.

Lib. 3. c. 4.

Ibid.

From the above-mentioned Paſſage in Bede, ſome Writers have inferr'd, That Biſhops were not then thought ſo neceſſary, ſince the Church of Scotland was able to ſubſiſt ſo long without them; and the Abbot of Hy, without being ordained Biſhop, exerciſed Epiſcopal Authority over thoſe that were Biſhops; to which, Arch-Biſhop Uſher in his before-cited Work, De Britan. Eccleſ. Antiquit. anſwers, That this Authority of the Abbots of Hy, their exerciſing Juriſdiction over the Biſhops of Scotland, was a Supe-

Superiority of meer Juriſdiction, and not of Order; and he there cites certain ancient Annals of Ulſter, to prove, That this little Iſland had always a Biſhop reſiding in it, either in or near that Monaſtery: Which is alſo further enforced in the Learned Biſhop Lloyd's Hiſtorical Account of Church Government, &c. where he brings ſeveral Authorities to prove, that this Columba received his Orders from Finean Biſhop of Meath in Ireland, before ever he came from thence; and that if he refuſed being made a Biſhop, it was out of a pure Monkiſh Humility, having from his Youth devoted himſelf to a Monaſtic Life; but that he himſelf did own the Order of a Biſhop to be above that of a Presbyter, is urged from Adamannus his Succeſſor, who wrote his Life; particularly mentioning Columba's refuſing to break the Bread to be received at the Communion, together with a concealed Biſhop, (as two Prieſts uſed to do in their way of Conſecration,) but would needs make him break it alone, (as a Biſhop ought to do,) asking him, Why he had endeavoured to conceal himſelf, that they might give him due Veneration? Which Words of Columba a Presbyter to a Biſhop, are ſuppoſed ſufficiently to ſhew, that he acknowledged the Epiſcopal Order ſuperiour to his own; and that the Scots ever acknowledged, that Biſhops were neceſſary for the Ordaining of others in the Miniſtery, the ſaid Biſhop further urges from Bede, who there tells us, "There was a Biſhop of all that Province; as "alſo from another place in the ſaid Author, where he relates, That "when King Oſwald becoming a Chriſtian, deſired to have a Biſhop from "Hy, to plant a Church among his Northumbrians; Aidan was ſent to "him, having firſt received the Degree of a Biſhop, in the time when "Segenius, Abbot and Prieſt, was over that Monaſtery; and alſo, that "after he came into Northumberland, he choſe the Place for his Epiſcopal See in the Iſle of Lindisfarn, where he was with his Clergy; and "there he was Abbot with his Monks, who all belong to the Care of "the Biſhop, where he was alſo ſucceeded by divers other Biſhops; till "that Church being deſtroyed by the Danes, the Biſhop's See was removed to Durham. I need ſay no more upon this Subject, but ſhall refer the Reader to the ſaid Learned Biſhop's Diſſertation, to prove, that no other Church-Government, but Epiſcopal, was ever ſetled amongſt the Scots, Picts, or Saxons, upon their Converſion to Chriſtianity. But that we may return again to our Saxon Annals.

'Adda King of Bernicia dying this Year, (as Florence of Worceſter and 'Matthew of Weſtminſter relate) one Glappa reigned in his ſtead two Years; 'but who he was, or how deſcended, theſe Authors do not tell us.

The ſame Year died Maelgwn Guineth King of the Britains, after five Years Reign over all that part of Britain that was left them: This is according to the account of that Learned Antiquary Mr. Robert Vaughan; thô Mat. of Weſtminſter, Dr. Powell, and Sir John Price, make him to have began his Reign long after, viz. the former of theſe in 581, and the latter in 590; both which Opinions the ſaid Mr. Vaughan Learnedly confutes ~~(in a Manuſcript I have now in my poſſeſſion)~~ [illegible] but who ſucceeded Maelgwn Guineth as King of all the Britains, ſince the Welſh Annals are ſilent, I ſhall be ſo too; for as to thoſe Succeſſors which Geoffery hath given him, I have already ſaid ſufficient to deſtroy his Credit in this matter; and Will. of Newberie's Cenſure of him is not leſs ſharp than true: "That concerning the Succeſſors of Arthur, he does not lie with leſs "Impudence, when he gives them the Monarchy of all Britain, even to "the 7th Generation. *

‘The next year Ceawlin, and Cutha his Brother, beginning a Civil War, fought with King Ethelbert, and drove him back into Kent, and killed two of his Commanders, Oſlac and Cnebba, at Wibbendon, (now Wimbledon in Surrey.) This King Ethelbert (as Will. of Malmesbury obſerves) was in the beginning of his Reign a Scorn to the Neighbouring Princes; for being beaten in one or two Battels, he could ſcarce defend his own Territories: But when in his riper Years he learned more Experience in War, in a ſhort time he brought under his Subjection all the Nations of the Engliſh-Saxons, except the Northumbrians; and that he might alſo gain the Friendſhip of Foreigners, he became allied to the King of the Franks by the Marriage of Bertha his Daughter. But of this King we hear no more for many years, till his Converſion to the Chriſtian Faith.

Anno Dom. DLXIX.

Glappa King of Bernicia dying, Theodwulf ſucceeded him for one year. But then he alſo deceaſing, Anno Dom. DLXX.

Freothwulf reigned after him for ſeven or eight years more. We are beholding for the Succeſſion of theſe two Kings, to Florence of Worceſter and Rog. Hoveden, being omitted by all other Authors; they are alſo more exact in diſtinguiſhing this Kingdom from that of Deira, moſt of the reſt confounding them together.

Cuthwulf the Brother of Ceawlin (as it is in H. Huntington) fought againſt the Britains at Bedicanford (now Bedford), and took four Towns, *viz. About this time, as is ſuppoſed, (for the Year is not ſet down in the Saxon Annals, nor any other Hiſtorian) began the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles under Uffa (the Eighth from Woden) tho it ſeems there were before him divers other petty Saxon Princes, who had invaded and fixed themſelves in the Countries we now call Norfolk and Suffolk; for in one Copy of Matth. of Weſtminſter which Mr. Twine had ſeen, (tho it be not found in our printed ones) he ſaith, That Anno 527. the Pagans came out of Germany and took poſſeſſion of the Countrey of the Eaſt-Angles, and tormented the Chriſtians with all ſorts of Cruelty; but it ſeems this Uffa in Strength and Policy overpowering the reſt of thoſe Petty Princes, got himſelf made ſole King, and governed with that Glory, that H. Huntingdon tells us, the Kings deſcended from him were called Uffings, though how long he reigned is uncertain, only that dying he left the Crown to Titul or Titillus his Son, of whom likewiſe nothing is recorded, and therefore Will. of Malmesbury takes no notice of theſe two Princes: The firſt he ſpeaks of is Redwald, the Tenth from Woden, whom he calls the greateſt King of the Eaſt-Angles; but ſince his Reign began after this Period, I ſhall reſerve the ſpeaking further of him to the next Book.

Anno Dom. DLXXVII.

To return to the Saxon Annals: ‘This year Ceawlin and Cuthwin his Son fought with and ſlew three Britiſh Kings, viz. Commail, Candidan, and Farinmaile, at a place which is called Deorham (now Durham) in Glouceſterſhire, and then took three Cities, Glewanceſter (now Gloceſter), Cirenceſter, and Bathonceſter, (now Bathe.)

Who theſe three Kings were, is very doubtful; ſome ſuppoſe the firſt and ſecond of them to be Cuniglaſ[illegible] and Aurelius Conan, both mentioned by Gildas; but for the third, I cannot tell what to make of him, there being no ſuch King mentioned in any of the old Britiſh Chronicles; ſo all that we can gueſs is, that he was ſome Petty Prince, whoſe Name is wholly omitted in the Welſh Annals, or elſe miſtaken in ours. From the time of this Battel, the Britains or Welſhmen (as the Engliſh call them) being driven into that rough and mountainous Countrey we now call Wales, lying beyond the Rivers of Dee and Severn, made fewer Invaſions into (what we call) England.

This year, as the Welſh Chronicle, called Triades, relates (being an Ancient Manuſcript written near 1000 years ago), the Battel of Arderydd was fought on the Borders of Scotland, between Aeddan Vradog, (i.e. the Treacherous) and Guendelew Son of Keidiaw, Britiſh Princes of the North Parts of Britain, on the one ſide; and Reiderch-hoel, (i.e. the Liberal) a Britiſh King of Cumberland, on the other ſide, and that upon a very ſlight occaſion, a Lark's-Neſt, and two Dogs. In which Battel Guendelew was ſlain, though his men fought and skirmiſh'd with the other Britains for Six Weeks to revenge his Death. After which Fight Aedan being there overcome, fled into the Iſle of Man.

The like Story is related by Hector Boethius, concerning the Battel between Ædan King of the Scots, and the Picts, upon the like occaſion; ſo that either the Scots borrowed it from the Britiſh Hiſtory, or elſe this had it from them; though the former be the moſt likely. But how this can agree with our Saxon Annals, who make Adda King of Bernicia to have died Ten Years before, I know not; one of them muſt certainly be miſtaken, ſince there was but one King of Northumberland who was called Adda.

This year, or the next, King Freothwulf dying, Theodoric the Son of Ida (according to Florence of Worceſter and Matth. Weſtminſter) ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of Bernicia, Ælla ſtill reigning in Deira. This Theodoric and his Sons (according to the Ancient Author of the Engliſh-Saxon Genealogies at the end of Nennius, lately put forth by Dr. Gale) fought with Urbgen, or Urien, King of Cumberland, and his Sons, with various Succeſs, who beſieged Theodoric in the Iſle of Medcant, (now Turne Iſland) until by the means of Morgant, a Prince of the ſame Countrey who envied his Valour, Urien was in that Expedition murthered by his own men: But the Succeſſion of theſe Kings of Northumberland is very obſcure and uncertain.

For the Author of the abovecited Genealogies makes one Freodguald to have ſucceeded this Theodoric or Deoric (as he calls him); but whether he was the ſame with Freothwulf, mentioned by Florence, is hard to determine; and after this Freodguald, who reigned ſeven years, one Huſſa is ſaid to have ſucceeded, who reigned ſeven years likewiſe; but whether in Deira or Bernicia, he does not ſay; in which he is alſo followed by Rog. Hoveden, in his Prologue to his Hiſtory; but the Succeſſion of theſe Kings having no certain Time aſſigned them, I can only ſet them down as I find them. Here is a large Gap left in the Saxon Annals, where nothing occurs further of Engliſh Affairs for ſeven years. To ſupply which, we muſt have recourſe to the Britiſh Affairs in thoſe Countries we now call Wales. Where (to ſhew you the Uncertainty of the Britiſh Chronology), tains of Wales (having been long before King of North-Wales, as the word Gwineth in the Welſh Tongue ſignifies). And Humphrey Lloyd, in his Fragment of the Deſcription of Wales, from an Ancient Book of Britiſh Laws, thus gives us the manner of his Election.

After the Saxons had obtained the Kingdom and Crown of London upon the Expulſion of the Britains, all the People of Wales met at the mouth of the River Dee to Elect a King; and thither came the men of Gwineth (or North-Wales), the men of Powis-land, the men of Dehaubarth, Glamorgan, and divers other Countries; who all elected Mael Gwineth King:

Whom Geoffry of Monmouth fables to have been King not only of all this Iſland, but alſo to have conquered Ireland, Iceland, Gothland, Norway, Denmark, and the Orcades; a ſtory ſo ridiculous, that the very telling it is a ſufficient Confutation: And all this he collects from thoſe words of Gildas, wherein he calls him the Iſland Dragon, and a driver out of many Tyrants; and becauſe to expreſs his great wickedneſs he ſays, He was drunk with the Wine of Sodom; Geoffry will needs conclude him to have been guilty of Sodomy. This Prince is ſuppoſed to have reigned as Supreme King of Wales about ſix years.

Anno Dom. DLXXXIV. Saxon. An.

Ceawlin King of the Weſt-Saxons, and Cutha, fought againſt the Britains at a place called Frethanleag (now Frethern) in Glouceſterſhire, where Cutha was ſlain; yet Ceawlin now took many Towns, with great Treaſures, and other Spoil, and ſo returned home: As H. Huntington relates, the Britains had at firſt the better, but Ceawlin having ſent for freſh Recruits, overcame the Conquerors. William of Malmesbury mentions a Son of Ceawlin's, of the ſame Name, to have been killed before his face; but either the Copy he had of theſe Annals differed from thoſe we have left us, or elſe he was no other than this Cutha here mentioned, who was his Brother.

Anno Dom. DLXXXV.

About this time began the Kingdom of the Mercians, (according to H. Huntington and Matth. of Weſtminſter) whoſe firſt King was Crida, or Creoda; this, though the laſt erected, yet was one of the largeſt of the Engliſh Saxon Kingdoms, and was alſo one of the laſt that was conquered by the Weſt-Saxons.

This Year alſo (according to the Welſh Annals) happened a great Slaughter of the Britains of the North; for now Gurgi and Predur, two Britiſh Princes, being Brothers and Twins, the Sons of Oliver Goſgard Vawr, (i. e. Oliver with the great Train) a Prince of Cumberland, fought with Ædda, or Adda, the Saxon King of Northumberland, at a place called Caergrew, where both the Brothers were ſlain, many of their men treacherouſly deſerting them the Night before the Battel.

Anno Dom. DLXXXVIII.

'This year Ælla King of Deira died [after 30 years Reign], and Athelric ſucceeded him, and reigned 5 years over all Northumberland, having (as Will. of Malmesbury relates) obtained the Kingdom in his Old Age, his Youth being ſpent in a very narrow Fortune; yet having, according to Florence of Worceſter's Account, reigned two years over Bernicia in Ælla's time. And this year alſo, according to Matth. of Weſtminſter, this Athelric (for ſo I ſuppoſe it ſhould be, and not Ethelfrid, who had not yet begun to reign) married Acca, Daughter to Ælla King of Deira, and on her got ſeven Sons, whoſe Names he there gives us.

Anno Dom.
DLXXXVIII.

Alſo this year in the Welſh Annals, as well as thoſe of Vlſter, Conſtantine is mention'd to be converted to the Lord; whom Archbiſhop Vſher underſtands to have been that wicked Conſtantine, King of Devonſhire and Cornwall, whom Gildas has before inveighed againſt, and who at this time, being now bereft of his Wife and Children, was alſo weary of his Kingdom, and therefore went privately into Ireland, and there building a Monaſtery, took upon him the Habit of a Monk; as John of Tinmouth, in his Life of St. David, relates. And this Conſtantine Hector Boethius in his * Scotiſh Hiſtory, will have to have been ſent over by a certain Iriſh Biſhop to preach the Goſpel to the Scots, and being by them martyr'd, to have been ſome Ages after canonized for a Saint: But this ſounds like a Legend, ſince the Scots had been long before converted by St. Patrick to the Chriſtian Faith.

This year there was a great and bloody Battel fought at Wodensbeorge (now called Wodensburg, a little Village in Wiltſhire) between the Britains and the Saxons, though it is not here ſaid who were the Generals on either ſide; only H Huntington tells us, that the Britains having drawn up their Army after the Roman manner, and the Saxons charging them boldly, but confuſedly, there followed a ſharp Battel, in which GOD gave the Victory to the Britains; for the Saxons being wont to have the better in all their Wars, being now grown more careleſs, were vanquiſhed, and the whole Army almoſt deſtroyed, which (as W. of Malmesbury relates) happened through the Engliſh joining with the Britains againſt him (though of what Countrey the Engliſh were, he does not tell us); ſo that Ceawlin being driven out of his Kingdom, and Ceolric Son to his Brother Cuthwalf obtaining it, reigned five years. Ceawlin being thus expell'd after 31 years Reign, was forced to take Refuge in ſome other Kingdom; but whether in this Iſland, or elſe beyond Sea, our Hiſtories are ſilent: He had been a little before the greateſt and moſt powerful of all the Engliſh-Saxon Kings, his Atchievements being a Wonder to the Engliſh, and till then a Terror to the Welſh or Britiſh.

About this time Geoffry of Monmouth makes Careticus above-menti~~oned~~ to have ſucceeded Malgo (who perhaps was the ſame with Mael Gwineth) in the Kingdom of the Britains, whom he deſcribes to have been a lover of Civil Wars, and to be hateful to God and all the Britains; ſo that the Saxons ſeeing his weakneſs, invited Gormund an African King out of Ireland, to Invade England with Six thouſand Africans, who joining with the Saxons invaded the Territories of Careticus, and beating him in many Battels, at laſt beſieged him in the City of Cirenceſter, which being taken and burnt, he again joined Battel with Careticus, and forced him to fly beyond Severne into Wales; and then Gormund deſtroying all the Neighbouring Cities, never left till he had deſtroyed the whole Iſland from Sea to Sea; and ſo for a time obtained the Supreme Dominion of the whole Kingdom.

But of theſe Kings Gareticus and Garmund, ſince not only the moſt Authentick Welſh Chronicles, but the Saxon Annals are wholly ſilent, I ſuppoſe them to have been only Romances, and invented by Geoffrey to fill up this Gap in his Britiſh Hiſtory; not that I will deny that one Gormund a Daniſh King might reign in Ireland about this time; but that he ever reigned in England, is utterly falſe, no other Hiſtorian but himſelf, and thoſe that borrow from him, making any mention of it.

Ceawlin (late King of the Weſt-Saxons) died in Baniſhment; and the ſame year died Cwichelm (his Brother), together with Cryda [King of the Mercians, to whom ſucceeded his Son Wipha or Wippa] ; and Ethelfred began alſo to reign over both the Northumbrian Kingdoms, being the Son of Ethelric the Son of Ida. This Prince did not only defend his own Territories, but alſo invaded and ſeized thoſe of others. But the third year after was very remarkable,

Anno Dom. DXCVI. Sax: An

For now Pope Gregory ſent Auguſtine into Britain with many Monks to preach the Word to the Engliſh Nation.

As for the Britiſh Affairs, we have but little more to remark ever ſince the Death of Maelgwin Gwineth, for the ſpace of 24 years; only we find in the Book of Landaffe, that about this time Tudric King of Glamorgan, who was ~~ſtill~~ Victorious, is ſaid to have exchanged his Crown for an Hermitage; till going in Aid of his Son Mouric, whom the Saxons had reduced to great extremity, taking up Arms again, he defended him againſt them at Tinterne, by the River Wye, but he himſelf received a Mortal Wound.

But about the end of this Century (as Geoffry of Monmouth relates) when the Britains could not agree for 24 years who ſhould be their Supreme Governor, at laſt they choſe Cadwan Prince of North Wales to be King of all the Britains; but the year of this Election is not ſet down by Geoffry, nor is this Prince mentioned by any other Britiſh Author or Chronicle, before he wrote. But I ſhall defer ſpeaking farther of this Prince, till I come to the next Book.

Ceolwulf began to reign over the Weſt-Saxons, who making continual Wars all his time, fought ſometimes againſt the other Engliſh-Saxons, ſometimes againſt the Britains, or elſe againſt the Picts and Scots; but (what is more remarkable) this year Auguſtine the Monk, with his Companions, arrived in Britain.

Vid. Uſſerii Britan. Eccleſ. Antiquit. cap. 5, 12, 13.

But before I conclude this Period, I cannot omit taking ſome further notice of the Civil as well as Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, in that part of Britain, now called Wales, where the Remainders of Chriſtianity in this ſide of our Iſland, were now wholly confined; Bangor in the North, and Caer-Leon upon Usk in South-Wales, being the chief Places for Learning, as well as Religion, the laſt of theſe being alſo the See of an Archbiſhop; where was likewiſe a College of Philoſophers, of which (as Alex. Elſebienſis relates) Dubritius, Archbiſhop of that City, was the Founder; who reſigning his Biſhoprick, became an Anchoret in the Iſle of Bardſey; to whom ſucceeded David (afterwards Sainted), who flouriſhed about the year 509, and is ſaid to have been Uncle by the Mother's ſide to King Arthur; he removed the Epiſcopal See from Caer-Leon to Menevia, now called St. David's, in Pembrockſhire. Nor can I paſs by ſeveral Learned and Holy Men among the Britains of this Age; as firſt, Daniel the moſt Pious Biſhop of Bangor; Cadocus Abbot of Lancarvan in Glamorganſhire, whoſe Life is written by John of Tinmouth. In the ſame Age alſo flouriſhed Iltutus, a Pious and Learned Man of that Countrey; to whom we may alſo add Sampſon his Scholar, conſecrated Biſhop by Dubritius, Succeſſor to St. David; this Sampſon was afterwards Archbiſhop of Dole in Britain, having upon his leaving Britain carried away the Pall along with him, (as hath been already mentioned): Not to omit Patern and Petroc, the former a Preacher at Llan Patern in Cardiganſhire, and the other in Cornwal; beſides Congal Abbot of Bangor, and Kentigern the famous Biſhop of Ellwye in North-Wales, as alſo Aſaph his Scholar, and Succeſſor in the ſame See, now from him called St. Aſaph; to whom I may alſo add Talieſſen, the famous Britiſh Poet, whoſe Verſes are preſerved to this day. All theſe flouriſhed from the beginning till the middle of the Sixth Century, which now as much abounded in Learned and Pious Men, as the former Age was wanting of them.

Thus, omitting Fables, we have given you a View of whatever we find can be relied on for Truth, tranſacted in Britain ſince the Romans firſt conquered and then forſook it: Wherein we may obſerve the many Miſeries and Deſolations brought by Divine Providence on a wicked and perverſe Nation; driven (when nothing elſe would reform them) out of a Rich Countrey into a Mountainous and Barren Corner, by Strangers and Heathens: So much more intolerable in the Eye of Heaven is the diſhonouring the Chriſtian Faith and Religion by Unchriſtian Works, than downright Infidelity. Yet am I not of Bede's Opinion, That the Britains omiſſion to preach the Goſpel to the Engliſh-Saxons (though they inhabited the ſame Iſland) was any of their crying Sins; ſince it was not to be expected, that they could either Preach, or the Saxons would ever Receive the Goſpel from thoſe who were their utter Enemies, and had taken their Countrey from them by Violence: Yet God was not wanting to this Nation, but appointed other Preachers to convert it to the Chriſtian Faith; which how it was brought about, ſhall be the Subject of the enſuing Book.

BRITAIN,
NOW CALLED ENGLAND:
As well Eccleſiaſtical as Civil.

BOOK IV.

From the Preaching of the Chriſtian Religion by AUGUSTINE the Monk, to ECBERT, the firſt Chief or Supreme King of ENGLAND; containing Two Hundred and Three Years.

THIS Fourth Period will give us a new and more pleaſant Proſpect of the Affairs of Britain: For as the Goſpel of Chriſt did now diſpel that Egyptian Darkneſs of Paganiſm, under which it had ſo long laboured; ſo, together with Chriſtianity, Human Learning (and conſequently the Art of compoſing Hiſtories or Annals) entred alſo with it; the Monaſteries, which were not long after founded, being then the only Univerſities in which the Liberal Arts and Sciences were in thoſe times chiefly taught and profeſſed; which though it was not without a great mixture of that Gothic Barbariſm that had then overſpread all Europe, and even Italy it ſelf, yet was it ſufficient (in ſome meaſure) to inſtruct men not only in Divine, but Civil Knowledge; the Monks of that Age poſſeſſing the greateſt ſhare of Learning, and being almoſt the only Hiſtorians as well as Divines: Therefore we muſt be beholding to them for what Accounts we have, not only of the Eccleſiaſtical but Civil Affairs of thoſe Times; for Bede, our firſt Engliſh Hiſtorian, was himſelf a Monk: And the Saxon Annals (which we here give you) were firſt collected and written in divers Monaſteries of England; and to which is to be aſcribed that difference which is found between the Copies of that Chronicle, as to the Dates of Years, and other Matters; for before there was ſcarce any thing remembred by Tradition, but the great Wars and Battels fought by the Saxon Kings againſt the Britains; ſo, after the Monks came to commit things to writing, they began to make us underſtand ſomewhat of their Civil Conſtitutions, and the Acts of Peace as well as War; tho it muſt be confeſſed they are not ſo exact in the former as they might and ought to have been; minding more the relating of Viſions and Miracles, which they ſuppoſed to have happen'd and been done in thoſe times, for the Confirmation of ſome new Doctrines then not fully received: Yet however, I doubt not but from thoſe Remains they have left us, both the Conſtitution of their Government, and the manner of the Succeſſion of their Kings, may be clearly made out; of both which, in the former Period, we were wholly ignorant: But for this we are chiefly beholding to thoſe Engliſh-Saxon Laws that are left us, which were made by the Supreme Authority of each Kingdom in their Wittena Gemot, Mycel Gemot, or great Council (which we now call a Parliament); from which times moſt of the Laws made in thoſe Councils were carefully preſerv'd, and would have been convey'd to us more entire, had it not been for the loſs of ſo many curious Monuments of Antiquity, at the ſuppreſſion of Monaſteries in the Reign of King Henry VIII.

But ſince it muſt be confeſſed, that it was to the Learning which Chriſtianity brought in, that we owe the knowledge we have of the Hiſtory of our Ancient Times, we ſhall begin where we left off in the former Book, and ſhew you by what means this part of ~~Britain~~ was brought to the knowledge of Chriſt, and all the Kingdoms of the Saxon Heptarchy became, by degrees, united in the ſame Faith: For the doing of which it is neceſſary that we look ſome years backward, and give you Venerable Bede's Relation, how Pope Gregory (ſirnamed The Great, to whom the Engliſh Nation owes its Converſion) came to ſend Auguſtine the Monk to preach the Goſpel ~~here~~ in Britain; which he thus relates, as he received it down by Tradition.

Bede, l. 2. c. 1.

An: Dom DXCVI

The Report is, That many Merchants coming to Rome, great ſtore of Commodities being expoſed in the Market-place to be ſold, Chapmen flocking in apace, Gregory alſo himſelf going thither (tho rather out of Curioſity than to buy), ſaw among other things, certain handſome Boys expoſed to ſale; whom, when he beheld, he demanded from what Countrey they were brought; and anſwer being made, That they came out of the Iſle of Britain; then he asked again, Whether thoſe Iſlanders were Chriſtians? To which it was anſwered, They were Heathens; when, fetching a deep ſigh, he ſaid, It was pity the Father of Darkneſs ſhould be Maſter of ſuch bright Faces: They alſo told him, that they were called Angles, of the Kingdom of Deira, and that their Kings were named Ælla: On each of which Names Bede either invents, or elſe had heard, that Pope Gregory made divers Latin Alluſions; which ſince, if tranſlated, they would ſeem dry or trivial to moſt Readers, I therefore paſs by. But Will. of Malmesbury further adds to this ſtory, That it was then, and long after, the Cuſtom of the Nation of the Northumbers, to ſell their own Children, or other near Relations, to Foreign Merchants; which ſhews them then to have been either extraordinary neceſſitous, or elſe to have been as barbarous and void of Natural Affection, as the Negroes of ſome parts of Africa are at this day.

Gregory going immediately to the then Biſhop of Rome, (for himſelf was not ſo as yet,) intreated him to order ſome Preachers of God's Word to be ſent to the Engliſh Nation, by whoſe means it might be converted to Chriſt; and that he himſelf was ready to undertake the Performance of this Work, in caſe it would pleaſe the Pope to ſend him; who, although he was willing to grant his Requeſt, yet the Citizens of Rome (who had a great value for him,) would by no means permit that he ſhould go ſo far from that City.

But Gregory being not long after himſelf advanced to the Papacy, he performed by others his ſo long deſired deſign; for in his Fourth Year, being admoniſhed (ſaith Bede) by Divine inſtinct, he ſent Auguſtine, whom he had deſigned for Biſhop of the Engliſh Nation, and other Zealous Monks along with him, to preach the Goſpel in Britain; who being now upon their way, and diſcouraged by ſome falſe Reports, diſpatch'd Auguſtine in all their Names, beſeeching the Pope that they might return home, and not be ſent a Journey ſo full of hazard to a fierce and Infidel Nation, whoſe Language they underſtood not: But the Pope immediately ſent back their Meſſenger with Exhortatory Letters to them, not to be diſcouraged by vain Reports; but vigorouſly to purſue the work they had undertaken, ſince their labours would be attended with laſting Glory; both in this life and that to come, and that they ſhould obey Auguſtine, whom he had appointed for their Abbot; beſides which Letters the Pope Wrote alſo to Eutherius, Arch-Biſhop of Arles, wherein he recommended them to his Care and Protection, and that he would furniſh them with what they wanted; alſo recommending to him Candidus a Presbyter, whom he had ſent to receive and diſpoſe of the Churches Revenues in France; beſides which there is nothing remarkable in theſe Letters, except the date which is in the Tenth of the Kalends of Auguſt, in the Fourteenth Year of the Reign of our Lord, Mauritius Tiberius Auguſtus, and the Fourteenth Indiction, which falls out in the Year of our Lord 596; though the Author of the old Gregorian Regiſter hath for ſome Reaſons omitted to put down the dates of theſe Epiſtles; perhaps leſt Poſterity might underſtand that the Pope at that time called the Emperour his LORD, and dated his Letters by the Year of his Reign. Lib.1.chap.23.

Auguſtine and his Companions, being thus confirmed by the Pope's Exhortation, proceeded in their Voyage, and paſſing thorough France took Sea, and landed in the Iſle of Thanet, (lying on the Eaſt part of Kent) with about Forty Perſons in his Company, together with ſome Interpreters of the French Nation: Ethelbert was at that time King of that Country; being the moſt powerful Prince that had Reigned there, as having extended the bounds of his Dominion, as far as the banks of the River Humber: As ſoon as Auguſtine arrived, he ſent to King Ethelbert, giving him to underſtand, that he came from Rome, and had brought good tidings of Eternal Happineſs to all them that would receive it; the King hearing this, commanded that they ſhould remain in the place where they landed, and that all neceſſaries ſhould be plentifully ſupplied them, till he had determined what to do; for he had heard of the Chriſtian Religion long before, as having married a Chriſtian Lady, called Bertha, Siſter to the King of France, (as hath been already ſaid) upon this condition, that ſhe ſhould have the free Exerciſe of her Religion, and liberty to have a Biſhop of her own, named Lethard, whom ſhe brought with her to aſſiſt and ſtrengthen her in the Faith.

The King after ſome Days came to the Iſland, and fearing Inchantments, ſate down in the open Air, commanding that Auguſtine and his Companions ſhould be brought into his preſence; for he was perſwaded by his Country Superſtition, that if they brought with them any Inchantments, they could not there ſo eaſily work upon him; but Auguſtine and his Companions Armed with the Power of God, and bearing a Silver Croſs before them, with the Image of our Lord and Saviour painted on a Banner, came on ſinging (as in a ſolemn Proceſſion) the Litany as they went, and praying unto God for the Eternal Salvation of thoſe to whom they were ſent: But when ſitting down with the King, they had preached the Word of Life to him and his Nobles, the King thus ſpoke; " The Doctrines and the promiſes ye have made, are indeed fair and inviting; But I am not as yet reſolved to embrace them, ſince I cannot " ſuddenly conſent to quit that Religion I have ſo long profeſſed, together with the whole Engliſh Nation; yet becauſe ye are Strangers, " and come a long Journey, and as it ſeems would impart to us the knowledge of that Religion you believe to be the beſt, we will not give " you the leaſt Moleſtation, but rather will protect you, and take care " that all things neceſſary ſhall be provided for your Maintenance; " neither ſhall we prohibit you from gaining as many as you can, to the " belief of your Religion.

And accordingly he allotted them their reſidence in the City of Canterbury, (which was the Metropolis of his Kingdom) neither did he hinder them from the freedom of Preaching publickly to whom they would.

When they came to the place provided for them, they began to imitate the Innocent Life of the Primitive Chriſtians, by applying themſelves to continual Prayers and Faſting, and eſpecially to the Preaching the Word of God, to all that would hear them; deſpiſing the things of this World as ſuperfluous; being content with the bare neceſſaries of Life; living exactly according to the Rules they taught others: the ſucceſs of which, was, That many believed, and were baptized, admiring the ſimplicity of their Lives, as well as the Purity of their Doctrine.

There was near this City, towards the Eaſt, an old ruinous Church anciently Built in honour of St. Martyn; whileſt the Romans inhabited Britain, in which the Queen was wont to perform her Devotions: Here they firſt began to aſſemble and exerciſe their Spiritual Functions, until the King being converted, they obtained a full liberty of Preaching, and building Churches. But when the King, by the pure Lives of theſe Holy Men, as alſo by the Miracles they wrought, (as our Author relates) became convinced of the Truth of their Doctrine, and was thereupon Baptiſed, many flocking in, from all Parts to hear the Goſpel, and leaving their Heathaniſm, joyned themſelves to the Church of Chriſt, (ſo powerful a Motive is the Example of a Prince to his Subjects.) At whoſe Faith and Converſion, the King extreamly rejoyced; yet nevertheleſs would not compel any to receive Chriſtianity; only thoſe that believed, he cheriſhed with a more tender regard; for he had learnt from the Authors of his Salvation, That the Service of Chriſt ought to be voluntary, and not conſtrained; neither did he defer long the giving his Teachers places fitting for their imployment, in his City of Canterbury; and confer'd upon them large Poſſeſſions: But this was not done till ſome time after, being confirmed in a great Council of his Kingdom, as ſhall be ſhewn in its proper place.

But as ſoon as Auguſtine had by his Preaching converted the greateſt part of the Kentiſh Nation, he returned into France, where he was ordained Arch-Biſhop of the Engliſh Nation, by Eutherius, Arch-Biſhop of Arles, according to the commands they had received from Pope Gregory; but upon his coming back into Britain, he ſent immediately to Rome, Laurence a Prieſt, and Peter a Monk, to certifie the Pope, that the Chriſtian Faith was now received by the Engliſh, and that he was now made Biſhop; deſiring alſo his Opinion in certain Queſtions, he thought neceſſary to be reſolved: To all which, he ſpeedily received ſuch Anſwers from the Pope, as were proper to the Queſtion propoſed; ſome of which we have thought fit to inſert into our Hiſtory, becauſe they ſhew us, what was the State of Religion in the Weſtern Church, when Auguſtine came over hither.

Anno Dom. CCCCXCVIII.

Ibid.

His firſt Queſtion was, how the Biſhops ſhould converſe with their Clergy, as alſo concerning thoſe things that are Offered at the Altar, by the Oblations of the Faithful? And how many Portions there ought to be made of them? And how a Biſhop ought to behave himſelf in the Church? To theſe things the Pope anſwered to this effect.

That as for Biſhops, how they ought to carry themſelves in the Church, the Holy Scriptures teach, and eſpecially the Epiſtles of St. Paul to Timothy; in which he endeavours to teach him, how he ought to behave himſelf in the Houſe of God: alſo that out of every thing that ſhall be Offered at the Altar, there ought to be made four diviſions, viz. One for the Biſhop and his Family, for Hoſpitality, and Entertainment of Strangers; the Second for the Clergy; the Third for the Poor; and the Fourth for Repairing of Churches: But as you are well skilled in the Monaſtic Rules, nothing ought to be poſſeſſed by any Clergy-men in particular in the Engliſh Chhrch, which lately by God's Grace is brought to the Faith; but you ought to imitate the Primitive Converts, among whom none enjoyed any thing as his own, of thoſe things he poſſeſſed, but all things were in common among them.

In the ſecond Queſtion, Auguſtine deſires to be inform'd, whether Prieſts, not able to contain, may Marry? And if they ſhall Marry, Whether they muſt return to the Secular Life?

This Queſtion Bede hath not, but prepoſterouſly joins the following Anſwer to the firſt Queſtion: Yet Sir Henry Spelman hath added it, out of the Paris Edition of Councils, Anno 1518.

Where the Anſwer of Pope Gregory is thus, That if there be any of the Clergy out of Holy Orders that cannot contain, they ought to Marry, and ſtill to receive their Stipends, concluding great care ought to be had of the Stipends of the Clergy, that they may be diligent in Service; and that there was no occaſion of making a long diſcourſe concerning their keeping Hoſpitality, when all the over-plus ought to be beſtowed upon Pious and Religious uſes?

Anno Dom. CCCCXCVIII.

The third Queſtion of Auguſtine was this, that ſince there is but one Faith, Why are there divers cuſtoms of Churches? One manner of ſaying Maſs in the Holy Roman Church, and another in thoſe of Gaul?

To which Pope Gregory anſwered to this effect: You know very well the cuſtom of the Roman Church in which you were bred; but it is my pleaſure, That if you can find either in the Roman Church, or thoſe of Gaul, or in any other Churches, any thing more pleaſing to God, carefully chooſe it, and what things ſoever you can gather from any other Churches, of Good and Pious Example, bring them into the Engliſh Church; for things are not to be belov'd for the places, but places for the good things that are in them.

Auguſtine's fourth Queſtion was, What Puniſhment ought to be inflicted on him that commits Sacriledge?

The Pope's Anſwer to this Queſtion being ſomewhat long, I ſhall only give you the ſubſtance of it. In the firſt place, He diſtinguiſhes between thoſe who commit Theſt out of a wicked intent, and thoſe that offend out of neceſſity; from whence it follows, that ſome are to be puniſhed with Fines, others with Stripes, and ſome more ſeverely; and when (ſays he) you proceed againſt any with more rigour than ordinary, you muſt do it out of Charity, not out of Anger; becauſe the puniſhment is inflicted to this intent, that the party puniſhed may be ſaved: Then ſhews the end of ſuch puniſhments from the Example of Fathers correcting their Children, purely for their good, though they love them very well; he admoniſhes him to uſe a mean in chaſtiſing them, and not without the Rules of Reaſon: But if you ask how things taken from the Church are to be reſtored? God forbid that the Church ſhould receive any encreaſe for the loſs of meer Earthly things, or go about to make advantage of ſuch trifles.

The three following Queſtions, concerning in what degrees of Conſanguinity Men and Women may Marry, I ſhall omit, as being impertinent to our purpoſe; and ſhall proceed to the Eighth Queſtion which is this.

If, for the great diſtance of places, Biſhops cannot eaſily meet, Whether a Biſhop may be ordain'd, without the preſence of other Biſhops?

The Anſwer of Pope Gregory is to this effect; Certain it is, That in the Engliſh Church, wherein as yet there is no other Biſhop but your ſelf, you can ordain a Biſhop no other way than without Biſhops: for how can Biſhops come from Gaul, that may aſſiſt at the Ordination of a Biſhop in Britain? But we would have you ſo to appoint Biſhops, that they be not too far aſunder from one another, that there may be no hinderance; but that at the Ordination of a Biſhop others may be preſent, and ſuch other Presbyters alſo, whoſe preſence is requiſite, ought to have eaſie means of acceſs; when therefore Biſhops ſhall be ſo ordained in places near one another, the Ordination of a Biſhop ought never to be without Three or Four Biſhops aſſiſting, &c.

Auguſtine's Ninth Queſtion was this, How ought we to behave our ſelves towards the Biſhops of Gaul, and Britain?

Anno Dom. CCCCXCVIII.

The Pope's Anſwer was to this purpoſe, for being ſomewhat long, we ſhall alſo contract it.

In the firſt place, The Pope allows him no Authority over the Biſhops of Gaul, any further than by Advice, or Spiritual Admonition, if they ſhould happen to be guilty of any faults, becauſe they were no ways ſubject to his Authority: and concludes thus; But all the Biſhops of Britain we commit to your Brotherhood; That the Ignorant may be Taught, the Weak by perſwaſions ſtrengthned, and the perverſe corrected by our Authority; The remaining Queſtions, concerning Women with Child, and other unneceſſary, if not immodeſt things, I omit.

This Year alſo, according to Florence of Worceſter, Ceolric, King of the Weſt-Saxons dying, Ceolfus, or Ceulphus ſucceeded him, and Reigned Twenty Four Years.

This Year Redwald, King of the Eaſt Angles, dying, his Son Eorpenwald Reigned in his ſtead, as Mat. Weſtminſter relates.

Anno Dom. DXCIX.

Anno Dom. DC.

But Bede proceeds to tell us, That Auguſtine having ſettled his Archiepiſcopal See at Canterbury, rebuilt that old Church which had been firſt erected by the Chriſtian Romans, and having dedicated it in the Name of Chriſt our Saviour, he appointed it as a See for himſelf and his Succeſſours; he likewiſe founded a Monaſtery towards the Eaſt, not far from the City, where alſo Ethelbert, by his perſwaſion, built the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul; in which the Bodies of St. Auguſtine himſelf, and of all the other Biſhops of Canterbury, as alſo of the Kings of Kent ſhould be interred: Peter a Presbyter was made the firſt Abbot of this Monaſtery, who was drown'd going on a Meſſage into France; but Auguſtine never lived to to finiſh this Church, which was afterwards Conſecrated by Arch-Biſhop Laurence his Succeſſour.

Ibid.

But the Reader is deſired to take notice, That according to a fair, but indifferent ancient Manuſcript, concerning the Foundation of the Church and Monaſtery of St. Peter and S. Paul (afterwards called St. Auguſtine's) in Canterbury, which is now preſerved in the Library of Trinity Hall in Cambridge (part of which is printed in * Sir H. Spelman's Vol. of Councils) it appears that though the Cathedral of Chriſt Church be firſt mentioned by Bede; yet that according to the ſame Author, it was not the firſt built, but rather the Church of St. Pancrace, which from a Heathen Temple was turned into a Chriſtian Church, where King Ethelbert himſelf was Baptized; and upon the ground belonging to which, the Church and Monaſtery of St. Peter and St. Paul were firſt founded, as hath been already related from Bede.

Anno Dom. DCI.

Auguſtine having about this time ſent the Pope word, that the Harveſt indeed was great, but the Labourers few, he therefore ſent him more Preachers of the Word; among whom the chiefeſt were Mellitus, Juſtus, Paulinus, and Rufinian; and with them all thoſe things which were neceſſary for the Service or Ornament of the Church, (ſuch as) Holy Veſſels and Altar-Cloaths, as alſo Sacerdotal Veſtments, together with divers Relicts, and a great many Books; he alſo ſignified to him in his Letters, That he had ſent him an Archiepiſcopal Pall; and thereby he gives him power to ordain Twelve other Biſhops in ſeveral places, all which ſhould be ſubject to his juriſdiction; only the Biſhop of London was to be choſen choſen by his own Synod, and ſhould receive his Pall from the Apoſtolic See (for it ſeems the Pope then intended London for an Arch-biſhoprick, but as for York (when converted) he gives him power to ordain whom he pleaſed Biſhop there; who ſhould likewiſe ordain Twelve Biſhops more, and ſhould enjoy the honour of a Metropolitan; yet ſo, that as long as Auguſtine lived, he ſhould be ſubject to him, but after his Deceaſe, he ſhould not be at all ſubject to the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, or any other Biſhop; only, that he ſhould have the precedence who was firſt ordained; then exhorts him to tranſact all things by a common conſent, yet gives him a juriſdiction over all the Biſhops of Britain, that they might learn how to perform their duties, as well by his Inſtruction as Example; this Letter bears date in the Eighteenth Year of the Emperour Mauritius, which falls out in the Year of our Lord Six[illegible], with which alſo the Saxon Annals agree; for under this very Year.

Anno Dom. DCI.

They place Pope Gregory's ſending of the Pall to Arch Biſhop Auguſtine, with many holy Teachers to aſſiſt him: Sometime after the ſending theſe Meſſengers with theſe Letters, the Pope alſo writ other Letters to Mellitus, "Wherein he gives him Inſtructions concerning the Temples of Idols, "which the Pope would not have pull'd down, but only new Conſecrated by the ſprinkling of Holy Water, and erecting of new Altars; "and as for the Oxen that uſed to be ſacrificed to their falſe Gods, he "would have ſuch kind of Solemnities ſo to be obſerved, That on the "days of the Dedication of their Churches, or of the Holy Martyrs, "whoſe Relicts were there preſerved, Booths ſhould be made up of "boughs near the ſaid Churches, where having kill'd thoſe Oxen (that "were formerly wont to be ſacrificed) they might make merry, in giving "God thanks; ſince it was certain, that it ſhould be impoſſible to take "away all vain and Superſtitious cuſtoms at once, out of Men's minds ſo "prejudiced by long Education.

"At the ſame time alſo the Pope returned an Anſwer to other Letters "which Auguſtine had before wrote to him; wherein, having congratulated his great ſucceſs in the Converſion of the Engliſh Nation, and "alſo taking notice of the great Miracles that Almighty God had done "by him; he tells him, That though he may rejoyce in ſome meaſure "for that Heavenly gift, yet with ſuch a joy, as ought to be allay'd with "fear; for as he might rejoyce, that the Souls of the Engliſh were through "Miracles drawn to an inward Grace, ſo he ought to be afraid, leaſt by "the Miracles that were now wrought, his Mind might be puffed up by "vain Glory; Therefore that he ought ſtill to remember, that when the "Diſciples, returning from their preaching with joy, ſaid to their Heavenly Maſter, Lord, in thy name the Devils be ſubject unto us, they preſently received a rebuke; rejoyce not for this, but rather rejoyce, that "your Names are written in Heaven.

Bede alſo tells us, That Pope Gregory about this time ſent King Ethelbert many noble Preſents, together with a Letter full of good Advice and Inſtructions; "Exhorting him to cultivate that "Grace which he had received by the eſpecial providence of God; to "make haſte to propagate the Chriſtian Faith among his Subjects; to "increaſe the fervency of his own Feith, by furthering their Converſion, to deſtroy the Worſhip of Idols; to eſtabliſh the Manners of "his Subjects, in the purity of Life, by Exhorting, Encouraging, and "Correcting them, and by ſhewing himſelf an Example of good Works, "that ſo he may find his Reward in Heaven: Then propoſing to him the

Let us now return to our Civil Hiſtory, from which we have ſo long digreſſed: About this time, when Ethelbert and his People were wholly taken up in Acts of Piety, Ethelfrid ſtill govern'd the Kingdom of Northumberland; who being a Warlike Prince, and moſt ambitious of Glory, had waſted the Britains more than any other Saxon King of his time; winning from them divers large Territories, which he either made Tributary, or planted with his own Subjects: whence Adian (as Bede or Ædan, or Ægthan, as the Saxon Chronicle calls him) growing Jealous of Ethelfred's great Succeſs, came againſt him with a great and powerful Army, to a place called Degſa-ſtan (or Degſtan) and was there routed, loſing moſt of his Men; but in this Battel Theobald the Brother of Ethelfrid was ſlain, that part or wing of the Army which he commanded, being unfortunately cut off; yet nevertheleſs the loſs was ſo great on the Scotiſh ſide; that no King of the Scots durſt any more in hoſtile manner march into Britain, to the time that Bede wrote his Hiſtory, which was above a Hundred Years after: He alſo tells us, That this happned in the firſt Year of the Reign of the Emperour Phocas. Buchanan in his Scotch Hiſtory writes, that this Ethelfrid aſſiſted by Keawlin (whom he miſtiles King of the Eaſt, inſtead of the Weſt-Saxons) had before this time fought a Battel with this Adtan, wherein Cutha, Keawlin's Son was ſlain; but neither the Saxon Chronicle, nor any of our Engliſh Hiſtorians mention any ſuch thing; for this Cutha (as appears by the ſaid Chronicle) was ſlain in the Year 584. fighting againſt the Welſh. *

The number of Chriſtians beginning now to multiply, not only in Kent, but other Countries; Auguſtine found it neceſſary to ordain two other Biſhops; Mellitus and Juſtus, ſending Mellitus to Preach the Goſpel to the Kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons, which was divided from that of Kent by the River Thameſis, (over which Nation, Sebert, the Son of Richala, the Siſter of K. Ethelbert then Reigned) thô under his Authority, for he had then the ſupreme command over all the Nations of the Engliſh Saxons, as far as the Banks of Humber; but when this Province had by the preaching of Mellitus received the Goſpel of Chriſt, K. Sebert (~~alſo baptized Ethelbert~~) cauſed the Church of St. Paul to be built at London, where Mellitus and his Succeſſours, ſhould fix their Epiſcopal See.

Bede Ib. c. 2.

Hitherto Auguſtine had laboured only to convert Infidels; but now he took upon him, by vertue of his Archiepiſcopal, or rather Legatine Authority, which the Pope had conferr'd upon him, over all the Biſhops of Britain, (properly ſo called) to make a general Viſitation of his Province, and coming as far as the borders of Wales, (being aſſiſted by the power of King Ethelbert,) he ſummoned all the Britiſh Biſhops of the adjoyning Provinces, to a Synod, at a place called in Bede's time, Auguſtines Ake, (or Oak) then Scituate on the confines of the Wectii, now the Dioceſs of Worceſter, and the Weſt; Saxons (ſuppoſed to be ſomewhere on the edge of Worceſter-ſhire,) and began to perſwade them by brotherly Admonitions, that they would maintain the Catholick Unity, and alſo joyn in the work of Preaching the Goſpel to the Infidel Nations.

For there was then a great difference between them about the Rule of keeping Eaſter, which Bede tells us, The Britains did not keep at a right time; but obſerved it from the Fourteenth to the Twentieth Day of the Moon, which Computation is continued in a Cycle of Eighty Four Years; which account being ſomewhat obſcure, I ſhall, for the clearing of it, ſet down what the learned Biſhop of St. Aſaph hath given us upon this ſubject, in his Hiſtorical Account of Church Government (already cited in the laſt Book) where he takes notice, that this Cycle of Eighty Four Years, which was alſo called the Roman Account, * ſo lately as in Pope Leo's Time, the Scots and South Picts uſed the ſame Cycle, from the time of their Converſion, and ſo did the Britains, without any manner of alteration; but about Eighty Years after the rending in pieces of the Roman Empire, the Romans having left off the uſe of that Cycle, took up another of Nineteen Years: which, though it was better in many reſpects, yet was new in theſe Parts, and made a great difference from the former; and when the Romans had uſed this new Cycle another Eighty Years, coming then to have to do with theſe Northern Nations, (who were yet ignorant of it) they would needs impoſe the uſe of it upon them, as a neceſſary condition of their Communion, and ſo bore them down with two things which were really falſe; one, that the Romans had received their Cycle by Tradition from St. Peter; the other, that it was made uſe of every where, except in theſe Iſlands; to the firſt of theſe Aſſertions, the Scots, for want of knowing better, oppoſed only the Authority of St. John for their Cycle; as to the other, they could not tell what to ſay; whereas in truth (though they did not know it) the Roman account came but an Age or two before from Alexandria, and was not yet received in all the Weſtern Church, no not in ſome Parts of France it ſelf; but that in uſe among the Scots was the ſame Cycle that they and the Britains had ever uſed ſince their Converſion; and was the ſame that was anciently uſed in the Roman Church.

But to return to Bede's Relation of this Synod, where, when after a long Diſpute, the Britiſh Clergy could neither by Intreaties, nor Reproofs of Auguſtine, be brought to a Compliance, but that they would prefer their own old Traditions before the Conſent of the Chriſtian (i. e. the Roman) Church; the Arch-Biſhop (as Bede relates) offered to decide this Controverſie by a Miracle, deſiring that ſome ſick or impotent Perſon being brought before them, his Doctrine by whom the Man ſhould be be cured was to be followed, and believed to be from GOD; which when the other Party had at laſt, (thô unwillingly) conſented to, there was then found out a certain Engliſh-man who was quite blind, and being offered to the Britiſh Biſhops, could receive no Cure from them; when Auguſtine, moved by a juſt Neceſſity, prayed to GOD, That he would reſtore this blind Man to his Sight; whereupon he was immediately cured, and Auguſtine was cried up by all, as the only Diſpenſer of God's Word. Then the Britains confeſſed indeed, That they believed that the Doctrine which Auguſtine preached was the Truth; but that they could not, without the general Conſent of their own Nation, quit the ancient Rites and Cuſtoms of their Country; wherefore they deſired, that more of their Clergy being aſſembled, there ſhould be a General Synod held about it; which when it was agreed to, there came (~~as they relate~~) ſeveral Britiſh Biſhops, (their Annals relate them to have been Seven in all,) together with ſeveral Learned Men, eſpecially from the Monaſtery of Bangor, over which one Dinoth is ſaid to have been then Abbot, and in which there was ſo many Monks, all living by their own Labour, that being divided into ſeven Diviſions under as many Rectors, each of theſe Diviſions had not leſs than 300 Men.

But their Abbot Dinoth, and his Clergy, a little before their going to the aforeſaid Synod, went firſt to a certain Man both Holy and Wiſe, who led an Anchorite's Life among them, whom they asked, 'Whether 'they ſhould lay aſide their ancient Traditions at the Preaching of Au'guſtine,or no? Who made this Anſwer, If he is a Man of God, follow him. They ſaid, 'How ſhall we know this? He replied, The Lord ſays," Take "my Yoak upon you, for I am meek and humble in Heart: Perhaps that he himſelf beareth the Yoak of Chriſt, and offereth the ſame to be born of you; but if he be cruel and proud, it is apparent that he is not of God, neither need you to regard what he ſaith. They ſaid again, 'But how ſhall we make a Diſco'very of that? He replied, Contrive it ſo, that he and his Company may come firſt into the place of the Synod, and if he ſhall riſe up to you when you approach, know then that he is the Servant of Chriſt, and obediently hear him; but if he ſhall deſpiſe you, nor will riſe up to you, when you are more in number, let him be ſlighted by you alſo. They did as he directed them; and it fell out that Auguſtine bearing himſelf as the Pope's Legate, and their Metropolitan, as they drew near ſate ſtill in his Chair; which when they ſaw, they grew preſently angry, accuſing him of Pride, and endeavouring in all Things he ſaid to contradict him. But

He began thus to diſcourſe to them: Whereas ye do many Things contrary to our received Cuſtoms, and the Conſent of the Catholick Church; nevertheleſs, if ye will obey me in theſe few Things, to wit, That ye celebrate Eaſter in its proper Time; That ye perform the Miniſtery of Baptiſm according to the Cuſtom of the Holy Roman Apoſtolick Church; That ye preach the Word of GOD together with us to the Engliſh Nation: Then, as for all other Things which ye practiſe, although contrary to our Cuſtoms, we will quickly tolerate them. But they made anſwer, 'That they would do none of thoſe Things, 'neither would they acknowledge him for their Arch-Biſhop. And diſcourſing further among themſelves, they ſaid, 'If he would not juſt 'now riſe up unto us, how much more, when we ſhall be ſubject to 'him, will he then look upon us as nothing? To whom Auguſtine is reported thus threatningly to have denounced againſt them: If ye will not now accept of Peace with your Brethren, ye are like to find War from your Ene-

Enemies; and ſince ye would not preach the Way of Life to the Engliſh Nation, ye ſhall ſuffer by their hands the Puniſhment of Death. Which in every Thing (the Divine Judgment concurring) was fulfilled as he had foretold; thô Bede here further tells us, that Auguſtine lived not to ſee the Iſſue of this Prediction, for he died a good while before; but of this, we ſhall ſpeak in its due time: And though Bede places the fulfilling of this Prediction immediately after its Relation, yet ſince I intend to refer every thing to its proper Time wherein it happened, I ſhall defer the ſpeaking of this for ſome Years.

Vi. Spelman's Concil. p. 108.

But Sir Henry Spelman, out of an ancient Britiſh Manuſcript of Mr. Peter Moſtyn's, a Welſh Gentleman, gives us a much more particular Account of the Anſwer which the Abbot of Bangor then made to Arch-Biſhop Auguſtine, which being Tranſlated out of the Welſh Original, is to this effect. Be it known, and without doubt, unto you, that we all are, and every one of us, obedient and ſubject to the Church of GOD, and the Pope of Rome, and to every godly Chriſtian, to love every one in his Degree in perfect Charity, and to help them by Word and Deed to be the Children of GOD: And other Obedience than this I do not know due to him, whom you name to be Pope, nor as the Father of Fathers, to be claim'd, and to be demanded. And this Obedience we are ready to give, and to pay to him, and to every Chriſtian continually: Beſides, we are under the Government of the Biſhop of Caerleon upon Uske, who is to overſee under GOD over us, to cauſe us to keep the way Spiritual.

From whence we may obſerve, that the Chriſtian Religion came not firſt into Britain by the Preaching of any Perſons ſent from Rome, for then they would ſtill have owned Canonical Obedience to the Pope, as well as the Engliſh did afterwards; therefore it is moſt likely, according to the Traditions given you in the Second Book, that it was firſt preached and propagated here by ſome Apoſtle or Diſciple of the Eaſtern or Aſiatick Church: And thô a late Romiſh Writer very much arraigns the Credit of this Manuſcript, as made ſince the Days of King Henry the Eighth, and cavils at the Welſh thereof, as Modern, and full of falſe Spelling, yet is not this any material Exception againſt it; ſince the Welſh uſed in it is not ſo Modern as he would make it, as I am credibly informed by thoſe who are Criticks in that Language; and as for the Spelling, that may be the fault of the Tranſcribers: And thô the Archiepiſcopal See was then removed from Caer-Leon to St. David's, yet it might ſtill retain the former Title, as of the firſt and moſt famous Place.

Anno Dom. DCV.

About which time Arch-Biſhop Auguſtine is ſuppoſed by the beſt * Chronologers to have departed this Life; thô the certain Year of his Death is not to be found, either in Bede, or the Saxon Chronicle. His Body was buried abroad near the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, till that could be finiſhed and dedicated; which, as ſoon as that was done, was decently buried in the Porch on the North-ſide of the Church, in which were alſo buried all the ſucceeding Arch-Biſhops, except two, viz. Theodore and Birthwald, who were buried in the Church, becauſe the Porch would contain no more; but his Epitaph, thô it mentions his being ſent by the Pope to convert the Engliſh Nation, and his being the firſt Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; and that he died in the 7th of the Kalends of June, in the Reign of King Ethelbert; yet omits the Year of that King's Reign, as well as that of our Lord, in which he died; (I ſuppoſe, becauſe the Year of Chriſt was not then commonly made uſe of, either in the Eccleſiaſtical or Civil Accounts of that Time;) but of this, we ſhall treat further hereafter. Anno Dom. DCV.

Under this Year Bede alſo places the Death of Pope Gregory the Great, of whoſe Life and Actions he gives us a long Account, to which I refer you; but the Saxon Chronicle puts off the Death of this Pope to the next Year; but I rather follow Bede as the ancienter and more authentick Author.

Vi. Spelman's Council, 1 Vol. p. 118, 119, 120.

The ſame Year is alſo very remarkable for Civil, as well as Eccleſiaſtical Affairs in this Iſland; for now King Ethelbert ſummoned a Mycel Synod, or Great Council, as well of the Clergy as Laity, wherein by their common Conſent and Approbation all the Grants and Charters of this King, whereby he had ſettled great Endowments on Chriſt-Church, and that of St. Pancrace in Canterbury, were confirmed, which last had been before the old ruinous Church of St. Martin without the City already mentioned; but the Charters now made and confirmed by King Ethelbert in this Council are almoſt word for word the ſame with thoſe he had made by himſelf before, with heavy Imprecations againſt any, who ſhould dare to infringe them, as you may ſee in Sir H. Spelman's Firſt Volume of Britiſh Councils; where this Learned Author in his Notes farther ſhews us, that theſe Charters above-mentioned are very ſuſpicious of being forged in many reſpects; as Firſt, That this King there ſtiles himſelf King of the Engliſh in general, whereas indeed he was no more than King of Kent: Secondly, Becauſe the Year of our Lord is expreſſed at their Concluſion, which was not in uſe till long after: Beſides, an old Manuſcript of the Church of Canterbury ſays expreſly, That the Monks of that Monaſtery had their Lands and Priviledges by a long and peaceable Poſſeſſion according to Cuſtom, until King Wightred, Anno Dom. 693, made them a confirmation of all their Priviledges by a Charter ~~under his Seal~~ [illegible]. There are alſo other Exceptions againſt the Bull that is there recited ~~to be~~ as Arch-Biſhop Auguſtine's, which you may ſee at large in thoſe Learned Notes above-mentioned.

In this great Council or Synod, among many other Secular Laws and Decrees, theſe deſerve particularly to be taken notice of; the firſt Law aſſigns the Penalty of Sacriledge, appointing what Amends is to be made for Things taken from a Biſhop, by a Reſtitution of nine times the value; from a Prieſt by a Ninth, and from a Deacon by a Threefold Reſtitution.

The Second Law is, That if the King ſummon'd his People, and any Man ſhould preſume then to do them Injury, he ſhall make double Amends to the Party, and beſides ſhall pay Fifty Shillings to the King.

The Third Law is, That if the King ſhall drink in a Man's Houſe, and there be any Injury done in his Preſence, the Party ſo doing it ſhall make double Satisfaction; the reſt that follow, ſince they belong only to the Correction of Manners, are omitted.

To theſe Laws Bede relates, when he ſays, That King Ethelbert, amongſt other good Things which he conferr'd upon his Nation, appointed certain Laws concerning Judgments, by the Councel of his wiſe Men, according to the Example of the Romans, which being written in the Engliſh Tongue, were yet kept and obſerved by them to this time; and then mentions ſome of thoſe Laws to the ſame effect as they are already expreſſed.

Anno Dom. DCVII. Ibid. cap. This Year was fulfilled Arch-Biſhop Auguſtine's Prediction upon the Britains; for (as Bede and the Saxon Annals relate) Ethelfrid King of Northumberland now led his Army to Leger-Ceaſter, and there killed a great multitude of Britains, and ſo was fulfilled the Prophecy of Auguſtine above-mentioned; and there were then killed 200 Prieſts or Monks, who came thither to prey for the Britiſh Army; (but in Florence of Worceſter's Copy it was 2200;) but Brockmaile, who was to be their Protector, eſcaped with about 50 Men.

Lib. 11. H. Huntington gives a more particular account of this Action, and ſays; That King Ethelfrid, having gathered together a powerful Army, made a great Slaughter of the Britains near the City of Legions, which is called by the Engliſh Lege Ceſtre, but more rightly by the Britains Caerlegion; ſo that it is evident it cannot be Leiceſter, as our common Hiſtorians write, but Weſt-Cheſter, which lay near the Borders of King Ethelfrid's Kingdom, where this Battle was fought: This Author further adds, That when the King ſaw thoſe Prieſts or Monks of the Abby of Bangor, who came out to pray for the Army, ranged by themſelves in a place of Safety, having one Brockmaile for their Defender, and that the King knew for what end they came thither; he preſently ſaid, If theſe Men pray to their GOD againſt us, though they do not make uſe of Arms, yet do they as really fight againſt us as, if they did: And ſo he commanded his Forces to be firſt turned upon them, who being all cut off, he preſently defeated the reſt of the Army without any great difficulty; and he alſo agrees with Florence of Worceſter's Relation of the number of the Monks there ſlain, and accuſes their Defender Brockmaile of Cowardice, who left the poor Monks, whom he was to defend, to be cut to pieces. But William of Malmesbury relates this Matter ſomewhat otherwiſe, thô he ſays expreſly, that this Fight was at Cheſter, (then in the hands of the Britains;) which when King Ethelfrid went about to beſiege, the Townſmen reſolving to ſuffer any thing rather than a Siege, truſting in their Numbers, ſallied out to fight, whom when by an Ambuſh laid near the City, he had eaſily overcome; he then falling upon the Monks, who were come in great Numbers to pray for the Succeſs of the Britiſh Army, of which (ſays this Author) there muſt certainly have been an incredible Number, ſince even in his time there were left ſuch vaſt Remains of Churches and Cloyſters, and ſo great a heap of Ruines, as you can ſcarce (ſays he) find any where elſe: The Place is called Bangor, which was then an Abby of Monks, but is now turned into a Biſhoprick; yet here our Author was miſtaken, for this Bangor, where the Monaſtery was, is in Flintſhire, not far from the River Dee; whereas that which is the Seat of the Biſhoprick is in Caernarvanſhire, not far from the River or Streight of Menai, which parts that Country from the Iſle of Angleſey. But of all theſe great Ruines mentioned by Malmesbury, there is now nothing left, ſave thoſe of the two principal Gates of this old City, the one of which is on that ſide towards England, and the other towards Wales, being about a Mile aſunder, the River Dee running betwixt them.

Lib. 1. cap.

But before we proceed further, it is fit we enquire into the Truth of that Story of Geffery of Monmouth, who will needs have Arch-Biſhop Auguſtine to have perſwaded King Ethelbert to incite Ethelfrid King of Northumberland thus to make War upon the Britains, and to deſtroy theſe Monks, as you have heard, in which he is alſo followed by other later Writers, and particularly by Nicholas Trivet, an ~~ancient Author~~, in his Hiſtory, (lately printed at Paris among the Collections of Monſieur Dachery;) as alſo by Arch-Biſhop Parker, Author of the Latin Hiſtory De Antiquitate Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ; and likewiſe in Biſhop Jewel's Apology; the former of which, thô Bede hath expreſly told us, that Auguſtine was dead long before this happened, yet will have theſe Words of Bede to have been foiſted in, contrary to the old Saxon Manuſcripts which is not ſo; for it is found in them all, thô not in the Saxon Verſion; but beſides the Reſpect which we ought to have for ſo good a Man as Auguſtine is ſuppoſed to have been, and which inclines us to believe, that it was not likely he ſhould have a Hand in ſo cruel an Action; I doubt not but to prove from other Arguments, (ſuppoſing this Paſſage of Bede not to be his,) that Auguſtine died about the Year 605, where I have already placed it. In the firſt place therefore, I ſhall not deny, that William of Malmeſbury, in his Firſt Book De Geſt. Pontif. Anglor. as well as divers other Hiſtorians of later Times, ſuppoſe Auguſtine to have ſate Arch-Biſhop 15 (and in ſome Copies 16) Years, and then he muſt certainly have ſurvived this Maſſacre of the Monks of Bangor; but if I can prove they were miſtaken in this Account, all that had been ſaid to prove Auguſtine guilty of it, will ſignifie nothing: For Firſt, Bede relates, that Auguſtine, being yet alive, ordained Laurence for his Succeſſor, leſt himſelf being dead, the yet weak State of that Church, if vacant, (thô for never ſo ſmall a time) might happen to ſuffer, which it muſt be ſuppoſed he did, when he found himſelf in a declining condition, and not like long to ſurvive. Now that this happened in the Year 605, may be alſo proved by theſe Circumſtances: Bede hath already told us, that Auguſtine, in the Year 604, had ordained Mellitus and Juſtus Biſhops; immediately after which Relation, follows that, concerning Auguſtine's Death, which he would ſcarce have mentioned there, had not one followed the other within a ſhort time; and that it was ſo, appears in the Manuſcript Text of Adrian, the Abbot of Canterbury, who lived within leſs than 60 Years after, and who obtained a Priviledge from Pope Deuſdedit, concerning the Free Election of the Abbot of that Monaſtery, at the end of which there is this Paſſage: Anno Dom. 605. died the holy Biſhop Gregory IV^{o} Idus Martii, and in the ſame Year alſo Biſhop Auguſtine VII^{o} Kal. Junii; with whom alſo agree Marianus, Scotus, and Florence of Worceſter, in their Chronicles; the former of whom, under Anno Dom. 605, hath theſe Words: Auguſtine having ordained Laurence the Presbyter Arch-Biſhop in his ſtead, after a ſhort time departed to the Heavenly Kingdom; thô in Florence's Copy it is placed under the Year 604, which Difference might eaſily happen by the careleſneſs of Tranſcribers. This is alſo obſerved by Will. Thorne, the Hiſtorian and Monk of Canterbury, (from an old Book of the Life and Miracles of this St. Auguſtine, that now is loſt,) who in his Chronicle ſays expreſly, That many have erred concerning the Death of St. Auguſtine, thinking him to have died Anno Dom. 613, The cauſe of which Errour is owing to the falſe Dates of ſome Chronicles, who make him to have ſate Arch-Biſhop Sixteen Years; whereas Bede in his ſecond Book ſays, That he ordained Mellitus and Juſtus to be Biſhops a little before his Death, and there gives us the ſame reaſon as I have already done; with whom alſo agrees an ancient Anonymous Chronicle in the Library at Lambeth; as alſo the ſhort Annals of the Church of Rocheſter, which contain the Succeſſions of the Arch-Biſhops of Canterbury, both both which place the Death of Arch-Biſhop Auguſtine, and the Succeſſion of Laurentius, in Anno Dom. 604; but of this you may ſee more in the Firſt Volume of Anglia Sacra, publiſhed by the learned Mr. Wharton deceaſed; wherein you may alſo find a ſhort diſſertation on this Subject, and to whom I own my ſelf obliged for the light, I have had towards ſettling this obſcure Queſtion. Now having cleared Arch-Biſhop Aguſtine's Memory of that Crime, which is laid to his Charge; I ſhall proceed to the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of this time.

Bede Lib. 2.

Laurentius, who ſucceeded Auguſtine in the See of Canterbury, having ſeen the Engliſh Church not only founded, but much encreaſed, began about this time to beſtow his Paſtoral care, not only upon the Engliſh and Britiſh Inhabitants of this Iſland, but alſo upon the Scots who inhabited Ireland; becauſe he knew that at that time they, as well as the Britains, did not obſerve Eaſter according to the Nicene Canon (the occaſion of which Controverſie I have already given you), Therefore the new Arch-Biſhop thought it fit to write an Epiſtle on purpoſe to the Iriſh Biſhops, wherein he exhorted them to maintain the Catholick Unity, in the obſervation of Eaſter; in which Letters this is remarkable, That they are directed to all the Biſhops, per Univerſam Scotiam, That is, through out all Ireland (for ſo it was then commonly called for near Four Hundred Years after this) and he therein complains of Draganus an Iriſh Biſhop, who coming over hither would not ſo much as Eat in the ſame Houſe with him; at which time alſo Laurentius wrote Letters, not only to his fellow Biſhops in Ireland, but alſo to the Britiſh Clergy in Wales, to the ſame purpoſe as the former; but how well he ſucceeded therein, the preſent time (ſays Bede) declares; about which Year alſo Mellitus Biſhop of London was ſent to Rome to confer with Pope Boniface, concerning the neceſſary Affairs of the Engliſh Church, when the Pope held a Synod at Rome with the Biſhops of Italy, concerning the Life and Converſation of the Monks, where he ſate with them: This Synod was held in the Eighth Year of Emperour Phocas, and the Biſhop at his return, brought back the Decrees of that Council, together with the Pope's Letters to Arch-Biſhop Laurence, and all the Clergy, as alſo to King Ethelbert, and the whole Engliſh Nation.

This Year alſo, Sebert King of the Eaſt-Saxons, Founded the Church and Abbey of Weſtminſter, and Mellitus the Biſhop Dedicated it to St. Peter, thô for what Order of Monks is uncertain, ſince they were driven out aftet the Death of Sebert, by his Succeſſours, who continued Pagans for many Years after.

This Year (according to Florence) Ceolwulf dying, Cynegils began to Reign over the Weſt Saxons, (for Thirty One Years) being the Son of Ceolric, who was the Son of Cutha, who (as we have heard) was ſlain fighting againſt the Britains ſome Years before.

Anno Dom. DCXIV.

Cynegils and Cwichelme, fought againſt the Britains at Beamdune (now Bindon in Dorſetſhire;) and there ſlew Two Thouſand and Forty Six Men; which Battel H. Huntington thus deſcribes; The Saxon and Britiſh Troops being drawn up in Battel Array, the Fight immediately began, when the Britains fearing the weight of the Saxon Battel Axes, and long Launces, turn'd their backs, and fled; ſo that the Saxons obtain'd the Victory, without any great loſs on rheir ſide; and he alſo agrees pretty near in the number of the ſlain, with our Saxon Annals; This Cwichelme here mentioned is by Will. of Malmeſbury ſaid to be Brother of Cynegils, and to be by him taken as his Partner in the Royal Power. But Florence of Worceſter, and Mat. Weſtminſter do make Cwichelme to have been the Son of Cinegils, thô the former Opinion be the more likely; but let it be either of them, it is certain that they were both of them Stout and good natured Perſons, who governed with that mutual Love and Concord, as it was a wonder to the Age in which they liv'd, ſo ought it to be an example to all future times.

Anno Dom. DCXIV.

Thô the Cathedral of Chriſt Church in Canterbury, had been already built about Twenty Years; yet it ſeems the Monaſtery adjoyning to it was not founded till this Year, as appears not only from the Manuſcript above mentioned (once belonging to the Monaſtery of St. Auguſtine) but alſo from Will. of Malmesbury; that in the time of Arch-Biſhop Laurence, and about this very Year that it was firſt repleniſhed with Monks, as appears by a Letter of Pope Boniface to King Ethelbert; whereby he approves of, and confirms the Foundation of the ſaid Abby, by the ſaid Arch-Biſhop; which Letter, though Will. of Malmesbury had promiſed to recite, yet being by him forgot, or elſe ommitted in our Printed Copies, is to be found at large in the ſaid Manuſcript; concerning which Monaſtery the aforecited Author farther adds, "That though ſome had ſaid that Arch-Biſhop "Ælfric had thruſt out the Clerks (i. e. ſecular Chanons) out of that "Church, and had placed Monks in their rooms, yet was it not at all "probable, ſince it appeared by the ſaid Epiſtle of Pope Boniface, that "there had been Monks in the Church of St. Saviour, from the firſt "foundation of that Monaſtery, in the time of Arch-Biſhop Laurence, "who ſucceeded St. Auguſtine.

De Juſt. Pont f. Lib. 1.

But it hath been denyed, by Cardinal Baronius, in his Annals, as alſo by ſome later Antiquaries, of what Order theſe Monks were, whom Auguſtine and Laurentius placed in theſe two Monaſteries above mention'd; and that a late ingenious Authour in his Preface to a Treatiſe, called Notitia Monaſtica, hath queſtioned whether they were of the Benedictine Order, ſince he rather ſuppoſes, That the Benedictine Rule was ſcarce heard of in England, till ſome Hundreds of Years after, and never perfectly obſerved, till after the Conqueſt; but he ſhould have done well to have told us, what other Order they were of, ſince the general Tradition in moſt of the Ancient Engliſh Monaſteries of the Benedictine Order, was, That they had obſerved that Rule from their firſt foundation: And the Saxon Annals under the Year 509, do expreſly affirm, That St. Benedict, the Father of all the Monks dyed that Year: And he had long before his Death founded his Order in Italy, and of which Auguſtine himſelf is ſuppoſed to have been: and though I alſo acknowledge, that all the ancient Monaſteries of England were not at firſt of that Order, ſince thoſe that were founded in the Kingdom of Northumberland, by the Biſhops Aidan and Coleman followed the ſame Rule with the Monks of Ireland, and Scotland, viz. That of St. Baſil, which all the Eaſtern Monks did then, and do to this day obſerve; yet even theſe did about an Hundred Years after quit that Rule, and follow the more Modern one of St. Benedict; and therefore Stephen Heddie, in his * Life of St. Wilfred Biſhop of York, (lately publiſhed by the learned Dr. Gale,) hath expreſly told us, That the ſaid Biſhop returning home into his own Country (i. e. the Kingdom of Northumberland) and carrying along with him the Rule of St. Benedict, very much improved the Conſtitutions of God's Churches; by which he meant the Monaſteries of thoſe Parts: And therefore the Chronology once belonging to the Abby of St. Auguſtine's in Canterbury, (printed in the Decem ſcriptores after Will. Thornes Chronicle) under Anno 666, upon very good grounds thus obſerves, That this Year Biſhop Wilfred cauſed the Rule of St. Benedict to be obſerved in England, That is in the North Parts, into which he then went; for if that Rule had not been obſerved in the Southern Parts before, How could it be ſaid that he carried it out from thence along with him? but to conclude; there having been a diſpute among the Roman Catholicks beyond the Seas, about Seventy Years ago concerning this matter; ſome of them affirming, that all the ancient Engliſh Monks, before the Conqueſt were of the Order of St. Equitius, or elſe of ſome other Order; whereupon thoſe of the Benedictine Order wrote over to our Antiquaries in England, (viz.) Sir Robert Cotton, Sir H. Spelman, Mr. Camden, and Mr. Selden; appealing to their Judgment herein: From whom they received a Letter under all their Hands, wherein they expreſly certified, that there was never any ſuch Order as that of St. Equitius; and further affirm, That there were only Two Orders of Monks in uſe amongſt our Anceſtours of the Engliſh Saxon Church; One of thoſe who followed the Rites of the Ægyptian Monks, and the other of Benedictine's who came over with Auguſtine, and ſo continued from that time to their diſſolution under King Henry the Eighth; to which Letter, or Certificate, all the ſaid learned Perſons above mentioned did put their Hands, as appears by the Certificate it ſelf; which you will find Printed in Clem. Reyner. de Appoſtolatu Benedictini in Anglia. This, though perhaps it may ſeem an impertinent digreſſion to ſome; yet, I hope, will not prove ſo to thoſe, who are lovers of Ecleſiaſtical Antiquities.

An. Dom. DCXVI

I find little ~~[illegible]~~ certain concerning the Princes of the Brittains or welsh during those times. onely that King Cadvan now deceasing Cadwalla his son succeeded him Hist. MS: Rob. Vaughan

This Year Ethelbert King of Kent dyed, who was the firſt Engliſh King that received Baptiſm; Bede tells us, That this King dyed above Twenty Years after his Converſion, and was buried in St. Martin's Porch, in the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul; after whoſe deceaſe Eadbald his Son ſucceeded to him in the Kingdom. The beginning of whoſe Reign I ſhall give you out of Bede, being much more particular than that in the Chronicle.

This King did not only refuſe the Faith of Chriſt, but alſo polluted himſelf with ſuch Fornication, which the Apoſtle ſays, ought not to be heard of among the Gentiles, in that he Married his Father's Wife; by which wickedneſs he gave occaſion to thoſe to return to their former Heatheniſm, who had embraced Chriſtianity in his Father's Reign, either out of Fear, or hopes of Favour; thô God's Judgments were not wanting to Correct this Infidel King, for he was tormented with frequent fits of Frenſie, and the poſſeſſion of an unclean Spirit; but the Death of Sebert King of the Eaſt Saxons, happening alſo about this time, extremely encreaſed the preſent Storm of Afflictions; for he left Three Sons Heirs to his Kingdom, who all relapſed to Paganiſm, having in their Father's lifetime ſeemed Chriſtians, but now permitted all their Subjects the free licence of worſhiping Idols; and when they ſaw the Biſhop Adminiſtring the Euchariſt to the People in the Church, they thus ſpoke to him in their Barbarous folly; "Why doſt thou not give us this White Bread, which "thou wert wont to Miniſter to our Father? To whom the Biſhop re- "plyed, That they muſt firſt be waſhed in that ſaving Font, in which "their Father had been Baptiſed, and then they might partake of the "ſame Bread; which though they deny'd to do, yet would they not deſiſt from requiring this Bread at his hands; which he ſtill refuſing them, Anno Dom. DCXVII

they then plainly told him, That if he would not yield to them in ſo ſmall a matter, he muſt not ſtay any longer in their Dominions; and ſo commanded ~~them~~ to be gone; who being thus expelled, went thence into Kent to conſult with the Biſhops Laurentius and Juſtus, what was beſt to be done on this occaſion; where it was decreed by common Conſent, That it was better that all of them ſhould return into their own Countrey, there to ſerve God with freedom of Conſcience, than to live without any Fruit of their Labours amongſt ſuch Barbarous Rebels to the Chriſtian Faith; thereupon Mellitus and Juſtus departed firſt, and went into France, there reſolving to expect the iſſue of theſe things; but not long after, theſe Three Princes, who had driven out a Preacher of the Truth, and relapſed to the Worſhip of Idols, marching out to Battel againſt the Weſt-Saxons, were all cut off, together with their Army: However, though the Authors of this Apoſtacy were deſtroyed, yet the common people being once inured to wickedneſs, could not eaſily be brought back to the Faith of Chriſt.

Bede, Ibid.

But when Laurentius was about to leave Britain, to follow Mellitus and Juſtus, he ordered a Pallet to be laid for him in the Church of St. Peter and Paul, on which (after many Prayers and Tears poured forth to God, he laid down to take his reſt; where, (if credit may be given to Bede's relation) St. Peter, in whoſe Church he had ſpent great part of the Night in watching and Prayer, appeared to him, and to make the Viſion more ſenſible, gave him many ſtripes for thus offering to deſert his Flock; at ſight whereof the King (to whom next morning he ſhewed the marks of what he had ſuffered, and by whom, and for what cauſe) relenting, in great fear renounced his Inceſtuous Marriage, and applied himſelf to the Chriſtian Faith more ſincerely than before, together with all his People; but the Londoners refuſing again to receive their Biſhop Mellitus, this King had not ſo much power as his Father to force them to it, whether they would or not; yet nevertheleſs, he with all his Nation, from the time that he was thus re-converted to Chriſt, endeavoured wholly to ſubmit himſelf to the Divine Precepts, and then near the Monaſtery of the Apoſtles built a Church, in honour of the bleſſed Virgin, which was conſecrated by Archbiſhop Mellitus: But to return again to Civil Affairs.

Id. Ibid.

This Year alſo Edwin, of the Blood-Royal of Northumberland, having been forced to fly from Ethelfrid, then King of that Countrey, had wander'd for ſome Years as a baniſhed Man, through divers Kingdoms, till at laſt he took refuge with Redwald, King of the Eaſt-Angles, beſeeching him to ſave his Life from ſo cruel and unjuſt a Perſecution; who thereupon receiving him into his protection, granted his Requeſt; but whilſt he thus ſojourned with King Redwald, he had a Viſion or Apparition, which was the cauſe of his future Converſion, and which though it looks very much like a Monkiſh Legend, yet ſince it is related by ſo grave an Author as Bede, I ſhall here from him ſet down.

So ſoon as Ethelfrid heard where Edwin was, he ſent Ambaſſadors to Redwald, offering him a great Sum of Money to put him to death; which being refuſed, he ſtill repeated, and increaſed his offers, twice or thrice threatning War, if he were refuſed; till at laſt the King being either prevailed upon by his great proffers, or terrified by his threatnings, yielded, promiſing either to kill Edwin, or to deliver him to his Ambaſſadors; which when a certain Friend of Edwin's, then near the King, Anno Dom. DCXVI.

came to know, the firſt hour of the Night he went in haſte to his Chamber, and calling him forth for better ſecreſy, revealed to him his Danger, and offer'd him his Aid to make his Eſcape, where neither Redwald nor Ethelfrid ſhould ever find him: But he not approving of that courſe, as ſeeming diſhonourable, without more manifeſt cauſe to begin firſt to diſtruſt one who ſo long had been his only Refuge, choſe rather to dye by his Hand, than by any other more Ignoble: Whereupon his Friend departing, Edwin being thus left alone without the Palace-Gate, full of ſad and perplexed Thoughts, diſcerns about the dead of Night a man approaching towards him, neither by Countenance nor Habit to him known, who after a ſhort Salutation asked him, 'Why at this Hour, when all others were at Reſt, he alone ſate ſo ſadly waking on a cold ſtone? Edwin wondering not a little who he might be, asked him again, What his ſitting within doors or without, concerned him? To whom he again replied, 'Think not that who thou art, or why ſitting here, or what danger hangs over thee, is to me unknown. But what would you promiſe to that man who would free you out of all theſe Troubles, and perſuade Redwald not to moleſt you, nor give you up to your Enemies? All that I am able, anſwered Edwin to the Unknown: Then he proceeds thus; 'What if the ſame Perſon ſhould promiſe to make you greater than any Engliſh King hath been before you? I ſhould not doubt, replied Edwin, to be anſwerably Grateful. 'But what if to all this he would inform you (ſaith the other) of a way to Happineſs beyond what any of your Anceſtors had known? Would you hearken to his Counſel? Edwin, without any Heſitancy, promiſed he would. Then the other, laying his right Hand on his Head, ſaid, 'When this Sign ſhall next befall you, remember this Night, and this Diſcourſe; nor defer to perform what thou haſt now promiſed. And with theſe words diſappearing, he was not only convinced that it was not a Man, but a Spirit that had thus talked with him: But the Royal Youth was alſo much revived, when on the ſudden his Friend, who had been gone all this while to liſten farther what was like to be reſolved concerning him, comes back, and joyfully bids him go to his Repoſe, for that the King's Mind, tho for a while drawn aſide, was now fully reſolved, not only never to betray him, but to defend him againſt all his Enemies, as he had promiſed: In ſhort, the King was as good as his word, and not only refuſed to deliver him up, but alſo raiſing Forces, thereby helped him to regain his Kingdom: For the next Year, as the Saxon Annals relate,

C.5 Anno Dom. DCXVII.

> 'Ethelfrid King of Northumberland, was ſlain by Redwald King of the Eaſt-Angles; and Eadwin the Son of Ælla ſucceeded him (in that Kingdom), who ſubjected all Britain to him, (except only Kent): He alſo baniſhed the Royal Youths, the Sons of Ethelfrid, (viz.) Ealfrid the eldeſt Son, as alſo Oſwald and Oſwin; with many other Princes, whoſe Names would be tedious here to be repeated.

But Will. of Malmesbury gives us a more particular Account of this Fight; and that ſince War had been denounced by Ethelfrid, upon his refuſing to deliver Edwin, that thereupon Redwald determin'd to be beforehand with the Danger, and with an Army raiſed on the ſudden, ſurprize Ethelfrid (being not aware of an Invaſion), and in a Fight near to the Eaſt ſide of the River Idel, on the Mercian Border (now in Nottinghamſhire) ſlew him, diſpatching eaſily thoſe few Forces which he had got to march out over-haſtily with him; who yet (as a Teſtimony that his Fortune, and not his Valour, was to be blamed) ſlew with his own Hands Reiner the King's Son. And H. Huntington adds, That this Battle was ſo great and bloody, that the River Idel was ſtained with the Blood: And that the Forces of King Redwald being very well drawn up, the King of the Northumbers, as if he had been ſure of the Victory, ruſhing in among the thickeſt Ranks, ſlew Reiner (above-mentioned,) and wholly routed that Wing of the Army: But Redwald not terrified with ſo great a Blow, but rather more incenſed, renewed the Fight with the two remaining Bodies, which being not to be broken by the Northumbers, Ethelfrid having got among the thickeſt of his Enemies, further than he ought in Prudence to have done, was after a great Slaughter there ſlain, upon which his whole Army fled; but his two Sons, (by Acca, King Edwin's Siſter,) Oſwald, and Oſwi, eſcaped into Scotland. This End had King Ethelfrid, a Prince moſt skilful in War, thô utterly ignorant of the Chriſtian Religion. By this Victory Redwald became ſo far Superiour to the other Saxon Kings, that Bede reckons him as the next after Ælla, and Ethelbert, who had all England on this ſide Humber under his Obedience.

Anno Dom. DCXVII.

But to look back a little to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; about this time Laurentius the Archbiſhop died, and was buried near Auguſtine his Predeceſſor; to whom ſucceeded Mellitus, who was Biſhop of London; this Mellitus is related by Bede, to have by his Prayers ſtopp'd a great Fire in Canterbury, by cauſing the Wind to blow the quite contrary way to what it did before; which at laſt quite falling, the Fire ceaſed with it. He ſat Archbiſhop only five Years.

Anno Dom. DCXX.

This Year Cadwallo is ſuppoſed by Radulphus de Diceto to have ſucceeded his Father Cadwan in the Kingdom of Britain; though ſome of the Welſh Chronicles make him to have began to reign four Years before. But as for Geoffery of Monmouth, who gives a large and very improbable Account of this King's Martial Actions, (and therefore needleſs to be here repeated,) it is not his Cuſtom to cite any Authors, nor give any Year or Account when his Kings began to reign, or when they died.

Ib. chap. 9.

This Year Mellitus deceaſed, and was buried with his Predeceſſors; to whom immediately ſucceeded Juſtus, who had been hitherto Biſhop of Rocheſter, but the Year following Paulinus, a Roman, was conſecrated by Juſtus to be Biſhop of the Northumbers; for Bede tells us, he had before received Authority from Pope Boniface to ordain what Biſhops he pleaſed, and as the preſent occaſion ſhould require; the Pope ſending alſo a Pall to beſtow upon him at the ſame time. To this Year Bede alſo refers the Converſion of the Northumbers, (that is, all thoſe Engliſh-Saxons who lived North of the River Humber,) together with Edwin their King, to the Chriſtian Faith; who, as an earneſt of his future Faith, had the Power of his Empire already ſo encreaſed, that he took the utmoſt Borders of Britain under his Protection; but the occaſion of his Converſion was through his Alliance with the King of Kent, by his marrying Ethelburga the Daughter of King Ethelbert; whom, when he ſent to deſire of her Brother Eadbald, for his Wife, it was anſwered, That it was not Lawful to beſtow a Chriſtian Virgin in Marriage with a Heathen: Which, when the Meſſengers related [illegible] to King Edwin, he promiſed he would act nothing contrary to that Faith which the Virgin profeſſed, but would rather permit a free exerciſe of her Religion to all thoſe Prieſts and others, who ſhould attend her: Neither did he deny to receive the ſame Religion himſelf, provided, (upon a juſt Examination,) it ſhould appear more Holy, Anno Dom. DCXXV. and worthy of GOD. Upon theſe Terms the Lady was ſent to Edwin, and Paulinus being ordained Biſhop, (as was before reſolved on,) was ſent as a Spiritual Guardian to the Virgin; who, when he came to King Edwin's Court, uſed his utmoſt Endeavour to convert the Pagans to the Chriſtian Faith, but to little purpoſe for a long time, tho' at laſt he prevailed by this occaſion. For the year following,

Anno Dom. DCXXVI. When Cuichelme, (at that time one of the two Weſt-Saxon Kings,) envious of the growing Greatneſs of King Edwin, ſent privily one Eomer, an hired Cut-Throat, to aſſaſſinate him; He, under pretence of delivering a Meſſage from his Maſter, with a poyſon'd Weapon ſtabs at Edwin whil'ſt he was diſcourſing with him in his Houſe, (by the River Derwent in Yorkſhire,) on an Eaſter-day; which Lilla, one of the King's Attendants, at the lucky inſtant perceiving, having no other Means to defend him, interpoſed his own Body to receive the Blow, thrô which, notwithſtanding, it reached the King's Perſon, with a dangerous Wound; the Murtherer being now encompaſſed with many Swords, and made more deſperate by his own Danger, ſlew another of the King's Servants in the ſame manner.

That Night the Queen brought forth a Daughter, who was called Eanfled; and when the King, in the preſence of Paulinus, gave Thanks to his Gods for the Birth of his Daughter, the Biſhop, on the contrary, gave Thanks to our Lord Chriſt, that the Queen was ſafely delivered by his Prayers: At which, the King, being well pleaſed, promiſed the Biſhop to renounce his Idols, and become the Servant of Chriſt, if he would grant him Life, and Victory againſt that King who had thus ſent a Murtherer to kill him; and as an earneſt thereof, he gave his new-born Daughter to be bred up in that Religion; who, with 12 other of his Family, on the day of Pentecoſt, was baptiſed; and by that time, being well recovered of his Wound, to puniſh the Authors of ſo foul a Fact, he march'd with an Army againſt the Weſt Saxons; whom having ſubdued, and put ſome of thoſe to Death who had conſpired againſt him, and received others to Mercy, he return'd home victorious.

But I cannot omit here taking notice of a great Miſtake in Mat. Weſtminſter's Flores Hiſtoriarum, who, under this Year, makes K. Cuichelme, abovementioned, to have been kill'd in this Battle, though from what Authority I know not; whereas it will appear by our Annals, that he was alive, and Chriſtned near ten Years after.

But thô after this Victory K. Edwin forbore to worſhip Idols, yet ventured he not preſently to receive Baptiſm, but firſt took care to be inſtructed aright by the Biſhop Paulinus in the Principles of the Chriſtian Faith; ſtill conferring with himſelf, and others of his chief Men whom he thought moſt wiſe, what was beſt to be done in ſo weighty an Affair; and he himſelf, being a Man of a piercing Underſtanding, when he was alone often conſidered with himſelf which Religion was beſt to be followed.

Ib. m, c. 10. About this time alſo he received Letters from the Pope, wherein 'having briefly ſet forth the Doctrine of the Trinity, as the Foundation 'of the Chriſtian Faith, and having extolled the Converſion of King Eadbald, and Piety of the Queen his own Wife, he exhorts him to imitate 'their Examples, and caſting away his Idols to receive Chriſt. The Pope writ alſo Letters at the ſame time to Queen Ethelburga his Wife,' wherein 'he congratulated her Converſion, and praiſed her Piety, exhorting her Anno Dom. DCXXVI.

'to perſiſt in the Courſe ſhe had begun, and to do her Endeavour to re-'claim her Husband from his Infidelity. But thô the King joyfully received theſe Letters, yet did they not ſo much prevail with him, as the wonderful fulfilling of the Prediction of the Viſion above-mentioned; for when the King ſtill deferred the declaring himſelf a Chriſtian, Biſhop Aidan (as it is ſuppoſed) had that Tranſaction revealed to him; for one day coming in to the King, on a ſudden he laid his Hand upon his Head, and deſired him to remember that Sign; whereupon the King being much ſurpriſed, fell down at his Feet, but the Biſhop raiſing him up, ſaid thus: GOD hath delivered you from your Enemies, and given you the Kingdom as you deſired; perform now what ſo long ſince you promiſed him, and receive his Doctrine, which I now bring you, and that Faith which will not only ſave your Soul from perpetual Torments, but alſo make you a Partaker of Eternal Happineſs.* Which, when the King heard, he confeſſed, 'That he would, nay, 'ought to receive this Faith; but (ſaid he) I muſt firſt conſult further 'with my chief Friends, and Councellors, concerning this Matter, that if 'they ſhould likewiſe receive it, we might all be Converted, and Bapti-'zed together. Which Paulinus agreeing to, and the King there holding a Council with his wiſe Men, asked them ſeverally, 'What they thought 'of this new Doctrine and Worſhip, which had been as yet unknown 'among them? To whom Coifi, chief of the Idol-Prieſts, preſently anſwered; You may, Sir, conſider what is now preached to you, but to tell you freely my Opinion, the Religion we profeſs is good for nothing; for although no Man hath more ſtudiouſly obſerved the Worſhip of our Gods than my ſelf, yet nevertheleſs there are many who have received greater Benefits and Dignities from you than I have done, and have been more Happy and Proſperous in all their Undertakings; whereas, if theſe Gods had any Power, they would rather have aſſiſted me, who took ſuch care to ſerve them: Wherefore if, upon a good Examination, you find, that the New Doctrine now preached is far better than the Old, let us then receive it without delay. To which Opinion, another of the great Men alſo yielding his Aſſent, further ſaid; It ſeems, Sir, to me, that the preſent Life of Man upon Earth, in compariſon of that Time which to us is unknown, is like unto a little Sparrow, which, whilſt you feaſted in your Preſence-Chamber, flew in at one Window, and out at another; we ſaw it that ſhort time it remained in the Houſe, and it was then well ſhelter'd from Wind and Weather; but as ſoon as it got out into the cold Air, whither it went, we were altogether as ignorant, as from whence it came: Thus we can give ſome Account of our Souls, during its abode in the Body, whilſt houſed and harboured therein; but where it was before, or how it fareth afterwards, is to us altogether unknown. If therefore Paulinus his Preaching can certainly inform us herein, it deſerveth, in my Opinion, to be well received. To which Diſcourſes, Coifi alſo further added, That he deſired to hear Paulinus himſelf preach concerning his God: Which, when he had performed, (as the King had commanded him,) Coifi cried out, I have long ſince underſtood, that what we worſhipped was nothing, for the more I ſought to underſtand the Truth in that Religion, the leſs ſtill I found of it. So that it is in this Doctrine alone, that Truth clearly ſhines, and which is able to confer upon us Eternal Happineſs. In ſhort, the King not only gave Paulinus his Conſent to preach publickly, but alſo, renouncing his Idolatry, received the Chriſtian Faith. But Coifi the Chief Prieſt did not only declare, That the Temples and Altars of their falſe Gods ſhould be pulled down, and deſtroyed; but when the King asked him who ſhould undertake it, he freely offered himſelf to do it; and ſo deſiring of him a

Horſe

Anno Dom. DCXXVI. Horſe and Arms, taking a Lance in his Hand, he went to deſtroy the Idol Temples; the People at firſt thought him mad, becauſe it was not lawful for their Prieſts, either to bear Arms, or ride on Horſe-back: But as ſoon as Coiſi came to the Idol Temple, he commanded thoſe that came with him to burn and utterly deſtroy it; and the place where it ſtood was ſhewn in Bede's time, lying not far from York, Eaſtward near the River Darwent, being then called Godmundingham, where this Prieſt, by thus demoliſhing the Altars of his former Gods, made ſome Amends for his teaching Men to adore them. But the Year following,

Anno Dom. DCXXVII. King Edwin, with all his Noblemen, and a great many common People of his Kingdom, received Baptiſm; the King himſelf being baptized at York on Eaſter Day in the Church of St. Peter, which he had Ibid. c. 14. commanded with all ſpeed to be built of Wood for that purpoſe, in which City he alſo ſettled the Epiſcopal See, Paulinus being the firſt Biſhop; ~~there~~; but not long after the King had received Baptiſm, he himſelf took care to build a large and noble Church of Stone round about the former, which was ſtill left ſtanding till the other was finiſhed; but before the Walls of it could be raiſed, the King being killed, left the Work to be perfected by Oſwald his Succeſſor: So Paulinus continued, during all the reſt of this King's Reign, (which was about the ſpace of 6 Years,) to preach the Word of GOD in that Kingdom; in which Church there were alſo baptized divers others of Note, as Oſfrid and Eadfrid, the Sons of King Edwin, both which his former Wife Quenburga, the Daughter of Ceorle King of Mercia, had brought forth in their Baniſhment. There were likewiſe afterwards baptized divers others of the King's Children by his laſt Queen, who not long after dying, were buried in York Minſter. Beſides theſe, there were baptized Iſſi the Son of Prince Oſrid, and ſeveral other Noblemen; and it is reported, that the People's Deſires to receive Baptiſm were then ſo fervent, that when on a time Paulinus came with the King and Queen to a certain Town of the King's, called Adefrin, he there ſpent a Month in doing nothing elſe but Catechiſing, and Baptizing thoſe that came to him from far and near to that end; for after his Inſtructing them, they were ſtrait baptized in the River Gleni, which he made uſe of as being convenient for that purpoſe.

Theſe Things were tranſacted in the Province of Bernicia; but in that of Deira, where he uſed to remain moſt commonly with the King, he baptized in the River of Swale, for in that preſent Infancy of the Church, Oratories and Fonts were not yet erected: But in the Country of Done he built a Church, which was burnt not long after by the Pagans when they killed King Edwin. Theſe Things, thô happening in ſeveral Years, Bede here relates all at once. But to return to Civil Affairs.

This Year Cynegils and Cwichelm, Kings of the Weſt-Saxons, fought with Penda King of Mercia at Cirenceſter, where alſo a League was made between them.

H. Huntington is larger in the Relation of this Fight, and tells us, that when both Armies had fought from Morning till Sun-ſet, neither of them giving Ground; the next Morning perceiving they ſhould be both ruined if they ſtood another Fight, they treated of a Peace, and ſo parted Friends.

It were to be wiſhed, that the Monkiſh Writers, who have left us the only Relations of theſe Wars, would alſo have told us the particular Cauſes and Grounds on which they were made; for want of which, we are are left to gueſs in general, that Revenge or Ambition (the common Incentives to War among Princes) did alſo produce theſe we now treat of; but within two Years after (as the Saxon Annals relate) Eorpwald [King of the Eaſt-Saxons] was baptized.

This Bede relates to have been done by the Perſuaſion of King Edwin, who after the Death of Redwald, had the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles voluntarily delivered up to him by the People of that Province; but he out of Gratitude to his old Benefactor, permitted his Son Eorpwald quietly to hold that Kingdom, tho as his Tributary; who now caſting away his Idols, was baptized, together with many of his Subjects: His Father King Redwald had been alſo baptized in Kent by the means of King Eadbald, tho in returning home he was again perverted by his Wife and ſome others of her Superſtition, from the true Faith; ſo that he had at once in the ſame Temple one Altar for Chriſt, and another for Devils: But King Eorpwald, not long after his receiving the Faith, was ſlain by one Richbert a Heathen, but who he was, or why he did it, is not told us; ſo that the Kingdom for three years returned to Paganiſm, until Sebert, Brother to the laſt King, a moſt Learned and Chriſtian Prince, obtained the Crown; who whilſt his Brother lived being baniſhed into France, did there receive Baptiſm, of which as ſoon as he began his Reign he made his Subjects alſo Partakers: But to this Prince we ſhall ſpeak more largely anon. Ibid. c. 15.

About this time Paulinus alſo preached the Word to the Province of Lindiſſi, (now Lincolnſhire) and converted the Governor of Lincoln, whoſe Name was Blecca, with all his Family, to the Chriſtian Faith: In which City he built a Church of Stone of curious Workmanſhip, whoſe Roof being fallen down, either by length of Time, or Hoſtile Incurſions, the Walls were only ſtanding in Bede's time: And concerning the Propagation of the Chriſtian Faith in this Province, a certain Prieſt and Abbot of the Monaſtery of Barteneu told Bede, That he himſelf was baptized by the Biſhop Paulinus, together with a great Multitude of people in the River Trent, near a City then called Tiowulfingceaſter (where it was, we know not) King Edwin being preſent; of whom Bede alſo tells us, That in his time a Woman with a Child in her hand might have gone from Sea to Sea; and that the King at certain Fountains near the Highways, cauſed Drinking-Pots of Braſs to be ſet upon Poſts, for the refreſhment of Travellers, which none either out of Love or Fear would preſume to meddle with; he alſo cauſed to be carried before him when he went through the ſtreets, a ſort of Banner which the Romans called Tufa, and which the Engliſh then called a Tuff. Idem Ibid.

About this time too Pope Honorius ſucceeded Boniface in the Roman See; and as ſoon as he heard that the Nation of Northumbers had received the Chriſtian Faith by the Preaching of Paulinus, he ſent him an Archiepiſcopal Pall, together with Exhortatory Letters to King Edwin, perſuading him to perſevere in the Faith which he had received; which Letter you may find at large in Bede; wherein it alſo appears, that Honorius Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Paulinus of York, had this Truſt lodged jointly in them, That whenſoever one of them died, the Survivor ſhould immediately conſecrate another Archbiſhop in his ſtead; for not long before, Archbiſhop Juſtus deceaſing, Honorius had been elected in his room; who coming to Paulinus as far as Lincolne, was there by him ordained Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Id c. 17. Id. c. 18.

Cadwallo

Anno Dom. DCXXXIII.

Cadwallo, King of the Britains, having been (as Geoffrey of Monmouth relates) conquered by King Edwin, loſt ſo great a part of his Kingdom, that he was forced to fly into Ireland, from whence ſoon after returning with a great Army of Iriſh, he overcame Penda King of the Mercians in fight, and then made him join his Forces againſt King Edwin: All which is probable enough; for * Bede alſo tells us, That Cadwallo this year rebelling againſt King Edwin, together with Penda,^ invaded the Kingdom of Northumberland, when King Edwin raiſing an Army met them at a place called Hethfield (now Hatfield in Yorkſhire) and there fought a bloody Battel, wherein King Edwin himſelf was ſlain, and his whole Army quite routed; in which Fight Oſfrid his Son, a Warlike Young Prince alſo fell; but Edfrid the Younger being compelled by neceſſity to ſurrender himſelf to Penda, was afterwards by him murthered, contrary to his Oath. This happen'd in the 17*th*. year of King Edwin's Reign, having till now been ſucceſsful in all his Undertakings.

* Ibid. cap. 20.

^ the British King

But there now enſued a very ſad Deſtruction of the Engliſh Nation of the Northumbers, ſince of theſe two Generals, the one was a profeſſed Pagan, and the other, though a Chriſtian in Name, yet ſhewed himſelf worſe than a Pagan; for Cadwallo, altho he profeſſed Chriſtianity, yet was ſo barbarous, that he ſpared neither Age not Sex, but put all to death with great Cruelty; tyranizing for a long while over all thoſe Provinces, and ſeeming reſolved quite to extirpate the Engliſh Nation; nor did he ſhew any reſpect to Churches or other Sacred Places; it being then the cuſtom of the Britains (in Bede's time) to ſet at nought the Faith and Religion of the Engliſh-Saxons; neither would they have any thing to do with them, more than with Pagans: But the Head of the ſlain King was brought to York, and there depoſited in the Church of St. Peter, which he himſelf had begun, and Oſwald his Succeſſor finiſhed. All things being thus in confuſion in thoſe parts, and no Refuge or Safety any where to be expected, Queen Æthelburga returned by Sea into Kent, together with Paulinus the Archbiſhop, and was there received with great Honour by King Eadbald and Archbiſhop Honorius; ſhe was conducted thither by Baſſe, a Valiant Captain of King Edwin's, who alſo brought with him Eanfrede the King's Daughter, as alſo Vſcfrea his Son, and Iſſi his Grandſon by Oſfrid; whom their Mother afterward, for fear of the Kings Eadbald and Oſwald, ſent into France to King Dagobert to be brought up, where they both died in their Infancy.

At which time alſo the Church of Rocheſter wanting a Paſtor, (Romanus the Biſhop having been drowned in going on a Meſſage to Rome) Paulinus at the requeſt of King Eadbald and Archbiſhop Honorius, took upon him the care of that Church, which he held as long as he lived.

Ibid. Lib. 3. Cap. 1.

After the Death of King Edwin, Oſric the Son of Elfric, his Uncle by the Father's ſide, obtained the Kingdom of Deira, who had been before received by Paulinus; whilſt Eanfrid, of the ſame Blood-Royal, as being the Son of Ethelfrid the laſt King before Edwin, ruled the Kingdom of Bernicia; ſo that during the Reign of Edwin, all the Sons of Ethelfrid, with many more of the Young Nobility of that Country, lived in Exile either with the Scots or Picts, by whom they were inſtructed in their Religious Rites, whilſt both theſe Kings laſt mentioned abjured the Chriſtian Religion, which they had before learnt and profeſſed; and relapſing to their old Idolatry, were ſhortly after cut off by Cadwallo, King of

of the Britains; for the next Summer Oſric having beſieged him in a certain Town, Cadwallo ſallying out with his Men, cut him off on a ſudden with all his Army; and then when he had ravaged the Northumbrian Provinces, not as a King, but a cruel Tyrant; and that at length Eanfrid came to him imprudently, with only Twelve Select Knights in his Company to treat of Peace, he put him to Death as he had done his Couſin before.

Ibid cap. 3.

That Year, ſaith Bede, Is ſtill at this day accounted unlucky, and hateful to all good Men, both in reſpect of the Apoſtacy of theſe Princes who renounced their Baptiſm; as alſo for the Tyranny of this Britiſh King: Whereupon it was agreed by thoſe who computed the Reigns of the Northumbrian Kings, to aboliſh the Memory of theſe Infidels, and to caſt this Year into the Reign of the Pious King Oſwald, who ſucceeding after the Death of his Brother Eanfrid, and marching with a ſmall Force, (but fortified by Faith in Chriſt) routed Cadwalla, that Prince of the Britains, with his vaſt Army, which nothing could reſiſt, as he boaſted; and, who was ſlain in a place, which in the Engliſh Tongue is called Deniſesbourn, or Brook, the place (ſaith our Authour) is ſhewn at this day, and had in great Veneration; where Oſwald being to give Battle erected a large Wooden-Croſs, and he himſelf laboured in ſetting of it up; which when he had finiſhed, he thus ſpoke to his Army; Let us now kneel down, and joyntly pray unto the Omnipotent, and only true God, that he would mercifully defend us from this proud Enemy; for he knows that we undertake a juſt War for defence of our Nation and Religion: The place is in the Engliſh Tongue called Heofenfield (or Heavenfield), lying near to the Wall which the Romans built from Sea to Sea, (which we now call the Pict's Wall:) The reſt of Bede's Miracles concerning this place, and Croſs, I omit, as very incredible and Superſtitious.

But before we leave this great Action of the Death of Cadwallo, I cannot omit taking notice of the Confidence of Geoffrey of Monmouth, who (notwithſtanding this expreſs Teſtimony of Bede to the contrary,) will make this Cadwallo not only to have overcome Edwin, and other Saxon Kings in divers Battles, and to have forced them to ſubmit themſelves to him, and do him Homage at London, and that living and dying Victorious, he was there buried, and his Body being put into a Braſen Statue of a Man on Horſe-back, was ſet over Ludgate for a terror to the Saxons, having Reigned Forty Eight Years; all which is notoriouſly falſe, for London had been part of the Eaſt-Saxon Kingdom, for above One Hundred Years, when this King was kill'd, who did not Reign Twenty Years in all.

Id. cap. 3

But the ſame King Oſwald, as ſoon as ever he came to the Kingdom, deſiring that all his Subjects might profeſs the Chriſtian Faith, ſent to the Scotch Biſhops (for ſo I ſuppoſe the Words Majores natu, in Bede are to be rendered) among whom, whilſt he was in Baniſhment, he had together with his followers received Baptiſm, deſiring them that a Biſhop might be ſent him; by whoſe Preaching the People whom he Govern'd might be grounded in the Chriſtian Religion, and receive Baptiſm; nor was he long without an anſwer to his requeſt, for they ſoon ſent him Aidan, a Man of great Meekneſs, Piety and Moderation; only Bede finds fault with him, That he had Zeal, but not according to Knowledge, in that he obſerved Eaſter day according to the cuſtom of his own Nation, and that of the Picts, of which I have ſufficiently ſpoken already: But ſo ſoon as this Biſhop came to him, he gave him a place for his Epiſcopal See, in the Iſle of Lindisfarn, where he himſelf deſired it, which place is Pena-Inſula, except when the Sea quite overflows that neck of Land which joyns it to England: But this King took care, by hearkening to the Inſtructions of this good Biſhop, to propagate Chriſt's Church in his Kingdom, which during his Reign, extended over both Deira, and Bernicia, being then both united into one; and it was often obſerved as an unuſual ſpectacle, that whil'ſt the Biſhop Preacht (who being a Scot did not ſpeak Engliſh, ſo as to be well underſtood,) the King being preſent, and with his Courtiers and Officers, having learn't the Scotiſh Tongue, during the time of his baniſhment, would himſelf interpret the Biſhops Sermon to them, and many Scotiſh Prieſts coming into thoſe Provinces of Britain where King Oſwald Reigned, began to Preach, and Baptize thoſe that believed; ſo that now Churches were built in divers places, to which the People aſſembling rejoyced to hear the Word of God; there were alſo given by the King ſeveral Lands and Poſſeſſions to build Monaſteries, for they were chiefly Monks, who now came hither to Preach; for Biſhop Aidan was himſelf a Monk ſent from the Monaſtery of the Iſle of Hye, of which we have ſaid enough in the laſt Book.

Id. Cap. 5. But of the Humility and Piety of this Biſhop Aidan, Bede gives us a very large account, in ſeveral inſtances of it; for he ſeems to have been an excellent pattern for ſucceeding Biſhops and Clergy Men to follow: For he tells us, That all who travelled with him (I ſuppoſe in his Viſitation or Converſions) were they profeſſed Monks or only Lay-Bretheren, were obliged to beſtow their time either in reading the Scriptures, or elſe in learning the Pſalms by heart: but to let you ſee how much more Humility and Condeſcention are able to prevail than Pride and Auſterity, Bede tells us, That the King of the Scots firſt ſent another Biſhop to King Oſwald, who being of a very rough Auſtere Temper, could therefore do but little good among the Engliſh; ſo that being forced to return home again, he laid the fault upon their Rude, Irreclameable Diſpoſitions; whereupon the Scotch Clergy being grieved at his return, called a Synod to conſider what was beſt to be done in this caſe; when Aidan, who was then preſent, told this Biſhop, That he thought he had been too harſh and ſevere to his Ignorant Auditors, and had not, according to the Apoſtle's Rule, firſt given them the Milk of milder Doctrine, till by degrees they ſhould be able to receive, and digeſt the more perfect and harder precepts of God's Word; which as ſoon as they heard, they all turn'd their Eyes upon him, and reſolved he ſhould be ſent to Convert the Ignorant, unbelieving Engliſh, becauſe he was endued with Prudence, the Mother of all other Vertues, thô he was not wanting in thoſe alſo.

Id. Cap. 6. The ſame Authour, alſo gives us as high a Character, with many Examples of the great Humility, Affability and Charity of King Oſwald; as that being once at Dinner, it was told him, There were a great multitude of Poor People at his Gate, deſiring Alms; whereupon he immediately ſent them a large Silver Diſh full of Meat from his own Table, and order'ed the Diſh afterwards to be broken into ſmall pieces and diſtributed among them; upon this Biſhop Aidan taking him by the Right Hand, ſaid thus; Let this Hand never corrupt, which ſaying gave occaſion to the Miracle, (whether falſe or real I ſhall not now diſpute) concerning the incorruptibility of King Oſwald's Right Arm, which Bede hath hath given us ſo many ſtrange Relations of, and that it was preſerved uncorrupt in the Church of Peterburgh in his time: Of this King he alſo tells us, That by his Induſtry the Provinces of Deira and Bernicia, which had been almoſt in perpetual Diſcord, were now (as I may ſay) united into one People, ſo that he received all the Nations and Kingdoms of Britain under his Protection: He was Nephew to King Edwin by his Siſter Acca, and it was fit that ſo great a Predeceſſour ſhould have one of his own Blood to ſucceed him. * This year (according to Bede) Oswald King of the [illegible] being deceasing [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

~~But~~ we ſhall proceed now to the Converſion of the Weſt-Saxons, which the ſame Author thus relates: At this time the Nation of the Weſt-Saxons (which were anciently called Gewiſſes) received the Chriſtian Faith in the Reign of Cynegils, by the preaching of Byrinus an Italian, who being ordained Biſhop by Aſterius Biſhop of Genoua, by the Order of Pope Honorius, came into Britain; and thô he had promiſed the Pope to preach the Goſpel in the moſt inland parts of the Iſland, where it never had been heard of before, yet landing in the Country of the Weſt-Saxons, and finding them to be altogether Heathens, he thought it better to preach the Goſpel there, than to ſeek further; which, when he had done for ſome time, and that the King (being ſufficiently inſtructed) was to be Baptized, with his People, it happened that Oſwald, the Victorious King of the Northumbers, was there preſent, and received him coming out of the Font as his Godfather, intending alſo to make him his Son-in-Law, and then both Kings joyned in conferring on the ſaid Biſhop a City, which was called in Latin Dorinca (now Dorcheſter) in Oxfordſhire, there to fix his Epiſcopal See; but divers Years after, when many Churches had been built, and much People converted to Chriſt by his means, he at laſt deceaſed, and was buried in that City, (for ſo Bede ſtiles it,) thô it be now but a poor Country Town.

Will. of Malmesbury adds to this Relation of Bede, That King Cynegils was quickly perſwaded to ſubmit to the preaching of the Biſhop, but that Cwichelme his Brother, (and Partner in the Kingdom,) did for ſome time refuſe it; till being admoniſhed by Sickneſs, that he ſhould not neglect the Salvation of his Soul, he was at laſt baptized, and the ſame Year died, which is confirmed by the Saxon Chronicle under the Year following; thô omitting the Baptiſm of Cynegils, it only mentions that of Cwichelme, adding, That the ſame Year he departed this Life, ~~and that~~ & Biſhop Felix preached the Faith of Chriſt to the Eaſt-Angles: This Felix was a Burgundian, the firſt Biſhop ~~in~~ of Dunwich in Suffolk, where he founded his Epiſcopal See; him whom Pope Honorius sent ~~over~~ into England and so preach the Gospel to the East-Angles.

This Earcombert was the firſt Engliſh King, who commanded Idols to be deſtroyed throughout his whole Kingdom; and who alſo by his Authority ordained, That the Forty Days before Eaſter (now called Lent) ſhould be obſerved; and that it ſhould not be contemned, appointed competent Puniſhments for thoſe that ſhould dare to tranſgreſs it.

Of which, Bede gives us a more particular Account, That refuſing to receive the Chriſtian Faith, he not long after loſt his Kingdom; for having divorced his Wife, the Siſter of Penda King of the Mercians, he had therefore not only War made upon him, but was driven out of his Kingdom upon that account; ſo that he was forced to retire to Anna King of the Eaſt-Angles, with whom remaining 3 Years in Baniſhment, he came firſt to the knowledge of, and there received the true Faith, for that King was a good Man, and happy in a pious Iſſue.

Anno Dom. DCXLVI.

‘This Year King Cenwalc was baptized: And, as William of Malmesbury relates, after 3 Years baniſhment, gathering freſh Forces, recovered his Kingdom, and proved the greateſt of the Weſt-Saxon Kings that had reigned hitherto, as ſhall be in due time related: But Bede tells us, That after this King had been ſome time reſtored, there came out of Ireland a certain Biſhop called Agelbert, a French Man, who offered himſelf to the King to preach the Goſpel, whoſe Learning and Induſtry when the King underſtood, he offered him the Biſhoprick of that Province which was then void by the death of Birinus and conſenting ſenting to the King's Deſires, he remained ~~there~~ Biſhop of Dorcheſter ſeveral Years; till the King finding he could not learn Engliſh, and growing weary of his bad Pronunciation, introduced another Biſhop, one Wini of his own Nation, over his Head, who had been ordained in France, and ſo dividing the Province into two Dioceſſes, ſettled the latter in his Epiſcopal See at Wincheſter; at which Agelbert being offended, becauſe the King had done it without his Knowledge and Conſent, he returned into France, and there accepting of the Biſhoprick of Paris, died an old Man; but not many Years after his departure, Wini being driven from his ~~Biſhoprick~~, retired to Wulfer King of Mercia, and buying of him the Epiſcopal See of the City of London for a Sum of Money, ſate there Biſhop as long as he lived; thus Simony crept very early into the Engliſh Saxon Church: So the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, was no ſmall time without a Biſhop, whereupon King Cenwalc being afflicted with great loſſes in his Wars, ſent Meſſengers into France, to Biſhop Agelbert, deſiring him to return, and reaſſume the Biſhoprick he had left; but he excuſed himſelf, that he could not return, being already engaged in another Charge; yet to comply as far as he could to the King's deſires, he ſent him his Nephew Elutherius a Prieſt, to be ordained Biſhop if he pleaſed; who being Honourably received by the King and People, and having been ordained Biſhop by Theodorus, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, did for many Years Govern alone the Dioceſs of the Weſt-Saxons. This, thô happening in a courſe of ſome Years, is by Bede related as one continued Story. and it appears by the Saxon Chronicle, that this Bishop

Chron. S.

" This Year K. Oſwin was ſlain, xii. Kal. of September: And within " twelve days afterwards died alſo Aidan the Biſhop.

Lib. 3. c. 14.

But the manner of this King's Death is by Bede thus related, That King Oſwin (who ſucceeded K. Oſwald his Brother,) had, from the beginning of his Reign, a Conſort, or Sharer of the Royal Dignity of the Northumbrian Kingdom, called Oſwi, the Son of Uſric, of the Poſterity of King Edwin; whilſt Oſwin govern'd the Province of Deira for Seven Years with great Happineſs and Love of his Subjects; But Oſwy, who reigned in the Kingdom of Bernicia, would not long maintain Peace with him; 'till at laſt freſh Diſſentions ſtill ariſing between them, he deſtroyed Oſwin by Treachery; for both their Armies now lying near each other, as ready to fight, when Oſwin ſaw, that being weaker in Force, he was not able to wage Battle with him who came againſt him with a much greater Army, he judg'd it better to lay aſide all Thoughts of fighting, and to preſerve himſelf and his Men for ſome better Opportunity: So he ſent home his Army from a place called Wilfers Dun, and himſelf retired with only one ~~faithful Follo~~wer, to lie concealed in the Houſe of Earl Hunwald, whom he ſuppoſed to have been faithful to him; but it proved far otherwiſe, for by him he was betray'd, and there ſlain by the Command of K. Oſwi, together with his ~~faithful~~ Servant Tondhere, in the ninth year of his Reign, at a place called Ingerlingum.

This Fact of King Oſwy, as it was deteſtable to all Men, ſo it afterwards proved moſt hateful to himſelf; who, repenting of it, built there a Monaſtery to expiate the Crime, and to pray, as well for his own Soul as for that of the King he had kill'd. This King Oſwin was a Man of a beautiful Aſpect, tall of Stature, affable, and very bountiful; all which excellent Endowments, both of Mind and Body, procured him ſuch Reputation, that he was generally beloved; and many Noble Perſons, out of all the Engliſh Provinces, thought themſelves happy if they could get into his Service; but above all, his Humility and ſingular Modeſty were moſt remarkable, whereof Bede gives us this Inſtance: K. Oſwin had beſtowed an excellent Horſe upon Aidan, (that charitable Bp of Lindisfarne,) but the Biſhop, when a poor Man ask'd an Alms, gave him the Horſe with all the rich Furniture upon him: The King hearing of this, as they were going to Dinner, ſaid to him, My Lord Biſhop, Why would you give that Noble Horſe, that I beſtowed upon you for your own Saddle, to a poor Man? Have we not many worſe Horſes, and other Things, which would better ſerve the Poor, inſtead of this Horſe I made choice of for your own riding? The Biſhop inſtantly replied, Sir, What do you ſay? Is that Son of a Mare more dear to you than the Son of GOD? With that they went to Dinner, the Biſhop took his Seat, but the King, being newly come in from Hunting, ſate down by the Fire with his Attendants; but remembring what the Biſhop had ſaid, he roſe ſuddenly up, and giving his Sword to his Servant, ran haſtily to the Biſhop, and falling down at his Feet, beſought him not to be angry, affirming, he would never after ſpeak, or concern himſelf, whatever he gave to the Children of GOD. ‸ The Biſhop being wonderfully amazed, and riſing haſtily from his Seat, raiſed him up, telling him, he was very well pleaſed if he would but ſit down to Dinner, and be chearful: The King then, at his Requeſt, began to be merry; but the Biſhop to be ſad, inſomuch that he ſhed Tears; of which his Prieſt taking Notice, and in their own Language (being the Scottiſh, which neither Oſwin nor his Servants underſtood,) demanded the Reaſon: I know (ſaith he,) that the King will not live long, for till now I never beheld an humble King; whence I apprehend, that he will ſpeedily be taken away from us; for this Nation is not worthy of ſuch a Governor. Not long after, this Preſage of the Biſhop was fulfilled in the Murther of Oſwin (as you have heard): But Aidan lived 'till the twelfth day after his Death, and then died himſelf on the laſt of Auguſt: Of the Miracles of which Biſhop, Bede gives us ~~too long an~~ an incredible ~~Account either~~ to be believed, or ~~or~~ inſerted here.

"This Year Cenwal, (King of the Weſt-Saxons,) fought at Bradenford, "near the River Afene (in Wiltſhire); but it is pity that our Annals had not told us againſt whom he fought, which I cannot find in any Author, thô it is moſt likely to have been againſt the Mercians; for Ethelward, in his Chronicle, ſays, That Cenwal, about this time, was engaged in a Civil War, which muſt be underſtood with thoſe of his own Country, and the Mercians were his next Neighbours. together with his whole Nation, would receive Baptiſm; but he having heard the Preaching of the Goſpel, through the Hope of a future Immortality, voluntarily profeſſed that he would be a Chriſtian, whether he had married the Virgin or not; being chiefly perſuaded to receive the Faith by Alcfrid, the Son of King Oſwy, who was his Friend and Relation, having married Cymburge his Siſter: So that King was baptiſed by Biſhop Finan, together with all his Train, in that famous Town of the King's, which Bede calls Admurum (that is, Walltown, near the Picts Wall); and taking with him four Prieſts to teach and baptiſe his Nation, he return'd home with much Joy; theſe Prieſts coming with the King into this Province preach'd GOD's Word, and were as willingly heard and receiv'd; and both, the Noble as well as the inferior ſort, renouncing their Idolatry, were baptiſed; nor did King Penda himſelf prohibit them from preaching in his own Kingdom, if they would, but rather hated and deſpiſed thoſe, whom, profeſſing the Faith of Chriſt, he found not to perform Works ſuitable to it; calling them miſerable and contemptible Wretches, who failed to obey that GOD in whom they believed. Theſe Things fell out two Years before the Death of King Penda.

Bede Ib. c. 22.

About the ſame time the Eaſt-Saxons, at the Inſtance of King Oſwy, again received the Chriſtian Faith, which they had formerly rejected, having (as you have heard,) driven away Mellitus their Biſhop; for Sigebert, who was now King of that Nation, having ſucceeded Sigebert, Sirnamed The Little; This Prince being a Friend to King Oſwye, and uſing to come ſometimes to viſit him into the Kingdom of Northumberland, he was wont often to tell him, That thoſe could not be GODS that were the Works of Mens Hands; but that GOD was an Incomprehenſible Being, Inviſible, Omnipotent, and Eternal, who govern'd all Things both in Heaven and Earth, and would judge the World in Equity; and that all thoſe who would learn, and do His Will, ſhould receive Eternal Rewards: Theſe and many other ſuch Things, when King Oſwy had often inculcated with a Brotherly Affection, at laſt by the Perſuaſion of that King, and of divers of his Friends, he alſo Believed, and was baptiſed, with all his Followers, at the ſame place where Peadda had been Chriſtned before, (viz. at Wall-Town above-mentioned). King Sigebert, being thus made a Chriſtian, returned to his own Kingdom, only asking of King Oſwy to appoint him ſome Teachers, who might convert and baptiſe his Nation into the Faith of Chriſt; ſo the King ſent to the Kingdom of the Mercians, and called back Cedda, who had been before ſent thither; and giving him a certain Prieſt for his Companion, ſent him to preach the Word to the Eaſt-Saxons: When theſe had paſſed through all places, and had gathered a very large Church, it happened ſome time after, that Cedda, returning home, went to Lindisfarne, to confer with Biſhop Finan; who, when he found the Work of the Goſpel to have ſo well proſpered under his Miniſtery, calling to him Two other Biſhops, ordained Cedda Biſhop over the Nation of the Eaſt-Saxons; who thereupon returned into his own Province, and finiſhing the Work he had begun with greater Authority, Built Churches in many places, and ordained Prieſts and Deacons, who might help him in the Preaching of the Word and Baptiſm; eſpecially in a City, which is called in the Engliſh Tongue, Ithanceſtir, as alſo in that which is called Tylabury; the former of which places was upon the Bank of the River Pent, and the other is near the Thames (now called Tilbury) in which having gathered together a ſmall company of Chriſt's Servants, he taught them the Diſcipline of a Monaſtick Liſe, as far as they were capable to receive it.

This Year, (according to the Saxon Annals) Anna, King of the Eaſt-Angles was Slain; being overcome in Fight by King Penda, of whom H.Huntington gives us but a ſlender Account, only that Anna and his whole Army periſhed in a moment, by the edge of the Sword; ſo that ſcarce any of them remained.

This Year alſo, one Bottulf began to Build a Monaſtery at Icanho (ſuppoſed to be Boſton in Lincoln-ſhire). As alſo Honorius, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, Deceaſed on 20. Kal. Octob. The ſame Year likewiſe (according to Mat. Weſtminſter) Ercombert King of Kent Deceaſing, Egbert his Son Succeeded him; in the beginning of whoſe Reign, Æthelbert, and Æthelred, the Sons of his Unkle Ermenred, being but Youths, were cruelly Murdered by one Thunor, the King's Servant, without his privity; whoſe Bodies were ſtrangely diſcovered, where they were buried, by a Light from Heaven: whereupon their Bodies were removed to the Monaſtery of Warinens: The Miracles that followed in the doing of which, I omit as incredible.

Anno Dom. DCLV.

This Year King Penda was Slain at Winwidfeld, with Thirty others of the Royal Blood.

Lib. 3. c. 16.

Of which Battle Bede gives us a particular account; That Oſwi having long endured the Ravages, and Devaſtations of his Country by the Inroads of King Penda, and having had his ſtrong City of Bebbanburg (now Bamburrough Caſtle) aſſaulted, and ſet on Fire, and thereby very near taking, found himſelf too weak to reſiſt, and offering him many Rich Preſents, deſired to buy a Peace; which Penda proudly refuſing, and reſolving nothing leſs ſhould ſatisfie him than this King's deſtruction; Oſwi upon that turning his Gifts into Vows to God, implored the Divine Aſſiſtance; devoting his Daughter (then but one Year Old) to be a Nun, and with Twelve Portions of Land, (whereof each maintained Ten Families,) to build and endow Monaſteries: So it ſeems, his Vows proved more ſucceſsful than his Treaties; for hereupon, he with Alfred his Son, gathering a ſmall Army, therewith encountred, and diſcomfited the Mercians, having then Invaded and waſted the Northumbrian Kingdom, thô they were Thirty times more in number, and led by experienced Captains: This Battle was fought near a place called Loyden (now Leeds in Tork-ſhire;) beſides this Ethelwald, the Son of Oſwald, who ruled in Deira, took part with the Mercians, but in the Fight withdrew his Forces, and in a ſafe place waited for the Event; with which unſeaſonable Retreat, the Mercians perhaps, being terrified, and miſdoubting greater danger fled; their Commanders together with Penda himſelf, being almoſt all Slain; amongſt whom was Ethelher, King of the Eaſt-Angles, who forgeting the Death of his Brother K. Anna, formerly Slain by Penda, now took part with him, and was the chief Authour of this War; many as they were flying were drown'd in the River Winved, then ſwoln above her Banks: The death of Penda, that Cruel, and Heathen King, cauſed a General rejoycing among the Chriſtians, according to the Old Engliſh ſaying, (mentioned by Mathew Weſtminſter) at Winved: So that after Penda had been the death of no leſs than Four or Five Chriſtian Kings, whom he ſlew in Battle, he himſelf underwent the ſame Fate; ſo little Difference is there between the deaths of Good, and Bad Princes; only the former are ~~called~~ God's Corrections, but the latter his Judgments.

Anno Dom. DCLV.

But to Ethelher, ſucceeded Ethelwald his Brother, and to Penda his Son Peadda, who being a Chriſtian and Son in Law to Oſwi himſelf, he allowed him to hold the Province of South Mercia, divided from the Northern, by the River of Trent, then containing (according to Bede) Five Thouſand Families,) to be held as Tributary to the Northumbrian Kingdom.

After this the Mercians became all Chriſtians, by the means of King Oſwi, and Peadda: and here that Copy of the Saxon Chronicle, Written in the Abby of Peterburgh, gives us a large account of the Foundation of that Abby, which is thus; "That in the Time of this Peadda, he "and Oſwi, the Brother of King Oſwald met, and conferred about building a Monaſtery, in honour of Chriſt and St. Peter, which they afterwards did, and gave it the Name of Medeſhamſted, from a certain "Well, which is ~~there~~, called Medeſwell; ſo they laid the Foundations, "and when they had near finiſhed the Work, they committed it to the "Care of a certain Monk, called Saxulf, who was dear to God, and beloved of all the Nation; for he was a Rich, and Noble Perſon in his "time, but is now much richer in Chriſt.

This Year alſo, (Honorius the Archbiſhop deceaſing, on the 7th of the Calends of April) Ithamer Biſhop of Rocheſter, Conſecrated Deus Dedit to be Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury. This was the firſt Engliſh Monk, that had ever been choſen Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and was alſo the firſt that was Conſecrated but by one Biſhop; for the better ſound ſake, he changed his Name to Deus Dedit, having been before called Fridona, or Fridon.

Anno Dom. DCLVI.

This Year was Peadda Slain about Eaſter, by the Treachery of his Wife, the Daughter of K. Oſwy, and Wulfher (his Brother) the Son of Penda ſucceeded him.

Thô not until ſome Years after; for upon the Death of Peadda, King Oſwi ſeized ~~alſo~~ that part of the Kingdom, and held next his own ~~and laid~~ it ſo his ~~own Dominions~~. some time. *

Here the Saxon Chronicle proceeds to give us a further account, concerning the finiſhing of the aforeſaid Monaſtery of Peterburgh; but thô it was done ſome Years after, and the Relation be ſomewhat long, yet becauſe it ſhews more plainly than any other Hiſtory, the Form and Manner of erecting ſuch a Foundation, I ſhall give you the ſubſtance of it, omitting what is not pertinent to our purpoſe. The ſaid Chronicle proceeds thus,

"That in his (*viz. when it was told the King, he was very joyful, and ſent to give notice of it to all his Thanes throughout the whole Nation, as alſo the Arch-Biſhop, Biſhops Earls and all who loved God, that they ſhould come to him; ſo he appointed them a day when the Monaſtery ſhould be Conſecrated; at which Conſecration King Wulfer, and his Brother Ethelred, and his Siſters were all preſent, as was alſo Arch-Biſhop Deus Dedit, and Ithamer Biſhop of Rocheſter, together with Wina Biſhop of London, and ſeveral other Biſhops: There were alſo preſent all the Thanes that were in his Kingdom, when this Monaſtery was Conſecrated, in the Names of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Andrew: Then the King riſing up from his Chair, ſpoke thus, with a loud Voice before all his Thanes; Thanks be to the moſt High and Omnipotent GOD, for this honour which he hath done me, and I will, That you all confirm my Words; I Wulfer do give this Day to St. Peter, and to Saxulf, and to the Monks of this Monaſtery, all theſe Lands, Waters, &c. and all the Territories lying round about them, which are of my Royal Patrimony; ſo freely that no Man ſhall have thence any Tribute or Revenue, beſides the Abbot and Monks, which Gift is this; Then the King proceeded to declare the Meets and Bounds of the Lands, which he had given; which becauſe they are not to our purpoſe, I omit, only that they reach'd as far as Stamford, and were above Threeſcore Miles about; then ſaid the King, The Gift indeed is ſmall, but I will, that they hold it ſo freely, that none may exact any Gueld or Tribute out of it, but what is id to the Monks; and I do hereby free this Monaſtery, from being ſubject to any, but the See of Rome; but I will alſo, That all thoſe who cannot go thither, ſhould here implore to St. Peter: " When the King had ſpoke theſe things, the Abbot made a requeſt to him, in the behalf of certain Religious Monks, who deſired to lead the Lives of Anchorites, and therefore prayed, that on a certain Iſland, a ſmall Monaſtery ſhould be Built, wherein they might live in Peace and Solitude; which was preſently granted by the King; then he alſo deſired his Brothers and Siſters, that for the good of their Souls, they would be witneſſes to his Charter; conjuring all thoſe who ſhould ſucceed him, to preſerve his Gift Inviolate, as they hoped to be partakers of Eternal Life, and would eſcape Eternal Torments; then follow the Names of the Witneſſes, who were preſent, and who ſubſcribed, and with the ſign of the Croſs confirmed it, by their conſents; that is, King Wulfer, who firſt of all confirmed it with his Word, and then ſign'd it with the Croſs, and then ſpake thus, I King Wulfer with the Earls, Heoretoghs, and Thanes, being Witneſſes of my Gift, do confirm it with Chriſt's Croſs, before the Arch-Biſhop Deus Dedit: Then follow the Subſcriptions of the Kings, and others of the Blood Royal, (viz.) Oſwi, King of Northumberland, King Sygar, King Sibbi; Ethelred the King's Brother, together with his Siſters above named, as alſo of Deus Dedit, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; after whom follow the Subſcriptions of the reſt of the Biſhops, together with ſome Presbyters and Saxulf the Abbot; as alſo of divers Eoldermen or Governours of Countries, who with divers others of the King's great Men, did likewiſe confirm it: This Charter was made in the Year after our Lord's Nativity, 664, being the Seventh Year of King Wulfer's Reign: they did then alſo denounce the Curſe of God, and all his Saints againſt all that ſhould violate any thing that was there done; to which they all anſwered, Amen. Anno Dom. DCLIX. " This Year, according to Florence of Worceſter, Hilda the Abbeſs " Founded a Monaſtery at a place called Streanſhale, wherein ſhe lived " and dyed Abbeſs.

The ſame Year alſo, according to the ſame Author, Inumin, Eaba and Eadbert, Eoldermen of Mercia, rebelled againſt King Oſwi, and pro-claimed for their King, Wulfer, the Son of Penda, whom they had hithert kept concealed; Alſo Ædelbert, or Aglbert the Biſhop left King Cenwalch, and took the Biſhoprick of Paris; and Wina held th Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, of both which Bede hath already given us a parricular account.

Anno Dom. DCLXIV.

“ The Sun was now eclipſed Vº. Non Maij; and Ercenbryht King of “ Kent departed this Life, and Ecgbryht his Son ſucceeded him in that Kingdom.

As for King Ercombert, Will. Malmesbury gives him a very good Character, being famous for his Religion to God, and his Love to his Country ; but he had no Right to the Crown ſave only by Election, having an Elder Brother, called Ermenred, who was alive at the beginning of his Reign, and left two Sons behind him.

“ Coleman alſo with his Companions then departed to his own Nation;
“ the ſame Year there was a great Plague over all the Iſle of Britain, in “ which periſhed Tuda the Biſhop, and was buried at Wagele (which Bede “ calls Pegnaleth:) alſo Ceadda and Wilverth were now Conſecrated Bi-“ ſhops ; and the ſame Year too the Archbiſhop Deus Dedit dyed, after “ whom the See remained void for Four Years.

But of the occaſion of this departure of Coleman, Bede hath given us a long and particular account, (viz.) That a Synod being called at Streanſhall (now Whitby in York-ſhire) by the procurement of Hilda the Abbeſs of that place; thô by the Authority of King Oſwi, (who was there preſent,) concerning the old Difference about the obſervation of Eaſter; Wilfred the Abbot, and Romanus a Prieſt, were very earneſt for the obſervation of it, according to the Order of the Church of Rome; and Coleman Biſhop of Lindisfarne was as zealous on the other ſide; but after many Arguments pro and con, (which you may find at large in Bede,) the Synod at laſt determining in favour of the Romiſh Eaſter, it ſo far diſpleaſed Coleman, that he was reſolved to quit his Biſhoprick, and depart into Scotland, to the Iſle of Hye, (from whence he came,) rather than to comply with it; from whence he alſo departed into Ireland, (here called Scotland) where he built a Monaſtery in that Country, and lived all the reſt of his days, and in which only Engliſh Men were admitted, at the time when Bede wrote his Hiſtory.

Id. Cap. 25.

But after the departure of Coleman, one Tuda, who had been ordained Biſhop among the Southern Scots, was made Biſhop of Lindisfarne, but he enjoyed that Biſhoprick but a very little while.

But after the Death of Biſhop Tuda, (according to the Life of Biſhop Wilfrid) King Oſwi held a great Council with the Wiſe Men of his Nation, tion, whom they ſhould chuſe in the vacant See, as moſt fit for that holy Function, when they all with one Conſent nominated and choſe Abbot Wilfrid as the fitteſt and worthieſt Perſon to ſucceed him; but being to be Conſecrated; he refuſed it from any Biſhop at home, becauſe he look'd upon them all as Uncanonical, being all ordained by Scotiſh Biſhops, who differed from the Roman Church about this Point of keeping Eaſter; ſo that he would needs go over into France for Ordination; where ſtaying too long, the King put Ceadda (who had lately come out of Ireland) into his Place; which Wilfred upon his return much reſenting, retired to his Monaſtery at Ripon, and there reſided; as alſo ſometimes with Wulfher, King of Mercia, or elſe with Ecgbert King of Kent, till he was reſtored to his See.

Bede tells us, that the above-mentioned Eclipſe was followed by a ſudden Peſtilence the ſame Year, which firſt depopulating the Southern Parts of Britain, then proceeded to the Northern, wherein Biſhop Tuda deceaſed; it alſo invaded Ireland, and there took off many Religious, as well as Secular Perſons.

The ſame Year alſo (according to Florence) Ercombert King of Kent dying, left that Kingdom to Egbert his Son: Alſo Ethelwald King of the Eaſt Angles dying this Year, Aldulf ſucceeded him.

Lib. 4. c. 30.

About this time (according to Bede) Siger and Sebba, ſucceeding Swidhelm in the Kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons, being unſteady in the Faith, and ſuppoſing the late great Peſtilence to have fell upon them for renouncing their old Superſtition, relapſed again to Idolatry, and rebuilt the Idol-Temples, hoping by that means to be defended from the preſent Mortality; but as ſoon as Wulfher, King of the Mercians, (to whom this Kingdom was then ſubject) heard of it, he ſent Biſhop Jaruman to them, who, together with their Fellow-Labourers, by their ſound Doctrine, and gentle Dealing, ſoon reclaimed them from their Apoſtacy.

Anno Dom. DCLXV.

This Mortality is alſo partly confirmed by Mat. Weſtminſter, who the next Year relates ſo great a Mortality to have raged in England, that many Men going in Troops to the Sea-ſide, caſt themſelves in headlong, preferring a ſpeedy Death before the Torments of a long and painful Sickneſs; thô this ſeems to be no other than the great Peſtilence which raged the Year before, unleſs we ſuppoſe it to have laſted for 2 Years ſucceſſively.

The ſame Year alſo, according to the Account of an ancient Britiſh Chronicle, (l~~ately~~ in the Poſſeſſion of Mr. Robert Vaughan,) Cadwallader, laſt King of the Britains, having been forced by a great Famine and Mortality to quit his Native Country, and to ſojourn with Alan King of Armorica; finding no hopes of ever recovering his Kingdom, from thence went to Rome, where, profeſſing himſelf a Monk, he died about 8 Years after. Now, thô the Britiſh Hiſtory of Caradoc (Tranſlated by Humphrey Lloyd, and Publiſhed by Dr. Powel,) places Cadwallader's going to Rome Anno 680, which, Mr. Vaughan in the Manuſcript I have by me, (and which is already cited in the former Book) proves, can neither agree with the Account of the ſaid old Chronicle, nor yet with the Time of the great Mortality above-mentioned; for Caradoc and Geoffery of Monmouth do both place Cadwallader's going to Rome in the Year of the great Peſtilence, which (as Bede and Mat. Weſtminſter teſtifie) fell out in the Year 664, or 665, and therefore that learned Antiquary very well obſerves, That as for their Calculation, who prolong Cadwallader's Life to the Year 688, or 689, and place his going to Rome in Pope Sergius's time, he he thinks they had no better Warrant for it, than their miſtaking Ceadwalla, King of the Weſt Saxons, (who then indeed went to Rome, and there died) for this Cadwallader, who lived near 20 Years before, whereby they have confounded this Hiſtory, and brought it into a great deal of uncertainty; whereas that ancient Appendix annex'd to the Manuſcript, Nennius, in the Cottonian Library, (whoſe Author lived above 300 Years before either Geoffery, or Caradoc,) doth clearly ſhew, that this ~~Monaſtery~~ Mortality above-mentioned, and conſequently Cadwallader's going to Rome, happened in the Reign of Oſwi King of Northumberland; who, according to the Saxon Annals, began to Reign Anno 642, and died Anno 670; and therefore no other Mortality ought to be aſſigned for Cadwallader's going to Rome, than this in King Oſwi's Reign, Anno 665, for the Words of the ſaid old Author are theſe: 'Oſwi, the Son of Ethelfred, reigned '28 Years, and 6 Months; and whilſt he reigned, there happened a great 'Mortality of Men, Catwalater (ſo he ſpells it) then reigning over the 'Britains, after his Father, and therein periſhed. Now the Caſe is clear, if theſe Words in the Latin, Et in ea periit, have relation to Cadwallader, (as moſt likely they have,) conſidering Oſwi lived 5 Years after the Year 665, wherein this Mortality raged; then Cadwallader never went to Rome at all, but died of this Plague; but of this, I dare not poſitively determine, ſince the greater part of the Welſh Chronicles are ſo poſitive in Cadwallader's dying at Rome. But to return to our Annals.

Anno Dom. DCLXVII.

'This Year Oſwi King of Northumberland, and Ecgbrith King of Kent, 'with the Conſent of the whole Engliſh Church, (as Bede relates,) 'ſent Wigheard the Presbyter to Rome, to be there made Arch-Biſhop of 'Canterbury, but he died almoſt as ſoon as he arrived: So that Theodorus being the next Year conſecrated Arch-Biſhop, was ſent into Britain. Of which Tranſaction, Bede gives us this particular Account.

Lib. 3. c. 29.

About this time alſo, (as Bede relates,) Wina Biſhop of Wincheſter being driven from his See by King Kenwalch, went and bought the See of London of King Wulfher. This is the firſt Example of Simony in the Engliſh Church.

The See of Canterbury had been now vacant for above 3 Years, for the Pope was reſolved himſelf to Ordain an Arch-Biſhop; and at laſt, at the Recommendation of one Adrian a Greek Monk, (who might have been Arch-Biſhop himſelf, but refuſed it,) the Pope choſe this Theodorus, then a Monk, and a Native of Tharſus in Cilicia; who, being an excellent Scholar, brought the knowledge of the Greek Tongue, as alſo Arithmetick, Muſick, and Aſtronomy, in uſe among the Engliſh Saxons.

Lib. 4. c. 2.

This Arch-Biſhop, immediately upon his coming into England, made a thorough Viſitation of his Province, and (as Bede tells us) ſurveyed all Things, and ordained Biſhops in fit Places; and thoſe Things which he found leſs perfect than they ſhould be, he by their Aſſiſtance corrected; among which, when he found fault with Biſhop Ceadda, as not having been rightly Conſecrated; he humbly and modeſtly replied, If you believe that I have not rightly undertook the Epiſcopal Charge, I willingly quit it, ſince as I never thought my ſelf worthy, ſo I never conſented to accept it, but in obedience to the Commands of my Superiours. But the Arch-Biſhop ſeeing his Humility, anſwered, "That he would not have him lay aſide "his Epiſcopacy; and ſo he again renewed his Ordination according to the Catholick Rites.

Anno Dom. DCLXVII.

From whence it appears, that this Arch-Biſhop then thought the Ordination of the Engliſh and Scotiſh Biſhops, who differed from the Church of Rome, as to the time of keeping Eaſter, to be Uncanonical; and for this reaſon Bede here alſo tells us, That Biſhop Wilfrid was ſent into France to be Ordained: But as for this Biſhop Ceadda, Florence of Worceſter informs us, That he was now alſo deprived of his Biſhoprick, (and Wilfrid reſtored to it,) as having been unduly Elected thereunto; which, thô Bede doth not tell us in expreſs Words, yet he confirms it in the very next Chapter, where he tells us, That Jaruman, Biſhop of the Mercians, being now dead, King Wulfher did not ask Arch-Biſhop Theodorus to Ordain a new One, but only deſired of King Oſwi, that Biſhop Ceadda, the Brother of Cedda, ſhould be ſent to him to take that Charge, (who lived privately at his Monaſtery of Leſtinghen, where he was then Abbot,) Wilfrid then not only Governing the Dioceſs of York, and all the Northumbers, but alſo the Picts as far as King Oſwi's Dominions extended. But to return again to the Saxon Annals.

'This Year King Egbert gave to Baſſe the Prieſt (the Saxon call) Reculſ, where he built 'a Monaſtery: This was afterwards called Reculver [in Kent].

Anno Dom. DCLXX.

'Oſwi, King of Northumberland, died xv Kal. Martij, [and was buried at 'Streanſhale Monaſtery,] and Ecverth (or Egfrid) his Son reigned after 'him; alſo Lothaire, Nephew of Biſhop Agelbert, took upon him the Epiſcopal Charge over the Weſt Saxons, and held it 7 Years; Arch-Biſhop Theodorus Conſecrated him. He whom theſe Annals call Lothair, was the ſame with Leutherius Biſhop of Wincheſter.

* Lib. 4. c. 5.

* Bede tells us further of King Oſwi, That being worn out with a long Infirmity, he was ſo much in love with the Roman Rites, that if he had recovered of the Sickneſs of which he died, he had reſolved to go to Rome, and end his Days at the Holy Places; having engaged Biſhop Wilfrid to be the Guide and Companion of his Journey, promiſing him no ſmall Rewards for his Pains.

Anno Dom. DCLXXI.

'This Year was a great ſlaughter of Birds. H. Huntington renders it a great Fight of Birds, which ſeems to have been ſome remarkable Combat of Crows or Jackdaws in the Air, of which we have ſeveral wonderful Relations in our Hiſtories. Mat. Weſtminſter relates, that the ſtrange Birds ſeemed to flie before thoſe of this Country, but that many Thouſands were killed.

'This next Year Cenwalch King of the Weſt Saxons died, and Sexburga 'his Wife held the Kingdom after him for one Year. Of whom William of Malmesbury gives this Account; That this King dying, left the Kingdom to Sexburga his Wife; nor did ſhe want Spirit or Courage to diſcharge all the Functions of a King, for ſhe ſtraitways began to raiſe new Forces, as alſo to keep the Old to their Duty; to govern her Subjects with moderation, and to keep her Enemies in awe; and, in ſhort, to do ſuch great Things, that there was no Difference, but the Sex, between Her and a King: But as ſhe aimed at more than Feminine Undertakings, ſo ſhe left this Life when ſhe had ſcarce Reigned a Year about.

But Mat. Weſtminſter ſays, ſhe was expelled the Kingdom by the Nobles, who deſpiſed Female Government: But what Authority he had for this, I know not, for I do not find it in any other Author; whereas if what William of Malmesbury ſays of her be true, it was not likely they ſhould Rebel againſt ſo good a Governeſs, who ſeems to have been the perfect Pattern of an Excellent Queen.

Anno Dom. DCLXXII.

& who takes no notice of Queen Sexburga

After the Death of King Cenwalch, and (as I ſuppoſe) Queen Sexburga likewiſe, Bede relates, That the Great Men or Petty Princes of that Kingdom, divided it among them, and ſo held it for 10 Years; in which time Eleutherius, Biſhop of the Weſt Saxons (i. e. of Wincheſter) dying, Heddi was Conſecrated by Arch-Biſhop Theodorus in his ſtead; in whoſe time thoſe Petty Princes being all ſubdued, Cendwalla took the Kingdom; but this does not agree with the Saxon Annals.

Lib. 4. c. 12.

About this time (thô Bede does not ſet down the Year) King Egfrid of Northumberland waging War with Wulfher, King of Mercia, won from him all the Country of Lindſey.

About this time alſo died Ceadda, Biſhop of Litchfield, (according to Ran. Higden's Polychron;) but Bede does not tell us the time of his Death, thô he mentions it, and there gives a large Account of the great Humility and Piety of that good Biſhop, and of the Pious End he made: He is called by us at this day St. Chad.

Anno Dom. DCLXXIII.

This Year Egbert, King of Kent, deceaſed, (according to Bede's Epitome,) who (as ſays Math. Weſtminſter) gave part of the Iſle of Thanet to build a Monaſtery, to expiate the Murder of his Couſins, whom he had cauſed to be ſlain, as you have already heard.

The ſame Year was a Synod of all the Biſhops and great Men of England held at Heortford, (now Hartford,) which Synod (as Bede tells us) was called by Arch-Biſhop Theodorus; where Wilfred Biſhop of York, with all the reſt of the Biſhops of England, were either in Perſon, or by their Deputies, (as Florence relates,) and in which divers Decrees were made for the Reformation of the Church; the firſt and chiefeſt of which was, That Eaſter ſhould be kept on the firſt Lord's Day after the Fourteenth Moon of the Firſt Month (~~i. e. January~~); which thô it had been before appointed by the Synod at Streanſhale above-mentioned, yet that being not looked upon as a General Council of the whole Kingdom, it was now again renewed; the reſt of them concerning the Juriſdictions of the Biſhops, and the Priviledges and Exemptions of Monaſteries, I paſs over, and refer you to Sir H. Spelman's Firſt Volume of Councils for farther ſatisfaction: But I cannot omit, that it was here firſt Ordained, That thô Synods ought to be held twice a Year, yet ſince divers Cauſes might hinder it, therefore it ſeem'd good to the whole Council, that a Synod ſhould be aſſembled once a Year at a place called Cloveſhoe.

Lib. 4. c. 5.

i.e. March 9. [illegible]

This Year alſo the Saxon Annals relate, 'That Etheldrethe, late Wife to 'Egfrid King of Northumberland, founded the Monaſtery of Ely, (in 'which ſhe her ſelf became the firſt Abbeſs.) She (as Bede tells us) had been twice married, but would never let either of her Husbands enjoy her; and at laſt (with much ado) obtained Leave of this King to quit his Palace, and retire into a Nunnery; which perverting of the Ends of Marriage, was counted a great piece of Sanctity in thoſe Times. But the Monaſtery above-mentioned being burnt and deſtroyed by the Danes, Anno 870, was afterwards re-edified by King Edgar, as ſhall be in due time more particularly related.

Id. c. 19.

'Alſo Eglright, King of Kent, deceaſed; and Lothair, his Brother, ſucceeded him.

This Year alſo, according to Bede, Boſa Biſhop of Dunmoc being deprived by reaſon of his Infirmities; two Biſhops, (viz.) Acca and Bedwin, were placed in that Dioceſs, one of whom had his See at Dunmoc (now Dunwich) in Suffolk, and the other at Helmham in Norfolk.

Anno Dom. DCLXXIV.

'This Year Æſcwin began to Reign over the Weſt-Saxons.] Here alſo follows his Pedigree needleſs to be repeated; for William of Malmesbury remarks no more of him, than that he was ſuppoſed to be the next of the Royal Line, as being the great Nephew of Cynegils, by his Brother Cuthgils.

* Publiſhed by Sir Ja. Ware 1664, with other Pieces of Bede, and Arch-Biſhop Egbert; it is alſo in Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library.

The ſame Year (as Bede tells us in *his Lives of the Abbots of Wiremuth and Girwy) Abbot Benedict, (I ſuppoſe from his Epiſcopal Actions Sirnamed Biſcop,) having before come over with Arch-Biſhop Theodorus, was by him made Abbot of the Monaſtery of St. Peter in Canterbury; which he 2 Years after reſigning, and Adrian, that great Scholar, ſucceeding him, he went again to Rome, and then returning into Britain, brought along with him many Books of Divine Knowledge; and then applying himſelf to Egfrid, King of Northumberland, he obtained of him as much Land as ſerved 70 Families, lying near the Mouth of the River Wir, (in the Biſhoprick of Durham,) where he began a Monaſtery in Honour of St. Peter; but before it was finiſhed, he went into France, and from thence brought Maſons, who built the Church of Stone after the Roman faſhion: and the Work being near finiſhed, he ſent into the ſame Country for Artificers, who underſtood the making of Glaſs, which till then had been unknown in Britain; wherewith he glazed the Windows of the Church and Monaſtery he had there built, and thereby taught the Engliſh Nation the Art of Glaſs-making; which (ſays my Author) hath proved ſo uſeful in making of Lamps for Churches, and alſo other Veſſels ſo neceſſary for divers Uſes: And becauſe this Iſland, nor yet France it ſelf, could then afford all the Ornaments requiſite for the Altar, he took care to fetch them from Rome, whither he went for that purpoſe; from whence again returning, he brought a great many choice Books of all ſorts, together with divers Relicks of Saints, and curious Pictures, with which he adorned the Church he had built; and he likewiſe received a Bull from Pope Agatho, whereby the Monaſtery alſo, by the Conſent and Licenſe of King Egfrid, was freed from all Secular Servitude.

But ſome time after, (Simeon of Durham ſays 8 Years,) King Egfrid (being very well ſatisfied with what Benedict had done) beſtowed as much more Land upon him as then maintained 40 Families, for the building of another Monaſtery at a Place called Girwy, (now Tarrov,) near the Mouth of the River Tine, which was built in Honour of St. Paul; when alſo, by reaſon of his frequent Abſence and Employment in other Affairs, he appointed one Eaſterwine his Kinſman, Abbot of that of St Peter; and Ceolfrid a Monk of the ſame Monaſtery, over that of S. Paul; in which Charges they continued ſeveral Years under his Inſpection; till at laſt, after the deceaſe of Eaſterwine, and another Abbot called Sigfrid, Ceolfrid above-mentioned was made Abbot of both Monaſteries, which he Governed many Years; untill He reſigning that Charge, went to end his Days at Rome, but died by the way in France. Theſe Tranſactions, thô happening in the ſpace of about 40 Years, I have here put together, that you may have at once the Hiſtory of theſe two ancient and famous Monaſteries, in the latter of which Bede himſelf (the Author of this Account) lived, and died a Monk, as ſhall be related hereafter.

About this time alſo, (thô Bede does not ſet down the Year,) Arch-Biſhop Theodore depoſed Winfrid, Biſhop of the Mercians, for ſome Canonical Diſobedience, and ordained Sexwulf, Abbot of Medeſhamſted, in his Room. But to return to the Annals.

'This Year Wulſher the Son of Penda, and Æſcwin Son of Cenwulf, 'fought at Bedanheafde; and alſo King Wulſher deceaſed the ſame Year.] Where that Place was, is uncertain, (thô ſome ſuppoſe it to be Bedwin in Wiltſhire, lying near Berkſhire.) H. Huntington deſcribes this Battle to have ~~been very~~ ſharp; but that the Mercian King, inheriting his Father's, and his Grandfather's Courage, was ſomewhat ſuperiour; yet that both Armies were terribly ſhattered, and many Thouſands ſlain on both Sides; on which our Author makes this juſt Reflection, 'That from 'hence it is worth while to obſerve, how Vile the Actions of Men, and 'how Vain thoſe Wars are, which Princes call Glorious Undertakings; for 'when theſe Kings had brought ſo great a Deſtruction upon their own 'Nations, both of them ſurvived not long after: For (according to Florence's Chronicle) King Wulſher deceaſed this Year, having deſtroyed the Worſhip of Idols throughout his Kingdom, and cauſed the Goſpel to be preached in all Places of his Dominions, and Ethelred his Brother ſucceeded him in the Kingdom; whom William of Malmesbury deſcribes to have been more famous for Devotion, than Fighting, unleſs when he ſhewed his Courage in a notable Expedition againſt Kent; or elſe when he met and repell'd Egfrid, King of Northumberland, and forced him to return home, recovering from him all Lindſey, which Wulſher had taken away before, thô with the loſs of his Brother Edwin, in that Expedition; after which, he ſpent all the reſt of his Life in Peace.

Anno Dom. DCLXXV.

About this time alſo, according to Math. Weſtminſter, (for Bede hath not ſet down the Years,) Erkenwald, younger Son of Anna King of the Eaſt Angles, was by Arch-Biſhop Theodore ordained Biſhop of London, being a Man of great Worth and Piety.

This Year alſo (according to Florence) King Wulſher was firſt baptized, but the Saxon Annals mention no ſuch thing; and therefore I wonder from whence he had it, for it is quite contrary to what Bede relates, concerning his being Baptized long before; or elſe, How could he be Godfather to Edelwalch, King of the Weſt Saxons, who was Baptized near 20 Years before? But I ſuppoſe Florence had it from ſome old Monkiſh Legend, if not from the Roman Martyrology it ſelf, in which is related, that incredible Story of King Wulſher's murdering of his two Sons, Ulſwald and Rufin, with his own Hands, becauſe they had been inſtructed in the Chriſtian Faith by Ceadda, Biſhop of Litchfield. And Mr. Stow, in his Chronicle, having found the ſame Story in an old Ledger-Book of that Church, hath thought fit to inſert it into his Hiſtory; placing the Year of their Suffering in Anno 668, when all our Hiſtorians do at that time relate him to have been a Chriſtian. But this Book adds further, That the Queen, Mother to theſe Princes, cauſed them to be buried under a great heap of Stones, and thereby gave Name to the Town of Stone in Staffordſhire. I thought good to take notice of this Romance, becauſe a greater Author, viz. Mr. Camden himſelf, hath alſo thought fit to put it into his Britannia*, from the Authority of a Manuſcript Book once belonging to the Abby of Peterburgh.

* In Staffordſhire.

But it is time to look back upon Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; for now (according to William of Malmesbury) one Adhelm a Monk began to build the Abby of Malmesbury, having before obtained a Licenſe for ſo doing, together with a Grant of certain Lands, called Madulfsburgh, from Lutherius Biſhop of Wincheſter; the Place being ſo called from one Maildulf a Scotch Monk, and Philoſopher, (under whom Aldhelm had formerly ſtudied)

Anno Dom. DCLXXV. who died at this Place, where Maildulf had alſo begun a ſmall Monaſtery; but the few Monks that were there had no Means to ſubſiſt but by Alms, until ſuch time as this Aldhelm built it anew, and got it Endowed by the Charity of Ethelred, King of the Mercians; Ceadwalla, and Ina, Kings of the Weſt Saxons, with other Noble Benefactors: So that it ſoon became one of the greateſt and richeſt Monaſteries in England, being at firſt called Madunesburg, and afterwards Malmesbury. Vid. Monaſt. Angl. p 97, 98.

About the ſame time alſo, according to the old Book of the Abby of Abingdon in the Cottonian Librarie, the Abby of Abingdon was founded by one Hean, Nephew to Ciſſa, a Petty Prince under Kentwin, King of the Weſt Saxons, in Wiltſhire and Berkſhire; the Place at firſt was called Sheoveſham, and the Foundation was for no more than an Abbot, and 12 Monks, but was afterwards much increaſed by the Charity of ſucceeding Kings; being rebuilt by Abbot Ordgar in the Reign of King Edgar, having been burnt and deſtroyed by the Danes in the time of King Alfred.

Lib. 4. c. 6. This Year alſo (according to Bede) Arch-Biſhop Theodore conſecrated Erkenwald ^ Biſhop of London, who was in great Reputation for his Sanctity, having, before he came to be Biſhop, founded two Monaſteries, the one for Ethelburg his Siſter, at Berking; the other for himſelf, at Chertesey in Surrey.

(younger son [illegible]

Anno Dom. DCLXXVI. 'This Year Eſcwin, Biſhop of the Eaſt Saxons, departed this Life, and 'Hedda took the Biſhoprick of that Province, and Centwin ſucceeded in the 'Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons; which Centwin was Son to Cynegils, and 'he the Son of Ceolwulf: Alſo Ethelred, King of the Mercians, waſted Kent. Of which Expedition, H. Huntington further relates, That this King made War againſt Lothair, King of Kent; but he fearing that Valour, ſo Hereditary to the Mercian Family, kept out of ſight, and durſt not meet him; whereupon the King of Mercia deſtroyed the City of Rocheſter, and paſſing through the Kingdom of Kent, carried away a great deal of Spoil.

Lib. 4. c. 12. Bede adds further, That he deſtroyed both Churches and Monaſteries, without any regard to Religion, and ſo ſpoiled the Church and Palace of Rocheſter, that Putta, the Biſhop of that See, was forced to retire to Sexwulf Biſhop of the Mercians; and from him receiving the Poſſeſſion of a certain Church, there ended his Days in Peace. Anno Dom. DCLXXVII. This Putta is by Florence of Worceſter, and William of Malmesbury, made the firſt Biſhop of Hereford; which Church, it ſeems, Sexwulf parted with to him, tho Bede does not expreſly mention it. Alſo Eadhed was now ordained Biſhop in the Province of Lindiſſe, which King Egfrid had lately conquered from Wulfher King of the Mercians. But when Ethelred (Succeſſour to Wulfher) recovered that Province, this Biſhop retiring from Lindiſſe, governed the Church of Ripon.

The ſame Year alſo Oſric, a petty Prince of this Country, built a Nunnery at Bath, which was afterwards turned to a Houſe of Secular Canons; but King Edgar turned them out, and placed Benedictines in their Places.

Anno Dom. DCLXXVIII. This Year being the Eighth of the Reign of Egfrid, King of Northumberland, (according to Bede, and the Saxon Annals,) there appeared a Comet which continued 3 Months, and ariſing toward Morning, carried with it a large Tail like a Pillar; in which Year alſo (as Bede* relates) there aroſe a great Contention between King Egfrid, and Biſhop Wilfrid, who was expell'd his Biſhoprick, and two others ſubſtituted in his Room over the Nor-

Northumbrian Nation, (to wit,) Boſa, who Governed the Province of Deira; and Eatta, that of Bernicia; the former having his Epiſcopal See at the City of York, and the other at Hagulſtad, being both of them preferred from being Monks. Stephen Heddi, the Author of * St. Wilfrid's Life above-mentioned, as alſo † Will. of Malmesbury, relate the Quarrel between King Egfrid and the Biſhop to have proceeded from the Envy and Ill-will of Erminburge his Queen, ſhe making the King jealous of his Secular Glory, and Riches, and the great Retinue that followed him; whereupon the King reſolved to be rid of him; ſo that preſenting Theodore Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury with great Gifts, they perſwaded him to come into that Province; and, together with three Biſhops he brought with him, who were not of the Northern Dioceſs, they not only condemned, but deprived Biſhop Wilfrid, being abſent; whereupon the Biſhop went to the King, and the Arch-Biſhop, and asked them, What was the Reaſon, that without any Crime alledged, they had robbed him of his Eſtate that was given him by former Kings, for God's ſake? But (if this Author may be credited) they gave him a very trifling Anſwer, ſaying, That they found no Fault in him; yet would not alter what had been Decreed againſt him: Whereupon the Biſhop, by the Conſent of the reſt of his Fellow-Biſhops of his Province, appealed to Rome. But certainly theſe Biſhops could not at that time be many, for there were then no more in this Province than Lindisfarne, and Whitern in the Picts Country:

Towards Rome he went the next Year; but in his way thither, landing in Frizeland, he ſtayed there all that Winter, converting the People of that Province: And then proceeding in his Journey to Rome the Spring following, where arriving, he applied himſelf to the Pope, and preſented him with a Petition; which being read before Pope John, and the Synod at Rome, he was by the ſaid Pope, and all the Biſhops there preſent, (being 150 in Number) Decreed to be reſtored to his Biſhoprick; but he could never prevail ſo far as to get this Council's Decree to be received as long as King Egfrid lived.

Vit. Wilfredi, c. 39.

The ſame Year Biſhop Wilfrid returning into England, was received by Beorthwald, Nephew of Ethelred King of the Mercians, who then governed part of that Kingdom under his Uncle; who hearing of it, his Wife being the Siſter of King Egfrid, commanded Beorthwald immediately to diſmiſs him; from whence, he went to Centwin King of the Weſt Saxons, where ſtaying but a little while, he was alſo driven from thence, becauſe the Queen was Siſter of Queen Erminburge. Thus Stephanus Heddy, in his Life of Biſhop Wilfrid, relates; but it is to be doubted with too much Partiality on his ſide.

Lib. 4. c. 13.

Bede gives us a more particular Account of the reſt of his Actions, that thô he were thus expelled his Biſhoprick, yet ~~that~~ he could not be reſtrained from Preaching the Goſpel; for retiring to the Kingdom of the South Saxons, which lies between that of Kent, and that of the Weſt Saxons, where Edilwalch, then King, (and who had not been long before Baptized at the perſwaſion of King Wulfher, as has been already ſaid,) gave him Commiſſion to Convert and Baptize, not only the Principal Officers and Knights of that Province, but divers Presbyters, (there named, who came along with him,) did then, or not long after, Chriſten the reſt of the common People; and Ebba the Queen was alſo baptized in the Province of the Wectii, but what Queen this was, Bede does not tell us.

Anno Dom. DCLXXIX. Cap. 40. So that before this, it ſeems, thô the King was a Chriſtian, yet the whole Province of the South Saxons were as yet unconverted to the Chriſtian Faith, of which the Author of the Life of Biſhop Wilfrid gives this Reaſon; that this Province, by reaſon of the multitude of the Rocks, and thickneſs of the Woods, was hitherto almoſt inacceſſible to ſtrangers: But * Bede further tells us, That then there lived a certain Iriſh or Scotch Monk, named Dicul, who had a little Monaſtery in a place called Boſanham encompaſſed with Woods and the Sea, where he with five or ſix Brethren ſerved God in great Poverty and Humility; yet would not any of the People imitate their Lives, or hear their Preaching; but when Biſhop Wilfrid preach'd the Goſpel to them, he did not only free them from Eternal Torments, but alſo from preſent deſtruction, for it had not rained (as my Author ſays) for Three Years before in that Country; whence multitudes of the poorer ſort of People daily periſhed by Famine; ſo that many becoming deſperate, Forty or Fifty Men in a Company, being almoſt ſtarved, would all take hands together, and at once leap down a Rock into the Sea: But on the firſt day of their publick Baptiſm, ſoft and plentiful ſhowres deſcending, reſtored plenty to the Summer following; ſo this People caſting away their Idolatry, became not only enrich'd with Spiritual, but Temporal Bleſſings; for when the Biſhop came into this Province, and ſaw ſo diſmal a Famine, he taught them how to get their livings by fiſhing; for though the Sea and Rivers abounded plentifully with Fiſh, yet had not they the Wit to make Nets to take any but Eels; whereupon the Biſhop taught them, by joyning many of thoſe ſmall Nets together, to make them ſerve to catch Sea-Fiſh, of which they took ſo great a multitude, that they maintained themſelves with them, till other Proviſions could be had.

* Ibid cap. 13.

Bede ibid. At this time alſo King Edelwalch gave Biſhop Wilfrid a certain Iſland, called Seoleſeu, that is (in the old Engliſh Saxon) the Iſland of Seales, (or Sea Calves) where Wilfrid founded a ſmall Monaſtery, conſiſting chiefly of thoſe Brethren he brought with him, and which his Succeſſours hold to this day, (viz. in Bede's time;) for this place (after called Selſey:) was made the ſeat of the Biſhop of that Province, until it was long after removed to Chicheſter; here Biſhop Wilfrid lived, and exerciſed his Epiſcopal Functions, till the death of King Egfrid.

The ſame Year, (according to the Saxon Annals) Eſcwin was ſlain near Trent, in which place alſo King Egfrid and Ethelfred fought the ſame Year, and now alſo St. Etheldrith deceaſed, and Coludesburgh, was burnt.

Bede, lib. 4. cap. 21. H. Huntington more at large relates this Fight between the Kings of Northumberland and Mercia; and Bede alſo tells us, This Young Prince (mentioned in the Annals) being the King of Northumberland's Brother, and then about Eighteen Years of Age was ſlain, and extreamly lamented in both Kingdoms; For King Ethelred had Married Oſtrithe his Siſter, but when Arch-Biſhop Theodore ſaw the cauſes of their Inteſtine Quarrels daily to encreaſe, he by his interceſſion and perſwaſions made Peace between the two Kings, on this condition; that King Ethelred ſhould pay King Egfrid a pecuniary Mulct for his Brother, who was ſlain.

Bede, lib. 4. cap. 19. This Queen Etheldrith here mentioned in the Annals, was Daughter to Anna, King of the Eaſt-Saxons, and Wife of King Egfrid, who yet remained ~~a Virgin; for thô ſhe had been twice Married, yet~~ would ſhe never ~~let either of her Husbands lye with her; but~~ ſhe dyed at laſt Abbeſs of the Monaſtery of Eli, which ſhe her ſelf built, and of whom Bede makes large Elegy both in Proſe and Verſe; and that after ſhe had been there uried Sixteen Years, her body being taken up as whole as at firſt, ſhe as canonized, and called St. Audrey of Ely; but this Coludesburgh here entioned in the Annals, was a great Monaſtery of Monks and Nuns ogether, afterwards called Coldingham, in the Marches of Scotland; which as Bede tells us) was a very magnificent building for that Age, but y the juſt judgment of God for the looſe living of the Monks and Nuns, as burnt; thô it happen'd not by any Miracle, but by meer careleſneſs f the Servants.

About this time alſo, according to an ancient Manuſcript Copy of lorence of Worceſter's Chronicle in the Bodleian Library, the Province of he Mercians was by the Common Council or conſent of Ethelred (King f that Kingdom) and of Theodore Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury divided into ive Dioceſſes; Boſel being ordained Biſhop of the Wicii who had his Worceſter, whileſt Cuthwin was ordained to the Dioceſs of Litchfield, axulf was pleaſed to continue Biſhop over midle England, having his ee at Leiceſter, and Ethelwine was ſet over the Province of Lindiſſe aving his See at Cidnaceſter; but as for the See of Hereford, that had een founded about Three Years before by Biſhop Putta, by the means nd conſent of Biſhop Saxulf, as hath been now obſerved. Anno Dom. DCLXXX.

This Year, Theodore the Arch-Biſhop ſummon'd a Synod at Heathfield, (now Hatfield in Hartfordſhire) that he might correct divers errours concerning the Chriſtian Faith; but * Bede gives us a fuller account of it, and tells us, it was ſummoned to condemn the Hereſie of Eutyches, who then maintained but one will and Perſon in Chriſt, and which then troubled the Latin as well as Greek Church; and therefore the Arch-Biſhop being reſolved to prevent it, held this Synod, in which the Five firſt General Councils, were not only received, and confirm'd, but alſo the latter held at Rome under Pope Martyn I. in the Reign of the Emperour Conſtantine.

Vi. Sir H. Spelman 1. Vol. p. 168.

Bede alſo tells us, That there was preſent at this Council, John the Præcentor, or chief Chanter of the Church of St. Peters in Rome, whom Pope Agatho had ſent hither, not only to inſtruct the Engliſh Monaſteries, how to Sing after the Roman Faſhion, but alſo to give him an account of the Faith of the Engliſh Church, which he did at his Return to Rome, much to its advantage.

Id. Cap. 18

And the ſame Year, according to Bede and the Saxon Annals, Hilda the Holy Abbeſs deceaſed at Streanſhale, (now Whitby in Tork-ſhire,) which ſhe her ſelf had Founded; ſhe was Grand Niece to King Edwin, and having been converted by Paulinus, had been almoſt ever ſince her Converſion a profeſſed Nun, firſt in the Monaſtery of Cale in France, and was afterwards Abbeſs of divers Nunneries in England, being eſteemed a Lady of great Sanctity and Knowledge. At this Monaſtery of Strean-ſhale, (which was then for Men as well as Women) lived Cædmon the Engliſh Saxon Poet, who is ſuppoſed by Bede to have been once Divinely inſpired in his ſleep to make Verſes in his own Tongue upon the Creation of the World, and ever after kept that faculty upon other Divine Subjects; there are divers of his Paraphraſes in Saxon Verſe ſtill extant, upon ſeveral Stories in Geneſis and Exodus, but very hard to be underſtood by reaſon of the Obſoleteneſs of the Saxon Dialect. They have been Printed at Oxford, by the Learned Junius.

Anno Dom. DCLXXX.

About this time alſo (according to Florence) the Kingdom of the Mercians became divided into five Dioceſſes; and Talfride a learned Monk, of the Abbeſs Hilda's Monaſtery, was elected firſt Biſhop of Worceſter, but dyed before his Ordination.

Cited in Monaſticon Anglicanum, p. 120.

But the ancient Chronicle of the Church of Worceſter, now in the Cottonian Library relates, the Church of Worceſter to have been firſt founded by Athelred, King of the Mercians, and Theodore Biſhop of Canterbury; one Boſel being made the firſt Biſhop of that See, and ſate therein Eleven Years.

There was then alſo founded a Colledge of ſecular Canons, which ſo continued as the Chapter of this Church till Anno Dom. 991, when Biſhop Oſwald turned them out, and put in Benedictine Monks in their Rooms.

About the ſame time alſo, one Oſwald Nephew to King Ethelred, founded a College for Secular Canons at Perſhore, in Worceſterſhire, which continued till King Edgar and Biſhop Oſwald, Anno 984. brought in Benedictine Monks in their Places.

I may alſo add, under this Year, that pretended Bull of Pope Agatho's Privileges, together with the Charter of this K. Ethelred, which is recited in the Peterburgh Copy of the Saxon Annals, under Anno 675, and is there related to have been about the ſame time confirmed in the Council at Heathfield above-mentioned; whereby were granted to the Monaſtery of Medeſhamſtead divers great Immunities; which Bull does not only confirm all thoſe Privileges formerly granted by Pope Vitalian, but there is alſo further added this, that the Abbot ſhould be the Pope's Legat over the whole Iſle (of Britain); and that whatſoever Abbot was elected by the Monks, ſhould be immediately conſecrated by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; with divers other Things too tedious here to relate: Which Bull, being recited in the Council above-mentioned, was by them eſtabliſhed and confirmed; which being done, the King is ſaid to have made a Speech, reciting all the Lands he had given to the ſaid Monaſtery, and then, having ſubſcribed the Charter, the Queen, Adrian the Pope's Legat, and all the Biſhops and Abbots, (whoſe Names are there mentioned) did ſo likewiſe, under dreadful Curſes upon thoſe that ſhould violate the Privileges above-mentioned.

But notwithſtanding the ſo exact Recital, and ſuppoſed Confirmation of this Charter in the Council above-mentioned, we have very great Reaſon to ſuſpect this Bull, as alſo the Charter it ſelf, to have been forged long after by the Monks of Peterburgh; for, in the firſt place, the Privileges granted to this Abbey do not only exceed any that had been granted by the Pope to any Monaſtery in England, but alſo were ſuch, as we do not find it ever enjoy'd; as particularly, that of their Abbot's being the Pope's ordinary Legate all over this Iſland, which had been ſuch a Diminution of the Rights of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as he would never have ſo eaſily paſs'd over: And beſides all which, the Names of the Biſhops, who are put to this Charter, do not at all agree with the Circumſtances of Time; for, firſt, it is certain, that Wilfred is here ſtyled Archbiſhop of York, which Title he never took upon him, being then no more but a Biſhop under the Juriſdiction of Archbiſhop Theodore; and by whom he, at this Time, ſtood deprived, and was not preſent at this Council, nor did return this Year from Rome, (as this Copy of the Annals makes him to have done,) but was indeed returned from thence near three Years before; being at this Time converting the South-Saxons, (as hath been already related:) Neither was Putta, Biſhop of Rocheſter, or Waldhere, Biſhop of London, at the time when this Council was held, though their Names are alſo put to this Charter; for the former had been dead eleven Years before, and one Quichelme was then Biſhop of that See, as appears by the Catalogue of the Biſhops in Sir H. Spelman's Faſti, at the end of the Volume of Engliſh Writers after Bede; nor was the latter then Biſhop of London, but Erkenwald, who was elected to that See above fifteen Years before, and continued in it 'till after the Reign of King Ina, who began not to reign 'till Anno 688; ſo that upon the whole matter, I take this Charter to be a notorious piece of Forgery.

Anno Dom. DCLXXXI.

This Year Trumbrith was conſecrated Biſhop of Hagulſtad, and Trumwin Biſhop of the Picts: This was the Biſhoprick of Wyterne, called in Latin Candida Caſa; which at that time (as Bede teſtifies) belonged to the Kingdom of Northumberland; and alſo Centwin, (King of the Weſt-Saxons,) put the Britains to flight as far as the Sea; H. Huntington ſays, That he alſo waſted all their Country with Fire and Sword; but the Welſh Chronicle of *Caradoc (tranſlated by H. Lloyd) relates, That this Year Kentwin, King of the Weſt-Saxons gathered a great Company of his Nation together, and came againſt the Britains, who ſeem'd ready to receive the Battle; but yet, when both Armies appeared in ſight of each other, they were not all deſirous to fight, for they fell to a friendly compoſition and agreement; (viz.) That Ivor ſhould take Ethelburga to Wife, who was Couſin to Kentwin, and quietly enjoy all that he had got during the Reign of Ivor; but of this our Engliſh Hiſtories are ſilent.

Anno Dom. DCLXXXII.

This Year the Nunnery of St. Peter, in Gloceſter, was founded by Oſric, then a petty Prince or Governour under Ethelred, King of the Mercians, but was afterwards King of the Northumbers: This Monaſtery, thô it had the honour of having Three Queens ſucceſſively, Abbeſſes of it, was deſtroyed by the Danes, but afterwards was re-edified for Benedictine Monks by Aldred Biſhop of Worceſter, Anno 1058.

This Year alſo, (according to Bede) Egfrid, King of Northumberland, ſent a great Army into Ireland, under one Bert (or Bryt) his General, who miſerably waſted that innocent Nation, which had been always friendly to the Engliſh; (which Character perhaps might have been due to them in Bede's time;) and did not ſo much as ſpare the Churches or Monaſteries; but the Iſlanders as far as they were able, repel'd Force with Force, and invoked the Divine aſſiſtance to revenge their quarrel which happen'd the next Year, as the ſame Authour relates. For,

Bede, lib. 4. cap. 27, 28.

This Year, not long before the Death of King Egfrid, that Holy Man Cuthbert, was by the ſame King ordered to be ordained Biſhop of Lindisfarne, thô he was at firſt choſen to be Biſhop of Hagulſtad inſtead of Trumbert, who had been before depoſed from that Biſhoprick; yet becauſe Cuthbert liked the Church of Lindisfarne better, in which he had ſo long converſ'd, Eatta was made to return to the See of Hagulſtad, to which he was at firſt ordained, whilſt Cuthbert took the Biſhoprick of Lindisfarne.

But I ſhall now give you from Bede a farther account of the Life of this good Biſhop; he had been firſt bred in the Monaſtery of Mailroſs, and was afterwards made Abbot of the Monaſtery of Lindisfarne; retiring from whence, he had for a long time lived the Life of an Anchorite in the Iſle of Farne, not far diſtant, but when there was a great Synod aſſembled, King Egfrid being preſent at a place called Twiford, near the River Alne, where Arch-Biſhop Theodore preſiding, Cuthbert was, by the general conſent of them all, choſen Biſhop; who when he could not by any Meſſages or Letters be drawn from his Cell; at length the King himſelf, with Biſhop Trumwin, and other Noble and Religious Perſons, ſailed thither, where they at laſt, after many intreaties, prevailed upon him, to go with them to the Synod; and when he came there, thô he very much oppoſed it, yet he was forced to accept the Epiſcopal Charge; and ſo was conſecrated Biſhop the Eaſter following; and after his Conſecration, in imitation of the bleſſed Appoſtles, he adorned his calling by his good Works; for he conſtantly taught the People commited to his Charge, and incited them to the love of Heaven, by his conſtant Prayers and Exhortations; and, which is the chief part of a Teacher, whatſoever he Taught, he himſelf firſt practiſed; ſo having lived in this manner about Two Years, being then ſenſible that the time of his Death (or rather of his future Life) drew near, he again retired to the ſame Iſland, and Hermitage from whence he came.

Id. cap. 26.

The ſame Year alſo King Egfrid raſhly lead out his Army to deſtroy the Province of the Picts, (thô his Friends, and principally Biſhop Cuthbert, did all they could to hinder it), and having now entred the Country, he was brought (before he was aware) by the feigned flight of his Enemies, between the ſtreights of certain inacceſſible Mountains, where he, with the greateſt part of his Forces he had brought with him, were all cut off, in the Fortieth Year of his Age, and the Fifteenth of his Reign. And as the Year aforegoing, he refuſed to hear Biſhop Cuthbert, who diſwaded him from invading ~~Ireland~~, whi~~ch~~ did him no harm; ſo Bede obſerves it was a juſt Judgment upon him for that Sin, that he would not hear thoſe who would then have prevented his Ruine.

the Irish,

From this time, the Grandeur ~~and Valour~~ of this Kingdom of the Northumbers began to decline; for the Picts now recovered their Country, which the Engliſh had taken away; and the Scots that were in Britain, with ſome part of the Britains themſelves, regain'd their Liberty, which they did enjoy for the ſpace of Forty Six Years after, when Bede wrote his Hiſtory: But Alfred Brother to this King ſucceeding him, quickly recovered his Kingdom, thô reduced into narrower bounds: He was alſo a Prince very well read in the Holy Scriptures.

Ibid.

The ſame Year, (as the Saxon Annals relate) Kentwin, King of the Weſt-Saxons dying, Ceadwalla began to Reign over that Kingdom, (whoſe Pedegree is there inſerted, which I ſhall refer to another place:) and the ſame Year alſo died Lothair King of Kent; (as Bede relates) of the Wounds he had received in a Fight againſt the South Saxons; in which Edric, his Brother Egbert's Son, Commanded againſt him, and reigned in his ſtead.

This Year (alſo according to the Annals) John was conſecrated Biſhop of Hagulſtad, and remained ſo till Biſhop Wilfrid's return; but afterwards Biſhop Boſa dying, John became Biſhop of York, but from thence, many Years after, retired to his Monaſtry in Derawnde, (now called Beverlie in York-ſhire:) This Year it rained Blood in Britain; and alſo Milk and Butter were now turned into ſomewhat like Blood. You are here to take notice, that this Biſhop John above mentioned, is the famous St. John of Beverlie; of whom Bede in the next Book tells ſo many Miracles.

But our Annals do here require ſome farther Illuſtration; for this Ceadwalla here mentioned, was the Grandſon of Ceawlin, by his Brother Cutha; who being a Youth of great hopes, was driven into Baniſhment by by his Predeceſſour, and (as Stephen * Heddi in Biſhop Wilfrid's Life relates) lay concealed among the Woods and Deſarts of Chyltern, and Ondred, and there remained for a long time; till raiſing an Army, (thô Bede does not ſay from whence,) he ſlew Aldelwald, King of the South-Saxons, and ſeized upon his Province; but was ſoon driven out by two of that King's Captains, viz. Bertune and Autune who for ſome time kept that Kingdom to themſelves: the former of whom was afterwards ſlain by the ſame Ceadwalla, when he became King of the Weſt-Saxons; but the other who reigned after him, again ſet it free from that ſervitude for many Years; from whence it happen'd, that all that time they had no Biſhop of their own; for when Wilfrid return'd home, they became ſubject to the Biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons, (that is, of Dorcheſter) which return (as the Author of Wilfrid's Life relates) happen'd this Year, being the Second of King Alfred's Reign, who then invited him home, and reſtored him to his Biſhoprick, as alſo to his Monaſtery at Rypun, together with all his other Revenues, according to the Decree of Pope Agatho, and the Council at Rome above mentioned; all which he enjoyed till his ſecond Expulſion, as you will hear in due time.

Anno Dom. DCLXXXVI.

Id. cap. 16.

After Ceadwalla had obtain'd the Kingdom, he ſubdued the Iſle of Wight, which was as yet infected with Idolatry; and therefore this King reſolved to deſtroy all the Inhabitants, and to Plant the Iſland with his own Subjects; obliging himſelf by a Vow, (althô he himſelf ~~(as it is reported~~) was not yet baptized,) that he would give the Fourth part of his Conqueſts to God; which he made good, by offering it to Biſhop Wilfrid, who was then come thither by chance out of his own Country to preach the Goſpel. The Iſland conſiſted of about Two Thouſand Families, and the King beſtowed upon this Biſhop, as much Land there as then maintained Three Hundred Families, the Care of all which the Biſhop committed to one of his Clerks, named Bernwin, his Siſters Son, who was to Baptize all thoſe that would be ſaved. Bede alſo adds, That amongſt the firſt Fruits of Believers in that Iſland, there were two Royal Youths, Brothers, who were the Sons of Arwald, late King thereof; who having hid themſelves for fear of King Ceadwalla, were at laſt diſcovered, and by him ordered to be ſlain, which when the Abbot of Reodford heard, (as having his Monaſtery not far from thence) he went to the King, who then lay private in thoſe Parts to be cured of the Wounds he had received in taking of the Iſland, and deſired of him, if the Youths muſt needs dye, that they might firſt receive Baptiſm, which the King granted; whereupon the Abbot immediately inſtructed, and then Baptized them; ſo when the Executioner came to put them to Death, they chearfully underwent it, becauſe they hoped thereby to obtain an Eternal Kingdom. Thus the Iſle of Wight did, (thô laſt of all) receive the Chriſtian Faith, and that upon very harſh terms; as if God would make them ſuffer for their ſo long refuſal of the Goſpel.

The ſame Year alſo, Ceadwalla and Mollo (or Mull*) his Brother waſted* Kent. And, W. Malmesbury adds, That the occaſion of this War, was to be revenged of King Edric, who had killed Lothair his Predeceſſour, and that falling upon that Province, now grown Effeminate with long Peace, he committed a great deal of Spoil throughout the Country; but at laſt meeting with the Kentiſh Men, was repulſed with loſs.

Anno Dom. DCLXXXVI. This Year alſo, (according to Stephen Heddis's Life of Biſhop Wilfrid,) he was re-called home by King Alfred, and reſtored to his Sees of York, and Hagulſtad, the Biſhops that then enjoyed them being turned out.

Id. ibid cap. 30. The ſame Year alſo Cuthbert, that Pious Biſhop of Lindisfarne, having reſigned his Biſhoprick, and retired again to Farne-Iſland, there deceaſed, but his Body was tranſlated to Lindisfarne; which being taken up Eleven Years after, was found as entire, as when it was firſt buried.

Anno Dom. DCLXXXVII. This Year Mollo (or Mull) the Brother of King Ceadwalla, but now mentioned, was burnt in Kent, and Twelve others with him; but Ceadwalla afterwards waſted Kent the ſame Year, which action Will. of Malmesbury and H. Huntington relate more at large; That Ceadwalla in the ſecond Year of his Reign, ſent his Brother Mollo (at his own requeſt) to Ravage and Plunder the Province of Kent, out of a Deſire of Spoil, and Ambition of Glory; ſo marching into Kent, (then divided into divers Factions) and finding none there to reſiſt him, he laid all the Country waſte; but when he deſpiſed his Enemies, and thought he might do what he pleaſed with them; going about to plunder a certain Houſe, and having no more then Twelve Men in his Company, being there encompaſſed on the ſudden with far greater Forces, and not daring to ſally out upon them, they ſet the Houſe on Fire about his Ears; where He with Twelve Knights were burnt: And thus this brave Army conſiſting of the Flower of the Weſt-Saxon Youth came to nothing.

But Will. Thorne, in his Chronicle of the Abbots of St. Auguſtine, Cant. relates the Death of this Prince, with more Circumſtances (viz.) That he invading and ſpoiling Kent, and coming before the City of Canterbury, and being there ſtoutly reſiſted by the Citizens, till almoſt all his Men were killed, was at laſt conſtrained to flee to a certain Houſe, where the Men of Canterbury burnt him to Death, as hath been already related; but it ſeems his Body not being reduced to Aſhes, was taken up and buried in the Church of the Abby of St. Auguſtine, with the Kings of Kent; this I thought fit to add as not being found elſewhere.

But when Ceadwalla heard this news, being extremely enraged at it, he again entred Kent, and there ſatiating himſelf with Spoil and Slaughter, when he had left nothing worth carrying away, returned home Victorious.

Anno Dom. DCLXXXVIII. This Year, King Ceadwalla after he had Reign'd 2 Years (perhaps having ſome remorſe for his former Cruelties,) went to Rome, and there received Baptiſm from Pope Sergius, "who gave him the Name of Peter; "where he not long after dyed, and was buried in the Church of St. "Peter; to whom Ina ſucceeded in the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, and "Reigned Thirty Seven Years: He alſo built the Monaſtery at Glaſtingabyrig, (now Glaſtenbury) and alſo went to Rome, and there remained "until his Death.

Bede, lib. c. 7. Bede (who has given us a long Epitaph on Ceadwalla, both in Verſe and Proſe,) places this Prince's Baptiſm by the Pope, in Anno 689, which might very well be, for he reſigned his Kingdom the Year above mentioned, and it was ended by that time he could be baptized, and ſo the Saxon Annaliſt might well place both that and his Baptiſm under one and the ſame Year: The Britiſh Hiſtorians confounded this Ceadwalla with their King Ceadwallo, who ſlew King Edwin; but he lived above Twenty Years before this time, as hath been already obſerved.

But Dr. Powel, and Mr. Vaughan in their Learned Notes upon Caradoc's Welſh Chronicle, do ſuppoſe (with great probability) that this Cadwallo, was Edwal, ſirnamed Twrch, Prince of Wales, who about this time began to Reign, being the Son of Cadwallader; and may alſo very well agree with what Guidonius writeth of one Ethwal Prince of Wales; who about this time went to Rome and there dyed; for in proper Names it is an eaſie matter for a Capital C to creep in, ſince it was commonly uſed in old hands, at the beginning of a Paragraph: and might by an Ignorant Copier be added to the Name it ſelf, and ſo of Edwal make Cadwal, and from thence Cadwallader.

Lib. 5. cap. 8.

But the Year after Ceadwalla dyed at Rome, (according to Bede, as well as our Annals) Theodorus Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury alſo deceaſed, being Eighty Eight Years of Age, having ſate Arch-Biſhop Twenty Two Years, and was buried in the Church of St. Peter in Canterbury; * Bede tells us, That the Engliſh Church never attained to that height of perfection under any Arch-Biſhops Government, as it did under his; he being the firſt Arch-Biſhop, who Exerciſed his Metropolitan Juriſdiction over all the Biſhops, as well beyond, as on this ſide of Humber.

Berthwald, who now ſucceeded Theodore in the Arch-Biſhoprick, had been Abbot of a certain Monaſtery, called Raculf (now Reculver in Kent) near the Iſle of Thanet; and was a Man well read in the Scriptures, and skil'd in Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline; but yet he ought not to be compared to his Predeceſſours: he was Elected this Year, but it ſeems his Conſecration was deferr'd till near Three Years after, when the Saxon Chronicle likewiſe recites it. and further observes that hitherto the Arch Bps of Cant[illegible] had been [illegible] succeeded [illegible] ans but for ye future were Englishmen

This Year alſo (according to Florence) Ina a Prince of the Royal Blood took the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, being the Son of Kenred, the Son of Ceolwald: Yet it ſeems he had no right by Succeſſion; for Will. of Malmesbury tells us expreſly, That it was more in reſpect to his own Natural Vertue, than to the Right of a ſucceſſive deſcent, that he was now made King; and indeed, How could it be otherwiſe, his Father Kenred being then alive?

This Year alſo, Abbot Benedict (above-mentioned) dyed, after a long Sickneſs, of whom Bede in his Life (already cited) gives us a large Account, that having been at firſt a Servant to King Oſwin, and receiving from him a competent Eſtate for his Quality, he quited a Military Life for a Heavenly one, and leaving his Country, went to Rome, in the Company of Alfred, Son to that King; and upon his return thence the ſecond time, profeſſed himſelf a Monk in the Iſle of Lyren; where ſtaying Two Years, he accompanied Wyghard to Rome, ~~who went thither~~ than going thither to be ordained Arch-Biſhop, ~~but~~ Benedict ſoon after dying there, ~~he again~~ returned home with Arch-Biſhop Theodore, and after ſome time built the Monaſteries of Wyremouth and Girwy, as you have already heard; and now after a long Sickneſs, made a Holy End in the Monaſtery of St. Peter at Wyremouth, where he was alſo buried. About this time Wythred, the Son of Egbert, King of Kent, being Eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom, did by his Piety and Induſtry free it from Foreign Invaſions; tho one Swebheard, (or Webheard) held part of it together with him for ſome time.

Cap. 44.

This Year alſo according to Florence, for the Years are not exactly ſet down by Bede, or Stephen Heddi; Biſhop Wilfrid was the ſecond time expel'd from his Biſhoprick by Alfred, King of Northumberland; which,

(as

Anno Dom. DCXCI.

(as this Authour in his Life relates) happen'd becauſe that King had not reſtored to the Church of St. Peter at Rypun divers of its Poſſeſſions; The next was becauſe the Monaſtery of Hagulſtad had been erected into a Biſhoprick without his conſent, and contrary to the priviledge which Pope Agatho had beſtowed upon it; And laſtly, becauſe that King would have compelled him to obey certain Decrees of Arch-Biſhop Theodore, which had been made in Biſhop Wilfrid's abſence, and during the firſt quarrel that had riſen between them; which he refuſing to obſerve, thereupon retired to his old Friend Ethelred, King of the Mercians, who received him with great honour.

But King Alfred, as likewiſe Arch-Biſhop Bertwald, and all the Biſhops of Britain, being aſſembled in a Synod, at a place called Oneſtrefield or Hoſterfield, They ſent Meſſengers to Biſhop Wilfrid, deſiring him to appear before them; but when he came to the Synod, he could by no means agree with them, becauſe they did not perform what they had promiſed by their Meſſengers; ſo that great diſputes ariſing chiefly from thoſe Biſhops of the new Sees, who together with certain Abbots had been alſo ſet on by King Alfred, and for the ſake of their own private Intereſts, did not deſire the Peace of the Church; they alſo objected many falſe things againſt him which could no ways be proved; and at laſt decreed that the Biſhop ſhould be cenſured according to the Decrees of the late Arch-Biſhop Theodore; whereupon Biſhop Wilfrid asked them, with what Face they could prefer the Decrees of Theodore before the Apoſtolical Canons, which had been enjoined them from Pope Agatho, and Pope Sergius? but when no due or decent manner of ſpeaking was obſerved, and that they urged him to ſubſcribe a Reſignation of his Biſhoprick, and Monaſteries in Northumberland, and Mercia, into the hands of the Arch-Biſhop, he utterly refuſed it, and only offered to ſubmit to the Judgment of the Arch-Biſhop, as far as it was agreeable with the Canons of the Holy Fathers; but at laſt they offered him, that if he would reſign his Biſhoprick, he might ſtill retain his Abbey of Ripon, and live there in quiet, provided he did not go out of the bounds of the Monaſtery, nor exerciſe any Epiſcopal Juriſdiction; upon which, he in a long Speech ſet forth his former Merits, in converting the Northumbrian Nation to the due obſervation of Eaſter; Then asked them for what offenc they went now about to degrade him? To which the King and the Arch Biſhop replied, That he was culpable in this, and was therefore to b condemned, becauſe he had prefer'd the Judgment of the Men at Rom before theirs; and the King then offer'd the Arch-Biſhop to make hi ſubmit by force to their Judgment, but this was oppoſed by moſt of th Biſhops, becauſe he had come thither under their ſafe conduct; Then th Biſhop retired again to King Ethelred, ſetting forth the hard uſage whic he had received at the Synod, whereupon the King promiſed him neve to alter any thing in the Monaſteries, which he had beſtowed upon hi until he had ſent to Rome for the Pope's Judgment of theſe Matters and how he might act ſafely therein; but in the mean time the Arc Biſhop and the Synod did not only deprive, but alſo Excomunicate Biſho Witfrid, and alſo all thoſe who were in communion with him; ſo th none might ſo much as eat with them, and whatſoever they touche was looked upon as defiled.

Wherefore Biſhop Wilfrid was again forced to go to Rome, there make his appeal before the Pope, to whom he preſented a long Petitio

Anno Dom. DCXCI.

ſetting forth that the Troubles which he had met with in Britain, had proceeded from thoſe, who having ſeized upon his Biſhoprick, and Monaſteries, had refuſed to obſerve the Decrees of his Holineſs's Predeceſſours; whereupon the Pope at that time holding a Council at Rome, did there hear the whole difference between him and Arch-Biſhop Bertwald, who had now ſent his Deputies thither, together with the accuſations againſt him; ſo in ſhort, upon a ſolemn hearing of the whole matter on both ſides, and after above Seventy Congregations, in about Four Months time, (in all which the Biſhops Innocence did more and more appear,) he was at laſt abſolved by the Pope, and the whole Council; the particulars of which are too long to relate, only that thereupon the Pope wrote Letters to Ethelred, King of the Mercians, and Alfred, King of Northumberland, reciting Biſhop Wilfrid's former appeal to Pope Agatho, and the Decree that had been made in his Favour; as alſo what had been now done at Rome, and how well the Biſhop had acquitted himſelf of whatſoever had been laid to his Charge; and therefore did not only order them to receive him, but alſo admoniſhed Arch-Biſhop Bertwald to call another Synod, together with Biſhop Wilfrid, and there to Summon the Biſhops, Boſa and John, to hear what they would ſay in their own behalf; and if they could make any agreement, with the liking of Biſhop Wilfrid, it would be very grateful to him; but if otherwiſe, they were to exhibit the Reaſons of their diſſent before the Pope, there to be determined in a more ample Council; and whoever ſhould refuſe this, ſhould be ſubject to be Excomunicated, and depoſed from his Biſhoprick.

The Biſhop in his Return home with theſe Letters, fell ſo ſick by the way, that he was like to dye at Melune in France, where ('tis ſaid) he had a Viſion of an Angel appearing to him, which promiſed him reſtitution to his See within Four Years; ſo he at laſt arrived again in Britain, where applying himſelf to Arch-Biſhop Bertwald, He being frighted with the Pope's Letters, which had been before ſent him by Meſſengers, received Biſhop Wilfrid very kindly, and being then reconciled to him, promiſed to mitigate that harſh Judgment, given againſt him in the former Synod.

Then the Biſhop delivered his Letters to Ethelred, (who, having at that time reſigned his Kingdom, was become a Monk,) and ſo uſed his Intereſt with King Cenered, whom he had appointed King in his ſtead, that he promiſed to obey the Pope's Decrees; not long after which the Biſhop likewiſe ſent an Abbot with a Prieſt to King Alfred, deſiring his leave to return home, and to deliver him the Pope's Letters, and the Decrees which had been made on his behalf; which Meſſengers thô the King civily received, yet he plainly told them, That he would do them any other Favour, but that it was in vain to trouble him any further in this matter, becauſe whatever the Kings his Predeceſſours, together with his Councellours, as alſo the late Arch-Biſhop Theodore had already judged, and what he himſelf, together with the preſent Arch-Biſhop, and all the Biſhops of the Britiſh Nation had lately Decreed, That he was reſolved never to alter for any Letters ſent (as they ſaid) from the Apoſtolick See; ſo the Meſſengers returning without any ſucceſs, the Biſhop continued where he was for ſome Years: but the King it ſeems repented at laſt of this harſh Reſolution, and would have altered it, as you will hereafter find.

I have been the more exact in this tranſaction of Biſhop Wilfrid's, becauſe it has never been as yet publiſhed in Engliſh before, and it alſo gives us a great light into the Affairs of the Church at this time; and lets us know that the Kings of Northumberland did not then think themſelves bound to obſerve the Pope's Decrees, thô made upon Appeals to Rome, if they were contrary to a General Synod, or Council of the whole Nation.

Anno Dom. DCXCIII.

About this time (thô it be not mentioned in Bede, nor in the Saxon Chronicle) Ina, King of the Weſt-Saxons, ſummoned a great Council or Synod of all the Biſhops, with the Great and Wiſe Men of his Kingdom; which, becauſe it is the firſt Authentick great Council, whoſe Laws are come to us entire, I ſhall ſet down the Title of it as it is recited in the Firſt Volume of Sir H. Spelman's Britiſh Councils; it begins thus; Ina by the Grace of God, King of the Weſt-Saxons, by the Council and Advice of Cenred, my Father, and Hedde and Erkenwald my Biſhops; with all my Ealdermen, and ſage Ancients of my People, as alſo in an Aſſembly of the Servants of God, have Religiouſly endeavoured, both for the health of our Soul, and the common preſervation of our Kingdom, that right Laws and true Judgments be Founded, and Eſtabliſhed, throughout our whole Dominions, and that it ſhall not be Lawful for the time to come, for any Ealderman, or other Subject whatever, to tranſgreſs theſe our Conſtitutions.

I have alſo given you an Extract of the chief of thoſe Laws, as far as they relate to any thing remarkable, either in Church or State; referring you for the reſt to the Laws themſelves.

1. If a Servant do any Work on a Sunday, he ſhall be free, and the Maſter ſhall be amerced Thirty Shillings; but if he went about the Work without his Maſter's privity, he ſhall be beaten, or redeem the penalty; but a Freeman, if he work on that Day, without the Command of his Maſter, ſhall looſe his Freedom, or pay 60 Sihillings; if he be a Prieſt, his penalty ſhall be double.

2. The portion or dues of the Church ſhall be brought in by the Feaſt of St. Martyn, he that payeth them not by that time, ſhall be amerced Forty Shillings, and beſides pay twelve times their value.

3. If any guilty of a capital Crime ſhall take refuge in a Church, he ſhall ſave his Life, and yet make recompence according to Juſtice and Equity; if one deſerving Stripes run to a Church, the Stripes ſhall be forgiven him.

4. If any one Fight within the King's Houſe, or Palace, he ſhall forfeit all his Goods, and it ſhall be at the pleaſure of the King, whether he ſhall have his Life or not; he that Fights in a Church, ſhall pay 120 s. in the Houſe of an Alderman, or other ſage Nobleman, 60 s. whoſoever ſhall Fight in a Villager's Houſe paying Scot, ſhall be puniſhed 30 s. and ſhall give the Villager 6 s. and if any one Fight in the open Field, he ſhall pay 120 s.

5. He that on his own private account ſhall revenge an injury done to him, before he hath demanded publick Juſtice, ſhall reſtore what he took away, and beſides forfeit 30 Shillings.

6. If a Robber be taken, he ſhall loſe his Life, or redeem it according to the eſtimation of his Head; we call Robbers to the Number of Seven or Eight Men; from that number to Thirty Five, a band; all above, an Army. Anno Dom. DCLXXX.

7. If a Country Boor, having been often accuſed of Theft, if he be at laſt taken, he ſhall have his Hand or Foot cut off.

8. If any one Kill another's Godfather, or God-Son, the ſatisfaction ſhall be according to his Quality and Circumſtances; let the compenſation due to the Relations, and that due to the Lord, for the loſs of his Man, be both alike: and let the one encreaſe, according to the Circumſtances of the Perſon, juſt as the other doth; but if he were the King's Godſon, let him make ſatisfaction to the King, as well as the Relations; but if his Life was taken away by a Relation, then let the Money due to the Godfather be diminiſhed, as it uſeth to be, when Money is paid to the Maſter for the Death of his Servant: If a Biſhop's Son be killed, let the penalty be half ſo much.

From which Laws we may obſerve that our Saxon Anceſtors were ſtrict obſervers of the Lord's day, and would not permit any ſervile Work to be done thereon: Secondly, that the ſuperſtition of Sanctuaries was very ancient in England, as well as elſewhere: Thirdly, That Theft, Murder, and all ſorts of Crimes, were then redeemable by pecuniary Mulcts; either to the King, or to the Friends of the party ſlain, or wrong'd, or elſe by loſs of Limbs; but there is one Law behind that is very remarkable,

That if any Engliſh Man, who hath loſt his Freedom, do afterwards Steal, he ſhall be hang'd on the Gallows; and no Recompence made to his Lord; if any one Kill ſuch a Man, he ſhall make no recompence on that account to his Friends, unleſs they redeem him within a Twelve Month. Where it appears that no Engliſh Freeman could then be hang'd for any fault but Treaſon, (thô that is not expreſs'd in theſe Laws): but as for the laſt clauſe in theſe Laws, That if the Son of a Biſhop be killed, the penalty ſhould be half, whereby ſome would prove, that Biſhops were then Married, it is a miſtake; for by thoſe words are only meant a Biſhop's Spiritual Son, or Godſon, and not his Natural, or Conjugal Son.

This Year the Kentiſhmen made a League with King Ina and gave him Thirty Thouſand Pounds to obtain his Friendſhip, becauſe they had before burnt Moll his Brother. Alſo Withred began to Reign over the Kingdom of Kent, and held it Thirty Three Years. Anno Dom. DCXCIV. William of Malmesbury makes him to have been Elected King by the General Conſent of his Subjects, and that he did not deceive their expectation in governing them well.

The Saxon Chronicle here alſo proceeds, and gives us his Pedegree, which being not to our purpoſe, I omit; only, you may take notice, that he was the Son of one Ecbert, and not of the laſt King that Reigned.

As ſoon as ever he was made King, he commanded a Great Council to be ſummoned, at a place called Becanceld (which though it be ſomewhere in Kent, yet no body certainly knows where it lay, unleſs it were Beckanham, which lies near Surry;) at which Council Withred Himſelf was preſent, as alſo the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and the Biſhop of Rocheſter, and with them all the Abbots and Abbeſſes, together with many Wiſe and Prudent Men, who were Anno Dom. DCLXXXV. there aſſembled, that they might all take Council about the repairing of the Churches in Kent; then the King began to ſpeak thus, I will, That all Churches and Monaſteries, which have been given and endow'd for God's Glory, in the Days of the Faithful Kings my Predeceſſours, ſhall remain ſo to God's Honour for ever; Therefore, I Withred being an Earthly King, yet moved by the Heavenly one, have learnt from our Anceſtours, that no Lay-man ought to have right to meddle with any Church, or any of thoſe things, that belong to it; Wherefore we do firmly Decree, and appoint, and in the Name of the Omnipotent God, and all his Saints, do ſtraitly forbid all the Kings our Succeſſours, with all Ealdermen, (i. e. Governours or Judges) and other Laymen, to exerciſe any Lordſhip or Dominion over thoſe Churches, and their poſſeſſions, which either I, or my Predeceſſours, have given for the Honour of Chriſt, and our Lady St. Mary, and all the Saints: but when it ſhall happen that a Biſhop or any Abbot, or Abbeſs ſhall depart this Life, let it be told the Arch-Biſhop, that by his command one may be choſen, who is moſt worthy; Moreover let the Arch-Biſhop make good tryal of his Life, who ſhall be elected to ſo Holy a Function, neither let any one be Elected, or Conſecrated, without the conſent of the Arch-Biſhop; for as it is the King's duty to appoint Ealdermen, Sheriffs, and Judges, ſo it is the Arch-Biſhop's to Govern the Church of God, and to take care of it; as alſo to appoint and elect Biſhops, Abbots, and Abbeſſes, Presbyters, and Deacons, as alſo to Conſecrate, Confirm and Inſtruct them by his good Precepts, and Example; leaſt any of God's Flock ſhould wander out of the way, and periſh.

This paſſage being found in the Cottonian Copy of the Saxon Annals, I thought good to inſert, as a Monument of the ancient power of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, as Governour of the Church of England, though then under the power of the Pope in Eccleſiaſtical Matters. Theſe are the chief heads of this famous Council; nor do the other Copies in Sir H. Spelman's Collection, differ much from this in the Saxon Annals; only there follows the Subſcriptions of King Wythred, and Werburge his Queen, (who Subſcribed for her ſelf, and the Prince her Son,) then follow thoſe of the Biſhops and Abbots, and after them of Five Abbeſſes of that Kingdom; which ſhews them to have been preſent at this Council; but whether as conſenters, or voters, or elſe as bare witneſſes, I ſhall not determine; but it is obſervable that their Names are written not only before all the Presbyters, but alſo before Botred, a Biſhop, though of what Dioceſs is not ſpecified: But to return to Civil affairs.

About this time alſo, as Bede relates, (though no Hiſtorian hath given us the Year) Sebbi, King of the Eaſt-Saxons, being fitter for a Biſhop than a King, and being at laſt taken with a great bodily Infirmity, preferred a private Life before a Crown, and took upon him the Habit of a Monk, with the Benediction of Waldhere, then Biſhop, and Succeſſour to Erkenwald in the See of London; ſo this pious King, after he had beſtowed a great Sum of Money in Charity, ſoon departed this Life, leaving his Sons Sighard and Senfrid to ſucceed him. Lib. 4. cap. 11.

Anno Dom. DCXCVII. This Year the Southumbers (that is the Mercians) killed Oſtry the Wife of Ethelred their late King, and the Siſter of King Egfrid. H. Huntington calls it a vile Wickedneſs, but would not, or could not give us the reaſon why they did ſo; nor what puniſhment was inflicted upon them for it.

This Year likewiſe was held the Council of Berghamſted in Kent, Bertwald Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, Gibmund Biſhop of Rocheſter, and all the Eccleſiaſtical Order of that Kingdom, together with all the Lay or Military Men being there aſſembled, by the Common, and Unanimous Aſſent of

of All, they decreed theſe Laws ſhould be added to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Kentiſh Men: the Conſtitutions of this Council are called in the Saxon Title, the Judgments or Doomes of King Wightred; But thô they relate chiefly to Eccleſiaſtical Matters, yet I ſhall here inſert ſome of the chief of them.

The Firſt Law is, That the Church ſhall be free, and enjoy her own Judgments, Rents, and Penſions; and that Prayer be made for the King, and his Commands obeyed, not of neceſſity or Compulſion, but out of good will.

Secondly, If any Military Man (called there a Geſithcund-man, in the Saxon Original,) ſhall, after this Council is ended, deſpiſing the King's Law, and the Judicial Sentence of the Biſhop's Excommunication, be taken in Adultery, let him pay to his Lord an 100 Shillings.

By which Law it appears, there was at this time Knights Service in England, and alſo, that ſlighting of Excomunication had no further Temporal Penalty, than a pecuniary Mulct.

And that it was to the Lord of whom he held his Land, That he was to pay it, appears by the next Law, by which it is appointed, that if the Adulterer were a Country Man, or Villager, (called there Ceorleſman) he ſhall pay Fifty Shillings (to his Lord,) yea thô he do Pennance for that Sin.

Thirdly, If on Saturday in the Evening, after the Sun is ſet; or on Sunday Evening after the ſame time; a Servant ſhall, at the Command of his Maſter, do any work, let his Maſter redeem the offence with paying Eighty Shillings.

Fourthly, If a Layman kill a Theif, let him lye without any Wiregild, that is, without making any ſatisfaction to the Friends of the party ſlain.

'This Year alſo the Picts ſlew Bert the Ealderman, H. Huntington aſcribes 'this to the Curſe of the Iriſh Nation, whoſe Churches he had in the 'late Invaſion deſtroyed; for as King Egfrid Invading the Country of 'the Picts was there cut off; ſo entering their Country to revenge the 'Death of his Maſter, he was likewiſe ſlain.

Mat. Weſtminſter calls this Ealderman, Brithric, Earl of the Northumbers, but from what Authority I know not.

I ſhall conclude this Century with a very remarkable Tranſaction out of Bede, that happen'd about the latter end of it. Egbert, an Engliſh Prieſt, living in Ireland, being hindred by a Storm that forced him back from Preaching the Goſpel (as he intended) in Germany, he perſwaded one Wilbrode his Country man to do it; who having obtain'd the Pope's Licenſe to Preach to the Heathen Nations, he performed it firſt by preaching the Goſpel in old Frizeland, (which then included not only thoſe Provinces, called Eaſt and Weſt Frizeland to this day, but alſo Holland and Zealand, and divers others of the Belgic Provinces;) where he converted all thoſe Nations to the Chriſtian Faith, and was afterwards, at the deſire of Pipin, (father to King Charles,) ordained by the Pope, Arch-Biſhop of the Friſons, Anno Dom. 696: and upon his return to Rome; Pipin, being then Major of the Palace, (or General of France,) gave him for his Epiſcopal See that famous Caſtle, which is called in the Old Anno Dom. DCXCIX. Language of that Nation, Wiltaburg, but in the Gallic Tongue, Trajectum, at this day Utrecht.

Id. c. 12. But not long after, two Prieſts, each of them named Henwald, and for diſtinction Sirnamed from the colour of their Hair, the Black and the White, being by his Example piouſly affected to the Souls of their Country-men, the Old Saxons, at their coming into Old Saxony to convert them, met with much worſe Entertainment; for being in the Houſe of a Farmer, who had promiſed to convey them (as they deſired) to the Governour of that Country, and being diſcovered by their daily Ceremonies to be Chriſtian Prieſts, and the cauſe of their coming alſo known, they were by him and his Heathen Neighbours cruelly butcher'd, and their Bodies flung into the Rhine; but the Governour coming to the knowledge of it, being enraged at ſuch Violence offered to two Strangers, ſent Armed Men, and ſlew all thoſe wicked Inhabitants, and burnt their Village.

Anno Dom. DCC. About this time Sir H. Spelman, in his firſt Volume of Councils, records a Charter of Priviledge granted by King Wythred in a General Council or Synod of Kent; whereby, with the Conſent of the Chief Men of his Kingdom, he freed all the Churches thereof from all Publick Payments or Tributes whatſoever; provided they yielded the King and his Succeſſours the ſame Honour and Obedience, as they had done his Predeceſſours, under whom hitherto they had enjoyed all Juſtice and Liberty. This was done in the Eighth Year of his Reign, at a Place called Cylling; which ſeems to be no more than a Confirmation of what had been done 6 Years before in the Council of Becanceld. But to return to our Annals.

5 C Anno Dom. DCCII. 'This Year Cenred began to Reign over the Southumbers, (i. e. the Mercians,) as has been already ſaid.

5 C Anno Dom. DCCIII. 'Hedda, the Biſhop, departed this Life; he held the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter 27 Years.

Lib. 5. c. 19. This Hedda is he, of whom Bede gives the Character of an Excellent Biſhop, and one who Adorn'd the Epiſcopal See, converting more by his Example, than Preaching.

Anno Dom. DCCIV. 'Ethelred, the Son of Penda, King of the Mercians, became a Monk, (at 'Bardeney Abbey,) having reigned 29 (or rather 30) Years, and Cenred 'ſucceeded him, (who was his Couſin-German.)

William of Malmesbury further adds, That from a Monk he came to be Abbot of that Monaſtery, wherein he died; and that of Oſgilde, the Siſter of Egfrid King of Northumberland, he begat a Son, called Ceolred; yet for all this, Ethelred paſſing him by, he appointed Cenred, the Son of his Brother Wulfher, for his Succeſſour; who reigned with great Love to his Country, and a ſingular Probity of Manners, till, in the Fifth Year of his Reign, he went to Rome, and, (as Bede tells us) taking upon him Ibid. c. 20. the Habit of a Monk, during the Papacy of Pope Conſtantine, there ended his Days in Prayers, Faſting, and Alms.

Anno Dom. DCCV. 'Ealfert, or Alfred, King of the Northumbers, deceaſed on the 19° 'Jan. at Driffeild, (in the 12th Year of his Reign,) Oſred, his Son, 'ceeding in that Kingdom.

But Stephen Heddi, in his Life of Biſhop Wilfrid, (and who lived that time,) hath given us a more accurate Account of the Death of the King, and of his Succeſſours, viz. That King Alfred lying now upon his Death-bed, repented of what he had done toward Biſhop and promiſed, That if ever he recovered of that Sickneſs, he would reſtore the Biſhop, and in all Things obſerve the Decree of the Apoſtolick See; but if he died, he enjoyn'd, who ever ſhould ſucceed him, to be reconciled with that Biſhop for the good of both their Souls; but this King dying, one Eardwulf ſucceeded him, thô but for a ſmall time; and the Biſhop going to him, and carrying that King's Son along with him, he ſent Meſſengers before, ſuppoſing him to be his Friend; but the King being perſwaded by his Councellors, and alſo prompted by his own natural Wickedneſs, ſent the Biſhop word, (binding it with an Oath,) That unleſs he departed his Kingdom within the ſpace of ſix Days, whoſoever he found of his Company ſhould be put to Death; Not long after which harſh Meſſage, a Plot being laid againſt him, he was driven out of the Kingdom, which he had ſcarce enjoyed two Months, and ſo the Royal Youth Oſred, Son of the late King Alfred, ſucceeded in the Kingdom, and became Biſhop Wilfrid's adopted Son.

In the firſt Year of which King, the Author above-mentioned hath given us the following Account, concerning the Reſtitution of the ſaid Biſhop, viz. That Berthwald, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, came about this time from the South, together with all the Biſhops, Abbots, and Chief Men of the whole Kingdom, by the Precept of the Apoſtolical See, to hold a Synod at a Place lying on the Eaſt-ſide of the River Nid, in Northumberland; where the King, with his Biſhops and Chief Men being met, the Arch-Biſhop made a Speech to them, ſetting forth the Letters from the Pope, which Biſhop Wilfrid had brought directed to himſelf, and which he deſired might be read; the Purport whereof was to the ſame effect, as you have already heard: Then Ælfleda the Abbeſs, Daughter to the late King, as alſo Berechtfrid, the ſecond Man in the Kingdom, ſet forth the Will of the late King, and therefore that it was fit to obey it, as well as the Commands of the Apoſtolical See; whereupon the King, with his Great Men and all the Biſhops, upon mature Deliberation, reſolved to be reconciled to Biſhop Wilfrid, and that his two Monaſteries of Rypon and Hagulſtad, together with all their Revenues, ſhould be reſtored to him; and ſo a firm Reconciliation being made, all the Biſhops departed in Peace.

Cap 11, 12.

But yet for all this, by what Richard Prior of Hagulſtad hath left us of this matter, it appears, that Wilfrid did not carry the Cauſe ſo clearly as this Author would make it; for he only was reſtored to the Biſhoprick of Hagulſtad, and Biſhop John above-named was from thence tranſlated to York, which Biſhop Wilfrid had held before; only Biſhop John parted with Hagulſtad for Peace-ſake. I have been the more exact in this Tranſaction, becauſe it has never been done by any body in our Language before.

Lib. 5 c. 10

Alſo it is to this Year we are to refer the great Council, which Bede tells us was held in the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons; in which, after the Death of Biſhop Hedda, the Biſhoprick of that Province became divided into two; one whereof was conferred on Daniel, who held it at the time when Bede wrote his Hiſtory; and the other was beſtowed upon Aldhelm above-mentioned, then Abbot of Malmesbury, who was now made Biſhop of Shireburn, and when he was only an Abbot, did, at the Command of a Synod of the whole Nation, write an excellent Book againſt that Errour of the Britains, in not keeping Eaſter at the due time; whereby he converted many of thoſe Britains which were then ſubject to the Weſt Saxons, to the Catholick Obſervation thereof: Of

Anno Dom. DCCV.

whoſe other Works likewiſe, Bede gives us there a Catalogue; being Perſon (ſays he) admirable in all Civil, as well as Eccleſiaſtical and Divine Learning; and, as William of Malmesbury further informs us, was the firſt of the Engliſh Saxons who wrote Latin Verſes with a Roman Genius. ^

^ as to British Affairs we find one Gerent to have been King of the Cornish Britains about this time, for this year Bede mentions an Epistle wrote by the Bishop last mentioned to that Prince.

There is here in the Saxon Annals a Gap for the ſpace of 3 Years, in which I think we may (according to H. Huntington's Account) place what Bede relates in the Chapter and Book laſt cited, viz. That Daniel and Aldhelm yet holding their Sees, it was ordained by a Synodal Decree, That the Province of the South Saxons, which had hitherto belonged to the Dioceſs of Wincheſter, ſhould now be an Epiſcopal See, and have a Biſhop of its own; and ſo Ceadbert, who was then Abbot of the Monaſtery of Selſey, was conſecrated firſt Biſhop of that Place; who dying, Ceolla ſucceeded in that Biſhoprick; but he likewiſe dying ſome Years before Bede wrote his Hiſtory, that Biſhoprick then ceaſed.

Anno Dom. DCCIX.

'This Year the Saxon Annals began with the Death of Biſhop Aldhelm, '(whom it calls Biſhop of Weſtwude, for ſo Shireburne was then called,) 'after whom one Forther took the Biſhoprick, and this year Ceolred ſucceeded in the Kingdom of the Mercians; for now Kenred (King of the 'Weſt Saxons) went to Rome, and Offa, with him and Kenred, remained 'there to his Live's end; and the ſame year Biſhop Wilferth (or Wilfred) 'deceaſed at Undale; his Body was brought to Rypon in Yorkſhire. This is the Biſhop whom King Egferth long ſince forced to go to Rome.

There being divers Things put very cloſe together under this Year, they will need ſome Explanation. This Offa, here mentioned, was (as *Bede and William of Malmesbury relate) the Son of Sigher, King of the Eaſt Saxons; who, being a young Man of a ſweet Behaviour, as well as handſom Face, in the Flower of his Youth, and highly beloved by his People, and having not long before ſucceeded to the Kingdom, (after Sighard and Senfrid above-mentioned,) he courted Keneſwith, the Daughter of King Penda, whom he deſired to marry; but it ſeems, not long after their Marriage, ſhe over-perſwaded him to embrace a Monaſtick Life, ſo that he now went to Rome for that End. And Bede tells us expreſly, that both theſe Kings left their Wives, Relations, and Countries, for Chriſt's ſake. But to this Offa ſucceeded Selred, the Son of Sigebert the Good, in the Kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons. H. Huntington propoſes King Offa as a Pattern to all other Princes to follow, and makes a long Exhortation to them to that purpoſe; as if a King could not do GOD better Service, nor more Good to Mankind by well-governing his People, than by renouncing the World, and hiding his Head in a Cell: But ſuch was the Faſhion, or rather Humour, of that Age; and the Affairs, as well as Conſciences of Princes, being then altogether Govern'd by Monks, it is no wonder if they extoll'd their own Profeſſion, as the only One whereupon Salvation could certainly be obtained.

But ſince I have already given you from Bede and Stephen Heddi a large Account of Biſhop Wilfred's Life and Actions above-mentioned, I ſhall not need to add any more to it. He was certainly a Man who had tried all the Viciſſitudes of an adverſe, as well as a proſperous Fortune, having been no leſs than three times deprived of his Biſhoprick; the firſt time unjuſtly, but whether we may ſay the ſame of both the other, ſeems doubtful; for let his Friends ſay what they will, it is evident, he was at firſt deprived for oppoſing a very good Deſign, viz. That of dividing the the Northumbrian Kingdom into more Dioceſſes, and he having the rich Monaſtery of Hagulſtad under his Charge, would not permit it to be made a Biſhoprick, thô the Dioceſs was more than he could well manage; and this ſeems to have been the true Original of that great Quarrel between him and the two Kings Egfrid and Alfred, as you have already heard; ſo it ſhould ſeem, the Wrong pretended to have been done him was none at all, or elſe ſuch holy Men as St. Cuthbert, St. John of Beverlie, and Eatta, are deſcribed to be, would never have accepted of the Biſhopricks of York and Hagulſtad during the time of his Deprivation; and it is very ſtrange, that two Arch-Biſhops ſucceſſively, with the greater part of the Biſhops of England, ſhould have agreed to his Deprivation, if there had not been great Cauſe for it; nor would ſo holy and knowing a Woman as the Abbeſs Hilda, have been ſo much againſt him, had not there been ſome ſubſtantial Reaſons to juſtifie it; but he had the Pope on his ſide, who always encouraged Appeals to Rome, and then it was no wonder if he prevailed; but he was certainly a Prelate of a high Spirit, and great Parts, and who building a great many Monaſteries by the Benevolence of the Kings and Princes of that Time; and himſelf, (thô a Biſhop,) being Abbot of two of them at once; it was no wonder if he grew very rich, which, together with his high way of Living, (being the firſt Biſhop of that Age who uſed Silver Veſſels,) it procured him the Envy of thoſe Princes; but he was a grand Patron of the Monks, and therefore it is not to be wondred at if they cried him up for a Saint, of whom the Writer of his Life, (which he Dedicates to Acca his Succeſſour,) relates too many Miracles to be believed, (raiſing the Dead, curing the Lame, being very ordinary Feats,) but the Monks being the only Writers of that Age, we muſt be contented with what Accounts they will give us, thô thus much muſt be acknowledged in his Commendation, That he converted great Multitudes to the Chriſtian Faith, and cauſed the Four Goſpels to be written in Letters of Gold.

But having given you this Account of Biſhop Wilfred's Life, it is fit I ſay ſomewhat further of his Death, concerning which, the Author Cap. 62, 63. above-mentioned tells us, That having lived 4 Years in Peace after his laſt Reſtitution, he at laſt went to viſit the Monaſteries which he had founded in the South Parts of England, where he was received by his Abbots (whom he had put in) with great Joy; till coming to a Monaſtery which he had founded at Oundale in Northamptonſhire, being there ſeized with the ſame Sickneſs which had often attacked him before, (thô what it was, this Author does not tell us,) he there died, having before made his Will, and given a great deal, both in ready Money and Jewels, to the Monaſteries he had founded: His Body was carried with great Pomp and Attendance of many Abbots and Monks to his Abbey of Rypon, and there buried.

Anno Dom. DCCX. S. C.

'This Year Acca (the principal Chaplain of Biſhop Wilfred) ſucceeded 'him in his Biſhoprick of Hagulſtad; (To this Biſhop, Florence of Worceſter gives the Character of a skilful Singer, and Learned in the Scriptures:) 'Alſo this Year Beorthfrith the Ealderman fought againſt the Picts be'tween Hæſe and Care, (ſuppoſed to be Carehouſe and Hatfeild in Nor'thumberland,) and alſo King Ina, and Nun his Kinſman, fought with 'Gerent King of the Britains; and the ſame Year Hygbald was ſlain.

Mat. Weſtminſter places this Action in Anno 708, and makes this Hygbald to have been killed in the beginning of the Fight by the Welſh King above-above mentioned; and He being there put to flight, left great ſpoils behind him to the Engliſh; who (as Florence adds,) obtained the Victory.

General of the Weſt Saxons

~~This Britiſh Prince here mentioned, is ſuppoſed to have been King of Cornwall; for we can find no ſuch name in the Catalogue of the Princes of North, or South-Wales.~~

Lib. 5. c. 22.

About this time, (according to Bede) Naitan King of the Picts being convinced by the frequent reading of divers Eccleſiaſtical Writers, renounced his Error, concerning the Celebration of Eaſter; and that he might likewiſe reclaim his Subjects with greater Authority, he deſired the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh Nation, and therefore ſent Meſſengers to Ceolfrid, Abbot of the Monaſtery of Wyremouth, deſiring ſome Exhortatory Letters from him, whereby he might confute thoſe who preſumed not to keep Eaſter at the due time; as alſo concerning the true manner of ſhaving of Prieſt's Crowns; he likewiſe deſired ſome Architects, that might build a Church for him after the Roman faſhion, which he promiſed to Dedicate in honour of St. Peter.

To which Pious requeſts Ceolfrid aſſenting, did not only ſend him the Architect he deſired, but alſo writ him a long Epiſtle upon thoſe two Queſtions in which he deſired to be ſatisfied, which you may ſee at large in Bede; where, beſides many notable Arguments for keeping Eaſter on the firſt Sunday after the firſt Full Moon that follows the Vernal Equinox, and beſides ſome others, there is this doughty Reaſon againſt the Scotch way of ſhaving Crowns, that it was the Tonſure of Simon Magus; and then what good Chriſtian could not but abhor it as much as Magick it ſelf!

“ This Year Guthlac dyed, as alſo Pipin King of France; this Guthlac here mentioned, was at firſt a Monk at Repandun Abbey, but afterwards profeſſing himſelf an Anchorite, he retired into the Fens, and built himſelf a Cell, at Croyland: of him the Monkiſh Writers of thoſe times relate incredible Miracles, of his Temptations, Sufferings by, and Victories over, Evil Spirits, which then haunted that place, at which ſome Years after the Abbey of Croyland was founded.

The ſame Year alſo Egwin, Biſhop of Worceſter, founded the Abbey of Eveſham upon this occaſion; the Virgin Mary (as the Monks relate) had appeared about this place to one Eoves a Shepheard, and not long after to the Biſhop himſelf, having a Book in her hand, bringing two Female Attendants with her, (though who they were it ſeems ſhe did not declare:) whereupon the Biſhop there founded this Monaſtery, teſtifying this Viſion in the Charter of the Foundation, which you may ſee at large in Monaſt. Anglic. as alſo in Sir H. Spelman's firſt Volume of Councils; but as for the Story related by the Magdeburg Centuriators, that the Virgin Mary did then Command her Image to be ſet up, and worſhiped in that Church, there being no colour for it in the pretended Charter of the Biſhop himſelf, that muſt be certainly forged; for as Sir H. Spelman has very well obſerved, Arch-Biſhop Brightwald is ſaid to have writ this Charter by the command of the Pope; whereas this Arch-Biſhop was never at Rome, nor was the Council in which it is ſaid to have been confirmed, held, till after Biſhop Egwin's Return home into England; and as for the Kings, Kenred and Offa, who are made to witneſs and confirm it, they had both of them reſigned their Crowns, and gone to Rome Five Years before the date of this Charter, which is Anno Dom. 714; therefore I ſhall paſs it by as a mere Fable, ſince it is certain that the worſhip of Images was not then, nor long after introduced into the Engliſh-Saxon Church.

Anno Dom. DCCXII.

But before I diſmiſs this Subject concerning the foundation of the Abby of Eveſham, I cannot forbear taking notice of another Charter pretended to be made Anno Dom. 709; by King Kenred, and King Offa above mentioned, wherein they grant thoſe Lands, in which the Virgin Mary was ſuppoſed to appear to Biſhop Egwin, for the building of a Monaſtery according to the Rule of St. Benedict; in which Charter, thô the Lands are particularly named and ſet out, yet it is as juſtly ſuſpicious as the other, to have been forged by the Monks of that Abby in after times; as Sir H. Spelman very well obſerves, who hath Printed both theſe Charters in his firſt Volume of Councils; the former of which is dated at Rome, Five Years before the other of Biſhop Egwin's, and is ſuppoſed to be ſubſcribed by the Pope, this Biſhop himſelf, and the two Kings; who there ſtile themſelves, the former by the Title of King of Mercia, and the latter by that of King of the Eaſt-Angles; whereas it is apparent both from our Annals and Hiſtorians, that they had both then reſigned their Kingdoms to their Succeſſours, before they went to Rome; and, which is worſe, Offa was not King of the Eaſt-Angles, but of the Eaſt-Saxons, as Bede expreſly relates; nor can the fault be laid upon the Tranſcribers, ſince the Error is in the Original Charter it ſelf; neither do we read of any King of the Eaſt-Angles all that time, till King Offa, upon the Murther of King Ethelbert, ſeized that Kingdom; but enough, if not too much, of theſe Monkiſh Forgeries: we ſhall now return to our Annals.

“ King Ina and Ceolred fought at Wodensburh in Wiltſhire a great and bloody Battle; and now alſo Dagobert King of the French deceaſed.

Anno Dom. DCCXVI.

This Year was founded at Theoewkesbury in Glouceſter-ſhire, a noble Monaſtery, for Bendictine Monks, by Odo and Dodo, Ealdermen of Mercia.

Vi. Monaſt. Angl. P. 153.

“ The ſame Year Oſred King of Northumberland was killed near the Southern borders; Mat. Weſtminſter relates it was in a Fight near the Sea, but names not the Enemy with whom he fought. This Oſred held the Kingdom Eleven Years, then Cenred took it, and held it Two Years, and after him Oſric, who held it Eleven Years. The ſame Year alſo Ceolred, King of the Mercians Dyed, and lyeth Buried in Licetfield (now Lichſield): Then Ethelbald ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of Mercia, and held it Forty One Years.

Of this King Oſred above mentioned, Will. of Malmeſbury gives a very bad Character, that he ſtained his Reign by Debauching the Chaſtity of the Profeſs'd Nuns, and that he was at laſt Slain by the Treachery of his Relations, who alſo brought the ſame fate upon themſelves.

But this King Ethelbald above mentioned, was the Son of Alwer, and he of Eoppa, (whoſe pedegree is already ſet down.) Alſo this Year Egbert, that venerable perſon, converted the Monks of Hii to the right Faith, ſo that they afterwards obſerved Eaſter Orthodoxly, as alſo the Eccleſiaſtical Tonſure, the relation of which, Bede hath given us at large; being in ſhort, that Egbert the Prieſt (above mentioned) coming out of Ireland on purpoſe to convert thoſe Monks, they were ſo moved by his Pious Exhortations, that leaving the Traditions of their Fore-fathers, they afterwards obſerved the Catholic (i. e. Roman) Rites; Egbert, after he had lived with theſe Monks in this Iſland for Thirteen Years, dyed there.

Anno Dom. DCCXVII.

" This Year Ingild the Brother of King Ina deceaſed, whoſe Siſters " were Werburgh, and Cuthburgh; the latter of whom Built the Mona- " ſtery of Winburne: She was once Married to Eadbert, King of Nor- " thumberland, but whil'ſt he lived, they were made to renounce each " other's Bed.

In this Year alſo (as Ingulphus in his Hiſtory of the Monaſtery of Croyland relates) that Abby was founded by Ethelbald, King of the Mercians, in honour of St. Guthlac, the Anchorite, then lately deceaſed, it was for Benedictines: You may ſee this King's Charter in the aforeſaid Authour, whereby he granted to this Monaſtery, the whole Iſle of Croyland, then containing Four Leagues in length, and Three in breadth, with all the Marſhes adjoyning, there particularly mentioned.

Anno Dom. DCCXX.

About this time, according to the Welſh Chronicle, Roderic (or Rodri) the Son of Edwal Twrch, began to Reign over the Britains in Wales.

Anno Dom. DCCXXI.

" This Year Daniel Biſhop (of Wincheſter) went to Rome; and the " ſame Year Ina ſlew Cinewoulf Atheling, (that is, Prince of the Blood " Royal;) and the ſame Year St. John, Biſhop of Hagulſtad, deceaſed, " who was Biſhop Thirty Three Years and Eight Months, whoſe Body " was buried at Beverlie.

This was he, who being firſt Biſhop of Hagulſtad, and then of York, was after his Death Canoniſed by the Name of St. John of Beverlie; to whoſe ſhrine many Pilgrimages were made, and of whom the Monkiſh Legends relate many incredible Miracles, nor is Bede himſelf wanting in his Stories of this Biſhop, which notwithſtanding, I think, are better omitted: But Bede under this Year gives us this account of him, that when he was not able, by reaſon of his Age, to perform his Epiſcopal Functions, having ordained Wilfred his Presbyter, Biſhop of York in his room, he retired to his Monaſtery in the Forreſt of Deira, where he finiſhed his Life in a Heavenly Converſation.

Anno Dom. DCCXXII.

" This Year Queen Ethelburg deſtroyed the Caſtle of Taunton (now " Taunton-Dean in Somerſetſhire) which Ina had before built, and Eadbert " was forced to flye into Surry, to the South-Saxons, where Ina alſo fought " with them. H. Huntington tells us, That the reaſon why Queen Ethelburgh deſtroyed this Caſtle, was, becauſe Eadbert, a Rebellious Prince of the Blood Royal, had taken it; and made it the ſeat of this Rebellious War.

Anno Dom. DCCXXV.

It being now (according to Bede) the Seventh Year of the Reign of Oſric King of Northumberland, King Wythred dyed, who was Son of Egbert King of Kent, after having reigned Thirty Four Years and an half: He left Three Sons, Ethelbert, Eadbert, and Alaric his Heirs: Will. Malmesbury gives him this Character, that he was gentle at home, invincible in War, and who ſtrictly obſerved the Chriſtian Religion; but according to our Annals, Eadbert his Son ſucceeded alone to him in the Kingdom: This Year alſo (according to our Annals) " Ina fought again with the South-Saxons, and there ſlew Eadbert Ætheling, whom he " had before baniſhed.

H. Huntington farther informs us, That King Ina purſued Eadbert into Southſex; and a nameleſs Authour adds, That he then ſlew Aldwin, King of the South-Saxons, (who took his part) and Conquered that Countrey.

Alſo the ſame Year, King Ina new built the Ancient Monaſtery of Glaſtenbury, endowing it with divers Lands, and alſo granted it an E

emption from all Epiſcopal Juriſdiction, with divers other priviledges, as you may find in his Charter, confirmed by a great Council of the whole Weſt-Saxon Kingdom; the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and Baldred, King of Kent, with divers other Biſhops and Great Men being preſent, and ſubſcribing to it in the preſence of all the Lay-people. Anno Dom. DCCXXV.

This Charter is in ~~the~~ Manuſcript, in the Library of Trinity Coll. in Cambridge; and is alſo Printed by Sir H. Spelman in his Firſt Volume of Britiſh Councils: It was alſo ſent to Rome, and there confirmed by the Pope, as the Book of Glaſtenbury relates.

About this time (as Ranulph of Chicheſter in Polychronichon relates) that Ina, King of the Weſt-Saxons, firſt confered upon St. Peter (that is the Biſhop of Rome) a Penny from every Houſe in his Kingdom, which was called by the Engliſh-Saxons Romeſcot; and in Latin Denarius Sancti Petri, i.e. Peterpence,) which is alſo allowed by Polydore Virgil in his Hiſtory (who was once the Pope's Collector of this Tax in England;) but ſince I do not find this confirmed by any Ancient Authour or Council, I ſuſpend my belief of it; ſince I do not look upon the bare Teſtimony of the Collector of Polychronicon, as of ſufficient Authority for a matter of this Moment; but if it were ever granted by this King, it is likewiſe as certain, that it could not be done without the conſent of the Mycel-Synod, or great Council of the Kingdom, though that be not now to be found.

This Year, according to Bede, and the Saxon Annals, deceaſed Tobias, Biſhop of Rocheſter; a moſt learned Man, for he was bred under the diſcipline of Arch-Biſhop Theodorus and Abbot Adrian, and was ſo well skill'd in the Greek and Latin, that they were as perfect and familiar to him as his Mother Tongue; he was buried at Rocheſter in St. Paul's Porch adjoining to the Church of St. Andrew, after whom Aldwulf was made Biſhop of that See, Arch-Biſhop Bertwald conſecrating him. Anno Dom. DCCXXVII. Lib. 5. c. 24.

" King Ina went to Rome, and there dyed; and Ethelheard his Kinſ-" man ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, and held it " Fourteen Years. Anno Dom. DCCXXVIII.

William of Malmesbury, and H. Huntington do both give King Ina great Commendations, propoſing him as an Example not only of Magnanimity and Juſtice, by the good Laws he made, but alſo of Piety and Devotion; in that he was perſwaded to quit all Worldly Vanities for a Monaſtick Life, and that by the frequent Exhortations of the Queen his Wife; who, when ſhe ſaw nothing would prevail upon him, took this courſe; which, (thô none of the cleanlieſt,) I will here give you: Once when the King had made a great Entertainment at one of his Country-houſes, as ſoon as the Company was gone, the Queen ordered the Steward to defile all the Rooms with Cow-dung and other filth, and alſo put a Sow and Pigs into the Bed, where they had lain the Night before; but when the King and Queen had gone ſome part of their Journey, ſhe perſwaded him to return back again to the ſame place, otherwiſe he would run a great hazard; which being done, when the King ſaw the place, which was yeſterday fit to entertain a Prince, now thus ſpoiled, being much troubled at it, he went to the Queen, and complain'd to her of it; at which ſhe laughing replied; " My Lord and Husband, See what is become of all " that Feaſting and Magnificence we ſaw Yeſterday, Are they not all " gone and paſt, like Water that runs into the Sea? ſo of all thoſe Vanities " there remains nothing, but this Dung and Filth, that only ſerves to repre-" ſent the Corruption of the Soul by ſuch Exceſſes; think then Sir, Anno Dom. In this Year alſo (as Ingulphus in his Hiſtory of the Monaſtery of Croyland relates) that Abby was founded by Ethelbald, King of the Mercians, in honour of St. Guthlac, the Anchorite, then lately deceaſed, it was for Benedictines: You may ſee this King's Charter in the aforeſaid Authour, whereby he granted to this Monaſtery, the whole Iſle of Croyland, then containing Four Leagues in length, and Three in breadth, with all the Marſhes adjoyning, there particularly mentioned.

Anno Dom. DCCXXV. It being now (according to Bede) the Seventh Year of the Reign of Oſric King of Northumberland, King Wythred dyed, who was Son of Egbert King of Kent, after having reigned Thirty Four Years and an half: He left Three Sons, Ethelbert, Eadbert, and Alaric his Heirs: Will. Malmesbury gives him this Character, that he was gentle at home, invincible in War, and who ſtrictly obſerved the Chriſtian Religion; but according to our Annals, Eadbert his Son ſucceeded alone to him in the Kingdom: This Year alſo (according to our Annals) "Ina fought again with the South-Saxons, and there ſlew Eadbert Ætheling, whom he "had before baniſhed.

H. Huntington farther informs us, That King Ina purſued Eadbert into Southſex; and a nameleſs Authour adds, That he then ſlew Aldwin, King of the South-Saxons, (who took his part) and Conquered that Countrey.

Alſo the ſame Year, King Ina new built the Ancient Monaſtery at Glaſtenbury, endowing it with divers Lands, and alſo granted it an E

emption from all Epiſcopal Juriſdiction, with divers other priviledges, as you may find in his Charter, confirmed by a great Council of the whole Weſt-Saxon Kingdom; the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and Baldred, King of Kent, with divers other Biſhops and Great Men being preſent, and ſubſcribing to it in the preſence of all the Lay-people. Anno Dom. DCCXXV.

This Charter is in ~~the~~ Manuſcript, in the Library of Trinity Coll. in Cambridge; and is alſo Printed by Sir H. Spelman in his Firſt Volume of Britiſh Councils: It was alſo ſent to Rome, and there confirmed by the Pope, as the Book of Glaſtenbury relates. & hay t.

About this time (as Ranulph of Chicheſter in Polychronichon relates) that Ina, King of the Weſt-Saxons, firſt confered upon St. Peter (that is the Biſhop of Rome) a Penny from every Houſe in his Kingdom, which was called by the Engliſh-Saxons Romeſcot; and in Latin Denarius Sancti Petri, i.e. Peterpence,) which is alſo allowed by Polydore Virgil in his Hiſtory (who was once the Pope's Collector of this Tax in England;) but ſince I do not find this confirmed by any Ancient Authour or Council, I ſuſpend my belief of it; ſince I do not look upon the bare Teſtimony of the Collector of Polychronicon, as of ſufficient Authority for a matter of this Moment; but if it were ever granted by this King, it is likewiſe as certain, that it could not be done without the conſent of the Mycel-Synod, or great Council of the Kingdom, though that be not now to be found. r e &

This Year, according to Bede, and the Saxon Annals, deceaſed Tobias, Biſhop of Rocheſter; a moſt learned Man, for he was bred under the diſcipline of Arch-Biſhop Theodorus and Abbot Adrian, and was ſo well skill'd in the Greek and Latin, that they were as perfect and familiar to him as his Mother Tongue; he was buried at Rocheſter in St. Paul's Porch adjoining to the Church of St. Andrew, after whom Aldwulf was made Biſhop of that See, Arch-Biſhop Bertwald conſecrating him. Anno Dom. DCCXXVII. Lib. 5. c. 24.

"King Ina went to Rome, and there dyed; and Ethelheard his Kinſ-"man ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, and held it "Fourteen Years. Anno Dom. DCCXXVIII.

William of Malmesbury, and H. Huntington do both give King Ina great Commendations, propoſing him as an Example not only of Magnanimity and Juſtice, by the good Laws he made, but alſo of Piety and Devotion; in that he was perſwaded to quit all Worldly Vanities for a Monaſtick Life, and that by the frequent Exhortations of the Queen his Wife; who, when ſhe ſaw nothing would prevail upon him, took this courſe; which, (thô none of the cleanlieſt,) I will here give you: Once when the King had made a great Entertainment at one of his Country-houſes, as ſoon as the Company was gone, the Queen ordered the Steward to defile all the Rooms with Cow-dung and other filth, and alſo put a Sow and Pigs into the Bed, where they had lain the Night before; but when the King and Queen had gone ſome part of their Journey, ſhe perſwaded him to return back again to the ſame place, otherwiſe he would run a great hazard; which being done, when the King ſaw the place, which was yeſterday fit to entertain a Prince, now thus ſpoiled, being much troubled at it, he went to the Queen, and complain'd to her of it; at which ſhe laughing replied; "My Lord and Husband, See what is become of all "that Feaſting and Magnificence we ſaw Yeſterday, Are they not all "gone and paſt, like Water that runs into the Sea? ſo of all thoſe Vanities "there remains nothing, but this Dung and Filth, that only ſerves to repre-"ſent the Corruption of the Soul by ſuch Exceſſes; think then Sir,

"How

Anno Dom. DCCXXVIII.

"how ſoon that Fleſh will rot that is now pamper'd, by Luxury; and "the greater and more powerful we are, the greater will our Torments "be hereafter. She needed to ſay no more, for ſhe had now brought over her Husband to her Sentiments, which ſhe had for ſome Years before conſtantly inſtill'd, thô hitherto in vain; thus after ſo many warlike Triumphs, being at the higheſt pitch of Humane Felicity, he went to Rome, where he ſhewed not the leaſt Pride in his Converſation, but without expoſing himſelf to publick view; being there ſhorn a Monk, grew old in that mean Habit; nor was his Wife, who had been the Authour of this Reſolution, wanting in following the ſame Example, accompanying him thither her ſelf, comforting him, and confirming him in that Courſe he had undertaken by her own Example; ſo not living far from each other in Mutual Love, they at laſt departed this Life, not without doing divers Miracles, if our Author may be credited.

But before we diſmiſs the Hiſtory of this King, it is fit we ſhould take notice of a notorious falſhood inſerted by ſome Ignorant trifling Monk, among the Laws of King * Edward the Confeſſour, concerning "this King Ina's Marrying Guala, the Daughter of Cadwallader, King "of the Britains; from which Daughter we are there told, that Country was called Wallia, which in Ancienter times had the name of Cambria, and that all the Engliſh who lived at that time, took their Wives "from the Britiſh Stock, as they did alſo from the Engliſh; and that "this was done by the Advice of a Common Council of the Kingdom, "and that in this manner they were made one Nation, and one People, "by God's mercy; throughout the whole Kingdom of Britain; which hath given occaſion to ſome fabulous Hiſtorians to make this Ina King of Wales, as well as England, though without any ground. Since none of the Ancient Britiſh, or Engliſh Chronicles, do ever mention any ſuch thing: For during the Reign of this Ina, Ivour the Son of Alan, Duke of Britain, is Recorded by the Welſh Chronicles to have Reigned in Wales; but the likeneſs of theſe two Names, I ſuppoſe gave the firſt occaſion to this Fable.

The ſame Year that Ina went to Rome, the Saxon Annals relate, "That "King Ethelhard (his Succeſſour) fought with Oſwald Ætheling, which "Oſwald was the Son of Æthelbald; and he the Son of Cynebald, Grandſon to King Ceawlin; who as H. Huntington, and Will. of Malmesbury tell us, Being a Young Prince of the Blood Royal and raiſing a Rebellion againſt him in the beginning of his Reign, endeavoured to obtain the Kingdom for himſelf; but being worſted was forced to Flye.

Biſhop, who had been a Prieſt in the Monaſtery of Berodune, in the Kingdom of the Mercians; he was conſecrated at Canterbury by Daniel, Biſhop of Wincheſter, Ingwald Biſhop of London, Aldwin, Biſhop of Leichfeld, and Aldulf Biſhop of Rocheſter; he was a Man famous for Religion and Prudence, and very well skill'd in the Scriptures: he ſate Arch-Biſhop till Bede's Death, and lived but Three Years after; here alſo follow in Bede, the Names of the reſt of the Biſhops, that were his Contemporaries, which is unneceſſary here to be inſerted.

But as for the ſtate of Civil Affairs, when Bede finiſhed his Hiſtory, he gives us this brief Account, viz. "That Ceolwulf (who was then "King of Northumberland,) had been in the beginning of his Reign per-"plexed with great Troubles, the end of which Bede could not then "foreſee; the Nation of the Picts at this time kept their league, with "the Engliſh Nation, and rejoyced to be partakers of the Catholick "Peace and Truth with the Univerſal Church: This he ſpeaks becauſe Natan King of the Picts, had been but a little before brought over to imbrace the Romiſh obſervation of Eaſter, and to their manner of ſhaving Prieſt's Crowns.

"Alſo the Scots, who Inhabit Britain, being kept in within their own "limits, did practiſe no Treachery againſt the Engliſh Nation; as to "the Britains, thô the greateſt part, from a natural hatred to the Engliſh "Nation, did oppoſe the Catholick obſervation of Eaſter, yet the Di-"vine Power, as well as Human Force, being againſt them, they could "not obtain their deſires; for though they were partly at their own "diſpoſal, yet were they in great meaſure ſubject to the Engliſh; in "this Peaceable and quiet time, the moſt part of the Northumbrian "Nation, as well Nobles as Private Perſons, choſe rather to make "themſelves and their Children Monks, than to Educate them in a Mili-"tary Life; which (ſays he) What end it will have, the next Age will "ſhew.

And ſo indeed it did, not long after Bede's Death, for when the beſt Men thus retired into Monaſteries, none but the worſer, or meaner ſort being left, they ſoon fell into horrid Rebellions and Civil Wars; one King driving out, and Murdering another, leaving the People an eaſie Prey to the Danes, who in the next Generation Invaded them: This (as Bede relates) was the Preſent State of Britain, in his Time, about 285 Years after the Arrival of the Engliſh Saxons.

We being now bereft of the aſſiſtance of ſo good an Authour, muſt for the future wholly rely upon the Saxon Annals, together with the other Monkiſh Writers; thô indeed for near the ſpace of above Thirty Years laſt paſt, Bede growing more intent upon Eccleſiaſtical than Civil Affairs, (being all moſt wholly taken up with the reciteing of Viſions and Miracles,) and mentioning other things only by the bye, hath given us ſo ſlender an account of thoſe times, that if we had not found ſome aſſiſtance from the Saxon Annals, (as well as from other Writers,) the Hiſtory of that Age, though very ſhort and obſcure, would yet have been much more imperfect without them.

But to proceed now with our Saxon Annals.

'This Year K. Ethelbald took Sumerton; and Acca was driven from 'his Biſhoprick of Hagulſtad, (I ſuppoſe by the then King of Northumberland, though no Author expreſly mentions it.) Will. of Malmesbury tells us, that this Ethelbald was that great and powerful King of the Mercians Anno Dom. DCCXXXIII. to whom Boniface, Biſhop of Mentz, (being then the Pope's Legat, writ a ſharp Letter, ſetting forth, and reproving, the then reigning Vic of this Nation, and particularly of that King himſelf; who, relying the vain Confidence of his Juſtice and Alms, was not aſhamed (no mo than the Noblemen of his Kingdom, by his Example,) to commit U cleanneſs even with Conſecrated Nuns, which wicked Actions the Biſho foretells would be the ruin of himſelf and Kingdom, as it proved in th end.

to

But King Ethelbald, after he had thus taken Symerton, with an Army to powerful to be reſiſted by the K. of the Weſt Saxons, became ſo great, that (a H. Huntington obſerves,) he made all the reſt of the Provinces of Englan together with their Kings, ſubject to him, as far as the River Humber. This Symerton was anciently a great Town and Caſtle of the Weſt-Saxon Kings, and gave Name to that County, which we now call Somerſetſhire, though at preſent it be but an ordinary Country Village. Alſo this Year the Sun was ſo much eclipſed, that (as the Epitome of Bede and Ethelward relate,) on 13° Kal. Sept. its whole Orb ſeem'd as it were covered with a black Sheild.

Anno Dom. DCCXXXIV. This Year alſo the Moon appear'd as it were ſtain'd with Blood, and Simeon of Durham ſaith it laſted one whole hour, and then a Blackneſs following, it return'd to its natural Colour. • Alſo Tatwin the Archbiſhop deceaſed; • and Egbryht was made Biſhop of York: Now Bede alſo died.

But the Author of his Life (in Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library) refers it to the Year following; and the Chronicle of Mailros, with greater Truth, to the Year 736; for he was (as his Life above-cited relates,) born Anno 677, and deceaſed in the 59th Year of his Age.

But ſince Bede our Hiſtorian deceaſed about this time; and that it is to him we are beholding for the greateſt part of the Hiſtory of this preſent Period, it is fit we give you a ſhort account of his Life; He was born in the Province of Northumberland, not far from the Monaſtery of Gyrwie (the place is now called Tarrow,) near the Mouth of the River Were, where he was bred up from ſeven Years of Age, and in which, being profeſs'd, he lived a Monk all the reſt of his Life, ſpending his time in the Study of the Scriptures, ſaying his Prayers, or Writing Comments upon the Old and New Teſtaments, as alſo his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, (ſo often cited by us,) beſides divers other Books, containing the Lives of Saints, and other Matters, of Humane, as well as Divine Learning; whoſe Titles you may find at the end of his ſaid Hiſtory: 'Till at laſt, being waſted by a long Aſthma, he there made an Heavenly End, as may be ſeen in his Life above-mentioned: So that Simeon of Durham very well obſerves, that though he lay, as it were, hid in the utmoſt Corner of the World, yet, after his Death, he became known in all Parts by his Learned Writings; therefore he hath, for his great Piety, as well as Learning, juſtly obtained the Title of Venerable Bede :‡ After whoſe deceaſe, (as Will. of Malmesbury rightly obſerves,) all knowledge of Actions paſſed was almoſt loſt even to his own Times, ſince none proved an Emulator of his Studies, nor a Follower of his Learning; ſo that to a ſlothful Generation, one more ſlothful ſtill ſucceeding, the Love of Learning for a long time grew cold in this whole Iſland.

‡ and he was so honoured abroad that Pope Sergius wrote a letter on purpose to Ceolfride Abbot of Gyrwie to send over Bede to Rome that he might confer with him upon some material points after which he should be sent back with all safety. but we do not find that he ever went thither. see the copy of the letter among the fragments of Alcuines or Albines Epistles. publisht in Lelands collections

Anno Dom. DCCXXXV. • This Year Biſhop Egbriht received the Pall from Rome; but you muſt here obſerve, that by the Pope's thus ſending a Pall to the Biſhop of York, he now became an Archbiſhop, and conſequently Metropolitan of all the

Northumbrian Provinces, that See having been, ever ſince the Time of Paulinus's Flight out of Northumberland into Kent, and carrying the Archi-epiſcopal Pall along with him, no more than an ordinary Biſhoprick, ſubject to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, from whoſe Power it was from this time exempted, and came now to have Supreme Juriſdiction over all the Biſhops in Deira and Bernicia, as far as the Pictiſh Kingdom. Anno Dom. DCCXXXV. his

'This Year alſo Nothelm the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury deceaſed, and 'Cuthbriht was Conſecrated in his ſtead, as was alſo Dun Biſhop of 'Rocheſter, (after the Death of Eadulph.) 'This Year alſo the City of 'York was burnt, together with the Monaſtery, (as Simeon has it.)

Anno Dom. DCCXLII. Now was held the great Synod at Cloveſhoe, where were preſent Ethelbald King of the Mercians, and Cuthbert the Arch-Biſhop, with many other wiſe Men.

Where this Cloveſhoe was, is now very uncertain, ſince the Name is wholly loſt; ſome ſuppoſe it to have been Cliffe in Kent, near Graveſend; but it is not likely that Ethelbald, being now the chief King of England, would permit this Council to have been held out of his own Dominions; ſo that *others ſuppoſe it to have been Abingdon in Berkſhire, which was anciently called Seoveſham, where (as the old Book of that Abbey tells us) was anciently a Royal Seat of the Kings, and where there uſed to be great Aſſemblies of the People concerning the arduous Affairs of the Mercian Kingdom.

* Vid. Nominum, & Locorum explan. ad fin. Chron. Saxon. nuper Edit. per Edm. Gibſon.

But thô we are more certain of the Decrees of this Council, than of the Place, where it was held; yet ſince it was a meer Eccleſiaſtical Synod, and no great Council of that Kingdom, and that its Decrees were chiefly made in Confirmation of the Charter of King Withred concerning free Elections to Monaſteries in Kent, according to the Directions of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, I ſhall refer you to the Canons themſelves, as they are to be found in the Decem Scriptores, and *Sir H. Spelman's Britiſh Councils; and ſhall only take notice of this one, that now Biſhops were firſt ordered to viſit their Dioceſſes once a Year.

* Col. 2209. Vol. 1. p. 230.

Anno Dom. DCCXLIII. 'This Year Ethelbald King of the Mercians, and Cuthred King of the 'Weſt Saxons, fought againſt the Britains.] H. Huntington tells us, That theſe two Kings now joyning their Forces brought two great Armies into the Field againſt the Welſh-men, who not being able to defend themſelves, were forced to flie, leaving great Spoils behind them; ſo both the Kings returned home Victorious.

Anno Dom. DCCXLIV. According to Florence of Worceſter. Wilfred, the ſecond Biſhop of York of that Name, died, after he had ſate 30 Years. Alſo this Year, according to the Annals,

'Daniel reſigned the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, being worn out by Age, 'and Hunferth ſucceeded him; and they ſay, the Stars ſeemed to fall from Heaven. But Simeon of Durham calls them, (with more probability,) ſuch Lightnings as thoſe of that Age had never before ſeen.

About this time alſo, (according to Simeon,) there happened a great Fight between the Picts and the Britains, I ſuppoſe he means thoſe of Cumberland, for no other Britains lay near the Picts.

Anno Dom. DCCXLV.

'This year Biſhop Daniel (above-mentioned) deceaſed, after he had 'been 43 years Biſhop.

Anno Dom. DCCXLVI.

'This year Selred (King of the Eaſt-Saxons) was ſlain ;] But by whom, or which way, is not here ſaid. This Selred was Sirnamed The Good, and reigned 38 years.

Anno Dom. DCCXLVII.

Swithheard, King of the Eaſt-Angles, dying, Elfwold ſucceeded him, as the Chronicle of Mailros relates.

This Year alſo was held the ſecond Council at Cloveſhoe, under Cuthbert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, there being preſent, (beſide the Biſhops, Abbots, and many Eccleſiaſticks,) Ethelbald, King of the Mercians, with his chief Men and Ealdermen : In which, beſides many Decrees concerning the Unity of the Church, and for promoting Peace, (which you may ſee at large in Sir H. Spelman's Firſt Volume of Councils ;) and after, the reading of Pope Zachary's Letters to the People of England to live more continently, Theſe (among other) Decrees were likewiſe paſſed, viz. 1. That the Reading of the Holy Scriptures be more conſtantly uſed in Monaſteries. 2. That Prieſts receive no Reward for baptizing Children, or for other Sacraments. 3. That they learn the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer in Engliſh; and are likewiſe to underſtand and interpret into their own Tongue the Words of Conſecration in the Celebration of Maſs, and alſo of Baptiſm, &c. P. 245, Anno Dom. DCCXLVIII.

'This year Cynric Ætheling (that is, Prince of the Blood-Royal of the 'Weſt Saxons) was ſlain ; and Eadbriht, King of Kent, died, after ſix 'Years Reign ; and Ethelbryht, the Son of King Withred, ſucceeded him.] This Cynric was he, whom H. Huntington relates to be Son of Cuthred, King of the Weſt Saxons ; who, thô young in Years, was a great Warriour for his time, yet periſhed in a ſudden Sedition of his own Souldiers, but where he does not ſay.

Anno Dom. DCCXLIX.

Simeon affirms, That Elfwald, King of the Eaſt Angles, now dying, Hunbeanna and Albert divided that Kingdom between them ; but what relation they had to the late King, he does not tell us.

Anno Dom. DCCL.

'This year Cuthred, King of the Weſt Saxons, in the 12th Year of his 'Reign, fought againſt Ethelune, that couragious Ealderman.] H. Huntington calls him a bold Earl, who moved Sedition againſt his Lord ; and thô he were inferiour in the number of his Souldiers, yet maintained the Fight a great while by his ſole Courage and Conduct ; but while he was ready to get the Victory, a Wound he then unfortunately received, ſo diſabled him, and diſheartened his Men, that the King's (being the ſtronger, as well as the juſter) Side, did thereby prevail.

Alſo the ſame Year (according to Simeon of Durham, and the Chronicle of Mailros,) Eadbert King of Northumberland led Kynwulf Biſhop of Lindisfarne, Priſoner to the City of Beban, who it ſeems had ſome ways rebelled againſt him, for he then alſo cauſed the Cathedral Church of Lindisfarne to be beſieged.

in Northumberland

The ſame Year (as Bede's Continuator relates) Eadbert, King of Northumberland, made War upon the Picts, and ſubdued all the Country of Kyle, with other Territories, joyning them to his own Dominions.

Anno Dom. DCCLIII.

'This Year (according to the Saxon Annals) King Cuthred fought 'againſt the Britains:] (But of this, the Welſh Chronicles are ſilent, as well as other Authors.) 'The ſame Year alſo, (being the 12th Year of his 'Reign,) King Cuthred fought againſt Æthelbald, King of the Mercians, at 'Beorgford (now Burford) in Oxfordſhire, and there put him to flight.

But H. Huntington gives us this Battle more at large, That King Cuthred being not any longer able to bear the Inſolencies and Impoſitions of that proud King Ethelbald, took Arms, and met him with an Army in the Field, preferring his Liberty before his Life, being encouraged by Earl Ethelune above-mentioned, who it ſeems was now cured, and reconciled to the King, relying upon whoſe Courage and Council, he reſolved to undertake this War; but Ethelbald, as a King of Kings, had brought along with him, beſides his own Mercians, the Kentiſh Men, with the Eaſt Angles and Saxons, which made all together a very great Army, and being both drawn up on the Spot, they approached each other, whilſt Earl Athelune marching before the Weſt Saxons, carried the Royal Standard, (being a Golden Dragon,) and in the beginning of the Battle challenging him to a ſingle Combat, there ſlew the Standard-bearer of the Enemy; upon which a great Shout being given, Cuthred's Souldiers were very much encouraged; then both Armies engaging, there followed a great and bloody Fight, of which our Author gives us a long and pompous Relation. Pride and Ambition (ſays he) inciting the Mercians, and fear of Servitude provoking the Weſt Saxons, to fight it to the laſt; but wherever Earl Ethelune charged the Enemies, he with the force of his invincible Battle-Axe deſtroyed all before him; but at laſt K. Ethelbald and the Earl meeting, they fought together with great Obſtinacy and Reſolution; till GOD, who reſiſteth the Proud, ſo diſcouraged this King, that he turned his Back, and fled, whilſt his Men ſtill fought on; yet at laſt they were all routed; nor from that time, to the day of his Death, did GOD give him any more Succeſs.

C. S Anno Dom. DCCLIV.

'Cuthred, King of the Weſt Saxons, departed this Life; and (according to Simeon) Sigebert, his Couſin, ſucceeded him: Alſo Cyneheard 'ſucceeded in the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter after Hunferth, and the ſame 'year the City of Canterbury was burnt. x

Anno Dom. DCCLV.

'This Year was very remarkable, for now (as our Annals inform us) 'Cynwulf, with the Wiſe and Noble Men of the Weſt Saxons, deprived 'King Sigebert of the whole Kingdom for his Cruelty and Injuſtice, '(except Hampſhire,) which he kept for ſome time, until he ſlew one 'Cumbran an Ealderman, (who had continued longeſt with him;) ſo 'that at laſt Sigebert was driven into Andred's Wood, where he remained 'till ſuch time as a certain Hogheard ran him through with a Lance at 'Pruntes-Flood, and thereby revenged the Death of Cumbran the Ealder'man. This King Cynwulf often overcame the Britains in Fight, but after 'he had governed the Kingdom about 30 Years, he was ſlain by Cyneheard Ætheling, brother to Sigebert; as ſhall be ſhewn hereafter.

H. Huntington is very particular in the Reaſons, and manner of King Sigebert's Depoſition, and tells us, That being puff'd up with the good Succeſs of his Predeceſſours, he grew intollerable to his Subjects; for he had oppreſſed them by all manner of ways, and wreſted the Laws for his own Advantage, inſomuch that this Cumbran, one of his nobleſt Earls, at the Deſire of the People, repreſented their Grievances to this cruel King, who, becauſe he perſwaded him, that he ſhould govern them more gently, and thereby become more beloved both by God and Man, he preſently commanded him to be ſlain, and ſo daily increaſed in his Tyranny, till in the beginning of his Second Year, the Great Men and People of the whole Kingdom being gathered together, by the Provident Deliberation, and Unanimous Conſent of them All he was expell'd the Kingdom; and Cinewulf, a notable young Man of the Blood Royal, was Elected King in his room.

This is the firſt Example we have in our Engliſh Hiſtory, of the Solemn Depoſition of a King, by the Authority of the Great Council of the Kingdom, concerning whom our Author bids us remark the manifold Juſtice and Providence of God, how ſometimes it doth not only recompence Kings according to their Merits in the World to come, but alſo in this; for oftentimes ſetting up Wicked Kings for the Deſerved Puniſhment of their Subjects, he lets ſome of them Tyrannize a great while, that ſo a wicked People might be puniſhed, and the King becoming more wicked, may be tormented for ever; as may be ſeen in Æthelbald, King of Mercia above-mentioned, whilſt God cuts others ſhort by a ſpeedy Deſtruction, leſt his People, being oppreſs'd by too great Tyranny, ſhould not be able to ſubſiſt under it, ſo that the immoderate Wickedneſs of a Prince does often accelerate his Puniſhment.

The ſame Year, (according to Caradoc's Chronicle publiſhed by Dr. Powel,) Conan Tindaethwy, Son of Rodri Molwynoc, began his Reign over the Britains in Wales.

'This Year alſo, (according to the Saxon Annals,) Æthelbald, King 'of the Mercians, was ſlain at Seccandune (now Secington) in Warwick'ſhire, after he had reigned 41 Years; and then Beornred uſurped the 'Kingdom, and held it but a little while, and that with great Trouble; for 'the ſame year King Offa expelled Beornred, and taking Poſſeſſion of the 'Throne, held it 39 Years; but his Son Egberth no more than 140 Days. 'This Offa was the Son of Thincerth, and he the Son of Eanwulf: The reſt of his Pedigree, as far as Woden, I omit.

Abbot Bromton's Chronicle farther adds, concerning the Death of King Ethelbald, That he was ſlain in a Fight at the Place above-mention'd, yet was it not by the Enemy, but by the Treachery of this Beornred.

Ingulph, in his Hiſtory of Croyland, tells us, That King Ethelbald having founded the Abby of Ripendune (now Repton) in Derbyſhire, (being the moſt famous of that Age,) was there buried; and alſo of this Beornred, (whom he calls a Tyrant,) that he did not long enjoy his Uſurpation, for it ſeems he was not of the Blood Royal of the Mercian Kings; but when he was Expelled, Offa ſucceeded him by the General Conſent of the Nobles of Mercia; but Mat. Weſtminſter (who puts the Succeſſion of King Offa two Years later) is more particular in this Tranſaction, and relates, That this Beornred governing very Tyrannically, the whole Nation of the Mercians roſe up againſt him; ſo that both the Nobility and Commons joyning together, under the Conduct of Offa, a valiant young Man, Nephew to the late King Æthelbald, they expelled Beornred the Kingdom; and then Offa, by the General Conſent of the Clergy and Laity of that Kingdom, was crowned King. This was that King Offa, who afterwards became a Terrour to all the Kings of England.

Anno Dom. DCCLVI.

Eadbert, King of Northumberland, and Unuſt, King of the Picts, brought an Army againſt the City Alkuith, which the Britains delivered upon Conditions. This is from the Authority of Simeon of Durham, and lets us ſee, that this City (now in Scotland) was then in the Hands of the Northern Britains.

Anno Dom. DCCLVII. 'This year Eadbert, King of the Northumbers, was ſhorn a Monk, and Oſwulf, his Son, ſucceeded him, yet Reigned but one Year, being ſlain by the Treachery of his own Servants on the 9th of the Kal. Auguſt following, thô without any juſt Cauſe, as I can find.

Concerning this Eadbert, Simeon of Durham, in his Hiſtory of that Church, tells us, That after he had reigned 21 Years, and ruled his Kingdom with great Wiſdom and Courage, ſo that all his Adverſaries being either overcome by force, or elſe ſubmitting themſelves to him; the Engliſh, Pictiſh, and Scotiſh Kings, not only maintained Peace and Friendſhip with him, but rejoyced to do him Honour; ſo that the Fame of his Grandeur ſpreading as far as France, King Pipin not only made a League with him, but ſent him great Preſents; and the Kings, his Neighbours, when he was about to reſign the Crown, had him in that Eſteem, that they offered him part of their own Dominions, on Condition, that he would not lay down his Charge; but he refuſed it, and reſigned his Kingdom to Uſulf, his Son.

Alſo about this time, (according to the Britiſh Chronicles,) there was a great Battle fought at Hereford, between the Britains and the Saxons, where Dyſnwal ap Theodore was ſlain: But they do not tell us who obtained the Victory.

Anno Dom. DCCLVIII. This Year Cuthbert, Arch Biſhop of Canterbury, deceaſed, having ſate Arch-Biſhop 18 Years. Alſo (according to Florence) about this time Swithred reigned over the Eaſt, and Oſmund over the South Saxons; as alſo Beorne was King over the Eaſt Angles.

Anno Dom. DCCLIX. 'This Year Bregowin was conſecrated Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury at the Feaſt of St. Michael; and Ethelwold, Sirnamed Moll, began to reign over the Northumbers, and at laſt reſigned the Crown.

Anno Dom. DCCLX. 'Ethellryght, King of Kent, deceaſed; he was the Son of King Wythred. Of this King, William of Malmeſbury records nothing remarkable, but that the City of Canterbury was burnt in his Reign.

'Ceolwulf alſo, late King of Northumberland, departed this Life the ſame Year, dying a Monk in the Iſle of Lindiſfarne.] But Simeon of Durham prolongs his Life 4 Years longer.

Anno Dom. DCCLXI. 'This Year was a very ſharp Winter; and Ethelwald Moll, King of Northumberland, ſlew Duke Oſwin at Edwinſclife on the Eighth of the Ides of Auguſt.

But thô who this Duke was, our Annals do not tell us; yet Simeon of Durham, and Roger of Hoveden relate, he was one of thoſe Great Northumbrian Lords, that rebelled againſt the King; who gained the Victory over him, and thoſe Rebels that took his part.

Anno Dom. DCCLXII. 'This Year deceaſed Bergowine, the Arch-Biſhop above-mentioned. But if he ſate 4 Years, (as theſe Annals affirm,) he could not have died till the Year following; in which alſo, Anno Dom. DCCLXIII. 'Janbryht (who is alſo called Lambert) was now conſecrated Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury about 40 Days after Chriſtmas. Alſo Frithwald, Biſhop of Witherne, died on the Nones of May; he had been Conſecrated in Tork on the 18th Kalends of September, in the Reign of Ceolwulf, and ſate Biſhop 29 Years; and then Piyhtwin (or Pechtwin) was Conſecrated Biſhop of Witerne at Ælfet, on the 16th Kal. of Auguſt.

Anno Dom. DCCLXIV.

'Janlryht, the Arch-Biſhop, received his Pall.] This was (as Florence f Worceſter informs us) from Pope Paul I.

This Year alſo, (as Simeon of Durham relates,) there was much Miſchief done by Fire, at London, Wincheſter, and other Places.

Anno Dom. DCCLXV. [illegible]

'Albred, King of Northumberland, began to reign, and reigned Eight ears; (Ethelwold Moll having now ~~by Death quitted~~ that Kingdom) [illegible]

The manner of which is given us more perfectly by William of Malmesbury, and Roger Hoveden, (viz.) That Ethelwold loſt the Kingdom of Northumberland at Winchan-heal 1° Kal. November, being murder'd by the Treachery of this Alhred, who ſucceeded him, and was alſo of the Race of Ida, being his Great Nephew.

The ſame Year alſo, (according to * William of Malmesbury,) Offa, King of the Mercians, envying the Greatneſs of the Arch-Biſhops of Canterbury, did, by moſt noble Preſents made to the Pope, obtain a Pall for the See of Lichfield, that is, That it ſhould be for the future an Arch-Biſhoprick, and that all the Biſhops of the Provinces of the Kingdom of Mercia, and the Eaſt Angles, ſhould be ſubject to it; and this he not only gained, notwithſtanding the Oppoſition and Remonſtrances of Arch-Biſhop Jambert to the contrary, but alſo bereaved the Arch-Biſhoprick of Canterbury of all its Lands, which lay within the Mercian Territories; which Injuſtice continued during the whole Reign of King Offa, till Kenulph his Succeſſour, by the Interceſſion of Eanbald then Arch-Biſhop of York, reſtored the See of Canterbury to its ancient Rights.

Anno Dom. DCCLXVI.

'This Year deceaſed Egbert Arch-Biſhop of York, (13° Kal. Sept.) who 'ſate Biſhop 36 Years.] This is he who was Baſe Brother to the King of the ſame Name, and regained the Pall to his See, after it had been without it ever ſince the time of Paulinus: He alſo built a Noble Library at York, which was then counted one of the beſt in Europe; for William of Malmesbury relates, that Alcwin (the greateſt Scholar of his time) once told the Emperour Charles, 'That if he would give him ſuch Books of 'exquiſite Learning, as he had in his own Country by the Pious Induſtry 'of his Maſter Arch-Biſhop Egbert, then he would inſtruct and ſend 'him back ſome young Men, who ſhould carry over the choiceſt Flowers 'of the Engliſh Learning into France.

Anno Dom. DCCLXVII.

(According to Simeon of Durham) Albert was now ordained Arch-Biſhop of York.

Anno Dom. DCCLXVIII.

'Eadbert, the Son of Eatta, deceaſed on 14° Kal. September.] This Eadbert had been formerly King of Northumberland, and (according to Simeon of Durham) died 10 Years after his taking the Habit of a Monk, and was buried at York.

Alſo this Year, (as the Welſh Chronicles acquaint us,) by the means of Elbodius, that Learned and Pious Biſhop of North Wales, it was decreed in a General Synod of the Britiſh Nation, That Eaſter ſhould be kept after the Cuſtom of Rome; ſo that all Differences between that Church and the Britiſh now ceaſed.

Anno Dom. DCCLXIX.

'Charles, King of the Franks, began his Reign;] for Pepin, his Father, died this Year, (as R. Hoveden informs us:) Alſo the fair City of Cataract in Yorkſhire was burnt by B ornred the Mercian Tyrant; and He alſo periſhed by Fire the ſame Year.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXI. 'This Year (according to Simon of Durham, and R. Hoveden,) Offa 'King of the Mercians, ſubdued the Nation of the Heſtings by force o 'Arms; but who theſe People were, or where they inhabited, no Autho 'informs us. Mr. Lambert, in his Gloſſary at the end of the Decem Scriptores will have them to be Danes; but I ſee no reaſon for it here, ſince the Danes were not then ſettled in England.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXII. 'This Year died Milred the Biſhop.] Florence ſays, he was Biſhop of the Wiccii, (that is, of the Dioceſs of Worceſter,) and was in great Reputation for his Sanctity.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXIII. This Year Albert, Arch-Biſhop of York, received his Pall from Pope Adrian, as Simeon informs us.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXIV. 'This Year the Northumbrians expelled their King Albred from York 'about Eaſter, and choſe Ethelred, the Son of Moll, (once King,) for 'their Lord: He reigned 4 Years.

[illegible]

Of which Tranſaction, Roger Hoveden gives us this particular Relation; That King Albred being depoſed by the Common-Council, and Conſent of his own Subjects, and forſaken of all his Great Men, was forced to retire firſt to the City of Bebban, (af~~terwards called Banborough Caſtle~~,) from whence he betook himſelf to Cynoth, King of the Picts, with but very few Followers.

note, this is supposed to be the same with Banborough Castle C.S.

'The ſame Year alſo appeared a Red Croſs in the Heavens after Sun-'ſet, and the Mercians and Kentiſh-men fought at Octanford (now Otford) 'in Kent.] But neither the Saxon Annals, nor any other, vouchſafe to tell us what was the Quarrel, nor who were the Commanders on either ſide, nor yet what was the Succeſs. 'Alſo ſtrange Serpents were ſeen 'in the Province of the South Saxons.] Mat Weſtminſter places this Prodigy two Years after, and ſays, They ſeemed to creep out of the Earth.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXV. 'This Year Cynwulf, King of the Weſt Saxons, and Offa, King of the 'Mercians, fought at Binſington (now Benſington) in Oxfordſhire, 'but Offa took the Town:] So it ſeems Cynwulf had the worſt of it. Here follows in the Peterburgh Copy another Relation concerning that Abbey, which is thus: That 'In the Reign of King Offa there was a certain Abbot of Medeſham-'ſtead, called Beonna, who, with the Conſent of the Monks of his Mo-'naſtery, leaſed out to Cuthbriht the Ealderman, X Bonde-land (that is, the Ground of ten Bond-men, or Villains,) 'at Swineſheafde, with the 'Meadows and Paſtures, and all other Things thereunto belonging; upon 'this Condition, That Cuthbriht ſhould pay the Abbot Fifty Pounds, and 'one Night's Entertainment every Year, or elſe Thirty Shillings in 'Money; and that after his Death the Lands ſhould again revert to the 'Monaſtery: To which Grant, King Offa, King Egferth, Arch Biſhop 'Higebert, the Biſhop Ceolwulf, the Biſhop Inwona, with Beon the Abbot, 'and many other Biſhops, Abbots, and Great Men, were Witneſſes. I have inſerted this Paſſage, thô it does not relate to the Civil Hiſtory of theſe Times, becauſe it is the firſt Example of a Leaſe of this kind, and ſeems to have been done in a great Council of the Kingdom, where theſe Kings were preſent, which was then neceſſary for ſuch a Grant.

'Alſo in the time of this King Offa, (as the Peterburgh Copies relate,) 'there was a certain Ealderman, called Brordan, who deſired of the King, 'That for his ſake he would free a certain Monaſtery of his, called Wo-'cingas, becauſe he intended to give it to St. Peter, and to the Church of Anno Dom. DCCLXXV.

'of Medeſhamſted, one Puſa being then Abbot of it: This Puſa ſucceeded Beonna, and the King loved him very well; wherefore he freed the Church of Wocingas by the King's conſent with that of the Biſhop, Earls, and all other Men's conſents; ſo that no body ſhould from thenceforth have any duty or Tribute beſides, St. Peter and the Abbot; this was done in the King's Town, called Freoricburne.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXVI

'Pehtwin, Biſhop of Witerne (called in Latin Candida Caſa) deceaſed XIII. Kal. Octob. he was Biſhop Fourteen Years, and had been bred under Aldhelm, that Pious Biſhop of Wincheſter; and the ſame Year Ethelbert was conſecrated Biſhop of that See at York, XVII. Kal. Junii.

This Year (according to the Welſh Chronicle) the South-Welſhmen deſtroyed great part of Mercia with Fire and Sword: As alſo that Anno Dom. DCCLXXVII.

The Summer following, all the Welſhmen, both of North and South-Wales, gathered themſelves together, and, Invading the Kingdom of Mercia, made great ſpoil, by burning, and plundering the Country; whereupon King Offa was forced to make Peace with the other Saxon Kings, and to bend his whole Forces againſt the Welſh Men, who not being able to encounter ſo great a ſtrength as he then brought againſt them; were forced to quit all the plain Country, between the Rivers of Severne and Wye, and retired into the Mountains; whereupon Offa perceiving this, ſeiſed upon all the Country, and planted Saxons in their places; and annexing it to his own Kingdom, cauſed that famous Ditch, or Trench, to be made from Sea to Sea, betwixt his Kingdom and Wales, whereby he might the better defend his Country from the Incurſions of the Welſh hereafter: This Ditch is ſeen at this day in divers places, and is called in Welſh, Clawdh Offa, (i.e.) Offa's Ditch.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXVIII.

'This Year Æthebald and Hearbert, kill'd Three chief Geriſs or Governours, Ealdwulf the Son of Boſa at Cyningeſclife, (i e.) Kings Cliffe; and Cynwulf and Ecga at Helathyrn, XI. Kal. Aprilis; then Alfwold took the Kingdom, (Æthelred being Expel'd the Land,) and Reigned Ten Years.

But H. Huntington, and Simeon of Durham, gives us a more exact account of this Matter; that Æthelred, King of Northumberland, having cauſed Three of his Nobles, Aldwulf, Kinwulf, and Ecga, to be treacherouſly ſlain by two of the ſame rank; The Year following his Subjects Rebelling againſt him, they firſt ſlew Aldwulf, General of the King's Army, in Flight at the place above mentioned, as they alſo did the two other Commanders in the ſame manner; ſo that King Æthelred's Captains being all ſlain, and his hopes as well as his Forces defeated, he was forced to flee into another Country, and ſo Elfwald the Son of Oſwulf ſucceeded him, thô not without Civil Broils: He was a Juſt and Pious Prince; yet could not eſcape the hard Fate of his Predeceſſors, as you will ſee in due time

'The ſame Year, (as the Laudean Copy relates,) King Charles entred Spain, and deſtroyed the Citties of Pampelona, and Ceſar Auguſta, (now called Saragoſa,) and having joined his Army, ſubdued the Saracens, and received Hoſtages from them; and then returned by Narbon and Gaſcony into France.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXX.

'This Year the chief Geriſs or Governours of Northumberland, burnt Beorne the Ealderman in Seletune; 19 Kal. Januarij.

Roger Hoveden, calls theſe Geriſs, Osbald, and Æthelheard, and H. Huntington ſays, They burnt this Ealderman, or Chief Juſtice of the Kingdom, Anno Dom. DCCLXXX. Kingdom, becauſe he was more Rigid and Severe, than in Reaſon he ought to have been.

'The ſame Year the Ancient Saxons and Franks fought againſt each 'other,] in which Battle, Charles King of the Franks gained the Victory, having waſted the Saxon Territories with Fire and Sword, and laid them to his own Dominions; as not only our own, but the French Hiſtorians relate.

'Alſo, Biſhop Æthelheard dyed at York, and Eanbald was conſe-'crated to the ſame See; and Cynebald the Biſhop reſigned his See at 'Lindisfarne, and Alchmund Biſhop of Hagulſtead deceaſed, 7th Id. Sept. 'and Higbert was conſecrated in his ſtead, the 6th of the Nones of Octob. 'as likewiſe Higbald was conſecrated at Soccabrig to be Biſhop of Lindis-'farne. Alſo King Allwold ſent to Rome, to demand the Pall for Eanbald, 'Arch-Biſhop of York.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXXII. 'This Year Werburh, the Wife of King Ceolred (late King of the 'Mercians,) deceaſed, (at her Nunnery of Cheſter, where ſhe was Abbeſs, 'and where the Church is dedicated to her Memory:) alſo Cenwulf 'Biſhop of Lindisfarne died; there was likewiſe now a Synod at Aclea. But under what King this Council was held, or whereabouts the place is, or what Decrees were there made, our Hiſtories are altogether ſilent in, but Sir H. Spelman, in his * firſt Volume of Councils, ſuppoſes it to have been at a place of that Name, in the Biſhoprick of Durham, where there are two places ſo called, the one Alca, and the other Scole Aclea.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXXIV. This Year, Cyneheard ſlew Cynewulf, King of the Weſt-Saxons, but Cyneheard himſelf was there ſlain, and Eighty Four Men with him: but theſe Annals in the beginning of this King's Reign, under Anno Dom. DCCLV. have given us a full account of this King's unfortunate end, which I rather chuſe to inſert in its proper place, and was thus; 'That 'he endeavouring to Expel Cyneheard (Brother to the late King Sigebert 'out of the Kingdom;) in the mean time when he knew that the King 'with a ſmall Company was gone to Merinton, (now called Merton in 'Surrey,) to viſit a certain Woman, he there beſieged him, and beſet the 'Chamber where he was, before the King's Attendants could know 'any thing of it; which, as ſoon as the King perceived, he got out of 'Doors, and Manfully defended himſelf; but all of them aſſaulting the 'King at once, they in the end ſlew him, (thô as Florence relates, he firſt 'ſorely wounded Cynheard;) but when the King's Thanes, who were then 'in the ſame Houſe, heard the noiſe, they all ran thither as faſt as they 'could get themſelves ready; but Cyneheard Ætheling promiſed them 'great Rewards, and Pardon, if they would take his part, which none 'of them would agree to, but preſently all fought againſt him, till they 'were all kill'd, except one Britiſh Hoſtage, who was grievouſly wound-'ed; but the next morning the King's Thanes that remained at home, 'coming to know that he was kill'd, (viz) Oſric, the Ealderman, and 'Wiverth his Thane, and all thoſe whom he had left behind him, they all 'came thither on Horſeback, and when they found Cyneheard Ætheling in 'the Town, where the King lay dead, and having the doors faſt locked 'upon them, as they approached and endeavoured to break 'in; Cynheard promiſed to grant them all their Liberties, and all their 'Lands and Goods, with great Riches and Honours, if they would de-'liver up the Kingdom to him peaceably; telling them moreover, That 'he had ſome of their Kinſmen with him, who would never deſert him;

' but they anſwered, That none of their Relations were dearer to them than their own Lord, and they would never obey his Murderers; and they then farther told their Kinſmen, That if they would leave their Leader, they ſhould all be ſafe, from whom they alſo received this Anſwer, That the like had been already promiſed to thoſe who were of the King's Party; and ſaid, That as they then refuſed their promiſe, ſo themſelves ſhould now refuſe the like from them, then they ſought at the Gates until they were broken open, and the Conſpirators forced to retire within them, but there Cyneard Ætheling was Slain, and all thoſe that were with him, except one, who was the Ealderman's Godſon, to whom, being grievouſly wounded, he granted his Life. This King Cynwulf Reigned One and Thirty Years, and his Body lyes buried at Wintenceſter, but that of the Ætheling at Axanmiſter, (now Axminſter in Devon-ſhire,) being both of them deſcended from Cerdic, the firſt King of that Kingdom.

' This ſame Year alſo, Brihtic began his Reign over the Weſt-Saxons, whoſe Body lyes buried at Werham, and he was alſo deſcended from Cerdic in a right Line. In thoſe times King Ælmond Reigned in Kent; he was the Father of King Egbert, and Egbert was the Father of Athulf, (or Athelwulf.)

But the Authour of theſe Annals is here miſtaken, for thô one Ælmond was Father of King Egbert, yet was there never any of that Name King of Kent.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXXV

' Bothwin, Abbot of Ripun, deceaſed this Year, and the ſame Year was held that troubleſome Synod at Cealchythe, where Arch-Biſhop Janbryht loſt part of his Province to the See of Litchfield; alſo Higebryht was this Year choſen Arch Biſhop of Litchfield, by King Offa, and Egbert his Son, was anointed King with him; and in thoſe times there were Legates ſent from Pope Adrian to renew the Faith, which had been ſent us by Auguſtine.

Note, the Pope had before granted the Pall to Litchfield, and thereby made it an Arch-Biſhoprick, but it was not till the following Year confirmed in a general Synod of the Kingdom.

Anno Dom. DCCXXXVI.

Vid. Spelman's Council vol. 1.

This Year that great Synod, or Council of Calcuith (above mentioned) was held by Gregory, Biſhop of Oſtia, and Theophilact, Biſhop of Tudertum, (then the Pope's Legates in England;) at which were alſo preſent Offa, King of the Mercians, and Cinwulf, King of the Weſt-Saxons; where not only the Nicene Creed was again received, and confirm'd, as alſo the Seven firſt General Councils; but many Canons were made concerning Matters of Religion, and Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline; of all which I ſhall here recite ſome that I think proper.

The ſecond of theſe Decrees is, That Baptiſm be performed at the times appointed by the former Canons of the Church, and no other; and that all Men in general learn the Creed and the Lord's Prayer; that Godfathers ſhall be anſwerable for thoſe Children for whom they ſtand, till they come to Years capable of learning the Creed and the Lords Prayer.

The Twelfth Canon is, That in the Election or Ordination of Kings, no Man ſhould permit the Aſſent or Vote of Evil Men to prevail; but Kings ſhall be Lawfully Elected by the Clergy and Elders of the People, not begot of Adultery or Inceſt; becauſe, as in our times, an Adulterer according to the Canons cannot arrive to the Prieſt-hood, ſo neither can he be the Lord's Anointed, and the Heir of his Country, and King of the whole Kingdom, who is not begot of Lawful Matrimony. The reſt of it is for rendering Honour and Obedience to Kings, without ſpeaking Evil of them, and the chief Texts out of St. Peter and St. Paul, are cited to that purpoſe. It is alſo there forbid, That any Man ſhould conſpire the Death of the King, becauſe he is the Lord's Anointed; and if any ſhall be guilty of that wickedneſs, if he be a Biſhop or one in Prieſt's Orders, he ſhall be deprived, as Judas was caſt out from his Apoſtleſhip: There is alſo here likewiſe cited out of Scripture ſeveral examples of thoſe that have been puniſhed either for conſpiring the Death of Kinsg, or having actually kill'd them.

Anno Dom.
DCCLXXXVI.

The Sixteenth Canon is, That Baſtards, and thoſe begotten of Nuns, ſhall not inherit, which is the firſt Decree we find of this kind.

The Seventeenth Canon is, That Tythes ſhall be paid according to the Scriptures, viz. Thou ſhalt bring the Tenth part of all thy encreaſe, when thou bringeſt thy firſt fruits into the Houſe of the Lord thy God; there is likewiſe cited the Text in Malachi Chap. 3. concerning the paying of Tythes, and therefore, ſays the Canon, we exhort all Men, that they pay Tythes of whatſoever they poſſeſs; becauſe it is God's ſpecial Commandment, that every Man live, and give Alms of the other 9 parts.

Whence you may obſerve, that as this is the firſt Decree of any Council in England, concerning payment of Tythes, ſo alſo is it hereby declared that they are due by Divine Right.

The Nineteenth Decree is, againſt Mens obſerving any Pagan Rites, and particularly of making marks and ſcars in any part of their Bodies for any falſe God. There are alſo other Decrees which ſeem very trivial, as againſt cutting off Horſes Ears, or Tails, and ſlitting their Noſes; as alſo againſt eating Horſe-fleſh, which it ſeems was then much in faſhion amongſt the Common ſort of People; as alſo againſt caſting of Lots for the deciding of Civil Controverſies.

It alſo here appears by the Addreſs of the Pope's Legates, made to him at the end of this Council, that there were two diſtinct Seſſions of it; the firſt was held before King Ælfwald, and Arch Biſhop Eanbald, and all the Biſhops belonging to the Northumbrian Kingdom; as alſo all the Senators, Ealdermen, and People of that Country, who when theſe Decrees were propoſed to them, did all of them with great devotion promiſe to obſerve them, and ſubſcribed them with the Sign of the Croſs. Then follow the ſubſcriptions of the King, the Arch-Biſhop of York, and the reſt of the Biſhops of that Province; after them follow alſo the Subſcriptions of the Presbyters and Deacons of Churches, Judges, Chief and Noble Men, ſome of whom do there ſubſcribe for all the reſt.

Where this Council was held for the Kingdom of Northumberland is uncertain; but the ſecond Seſſion of it was held at Calcuith, now ſuppoſed to be in the Kingdom of Mercia, which, as alſo in the concluſion o this Council, it is thus recited; 'King Offa with all the Senator 'of his Kingdom, with Janbryht, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and the othe 'Biſhops of that Province, the ſame Decrees being read before the Council, as well in Latin as in Saxon, ſo that all might underſtand them 'they all agreed with one accord to obſerve them; then follow the Subſcriptions of King Offa, and the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, with diver of the Nobles there preſent, who ſubſcribed in the name of all the reſ

Anno Dom. DCCLXXXVI

But Will. of Malmesbury in his Firſt Book, de Pontif, hath given us a further account of the Acts of this Council, than what are expreſſed in the Canons themſelves; viz. That in this Council, Arch-biſhop Janbryht was forced to reſign part of his Province to the Biſhop of Litchfield, who thereby became an Arch-Biſhop; ſo that there remained no more Biſhops under the Juriſdiction of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, but thoſe of London, Winchester, Rochester, and Shireburne: But thô it had been obtained by King Offa from the Pope by great importunity, and falſe ſuggeſtions, that Arch-Biſhop Janbryht ſhould be thus deprived of his Primacy; yet was it not counted of any force till it was confirmed in a great Council, and that the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury himſelf had conſented to it.

The ſame Author further adds, That alſo in this Council, Offa the moſt potent King of the Mercians, did then cauſe his Eldeſt Son Egfred, a Comely and Valiant Young Man, and endued with all good Qualities, to be ſolemnly Crowned King; who obeying his Father in all things, Reigned together with him ſo long as he lived.

But it is very obſervable, that neither Alrich, then King of Kent, nor any of his Deputies, did appear at this Council; for which I can give no other Reaſon, than that this King did not approve of the Removal of the chief Archiepiſcopal See from Canterbury in his own Dominions, to Litchfield in another Prince's Territories.

De Pontif. l. 1.

But as Will. of Malmesbury obſerves, This Violence done to the See of Canterbury, thô it laſted all the Reign of King Offa, and alſo during the Life-time of Arch-Biſhop Janbryht, who ſpared neither coſt nor pains to get his See reſtored to its Ancient Dignity; yet was it all to no purpoſe, till ſuch time as Kenwulf, King of the Mercians, reſtored the Arch-Biſhoprick of Canterbury to its former Rights, Litchfield becoming again an ordinary Biſhoprick, ſubject to the See of Canterbury to this day, having continued an Arch-Biſhoprick only during the times of two Arch-Biſhops, viz. for the ſpace of about Eleven Years. But it is time to return to Civil Affairs.

The ſame Year (as H. Huntington relates) the Sign of the Croſs appeared of it ſelf upon Mens Cloaths, which (if true) is wonderful to future Ages.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXXVII.

King Brithric now married Eadburghe, the Daughter of King Offa, which was done (as Will. of Malmesbury relates) to ſtrengthen his Intereſt with his Neighbouring Princes; alſo about thoſe times (as Ethelwerd, and the Saxon Annals inform us,) arrived in the Weſt Country three Ships of Danes, or Norwegians, from Herethaland, (that is, the Country of Pyrates;) theſe landing, the King's Gerefa or Officer coming thither on Horſeback endeavoured to carry them to the King's Town (of Dorcheſter,) becauſe he knew not from whence they came; but he was there ſlain with thoſe that attended on him; after which great Multitudes of People flocking in, the Danes were at laſt forced to Flee to their Ships, and leave their prey behind them; theſe were the firſt Daniſh Ships that ever infeſted the Engliſh Nation.

Where Note, That the ſame People who are firſt called Normans in the Saxon Annals, are there alſo named Danes in other places; which ſhews, that the Danes and Normans were then looked upon to be one and the ſame People.

Anno Dom. DCCLXXXVI. ‘This Year there was a general Synod aſſembled at Pyncanhale, or Finkenhale, (now Finkley in the Biſhoprick of Durham, then part of the Kingdom of Northumberland) where Eanbald Arch-Biſhop of York preſided: whoſe Decrees you may ſee in Sir H. Spelman's 1 Vol. of Councils; but its conſtitutions being wholly about Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, and the right obſervation of Eaſter, it is beſide my purpoſe to take any further notice of them.

This Year alſo, (according to the Annals) Albert the Abbot deceaſed; and King Charles paſſed through Almany, to the very Borders of Bavaria, (as the Latin Text of the Laudean Copy relates.)

Anno Dom. DCCLXXXIX. ‘Alfwold, King of Northumberland, was ſlain by one Sicga on the IX. Kal. Octob.

This King is ſaid by Simeon of Durham, and Roger Hoveden, to have been a very Juſt and Worthy Prince, and that he was Slain by the Treachery of this Sicga, who was one of his chief Noblemen, and being Murthered at Cilceaſter, (near the Pict's Wall,) there was frequently ſeen a Light from Heaven over the Place, where he was Slain: He was buried in the Cathedral Church of Hagulſtad, with great Solemnity, and there was afterwards a Church built in the Place where he was killed: and Oſred, the Son of Alchred, Reigned after him, who was the Nephew of King Alfwold: There was alſo at this time another Synod held at Aclea.

The ſame Year likewiſe (according to Mat. Weſtminſter,) Offa, King of the Mercians, fought againſt Kenwulf, King of the Weſt-Saxons, at the Siege of Benſington Caſtle: But Kenwulf being worſted was forced to flee, and ſo Offa took the Caſtle.

Anno Dom. DCCXC. ‘Now Janbryht the Archbiſhop deceaſed, and Ethelheard the Abbot was elected Archbiſhop. Alſo Oſred, King of the Northumbers, was betray'd, and driven out of his Kingdom; and Ethelred, the Son of Ethelwald (Sirnamed Mull,) reigned after him, or rather was again reſtored to the Kingdom, having reigned there before, as hath been already ſhewn.

But Simeon of Durham adds farther, that this Oſred, the late King of this Kingdom, having been alſo ſhaven a Monk againſt his Will, eſcaped again out of the Monaſtery, into the Iſle of Man. But the next Year,

Anno Dom. DCCXCI. As Simeon relates, Oelf and Oelfwin, Sons of Alfwold, formerly King of Northumberland, were drawn by fair Promiſes from the Principal Church of York, and afterwards, at the Command of King Ethelred, cruelly put to Death at Wonwalderemere, a Village by the great Pool in Lancaſhire, (now called Winanderemere.)

Alſo about this time, (according to the ſame Author,) one Eardulf, an Earl, being taken and brought to Ripun, was there Sentenced by the ſaid King to be put to Death, without the Gate of the Monaſtery; whoſe Body, when the Monks had carried to the Church, with ſolemn Dirges, and placed under a Pavilion, was about Midnight found alive. But this Relation is very imperfect, for it neither tells us how he eſcaped Death; nor how he was conveyed away, though we find him five Years after this made King of Northumberland.

This Year (as Simeon of Durham and Mat. Weſtminſter relate,) Charles King of France ſent certain Synodal Decrees into England; in which alas! (for with great Grief, our Author ſpeaks it) were found many inconvenient things, and altogether contrary to the true Faith: For it had been decreed in a Council at Conſtantinople, by more than Three Hundred Biſhops, ſhops, that Images ought to be adored, which the Church of God does (ſay they) wholly abominate.

Anno Dom. DCCXCI.

Then Albinus, (that is our Alcuin,) wrote an Epiſtle, wherein he proved it by the Authority of the Holy Scriptures to be utterly Unlawful; and this he offered, together with the Book it ſelf, to the King of France, on the behalf of all our Biſhops and Great Men; and this Letter of Alcuinus is thought to have wrought ſuch an effect on the Synod of Francfort, aſſembled about two Years after, that the Worſhip of Images was therein ſolemnly condemned.

Vid. Sir H. Spelman's Councel, 1. vol. p. 307.

From which it is evident, that Image-Worſhip, as now practiſed in the Greek and Roman Churches, was not then received in England.

And this Year alſo, according to the ſame Author, Oſred, late King of Northumberland, being deceived by the Oaths of ſome great Men, returned privately from the Iſle of Man; when, his Souldiers deſerting him, and being taken Priſoner by King Ethelred, he was by his Command put to Death, at a Place called Aynsburg; but his Body was buried at the famous Monaſtery at the mouth of Tine; and the ſame Year King Ethelred betrothed Elfrede the Daughter of King Offa.

Anno Dom. DCCXCII.

In whom alſo there was found as little Faith as Mercy; for this Year, according to our Annals, Will. of Malmesbury, and Mat. Weſtminſter; Ethelbert, the Son of Ethelred, King of the Eaſt-Angles, notwithſtanding the diſſwaſions of his Mother, going to the Court of King Offa, in order to Wooe his Daughter, was there ſlain, by the wicked Inſtigations of Queen Quendrith; ſo that out of an Ambition to ſeize his Kingdom, Offa was perſwaded to make him away; but by what means it is not agreed: The Annals relate him to have been beheaded.

But the ſame Annals, and Florence of Worceſter agree, ‘That his Body ‘was buried (in the Monaſtery) at Tinmouth. But the Chronicle aſcribed to Abbot Bromton, as alſo Mat. Weſtminſter, have given us long and Legendary Accounts of the Death of this Prince; and the latter of theſe, as well as other Monks, who were favourers of this King Offa, would have this Murther to be committed without this King's knowledge; and Mat. Weſtminſter has a long Story about it, but not at all probable, eſpecially ſince the King was ſo well pleaſed with the Fact when it was done, that he preſently ſeized the Kingdom of this poor Murthered Prince, and added it to his own Dominions.

Anno Dom. DCCXCIII.

This Year, (as Mat. Paris, and his Nameſake of Weſtminſter relate,) King Offa was warned by an Angel to remove the Reliques of St. Alban into a more noble Shrine; and ſo either for this cauſe, or elſe (which is more likely) to expiate the ſeveral Murthers he had committed, began to build a new Church and Monaſtery in honour of St. Alban, and thither removing his Bones, into a Silver ſhrine all gilt and adorned with precious Stones, he placed them in the new Church that he had built without the Town: where (as the Monks pretended) they wrought great Miracles.

This King having made a journey on purpoſe to Rome, obtained of Pope Adrian to have him Canonized: King Offa alſo conferred upon this Monaſtery very great Privileges, and vaſt Poſſeſſions, all which he confirmed by his Charter, which you may find in the firſt Volume of * Monaſt. Anglic. as that alſo, Anno. Dom. 1154. One Nicholas having been firſt a Servant in this Abbey, and afterwards was Biſhop of Alba, Elected Pope by the Name of Adrian IV: he by his Bull ordained, that, as St. Alban was the firſt Martyr of England; ſo this Abbot ſhould be the firſt in Dignity of all the Abbots in England; and Pope Honorius did by a Bull in the Year 1118, not only ratifie all the Privileges made and confirmed by former Popes, but alſo granted to the Abbot and his Succeſſours Epiſcopal Rights, together with the Habit; and that he and his Monks ſhould be exempt from all Juriſdiction to the Biſhop of Lincoln, with other Exemptions too long here to be ſet down.

'Alſo this Year there appeared ſtrange Prodigies in the Country of 'Northumberland, which mightily terrified the People of that Province; '(viz.) immoderate Lightnings; there were alſo ſeen Meteors like fiery 'Dragons, flying in the Air; after which ſigns followed a cruel Famine; 'and a little after, the ſame Year (6° Idus Jan.) certain Heathens '(i. e. Danes) miſerably deſtroyed the Church of God in Lindiſfarne, 'committing great Spoils and Murthers. Simeon of Durham ſays, Theſe Danes not only pillaged that Monaſtery, but killing divers of the Friers, carried away the reſt Captive, ſparing neither Prieſts nor Laymen. 'This 'Year alſo Sicga died; he who killed the good King Alfwold, who now (as Roger Hoveden relates) ſlew himſelf.

And the ſame Year, (according to Florence of Worceſter,) Ethelard was ordained Arch-Biſhop of York; and (as Simeon of Durham relates) the ſame Year died Alric, Third Son to Withred, King of Kent, after a long Reign of Thirty Four Years; in whom ended the Race of Hengiſt: Thenceforth, (as Will. of Malmesbury obſerves,) whomſoever Wealth or Faction advanced, took on him the Title of King of that Province.

Anno Dom. DCCXCIV.

'This Year both Pope Adrian, and Offa, King of the Mercians, 'departed this Life; the Latter after he had Reigned Forty Years.

Yet notwithſtanding the Printed Copies of the Saxon Annals, have placed this King's Death under this Year: Yet the reſt of the Copies do not agree with this Account; for the Laudean Manuſcript Copy, in the Bodlean Library places this King's Death in Anno. Dom. 896; and that with greater Truth; for firſt Pope Adrian above-mentioned died not till Two Years after the time here ſpecified. And, it appears farther in a Letter written by the Emperour Charles the Great, to this King Offa; and which is recited at large by William of Malmesbury, in his Life of this King, that Pope Adrian was dead ſome time before the date of that Letter: viz. Anno. Dom. 796; Thô it is certain, King Offa did not ſurvive long after.

I thought to give the Reader notice of this, becauſe it puts the Death of this King, and the Succeſſion of all his Succeſſours, juſt Two Years later than the common Printed Accounts: But whenever this King here died, he is ſaid by William of Malmesbury to have been buried in a Chapel at Bedford, near the River Ouſe; whoſe frequent Inundations had in his time, carried away both the Chapel, and the Tomb into the River: So that it could not be ſeen, unleſs ſometimes by thoſe who waſhed themſelves in that River.

This Prince is alſo deſcribed by the ſame Author, to have had ſo grea a Mixture of Vertues and Vices, that he does not know well what Character to give him: The Reaſon that ſo confounded him, was, That th he was a Cruel and Perfidious Prince, yet he Built the Monaſtery of S Albans (as you have heard,) but for all that he cannot give him many goo words, becauſe he took away abundance of good Farms from hi Abbey. This ſeems to have been the firſt of our Engliſh Saxon Kin who maintained any great correſpondence with Foreign Princes; for tho had firſt great Enmity with Charles the Great, which proceeded ſo far, as to the interdicting of all Commerce, yet at laſt it was changed into as much Amity; ſo that a firm League was made between them, as appears by a Letter of the ſaid Charles to Offa, extant in William of Malmesbury, in which alſo is mentioned, that he ſent him many Noble Preſents. Alſo he granted (ſaith Henry Huntington) a perpetual Tribute to the Pope out of every Houſe in his Kingdom, and this, perhaps, for his conſenting to tranſlate the Primacy from Canterbury to Litchfield in his own Dominions. He alſo drew a Trench of a wondrous length between Mercia and the Britiſh or Welſh Territories, thereby to hinder the Incurſions of the Welſh-men, called to this day in the Welſh Tongue Claudh Offa, (i. e.) Offa's Dike.

Anno Domi. DCCXCIV.

But from the Grant of the above-mention'd Penſion, ſome Men of different Perſwaſions have drawn as different Conſequences. Pol. Virgil, and divers of the Romiſh Writers, have from thence concluded, That King Offa, by this Act, made his Kingdom Tributary to the Pope; whereas indeed it was no ſuch Thing, for it had been alſo granted by King Ina long before, (as hath been already obſerved,) for the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons; whoſe Example King Offa ſeemed now to follow, and indeed was no more than a Voluntary Annual Alms, or Benevolence, as it is expreſly called in our Saxon Annals, as ſhall be ſhewn further hereafter.

This is alſo urged by ſome high Promoters of the Royal Prerogative, to prove this King's unlimited Power in Eccleſiaſtical, as well as Civil Matters; ſince He (as they ſuppoſe) could, without the Conſent of the Great Council of the Kingdom, charge all the Houſes in his Dominions to pay, each of them, one Penny to the Pope: But this, if it be cloſely looked into, will prove a Miſtake; for tho it be true, that upon King Offa's going to Rome, he is ſaid to have granted this Alms, called Rome's Scot, or Peter-pence, to the Pope, yet Anno 794, immediately upon his Return, you will find in Sir H. Spelman's Councils, he called a Great Council at Verulam, (now St. Alban's,) where this Tribute might be confirmed by the Conſent of the Eſtates of his Kingdom: Nor is the Silence of our Hiſtories, or of the Acts of this Council it ſelf, any material Argument to the contrary, ſince that Law might be loſt, or omitted, by which it was confirmed, as well as ſeveral other Councils of that Age; there being no more mention made of this King's Confirmation of the Lands given to this Monaſtery in the great Council at Verulam, than what is cited in Sir H. Spelman's Councils out of a Manuſcript Hiſtory of St. Alban's, all the Acts of that Council being now loſt. But to return to our Annals. P. 314

'The ſame Year Ethelred, (who had been twice King of Northumberland,) 'was ſlain by his own People 14° Kal. Maii, and that deſervedly, (as R. Hoveden relates,) as having been the Death of King Oſred, his Predeceſſour. Who was moſt in fault, in all theſe frequent Rebellions, and Changes of Kings among the Northumbers, is hard to decide; ſince all the Annals, as well as Hiſtorians, are very ſhort in their Relations of theſe Tranſactions; but it is certain, that the People, as well as Princes, muſt have ſuffered much Anno Dom. DCCXCIV. much by ſuch frequent Revolutions. And it is alſo very well obſerved by H. Huntington, that theſe frequent Rebellions, and Expulſion of their Kings, proceeded in great part from the proud and turbulent Temper of the Northumbrian Angles.

The ſame Year, (according to our Annals,) Biſhop Ceolwulf, and Biſhop Eadbald, departed from the Northumbers, and Egferth (Son to Offa) began his Reign over the Mercians, and within a few Months after deceaſed, having ſcarce reigned half a Year. It is alſo further to be noted, That this Prince, being of great Hopes and Worth, had been crowned King 9 Years before, in his Father's Life-time, and after his Death reſtored to the Church whatever he had violently ſeized on; but before he died, he left the Crown to Kenwulf, the next of the Royal Line.

But the Monks do aſcribe the ſhort Reign of this good Prince, to his Father's Sins; but of theſe Things, it belongs not to us to determine.

‘ Alſo this Year Eadbert, or Ethelbert, (Sirnamed Pran,) began to Reign ‘ in Kent, and alſo Ethelred the Ealderman deceaſed.

This Man had been a famous Commander in his time, but was then a Monk in the City of York; and now alſo, (according to the Annals,) ‘ the Heathen Danes deſtroyed Northumberland, and robbed the Monaſtery ‘ built by Egbert, which is at the Mouth of the River Weri; but there ‘ one of the Daniſh Captains was ſlain, and divers of their Ships de‘ ſtroyed by a Tempeſt, and many of their Men drowned; but ſome ‘ of them reaching the Shore, were preſently ſlain at the Mouth of the ‘ ſame River.

But Simeon of Durham imputes this to a Judgment inflicted on them by St. Cuthbert, for thus ſpoiling his Monaſtery.

H Anno Dom. DCCXCV. ‘ The Moon was Eclipſed, 5° Kal. Aprilis, from the Cock crowing, till ‘ the Morning. Eardwulf alſo began to reign over Northumberland [illegible] Idus ‘ Maii, and was afterwards Conſecrated, and placed on the Throne 7° Kal. ‘ Junii, at York, by Eanbald the Arch-Biſhop, and by the Biſhops Ethelbert, ‘ Higbald, and Badewulf.

This Eardwulf, as Florence of Worceſter informs us, was he, who 5 Years before had ſo ſtrangely eſcaped Death at Ripun, after he had been carried out to be buried, ~~but the Chronicle of Mailroſs does here give great Light to the Saxon Annals; for it tells us, that now the Northumbers murthered their King Ethelred, the Son of Moll; Simeon places it a Year after, but ſays, The Murther was committed on the 14th of the Kalends of May, at a Place called Cobeme; but they both agree, that immediately after his Death, one Osbald, a Nobleman of that Country, was made King, but reigned only 27 Days; and that then being forſaken by the Chief Men of his Kingdom, he was driven into the Iſle of Lindisfarne with a few Followers, from whence he fled by Sea to the King of the Picts, where he became a Monk: And this Eardwulf reigned in his ſtead~~.

William of Malmesbury further adds, that Alcuin, writing to King Offa, tells him, That King Charles, ſo ſoon as he heard of this Murther of King Ethelred above-mentioned, and of the Perfidiouſneſs of the Northumbrian Nation, not only ſtopt the Gifts he was then ſending, but falling into a Paſſion againſt them, called them a perverſe and perfidious Nation, and worſe than Pagans; ſo that if Alcuin had not interceded for them, he would have done them all the Miſchief he could.

About this time alſo the Welſh Chronicles relate, there was a great Battle fought at Ruthlan, between the Saxons and the Britains; where Caradoc ap Gwin, King of North Wales, was ſlain. Anno Dom. DCCXCV.

But ~~Biſhop~~ Powel obſerves, in his Notes upon Caradoc's Chronicle, That in thoſe Times there was no ſettled Government in Wales; therefore ſuch as were Chief Lords of any Country there, are, in this Hiſtory, ſtiled Kings.

'This Year died Eanbald, Arch-Biſhop of York, the 4th of the Ides of 'Auguſt, whoſe Body was there buried; ~~alſo the ſame Year Biſhop Ceol-' wulf died~~, and another Eanbald was conſecrated in his ſtead. This 'Year likewiſe Cenwulf, King of the Mercians, deſtroyed Kent to the Bor'ders of Mercia, and took Eadbert, (or Ethelbert, Sirnamed Pran,) and 'carried him Priſoner into Mercia, and there cauſed his Eyes to be put 'out, and his Hands to be cut off. Alſo Ethelheard, Arch-Biſhop of Can'terbury, called a Synod; which, by the Command of Pope Leo, eſta'bliſhed and confirmed all thoſe Things relating to God's Church, which 'had been before conſtituted in the Reign of King Withgar; and then the 'Arch-Biſhop ſaid thus. I Ethelheard, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, with the Unanimous Conſent of the whole Synod, and of the whole Body of all the Monaſteries, to whom Exemption hath been granted of old Times by Believers; in the Name of GOD, and by his fearful Judgment, (and, as I have received Command from Pope Leo,) do Decree, That for the future none ſhall preſume to Elect themſelves Governours amongst Lay-men of GOD's Heritage, but as it is contained in the Charter (or Bulls) which the Pope hath granted, or Holy Men, (to wit,) our Kings and Anceſtors have ordained, concerning the Holy Monaſteries, ſo let them remain inviolate, without any gain-ſaying; and if there be any one who ſhall refuſe to obey this Command from GOD, the Pope, and Us, but ſhall deſpiſe it, and count it as nothing; let him know, that he ſhall give an Account of it before the Tribunal of GOD. And I Æthelheard the Arch-Biſhop, with Twelve Biſhops, and Three and twenty Abbots, do hereby eſtabliſh and confirm this Decree with the Sign of the Croſs. Anno Dom. DCCXCVI.

This Council, thô the Annals do not expreſly mention it under that Title, is that great Council of Becanceld, placed in Sir H. Spelman's Collection, under Anno 798, being held under Cenwulf, King of the Mercians, Æthelheard Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, with 17 Biſhops more, who all ſubſcribed to this Decree, thô the Annals mention no more than 12 Biſhops there.

In north wales k[illegible] [illegible] deceasing a man sirnamed [illegible] succeeded him, of both these kings I find nothing considerable. S. C. Chron. [illegible]

'This Year the Romans took Pope Leo, and cut out his Tongue, and 'put out his Eyes, and depoſed him; but preſently after (if it may be 'believed) he could both ſee, and ſpeak, by the help of GOD, as well 'as he could before; and was alſo reſtored to the Papacy (by the Em'perour Charles). Alſo Eanbald, the Arch-Biſhop of York, received the 'Pall, and Ethelbert Biſhop of Hagulſtad deceaſed 3° Kal. Nov. Anno Dom. DCCXCVII.

'This Year was a bloody Battle in the Province of Northumberland, in 'Lent-time, at Wealage, (now called Whalie) in Lancaſhire, where was 'ſlain Alric, the Son of Heardbert, and many others with him. Anno Dom. DCCXCVIII.

The occaſion of which Civil War, Simeon of Durham hath thus given us, viz. That beſides Alric, there were divers others in Northumberland, who had formerly conſpired againſt King Ethelred, and now raiſing a Rebellion againſt Eardwulf, under Wada their Captain, after much ſlaughter on both ſides at Billangahoth, near Whalie, in Lancaſhire; the Conſpirators being at laſt put to flight, King Eardwulf returned home Anno Dom. DCCXXVIII. Victorious. The ſame Year London (according to the ſame Author,) with a great multitude of its Inhabitants, by a ſudden Fire was conſumed.

And now (according both to Simeon of Durham, and Roger Hoveden) was held the Second Council of Pinchinhale in the Kingdom of Northumberland, under Eanbald Arch-Biſhop of York, and divers other Principal and Eccleſiaſtical Men, where many Things were ordained for the Profit of GOD's Church, and of the Northumbrian Nation; as concerning the keeping Eaſter, and other Matters not particularly mentioned.

Tom. 1. p. 187. The ſame Year alſo (according to Monaſticon Anglicanum) Kenwulf, King of the Mercians, founded a ſtately Abbey at Winchelcomb in Glocesterſhire for 300 Benedictine Monks, and when it was Dedicated in the Preſence of Wilfrid Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and 13 other Biſhops, he then ſet free before the High Altar Eadbert, King of Kent, who was then his Priſoner of War.

But having before moſt cruelly put out his Eyes, and cut off his Hands, and diſpoſed of his Kingdom to another, I doubt that Liberty proved but a ſmall Satisfaction to this poor injured Prince. But ſuch was the Superſtitious Zeal of that Age, the Foundation of a Monaſtery was counted a ſufficient Atonement to GOD for whatſoever Cruelties or Injuſtice Princes had then committed.

Anno Dom. DCCXCIX. 'This Year Ethelheard the Arch-Biſhop, and Cynebriht Biſhop of the 'Weſt Saxons, went to Rome to take the Habit of a Monk, and Biſhop Alfwin deceaſed at Southburg (now Sutbury) in Suffolk, and was buried at 'Domuc (now Dunwich) in the ſame County, (being then the Seat of 'that Biſhoprick; and Tidfrith was choſen in his Room. Alſo this Year 'the Body of St. Withburg was found at Durham entire and uncorrupt, 'after ſhe had been dead 55 Years. Simeon of Durham

+ And the ſame Year (according to ~~Roger Hoveden~~) Oſwald, who had been before King of Northumberland, died an Abbot, and was buried in York Minſter; and Alred the Ealderman, who ſlew King Æthelred, was alſo killed by one Thormond, in Revenge of the Death of his Lord.

Anno Dom. DCCC. 'Alſo the Moon was eclipſed in the ſecond Hour of the Night, 17° Kal. 'Feb. Alſo this Year Beorthric, King of the Weſt Saxons, deceaſed: As 'alſo Worre an Ealderman: Then alſo Ecgbriht began to reign over 'the Weſt Saxons; And the ſame Day (or Year, as Florence of Worceſter 'hath it) Æthelmond, Ealderman of Wicon, (that is, Worceſterſhire,) paſs'd 'the River Severne at Cyneſmeresford, (ſuppoſed to be Kemsford in Glouceſterſhire,) and there met him Weoxton the Ealderman, with the Wiltſhire 'Men who gained the Victory.

I cannot find in any Author the occaſion of this Quarrel; only, that it was fought between theſe Earls, one of the Weſt Saxons, and the other of M. the Mercians; but ſuch Bickerings we often meet with in theſe Writers, and ſo related, are of no more uſe to Human Life, than to Chronicle the Skirmiſhes of Crows or Jack-daws flocking together, and fighting in the Air.

The ſame Year is very remarkable, becauſe (as our Annals relate) 'Charles the Great was firſt made Emperour, and ſaluted Auguſtus by the 'Romans, he then condemned thoſe to Death who had before outraged 'Pope Leo; but by the Pope's Interceſſion they were pardoned as to Life, 'and only baniſhed; but Pope Leo himſelf anointed him Emperour. Alſo this Year, according to the * Welſh Chronicles, about this time Arthen ap-ap Sitſilt, King of Cardigan; and Run, King of Dyvet; and Cadel, King of Powis, all three died.

Anno Dom. DCCC.

Now alſo (according to Florence, and Simeon,) Alchmund, Son to Ethelred, late King of Northumberland, being taken by the Guards of K. Eardulf, was by his Command ſlain; but without telling us any Reaſon why. ^*

n

^* This I suppose is he who was afterwards sainted and whose body being first buried at Lilleshal, was afterwards translated to Derby ~~where~~ in a church which is to this day called by his name.

Alſo about this time, (according to Sir H. Spelman's Firſt Volume of Councils) was held the Third Council of Cloveſhoe, under Kenwulf, King of the Mercians, and Athelherd, or Ethelhard, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, with all the Biſhops, Ealdermen, Abbots, and other Dignified Perſons of that Province; in which few Things were tranſacted concerning the Faith, only the Lands of a certain Monaſtery, called Cotham, which had been given by Ethelbald, King of the Mercians, to the Monaſtery of St. Saviour's in Canterbury, and had been upon the Embezeling the Deeds, unjuſtly taken away by King Kenwulph, but he now repenting of it, deſired they ſhould be reſtored; whereupon Cynedrith, his Daughter, then Abbeſs of that Monaſtery, gave the ſaid Arch-Biſhop other Lands in Kent there mentioned, in exchange for the ſame.

But ſince I am come to the Concluſion of this Period, I cannot omit giving you a fuller Account of the Character, and Death of Brithric King of the Weſt Saxons, and of the Succeſſion of Egbert, who afterwards became the Chief or Supreme King of this Kingdom, and to whom all thoſe Kings that remained were forced to become Tributary.

As for King Britric, he is noted by Will. of Malmeſbury to have been more deſirous of Peace, than War; and to that end, courted the Friendſhip of Foreign Princes, to have been eaſie to his Subjects in ſuch Things as did not weaken his Government; yet being jealous of Prince Egbert, who afterwards ſucceeded him, he forced him to flee to King Offa for Refuge; but upon the coming of certain Ambaſſadours to Treat of a Marriage between King Brithric, and the Daughter of King Offa, he retired into France, till that King was made away by the means of his Wife Ædburga, the Daughter of King Offa; who having prepared a Cup of poiſoned Wine for one of his Favourites whom ſhe hated, the King, coming in by chance, taſted of it, and ſo pined away. After whoſe Death, Aſſer, in his Annals, relates, That when this Queen could live no longer among the Engliſh, (being ſo hated by them for her violent and wicked Actions,) ſhe went into France, where ſhe was kindly Entertained by Charles the Great, and there making that Emperour many great Preſents, for which he bidding her chuſe whom ſhe would have for a Husband, himſelf, or his Son, ſhe fooliſhly choſe his Son; whereupon the Emperour laughing, ſaid, If thou hadſt choſen me, thou ſhouldeſt have had my Son, but now thou ſhalt have neither: (A juſt Return for her deſiring to marry one ſo much younger than her ſelf.) So the Emperour put her into a Monaſtery, where ſhe lived for ſome Years as an Abbeſs; but being Expelled thence for her Incontinency, ſhe wandred about with only one Servant, and begged her Bread in Pavia in Italy, till ſhe died.

But as for Egbert above mentioned, when he had been for about three Years baniſhed into France, where (as William of Malmeſbury tells us) he poliſhed the Roughneſs of his own Country Manners, the French Nation being at that time the moſt Civilized of any of thoſe Gothic and German Nations, who had ſome Ages before (as hath been already related) ſettled themſelves in this ſide of Europe: But upon the Death

Anno Dom. DCCC. of King Brihtric, without any Iſſue, (as the ſame Author relates,) he was recalled by the Nobility of the Weſt Saxon Kingdom; and being there ordained King, reigned with great Glory and Honour, exceeding all the Engliſh Saxon Kings that went before him, as ſhall be declared in the enſuing Book.

But before I conclude this, I cannot forbear mentioning a Learned Engliſh-man, who flouriſhed about this time, called Alcuinus, or Albinus; who, going into France, was in great Favour with Charles the Great, whom he taught the Liberal Arts, and by his means erected the Univerſity of Paris, where he read Logic, Rhetoric, and Aſtronomy; being the moſt Learned Man of all the Engliſh-men (if not of all others) in his Time. He died Abbot of St. Martins at Tours, which that King beſtowed upon him. He wrote elegantly in Verſe, as well as Proſe, conſidering the Age he lived in; as appears by his Poem De Pontificibus & Sanctis Eccleſiæ Eboracencis, lately Publiſhed by the Reverend and Learned Dr. Gale, in his laſt Volume of Engliſh Hiſtorians.

So having arrived to the end of this Period, I ſhall in the next Book ſhew, how King Egbert obtained not only the Crown of the Weſt Saxon Kingdom, but alſo the Supreme Dominion of the Engliſh Nation.

The End of the Fourth Book.

A Continuation of the Succeſſion of the Engliſh-Saxon Kings contai and Simeon of Durham. Note, That the laſt King of each Colum the better ſee how the Series is continued.

NOW CALLED ENGLAND:

BOOK V.

From the beginning of the Reign of King EGBERT, to that of King EDGAR; Being the ſpace of One Hundred Fifty Six Years and an Half.

THE Engliſh Saxons having after their Conqueſt of ſo great a part of Britain, and the expulſion of the Natives into Wales and Cornwall, erected Seven (and if we reckon Deira and Bernicia as diſtinct, Eight) different Kingdoms in this part of our Iſland; that naturally followed, which always attends a Warlike People, canton'd out into many ſmall independant principalities, viz conſtant diſputes about the borders of their reſpective Territories, or elſe a ſtriſe for the Maſtery who ſhould be Chief, and Domineere moſt over the reſt: from whence (beſides divers other accidental occaſions of Quarrels) ſprang Civil Wars, incident to neighbouring Nations, no ways divided but by Rivers or other leſs certain boundaries, which never ceaſed until what had been begun by King Egbert's Predeceſſours, was finiſh'd by himſelf, and his Succeſſours, who at length united all thoſe Kingdoms into one, to the laſting quiet and happineſs of the Engliſh Nation; which to ſet forth ſhall be the ſubject of this preſent Period. For though there had been before Egbert many chief or Principal Kings (ſeveral of whom Bede, as alſo the Saxon Annals have mentioned) who by the ſole power of their Arms ſucceeded each other in that Title, yet did it never ſo properly belong to any one as to King Egbert, (with whoſe Reign we ſhall begin this Book ;) ſince he was not ſatisfied as others had been before him, with the bare acknowledgments and ſubmiſſions of the other remaining Kings; but having ſubdued moſt of them, he laid their Kingdoms to his own, leaving only thoſe of the Mercians , Northumbrians and Eaſt-Angles to be held by their reſpective Princes as Tributaries to his Crown ; in which ſtate they continued, till the Invaſion and Conqueſt of the Danes wholly ſwallowed up all thoſe Principalities, and that after their expulſion by King Alfred, and his Son Edward the Elder, theſe Kingdoms became again united to the reſt of their Dominions under the General name of England.

But ſince the Invaſion of the Danes, alſo happened in the beginning of this Period, 'tis fit we ſay ſomething of it, both as to its Cauſes, and Inſtruments by which it was performed ; in the doing of which I ſhall make uſe of H. Huntington's words, in the Prologue to his Fifth Book, wherein he tells us, ‘ That the Invaſion of the Danes was much the fierceſt, and moſt cruel that ever was felt in this Iſland ; for the Romans althô they ſubdued Britain to their Empire, yet uſed their Victory with moderation, and made thoſe they conquered partakers of the Roman Laws and Civility ; and as for the Invaſion of the Picts and Scots which followed the decay of the Roman Empire in Britain, though it fell ſeverely upon the Northern Parts, yet was it not of any long continuance, or of any general extent, being ſoon ſtopt by the more predominant Power and Valour of the Engliſh-Saxons; who (as you have already heard) conquering this Kingdom by degrees, though they drove out the ancient Inhabitants who refuſed to ſubmit to them ; yet we do not find, but that they ſpared the lives of all thoſe that became their Vaſſals, and having Conquered the Country, they not only repaired the ancient Towns and Cities , but likewiſe built many new ones, and governed the Kingdom by their own Laws and Conſtitutions. Laſtly, the Normans, who ſucceeded the Danes in ſubduing this Nation, yet granted not only Life and Liberty to the vanquiſhed, but alſo permited them the uſe of their ancient Laws and Cuſtoms; whereas the Danes waſted and ſpoiled this whole Iſland, for a long time together by frequent Incurſions, exempting no places Sacred or Prophane from Spoil or Ruin ; ſo that ſparing neither Age nor Sex, they ſeemed for a long time not ſo much to deſign the Conqueſt, as Deſtruction of the Engliſh Nation ;] till at laſt King Knute obtaining the Crown of England, after the Death of King Edmund (Sir-named Ironſide,) by reſtoring its ancient Laws and Liberties, made ſome amends for the continual ſpoils and depredations of himſelf and his Predeceſſours.

If therefore you do but conſider the frequent Invaſions of that Barbarous People, how they often landed in ſeveral places at once, thereby not only dividing the Forces of the Engliſh-Saxons, but alſo ſo diſtracting their Commanders, that they could not tell which way to March againſt them; you may hence obſerve (that next to the Providence, and Mercy of God,) nothing but the extraordinary Valour and Conduct of thoſe Kings, whoſe Great and Noble Actions we ſhall here relate, could have preſerved this Nation from being totally ſubdued long before; nor could they ever bring it under their Power, till they met with a Prince, who fell very ſhort of his Anceſtors, as well in Prudence and Valour, as (in the chiefeſt thing of all) the love of his Subjects.

But as for the cauſes, which provoked the wrath of God to bring this dreadful Judgment upon the Engliſh Nation, the ſame Authour gives us this probable account, viz. ' That in the Primitive Church of ' England, Religion ſhined with ſo great a Luſtre, that divers Kings and ' Queens, together with many of the Great Men and Biſhops undertook ' Monaſtick Vows, (as you have already heard;) but in proceſs of time ' all Virtue and Piety ſo far declined, that the Engliſh Saxons ſuffered no ' Nation to exceed them in deceit, and all manner of wickedneſs; ' which chiefly appears in the precedent, as well as following Hiſtory of ' the Northumbrian Kings, in which you will find, that all Orders and ' Degrees of Men were guilty of ſo great Treachery and Rebellion, ' that nothing was a greater diſgrace than Piety and Innocence, which ' was looked upon as a juſt occaſion to be made away; wherefore it ' was no wonder if God thought fit to ſend upon them whole ſwarms of ' cruel Nations, which deſtroyed all before them, (to wit) the Danes or ' Norwegians together with the Swedes and Vandals.

Theſe from the latter end of the Reign of King Egbert to the beginning of the Reign of William the Firſt, being above Two Hundred and Thirty Years, never gave this Iſland any long reſpite from their Invaſions. So that it ſeems it was not the ~~Nation of the~~ Danes alone, (properly ſo called) who were the cauſe of this Deſtruction, but a mixture of divers of theſe Northern Nations, who joyning together, propoſed at firſt to themſelves no other deſign but Plunder and Spoil: But of this we ſhall ſpeak more in due time; and ſhall now proceed in our Hiſtory, where we left off in our laſt Book.

Egbert, the only ſurviving Prince of the Blood Royal of the Weſt Saxon Kings, as being Great Nephew to Ina, by his Brother Inegilds, being now arrived in England, was Elected and Crowned King by the general conſent of the Nobility and People, as Ethelward and Florence of Worceſter expreſly relate; thô the latter begins his Reign One Year after our Saxon Annals, and thoſe aſcribed to Aſſer, place it, under Anno 802.) But it ſeems the very day he came to the Crown, (according to Ethelward and the ſaid Annals, or the ſame Year as it is in Florence,) Ethelmund, Ealderman of Wiccon, (that is Worceſter-ſhire) or elſe of the Mercians according to Florence, paſſed over the River Severne at Cyneſmereford, (ſuppoſed to be Kempſford in Glouceſter-ſhire,) and there met Weocton the Ealderman with the Wilt-ſhire Men, where there was a great Fight, and both the Ealdermen were ſlain, but the Wiltſhire Men gained the Victory.

I cannot find in any Authour the occaſion of this quarrel, only that it was fought between two Earls; one of the Weſt-Saxons, and another of the Mercians; but ſuch blind Accounts we often meet with in theſe Monkiſh Writers.

Alſo about this time, as appears from the ancient Regiſter of St. Leonard's Abbey in York; it is cited in * Monaſt. Anglican. viz. ' That Anno Dom. ' 800, Egbert King of all Britain in a Parliament at Wincheſter, by the conſent of his People, changed the Name of this Kingdom; and commanded it to be called England.

* 1. Vol. P. 367.

Now, thô by the Word Parliament here uſed, it is certain that this Regiſter was writ long after the Conqueſt; yet it might be tranſcribed from ſome more ancient Monument, ſince Will. of Malmesbury tells us of this King, (thô without ſetting down the time) that by the greatneſs of his Mind, he reduced all the Varieties of the Engliſh

Saxon Kingdoms to one uniform Empire, or Dominion, which he calle England; though others perhaps more truly refer it to the latter End o his Reign.

This Year Eardulf, King of the Northumbers lead his Army againſt Kenwulf, King of Mercia, for harbouring his Enemies, who alſo gatherin together a great Army, they approached to each other; when by th Advice of the Biſhops and Noblemen of England, as alſo by the Interceſſion of the Chief King of the Engliſh, (by whom is meant Kin Egbert; for as Supream King of England he then paſſed under that Title They agreed upon a laſting Peace; which was alſo confirmed by Oath on both ſides. This we find in Simeon of Durham's Hiſtory of tha Church, and in no other Authour.

Vid. Monaſt. Anglican. Tom 1. p. 191.

About this Time alſo St. Alburge, Siſter to King Egbert, founded Benedictine Nunnery at Wilton, which was long after rebuilt by Kin Alfred, and augmented by King Edgar, for Twenty Six Nuns, and a Abbeſs.

Anno Dom. DCCCII.

'This Year the Moon was Ecclipſed on the 13 Kal. Jan. and Beor 'mond was Conſecrated Biſhop of Rocheſter.

Anno Dom. DCCCIII.

About this Time, in Obedience to a Letter from Pope Leo III: (wh at the deſire of Kenwulf King of the Mercians, had Two Years ſinc reſtored the See of Canterbury to its ancient Primacy,) was held the Thir Synod at Cloveſhoe, by Arch Biſhop Ethelward, and 12 Biſhops of his Province whereby the See of Canterbury was not only reſtored to all its ancien Rights and priviledges; but it was alſo forbid for all times to come upo pain of Damnation (if not repented of) for any Man to violate th Rights of that ancient See, and thereby to deſtroy the Unity of Chriſt's Holy Church; Then follow the Subſcriptions of the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and of Twelve other Biſhops of his Province, together with thoſ of many Abbots and Presbyters, who never Subſcribed before, but without the Subſcriptions of the King, or any of the Lay Nobility: which plainly ſhews it to have been a meer Eccleſiaſtical Synod, and no great Council of the Kingdom, as you may ſee at large in Sir H. Spelman's 1. vol. of Councils, the Decree of which Synod alſo ſhews, that the Church of England did not then conceive the Authority of the Pope alone ſufficient to diſanul what had been ſolemnly Decreed in a great Council of the Kingdom, as was the Removal of the Primacy from Canterbury to Litchfield. But it ſeems Arch-Biſhop Ethelward did not long ſurvive this Council, for our Annals tell us, That the next Year

Anno Dom. DCCCIV.

'Ethelward Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury deceaſed, and Wilfrid was conſe'crated Arch-Biſhop in his ſtead; and Forther, the Abbot, dyed; alſo 'Higbert Biſhop of Lindisfarne now dyed, and Egbert ſucceeded him, 'and then Wilfrid the Arch-Biſhop received his Pall.

Anno Dom. DCCCV.

'Cuthred King of Kent deceaſed, as did alſo Ceolburge the Abbeſs, and 'Heabyrht the Ealderman.

This Cuthred here mentioned, was (as Will. of Malmesbury informs us) he whom Kenulph King of the Mercians had made King of Kent, inſtead of Ethelbert, called Pren.

Anno Dom. DCCCVI.

'This Year the Moon was Eclipſed on the Kal. of September, and 'Eardwulf, King of the Northumbers, was driven from his Kingdom 'and Eanbryht Biſhop of Hagulſtad deceaſed. Alſo this Year (2° Nones Junij) the ſign of the Croſs was ſeen in the Moon upon Wedneſday in the 'Morning; and the ſame Year on the Third Kal. Septemb. a wonderful Circle was ſeen round the Sun.

This

Anno Dom: DCCCVI.

This Eardwulf above-mentioned is related by Simeon of Durham to have been the Son of Eardulf, the firſt of that Name, King of Northumberland, and after Ten Years Reign, to have been driven out by one Ælfwold, who Reigned Two Years in his ſtead.

During theſe Confuſions in the Northumbrian Kingdom, Arch-Biſhop Uſher with great probability ſuppoſes (in his Antiquitat. Britan. Eccleſ.) that the Picts and Scots Conquered the Countries of Galloway and Lothian, as alſo thoſe Countries called the Lowlands of Scotland, as far as the Friths of Dunbritain and Edenburgh. And that this City was alſo in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Saxons, about an Hundred Years after this, I ſhall ſhew in due order of time; and that our Kings did long after maintain their claim to Lothian ſhall be further ſhewn, when I come to it: But that all the Lowlands of Scotland, as far as the Engliſh Saxon Tongue was ſpoken, were anciently part of the Bernician Kingdom, the Engliſh Language, as well as the Names of places, which are all Engliſh Saxon (and neither Scotiſh nor Pictiſh) do ſufficiently make out.

Anno Dom: DCCCVII.

The Sun was Eclipſed on the 7th Kal. of Auguſt, about the Fifth Hour of the Day.

This year Arthen ap Seyssill King of Cardigan deceased. Chron: Wal: of whom there is no more than that now Wales was divided into different Kingdoms or principalities.

Anno Dom: DCCCVIII.

This Year (as Sigebert in his Chronicle relates) King Eardulph (above-mentioned) being expelled his Kingdom, and coming for Refuge to the Emperour Charles the Great, was by his Aſſiſtance reſtored thereunto; but ſince neither the Saxon Annals, nor Florence, nor yet any of our Engliſh Hiſtorians do mention it, I much doubt the Truth of this Relation; thô it muſt be alſo acknowledged, that it is inſerted in the ancient French Annals of that time, and recited that this King's Reſtitution was procured by the Interceſſion of the Pope's and Emperour's Legates, who were ſent into England for that purpoſe.

This Year (according to Mat. Weſtminſter) Egbert, King of the Weſt Saxons, marching in an Hoſtile manner into Cornwal, abſolutely ſubdued it, and added it to his own Kingdom, many being there ſlain on both ſides.

The ſame Year alſo (according to Caradoc's Chronicle) Run, King of Dyvet, and Cadhel, King of Powis, deceaſed.

Anno Dom: DCCCIX.

'Charles the Emperour made Peace with Nicephorus Emperour of Con'ſtantinople.

This Year alſo (according to the ſame Caradoc) Elbode, ~~Arch~~-Biſhop of North Wales, (i. e. of St. Aſaph,) deceaſed, before whoſe Death was a great Eclipſe of the Sun: But as the Reverend Lord Biſhop of Bangor, in his Catalogue of the Welſh Kings, which he has been pleaſed to communicate to me, well obſerves, That Eclipſe falling out Anno 810, the Biſhops Death muſt do ſo likewiſe, and therefore in this the Chronicles muſt needs be miſtaken.

Chron: Wal.

as allso the King Arthens above mentioned.

Alſo (according to Mat. Weſtminſter) Ælfwold, King of Northumberland, dying, Earnred ſucceeded him, and held it for 32 Years; which is alſo confirmed by Simeon of Durham, thô this can by no means agree with the Chronicle of Mailroſs, which ſays, That Eardulf being expelled his Kingdom, it continued without any King for many Years; but William of Malmesbury makes this Anarchy to have begun from the murther of King Ethered, Anno 794, (as hath been already obſerved in the laſt Book,) and that this Confuſion laſted for about 33 Years, during which time that Province became a Scorn to its Neighbours: But it ſeems they ſtill had Kings, thô very obſcure, and but of ſmall Account.

Hiſt. Dun. Eccles. col. 13.

Anno Dom. DCCCX.

But of greater certainty is that which Mat. Weſtminſter relates under this Year, viz. That King Egbert ſubdued the Northern Welſh-men, and made them Tributary to him.

M.

But it is wholly incredible what Buchanan, in his Scotiſh Hiſtory, relates in the Year following, to wit, That Achaius, King of Scots, having reigned 32 Years, and had formerly aided (but in what Year of his Reign he tells us not) Hungus, King of the Picts, with 10000 Scots againſt one Athelſtan, then waſting the Pictiſh Borders; and that Hungus, by the Aid of thoſe Scots, and the Help of St. Andrew their Patron, in a Viſion by Night, and the Appearance of a Croſs by Day, routed the aſtoniſhed Engliſh, and ſlew this Athelſtan in Fight. But who this Athelſtan was, I believe no Man knows; Buchanan ſuppoſes him to have been ſome Daniſh Commander, on whom King Alured, or Alfred, had beſtowed Northumberland: Yet of this, I find no Foot-ſteps in our ancient Writers; and if any ſuch Thing were done in the time of Alfred, it muſt be above 60 Years after, for King Alfred began not to Reign till Anno 871. And John Fordun, in his Scotiſh Hiſtory, is alſo as much miſtaken, making this Athelſtan to be the Son of King Ethelwulf, who then governed the Northern Provinces under his Father, which alſo fails almoſt as much in point of time; this Prince Athelſtan here mentioned being (as appears by the Saxon Annals) alive, and engaged in a Sea-Fight againſt the Danes above 4[illegible] Years after, as you will find in its due place ſet down. This Athelſtan therefore, and this great Overthrow, ſeems rather to have been a meer Fancy of ſome idle Monk.

Anno Dom. DCCCXI.

And this Year, (according to Mat. Weſtminſter,) as King Egbert had the Year before ſubdued the Welſh-men, ſo (it ſeems upon ſome freſh Rebellion of theirs) he again entred their Borders, and laid them waſte from North to South with Fire and Sword, and then returned home Victorious.

But notwithſtanding the Wars the Welſh had from abroad, it ſeems they had alſo time enough for Civil Wars at home; for now (according to Caradoc's Chronicle) Conan, Prince of Wales, and his Brother Howel, could not agree, inſomuch that they tried the Matter by Battle, where Howel had the Victory; to which Dr. Powel hath here added this Obſervation.

That this Howel, the Brother of Conan, King or Prince of North Wales, did claim the Iſle of Mon, or Angleſey, for part of his Father's Inheritance, which Conan refuſing to give him, thereupon they fell at Variance, and conſequently made War the one againſt the other.

And here (ſays he) I think fit to ſay ſomewhat of the old Cuſtom and Tenure of Wales, from whence this Miſchief grew, that is, the Diviſion of the Father's Inheritance amongſt all the Sons commonly called Gavel kind. Gavel is a Britiſh Term, ſignifying a Hold, becauſe every one of the Sons did hold ſome portion of his Father's Lands, as his lawful Son and Succeſſour. This was the Cauſe, not only of the Overthrow of all the ancient Nobility of Wales, (for by that means the Inheritance being continually divided and ſubdivided amongſt the Children, and Children's Children, it was at length brought to nothing,) but alſo of much Bloodſhed, unnatural Strife, and Contention amongſt Brethren; as we have here an Example, and many others in this Hiſtory. This kind of Partition is very good to plant and ſettle a Nation in a large Country, not inhabited, but in a populous Country already furniſhed with Inhabitants; bitants; it is the utter Decay of great Families, and (as I ſaid before) the cauſe of conſtant Strife and Debate But ſome Years after, Howel gave his Brother Conan another Defeat, and ſlew a great many of his People.

Anno Dom. DCCCXI.

Whereupon Conan levied an Army in the Year 817, and chaſed his Brother Howel out of the Iſle of Angleſey, compelling him to flee into that of Man; and a little after died Conan, chief King of the Britains, or Welſh-men, leaving behind him a Daughter named Eſylht, who was married to a Nobleman, called Mervyn Vrych, the Son of Gwyriad, who was afterwards King in her Right.

This Year alſo, as the Manuſcript Annals of the Abbey of Winchelcomb relate, the Charter of this Monaſtery was granted by King Kenulph, as appears by a Copy there inſerted; which ſhews, what Orders of Men were ſummoned by that King to be preſent at the Council, in which this Charter was confirmed, viz. Merciorum optimates, Epiſcopos, Principes, Comites, Procuratores meoſque (i. e. Regis) Propinquos; which Terms having already been explained in the Introduction to this Book, I need not here repeat. There were alſo preſent Cuthred King of Kent, his tributary, and Suthered King of the Eaſt-Saxons, with all others, who ſhould be preſent at thoſe Synodal Councils: Then follow the Subſcriptions of K. Kenulph, as alſo of both the ſaid Kings, and of Wilfred Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, with the reſt of the Biſhops and Ealdermen there ſtiled Duces.

* Bib. Cotton. Tib. E. 4.

Anno Dom. DCCCXII.

'This Year, according to our Annals, the Emperour Charles the Great 'departed this Life, (when he had Reigned Forty Five Years;) alſo 'Wilfred the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and Wigbright the Biſhop of the 'Weſt-Saxons went to Rome:] But here our Annals are miſtaken, for this Emperour dyed not till the Year 814 Mat. Weſtminſter alſo adds, that theſe Biſhops above-mentioned went to Rome about the Affairs of the Engliſh Church.

Anno Dom. DCCCXIII.

'Arch-Biſhop Wilfred having received the Benediction of Pope Leo, 'returned again to his Biſhoprick, and the ſame Year King Egbert waſted the Weſtern Welſh from the South to the Weſt.] This ſeems but to have been the ſame Invaſion mentioned by Mat. Weſtminſter under An. 811.

This Year Leo, that worthy and Holy Pope, deceaſed; and Stephanus ſucceeded in the Popedome; but Florence of Worceſter more rightly places the Death of this Pope Two Years later.

Anno Dom. DCCCXIV.

'Pope Stephanus deceaſed, and Paſcalis was conſecrated Pope in his 'ſtead; and the ſame Year the School or College of the Engliſh Nation '(at Rome) was burnt.

Anno ~~Dom.~~ ~~DCCCX~~VI.

But Mat. Weſtminſter does more rightly place the Death of Pope Stephanus the Year following.

Anno Dom. DCCCXVI

At this time was held the Synod at Calcuith, under Wilfred Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and Kenulph King of the Mercians, who was there preſent; but the Decrees being wholly Eccleſiaſtical, I paſs them by, and refer the curious to Sir H. Spelman's 1. Volume of Councils: only ſhall here take notice of this one paſſage, that now Biſhops, Abbots, and Abbeſſes were firſt forbid by the Seventh Canon of this Synod, to alien their Lands committed to their truſt, in Fee, or for longer time then one Life; and⁁ that with the conſent of the Houſe. ⁁

⁁An. Dom. DCCCXVII. The welsh [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] agree that Conan King of the Welsh deceased this year, and was succeeded by Mervyn surnamed Frych in right of his wife Esylt Daughter to Conan.

Anno Dom. DCCCXIX.

Cenwulf King of the Mercians deceaſed, and Ceolwulf began to Reign in his ſtead, alſo Eadbyrht the Ealderman dyed.

But the Saxon Annals do here omit, that which is very remarkable that not Ceolwulf, but Kenelm, Son to King Kenwulf being a Child of Seven

Years

Anno Dom. DCCCXIX.

Years Old, ſucceeded his Father under the tutelage of his Siſter Quendride, who being tempted by a wicked Ambition of Reigning, was by her made away, and thereby he obtained the Name of a Martyr: The manner of which (thô it is certainly but a Legend) I ſhall, to divert the Reader, relate out of Will. of Malmesbury, and Mat. Weſtminſter.

This young Prince was committed by his Siſter to an Attendant, on purpoſe to be made away; who carrying him into a Wood under pretence of Hunting; cut off his Head, and threw his Body into a Thicket of Buſhes; his Siſter preſently ſeizing the Kingdom, ſtraitly forbad all inquiry to be made after her loſt Brother: But ſure it was Miraculous, That a thing done ſo privately in England, ſhould be firſt known at Rome: but ſo it came to paſs by Divine Revelation; for upon the Altar of St. Peter, a White Dove let fall a certain Paper, which diſcovered both the Death of King Kenelm, and alſo the place of his Burial; which being Written in Golden Letters was thus:

In Clent Cow-batch, Kenelme King Bearne, lieth under a Thorne, headed bereaved.

Which being in Saxon, may be thus Tranſlated into Engliſh Rhime.

In Clent-cow-paſture under a Thorne,
Of Head bereft, lies Kenelme King Born.

But it ſeems the Characters were ſo hard to be read, that all the Roman Clerks there preſent, attempted in vain at the Pope's Command to read this writing; but an Engliſh Man by chance ſtanding by, (whom, to make the Miracle the greater, Mat. Weſtminſter (reading Angelus inſtead of Anglus) calls an Angel, and Tranſlating this writing into Latin, cauſed the Pope by an Epiſtle ſent by him on purpoſe to give notice to the Engliſh Kings of their Martyr'd Country-man; whoſe Body being thus Miraculouſly diſcovered, was in a great Aſſembly of Clerks and Nobles, taken out of the hole where it was laid, and carried to Winchelcombe, in Glouceſter-ſhire; and there buried in the Church of that Abbey, which his Father had founded; which after ſome time brought no ſmall profit to that Monaſtery, by frequent Pilgrimages made to the Tomb of this little Saint.

Will. Malmesbury, lib. 2.

But now my hand is in, pray take all the reſt of the Story.

When the Body of this Young Prince was brought home, the Murdreſs his Siſter, being vexed with the Singing of thoſe Clerks and Laicks that attended the Corps, and looking out of her Chamber Window in pure Spite, repeated the Pſalm backward which they then Sung, thereby to diſturb the Harmony of the Chorus; but (as the ſame Authour adds,) whileſt ſhe was thus ſinging, both her Eyes fell out of her Head upon the Pſalter ſhe held in her Hands, and the Pſalter it ſelf ſet in Silver, and beſmeared with the Blood of her Eyes, (being then to be ſeen) gave a pregnant Teſtimony of her Crime, as well as puniſhment; yet it ſeems Will. of Malmesbury knew nothing of this Legend of the finding the Body, but only ſays, it was diſcovered by Miraculous Rays of a vaſt Light, which ſhining all Night over the place where it lay, was the occaſion of its being found out; but no matter for the manner, both of them being alike credible. This is enough, (if not too much) of this Boy, King and Martyr: And this is certain, that his unnatural Siſter did not enjoy the Fruits of her wicked Ambition long; for Ceolwulf Brother to King Kenwulf, ſucceeded in the Kingdom; thô he likewiſe Reigned but little more than one Year:

Anno Dom. DCCCXX.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXI. For the next Year he was deprived of his Kingdom (as Ingulphus relates) by one Bernulph, an Ambitious Man, of great Riches and Power, thô no way related to the Blood Royal.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXII. ‘ This Year Two Ealdermen were ſlain, Burkelm, and Muca, (but who theſe were our Annals do not acquaint us :) There was alſo this Year held a Synod at Cloveſhoe under King Beornwulf, and Arch-Biſhop Wilfred; whoſe Conſtitutions relating wholly to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, you may find in Sir H. Spelman's 1. Vol. The only Civil Buſineſs, was that of the Abbeſs Cendrythe's being forced to make ſatisfaction to Archbiſhop Wilfred, by rendering 100 Manſes or Farmes, for the wrongs which King Cenwulf her Father had done to the Church of Canterbury.

This Cendrythe is the ſame with Quendrithe; or Quendrida (as ſhe was called by our Latin Authors,) who made away her Brother K. Kenelme, (as you have already heard ;) and who, to Expiate for the Death of her Brother, (ſince ſhe could not be a Queen) had profeſſed her ſelf a Nun, and was now an Abbeſs.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXIII. ‘ There was a Fight between the Britains and Devonſhire Men at Gafulford, now Camelford, in Cornwall; and Florence of Worceſter tells us, ‘ That the Britains were ſlain by thoſe of Devonſhire.

‘ The ſame Year alſo, (according to our Annals,) Ecbriht King of the Weſt-Saxons, and Beornwulf, King of the Mercians, fought at Ellendune, (ſuppoſed to be Wilton near Salisbury;) where Ecbriht obtained the Victory, a great ſlaughter being there made; after which King Ecbright ſent Æthelwulf his Son, and Ealſtan his Biſhop, and Wulfheard his Ealderman, with a great Army into Kent, where they forced King Baldred to Fly over Thames into the Northern parts ; then the Kentiſhmen, and thoſe of Surry, together with the South-Saxons, and Eaſt-Saxons, ſubmitted themſelves to King Egbert; which laſt Nation had been unjuſtly wreſted from his Family, and had (as Florence relates) for the ſpace of ſeveral Years been ſubject to Kings that were ſtrangers; the ſame Year alſo the King of the Eaſt-Angles, together with the whole Nation beſeeched King Ecbriht to grant them Peace, and be their Protector, for fear of the Mercians.] And the ſame Year the Eaſt-Angles ſlew Beornwulf King of the Mercians, becauſe (as Mat. Weſtminſter relates) he challenged their Kingdom as his own, ever ſince the time that King Offa took it, but now the Mercians tried to recover it by Force.

The ſame Year was alſo held another Synodal Council at Cloveſhoe, for the Kingdom of Mercia, under K. Beornwulf and Wilfred Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, with all the Biſhops and Chief Men of that Kingdom, wherein ſome diſputes about Lands between Heabert, Biſhop of Worceſter, and a certain Monaſtery called Weſtburgh, were determined.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXV. ‘ This Year Ludican King of the Mercians and five of his Ealdermen were ſlain; and Wiglaf began to Reign in his ſtead.] Ingulf and Will. of Malmesbury tell us, That this Ludican was Kinſman to the laſt mentioned King Beornwulf, and leading an Army againſt the Eaſt-Angles to revenge his Death, was there overcome and Slain, and that both theſe Tyrants were juſtly removed, who had not only made Kings without any Right, but had alſo by their imprudence been the occaſion of the deſtruction of the Military Forces of that Kingdom, which had till then proved Victorious ; and that thereupon one Withlaf being before Ealderman of Mercia, was by the conſent of all the People created King ; whoſe Son Wimond had Married Alfleda the Daughter of Ceolwulf, the late King.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXVII This King Withlaf Reigned thirteen Years, as Tributary to King Egbert, as ſhall be further related anon.

'The Moon was Eclipſed on Chriſtmaſs day at Night, and the ſame 'Year King Egbryht ſubdued the Kingdom of Mercia, and all the Country 'that lay South of Humber: He was the Eighth King, who Ruled over all 'Britain; but the Firſt, who had ſo great a Command, was Ælla King of 'the South Saxons; the Second was Ceawlin, King of the Weſt-Saxons; the 'Third was Æthelbryght King of Kent; the Fourth was Redwald King of 'the Eaſt Angles; the Fifth was Edwin King of Northumberland; the Sixth 'was Oſwald, who ſucceeded him; the Seventh was Oſwi the Brother of 'Oſwald; and the Eight was Egbryght, King of the Weſt-Saxons; who not 'long after led an Army againſt the Northumbers, as far as Dore; which 'place is ſuppoſed to have been in York-ſhire beyond the River Humber; but 'the Northumbers offering him Peace, and due Subjection, they parted Friends.

From which paſſage in the Saxon Annals it is apparent, that this Supream Dominion of one Engliſh King over all the reſt was no new thing, Bede having taken notice of it long before; yet did they not therefore take upon them the Title of Monarchs, any more than Egbert, who now ſucceeded them in that Power, thô moſt of our Hiſtorians, who have written the Saxon Hiſtory in Engliſh, have (but without any juſt reaſon) given them that Title, which could not properly belong to Kings, who had divers others under them, with the like Regal Juriſdiction within their own Territories; not but that King Egbert was in a more peculiar manner the Supream King of England, becauſe by his Abſolute Conqueſt of the Kingdoms of Kent, and of the South and Eaſt Saxons, he was the greateſt King who had hitherto Reigned in England; all the reſt of the Kings that remained, Reigning by his permiſſion, and paying him Tribute; a power which never had been exerciſed by any other King before him.

But to return to our Hiſtory; it ſeems that King Egbert was ſo highly diſpleaſed with the Mercians for ſetting up a King without his conſent, that Ingulf and Florence of Worceſter tell us, That as ſoon as ever Withlaf was made King, before he could raiſe an Army, he was expell'd his Kingdom, which Egbert added to his own; but Withlaf being ſearch'd for by Egbert's Commanders through all Mercia, he was by the induſtry of Seward Abbot of Croyland, concealed in the Cell of the Holy Virgin Etheldrith, Daughter of King Offa, and once the Spouſe of Ethelbert, King of the Eaſt Angles; where King Withlaf found a ſafe retreat for the ſpace of Four Months; until ſuch time as by the Mediation of the ſaid Abbot Seward, he was reconciled to King Egbert; and upon promiſe of the payment of an Yearly Tribute, permitted to return to his Kingdom in Peace; which is by him acknowledged in that Charter of his, that Ingulf hath given us of his Confirmation of the Lands and priviledges of the Abbey of Croyland. 'It was made in the Great Council of the whole Kingdom in the preſence of his Lords, Egbert King of Weſt-Saxony, and his Son Ethelwulf, and before the Biſhops and Great Men of all England, Aſſembled at the City of London, to take Counſel againſt the Daniſh Pyrats, then infeſting the Engliſh Coaſts: And in the Year 833, as you ſhall ſee when we come to that Year.

This Reſtoration of King Withlaf to his Kingdom is alſo mentioned in the Saxon Annals of the next Year, where it is ſaid Anno Dom. DCCCXXVIII. 'That Withlaf again obtained the Kingdom of the Mercians, and Biſhop 'Ethelwald deceaſed; alſo the ſame Year King Egbryht led an Army againſt 'the Northern Britains, and reduced them abſolutely to his Obedience: For it ſeems they had again rebelled.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXVIII.

Now likewiſe, as Mat. Weſtminſter relates, King Egbert vanquiſhed Swithred, King of the Eaſt-Saxons, and drove him out of his Kingdom; upon whoſe expulſion, the Weſt Saxon Kings ever after poſſeſt ~~that Kingdom~~.

S.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXIX.

Now (according to the ſame Authour) King Egbert having ſubdued all the South Parts of England, led a great Army into the Kingdom of Northumberland, and having grievouſly waſted that Province, made King Eanred his Tributary; which is alſo confirmed by Will. of Malmesbury, who relates that the Northumbers, who ſtood out the laſt, fearing leaſt this King's anger might break out upon them; now giving Hoſtages, ſubmitted themſelves to his Dominion; but they continued ſtill under Kings of their own as you will further find.

About this time ~~[illegible]~~ Egylla King of northwales deceased and Meravird his son by Egylt succeeded him (~~[illegible]~~ next with years?

To this Year I think we may alſo refer that great Tranſaction, which the Annals of the Cathedral Church of Wincheſter (printed in* Monaſt. Angl. from an ancient Manuſcript in the|| Cottonian Library) place under the Year following, viz. That King Egbert having thus ſubdued all the Kingdoms above-mentioned, and forced them to ſubmit to his Dominions, called a great Council at Wincheſter, whereto were ſummoned all the Great Men of the whole Kingdom; and there by the General Conſent of the Clerus & Populus, (i. e. the Clergy and Laity,) King Egbert was crowned King of Britain: And at the ſame time he Enacted, That it ſhould be for ever after called England; and that thoſe who before were called Jutes, or Saxons, ſhould now be called Engliſh men. And this I could not omit, becauſe thô William of Malmesbury, and other Hiſtorians, agree of the Matter of Fact; yet I think this the trueſt and moſt particular Account of the Time, and manner when it was performed.

'Alſo this Year Wilfred, the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, deceaſed; and 'Feologild the Abbot was Elected Arch-Biſhop, (7 Kal. Maij.) and was 'Conſecrated (5 Id. Junij. being Sunday,) and dyed the 3. Kal. Sept. after. But here is certainly a miſtake in this Copy of the Annals, for it was not Feologild, but Ceolnoth, who was then choſen Arch-Biſhop; for in the next Year it is thus corrected, viz.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXX.

'This Year Ceolnoth was Elected, and Conſecrated Arch-Biſhop, and 'Feologild the Abbot deceaſed.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXI.

'And the Year following Ceolnoth the Arch-Bp received his Pall from Rome.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXII.

'This Year certain Heathens or Pagans waſted Sceapige (now the Iſle 'of Sheppey in Kent.]

But ſince this is the firſt time, that theſe Heathens are mentioned in the Saxon Annals, it is fit we ſhould tell you a little more exactly who they were, and from whence they came; for they were indeed no other than that Nation which was before in our Saxon Annals, called Northmanna, and ſometimes Deanſcan (i. e. Danes;) the Etymology of which Name, ſince I find writers are ſo divided about, I will not take upon me to determine; not that all theſe People came out of that Country, which is at this day called Denmark, for it is impoſſible, that ſo narrow a Region (thô you ſhould likewiſe include whatſoever that Kingdom did then, or does now enjoy upon the Continent of Swedeland and Jutland) could ever ſend out ſuch vaſt Shoales of People, as for near Two hundred ~~Thouſand~~ Years before the Norman Conqueſt over-ran and deſtroyed France, the Low Countries, and alſo this Iſland; but you may, from what has been already ſaid, obſerve, that H. Huntington, in the Prologue to his Book above cited, does beſides

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXII. the Danes, add alſo the Norwegians, together with the Goths, Swedes and Vandals, to have been thoſe Nations which for ſo many Years waſted England; and that he did not deliver this without Book, but had ſufficient Authority for what he wrote, I ſhall further make out from the Teſtimony of thoſe Writers, who lived in that very Age, when theſe Nations firſt infeſted thoſe parts of Europe: For Eginhart, who was Son-in-Law and Chancellour, to Charles the Great, thus writes in his Hiſtory of that Prince, which I ſhall here faithfully Tranſlate.

' In like manner the Danes and Sweones, with thoſe whom we call Normans, do poſſeſs the Northern Shore of Scandinavia, together with all
' the Iſlands adjoyning to it, whil'ſt the Sclavi with divers other Nations
' inhabit the Southern Coaſts; but the Norwegans, or rather Northern Men,
' (for ſo they are called by the Swedes, becauſe they lye more Northerly
' than the greater part of that Nation,) and indeed all thoſe that inhabit
' Scanzia, are (by thoſe People of Europe, that lye more remote,) with
' very good reaſon called in the German Tongue (i.e.) Northland Men.

Next to Eginhart, Adam of Bremen, (who lived about Two Hundred Years after) does not only inſert theſe very words of the aforeſaid Authour, but alſo adds this further, that the Danes and Swedes with the other Nations, beyond the River Danubius, are by the French Hiſtorians all called Normans; ſo likewiſe Albertus, Abbot of Stade, who wrote about the Year 1250, ſays likewiſe, that the Danes and other Nations, who lived beyond Denmark, are all called Normans; from which Authorities the learned Grotius in his Prolegomena to his Gothic Hiſtory, lays it down as an undeniable Truth, that whatever we find among any writers of that Age concerning the Normans, does rightly belong to the Swedes, who were then one of the greateſt and moſt powerful of thoſe Northern Nations, that were all then called by one general Name of Normans.

But as for their Religion, I need ſay no more of it, ſince I have already told you in the beginning of the Third Book, that all thoſe Nations had the ſame common Deities, (viz.) Woden, and Thor, &c. whoſe Names I have there already ſet down, to which laſt Deities, as Ubbo Emmius relates, they before any great exepedition, ſacrificed a Captive, by knocking out his Brains, and ſmearing their Faces in his Blood, immediately marched againſt their Enemies; but that they were extreamly given to Witchcraft and Inchantments, all their own Authours relate, which would be too tedious here to repeat, ſince you will meet with ſome Inſtances of it in the following Hiſtory. But to return again to our Annals.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXIII. ' This Year is very remarkable, for King Egbert encountred Thirty
' Five Ships of Daniſh Pyrates at Carrum (now called Charmouth in Dorſetſhire,)
' where there was a great ſlaughter, but the Danes kept the Field, whereby we may gueſs that they had the advantage; yet it ſeems before this time, (even in this very Year) the Danes had been vanquiſhed, and put to flight at Dunmouth, (now called Tinmouth, from whence (having now ſpoiled the Iſle of Sheppey) they Sail'd to Charmouth above-mentioned.

This ſhews us (as Will. of Malmesbury well obſerves) the Inſtability of all Worldly grandeur; for now King Egbert being arrived at the height of Empire, met with this unlooked for Enemy, who harraſſed him and his Poſterity for divers Generations: And thô in this Sea Fight laſt mentioned, he had the better for the greater part of the Day, yet towards Night he loſt the Victory, thô by the help of it he retreated, and ſo ſaved the diſgrace of an entire defeat; this was the only time that Fortune ceaſed to favour King Egbert's Undertakings.

‘ This Year alſo (according to our Annals,) Herefrith Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Wigen (or Sighelm) Biſhop of Scirborne, and alſo Two Ealdormen, Dudda and Oſmund deceaſed.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXIII.

The ſame Year was held that General Council of the whole Kingdom at London, at the Feaſt of St. Auguſtin the Engliſh Apoſtle, Egbert King of Weſt Saxony, and Withlaf King of the Mercians, with both the Arch-Biſhops, and all the other Biſhops and Chief Men of England being preſent; at which, (beſides a Conſultation how to reſtrain the Invaſion of the Danes,) the Privileges, and Conceſſions of the ſaid King Withlaf to the Monaſtery of Croyland, were alſo confirmed by the ſaid Council; and were ſubſcribed to by King Withlaf, and both the Arch-Biſhops, and moſt of the Biſhops of England.

Vid. Sir H. Spelman's Council, 1. vol.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXV.

‘ The next Year a great Fleet of Danes landed amongſt the Weſtern Welſh, (i. e. Corniſhmen,) who being joyned with them in a League againſt King Egbert; offered him Battle, which he accepting of, ſtreight ways marched againſt them with his whole Army, and at Hengeſtdune, (now Hengſton in Cornwal,) put both the Britains and Danes to flight; and as Mat. Weſtminſter adds, freed his Kingdom at this time from the Invaſion of thoſe barbarous Enemies.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXVI.

‘ King Egbryht departed this Life, having Reigned Thirty Seven Years, and Seven Months;] but the Annals muſt needs be miſtaken, either in the time of his Reign, or elſe in the Year of his Death; for if he began to Reign Anno Dom. 800, and Reigned Thirty Seven Years and an half; it is evident he muſt have dyed Anno Dom. 838; the Printed Copy of Will. of Malmeſbury places his Death, Anno Dom. 837, and another reading in the Margin, in 838; but Florence of Worceſter places it according to the Annals in 836.

This King as the ſame Authour relates, governed his Subjects with great Clemency, and was as terrible to his Enemies, and for Nine Years Reigned Supream King over all Britain: Before his Death he is ſaid (by Will. of Malmeſbury) to have told his Son Ethelwulf, whom he left his Succeſſour, ‘ That he might be happy if he did not permit the Kingdom, which he had now laid together with great Induſtry, to be ſpoiled by ſloathfulneſs, to which this Nation had been too much addicted.

There is little mention of this King's Children, except Ethelwulf, only it is ſaid by John of Tinmouth, that he had alſo a Daughter called Edgithe, who being firſt bred up under an Iriſh Abbeſs, called Modwina, was made Abbeſs of the Nunnery at Poleſworth; but this, ſince we have no better Authority than modern hands for it, I cannot be certain of; but as for the Wiſe of King Egbert who was (according to the late Weſt-Saxon Law,) never called Queen, her Name was Redburge, and ſhe is mentioned, by John Beaver to have procured that Law from her Husband, that no Welſhman ſhould without leave paſs over Offa's Ditch upon pain of Death.

Vid. Sir H. Spelman's Council, 1 vol.

But the ſame Year that King Egbert dyed, was held a Common Council of the whole Kingdom at Kingſton upon Thames, where were preſent Egbert, King of the Weſt-Saxons, and Ethelwulf his Son, with Ceolnoth Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and other Biſhops and Chief Men of England, where among other things the manner of Mallings in Suſſex having been beſtowed by Baldred, King of Kent, on Chriſt Church Cant. and being afterwards taken away from it, becauſe the great Men of that Kingdom would not ratifie the Donation, it was now by the conſent of the King and all his Chief, and Wiſe Men again confirmed.

Anno Dom. King Ethelwulf, with his Son King Athelstan.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXVI.

No ſooner was King Egbert's Body buried at Wincheſter, but King Ethelwulf ſucceeded to the Throne, and though none of our Hiſtorians mention any former Election or Coronation of this King, yet it is certain he came to the Crown by Vertue of his Father's Teſtament; Henry Huntington and Roger Hoveden telling us expreſly, That he left his Two Sons Ethelwulf and Athelſtan his Heirs, which though it be in part a miſtake, (ſince this Athelſtan was not Son, ~~but Brother~~ to King Ethelwulf) yet that concerning the King's bequeathing the Crown is very probable, it being according to the Cuſtom of that time, but that this alone would not have been ſufficient ſhall be ſhewn in another place.

to King [illegible]

This Prince (as Thomas Rudborn in his Hiſtory of the Church of Wincheſter relates) had been during the Life of his Elder Brother (whoſe Name we know not) educated in the Monaſtery of Wincheſter, under the Tuition of Helmeſtan Biſhop, and Swithune, Præpoſitus, or Dean of that Church, and had there taken the Order of a Subdeacon, with an intent (as is ſuppoſed) to have profeſſed himſelf a Monk, not that he was ever made Biſhop of that Church, thô it is ſo related by H. Huntingdon and other Writers.

But King Egbert having no other Son living, he was diſpenced with to Marry; and returning very early to a Secular Life, helped his Father in his Wars; after whoſe Death he was advanced to the Throne, yet he always retained a great deal of the Monk, loved his eaſe, and had very little Ambition; and therefore not caring to trouble himſelf with the Governing of many Provinces, he reſted contented with his Paternal Kingdom of Weſt Saxony, and made over the Kingdoms of Kent, and of the South and Eaſt Saxons (being his Father's Conqueſts) to Athelſtan, his Son (as the Saxon Annals and Will. of Malmesbury expreſly call him,) and which is more, Ethelwerd in his Chronicle gives us the Names of Five Sons of King Ethelwulf, of which (ſays he) Athelſtan who Reigned together with his Father was the Eldeſt, that Alfred the Fifth Son Reigned after them all; yet moſt of the other Hiſtorians going directly contrary to thoſe Authorities, will needs have him to be his Brother, I ſuppoſe to ſave this Pious Prince's Reputation; but Mat. Weſtminſter ſays, That he was his baſe Son, which is moſt probable, ſince he had not any Legitimate Son then old enough to Govern a Kingdom as this Athelſtan at that time was, and whom we ſhall often find mentioned in this Hiſtory; thô when, or how he dyed, all our Writers are ſilent.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXVII.

'This Year, according to the Saxon Annals, Wulfheard the Ealdorman 'fought at Hamtun, (i. e. Southampton,) with a Fleet of Thirty Three 'Daniſh Pyrates, and there making a great ſlaughter of them obtained 'the Victory.

'The ſame Year this Wulfheard deceaſed: Alſo Æthelm, another 'Ealdorman, fought with the Daniſh Army at Port, (now called Portland,) 'where he being aſſiſted by the Dorſet-ſhire Men, ſoon put them to flight; 'but how this can conſiſt with what follows I know not, viz. That the 'Danes notwithſtanding kept the Field where the Battle was Fought, and 'ſlew the Chief Commander being an Ealdorman; unleſs it relate to the 'Year following; when

'Herelryht the Ealdorman was killed by the Danes, and many others 'with him in Merſcwarum, (that is Mercia ;) alſo the ſame Year in Lindiſſe, 'as alſo among the Eaſt Angles, and in Kent many were Slain by their Forces ; for there (according to Mat. Weſtminſter) the above ſaid Earl or Ealdormen was ſlain ; the Danes obtaining the Victory, deſtroying all places with Fire and Sword : And (the ſame Year according to Florence of Worceſter) Wiglaf King of Mercia dying, Bertulf ſucceeded him.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXVII

'There was this Year a great ſlaughter made by the Danes, about 'London, Cantwic (i. e. Canterbury, and Hroſceſter,) that is Rocheſter.

Anno Dom. DCCCXXXIX

So that now it ſeems the Danes had entred farther into the Land, making havock of all where ever they came.

'This Year King Ethelwulf fought at Carrum, (i. e. Charmouth) againſt '35 Daniſh Ships, who kept the Field where the Battle was fought.

Anno Dom. DCCCXL.

'So that according to H. Huntington, they here obtained the Victory ; 'for though the number of their Ships were but ſmall, yet they were 'very large and full of Men.

'This Year alſo the Emperour Lewis (the Pious) dyed.

Nor can I here omit what the Scotiſh Hiſtorians place under the former Year, but ours under this, viz. The total Conqueſt of the Picts by Kened the firſt King of Scotland, after many fierce Battles ; in the laſt of which Druſken, King of the Picts, being Slain, that Kingdom was totally deſtroyed, and as H. Huntington long ſince obſerved, not only their Laws, but alſo their very Language, (except what remains in the Names of places) is now totally loſt, and that Nation being long ſince incorporated with that of the Antient Scots and Saxons, ſhews us that even whole Kingdoms and Nations have both their Originals, and fatal periods, as well as particular Perſons.

But thô the Scotiſh Hiſtorians do juſtly date the Empire of their Kings over all Scotland, from this Total Conqueſt of the Picts by King Kened, according to that old Verſe:

Primus in Albania fertur regnaſſe Kenedus,

Yet when thoſe Hiſtorians will by this Conqueſt extend the limits of this King and his Succeſſour's Dominions, ſo far beyond Edenburgh, Southward, making him to have Reigned from the River Tyne, (and ſo would take in all the County of Northumberland, lying between Tine and Tweed,) to the utmoſt Orcades, this is by no means to be admitted ; ſince as the Lord Primate Uſher learnedly obſerves, That Country had long after not only Engliſh, but Daniſh Kings, as ſhall in the purſuit of this Hiſtory be clearly made out ; and after thoſe were extinct, we may read in Turgot's Chronicle of the Biſhops of Durham, the Earls, appointed by the Kings of England, under them Governed that Country ; For as Roger Hoveden, in the Year 953, expreſly relates after Eric, to whom the Northumbers had ſworn Allegiance, that Province was committed by K. Edred to Earl Oſwald, who afterwards in the Reign of King Edgar, had one Olſac aſſigned him as a partner in that Government, the former Commanding all that lay on the North ſide of Tyne, and the latter all York-ſhire ; there alſo follow all the Succeſſours of theſe Earls, as low as the Time of Edward the Confeſſour, under whom Toſti Governed it ; who looſing his Earldom by reaſon of his Tyranny, it was by King Edward committed to Earl Morchar, but he being taken up with great Imployments, committed the Government of that part of it beyond Tyne to one Oſwulf, who afterwards by the Gift of K. William, enjoyed the Government of the whole Country ; But that Loden and the other Low-Land Countries of Scot- land, as far as Edinburgh, were long after in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, ſhall be ſhewn when we come to the Reign of King Edgar.

Anno Dom. DCCCXLI. About this Time Eanred King of Northumberland dying, Ethelred his Son ſucceeded him, as Simeon of Durham and Mat. of Weſtminſter relate, thô the latter places this the Year before.

But to give ſome account of the Affairs of Wales, from Caradoc's Chronicle.

Anno Dom. DCCCXLIII. About this time was fought the Battle of Ketell, betwixt Burthred King of Mercia, and the Britains; wherein (as ſome do write) Mervyn Vrych, King of the Britains was Slain, leaving behind him a Son afterwards called Rodri Mawr, that is to ſay, Rodoric the Great; yet according to Nennius, this King Mervyn was alive Anno Dom. 854, which was the Twenty Fourth Year of this Kings Reign, and in which that Authour in his Preface ſays, He wrote his Hiſtory; but I believe, there is either an errour in Nennius's Account, or elſe in the Tranſcribers; ſince all the Welſh Chronicles agree, that about this time Mervyn dyed, and Rodri ſucceeded him. *

* for Dr Gales [illegible] Chronicon makes this Mervyn to have been onely King of Man or Anglesey, and was onely for some time (& that in his wives Right) King of all north wales

This Prince, Commonly called Rodoric the Great, began his Reign over Wales this Year; it was he who divided all Wales into three Territories of Aberfraw, Dineuawr, and Mathraval, he had great Wars with Burhred, King of Mercia, who by the aid of King Ethelulph entred North Wales with a great Power, and deſtroyed Angleſey, and fought with the Welſhmen of Northwales divers times, and ſlew Meyric, a great Prince among them.

Anno Dom. DCCCXLIV. This Year, (according to Mat. Weſtminſter) Æthelred King of Northumberland was driven from his Kingdom, (I ſuppoſe by a Rebellion, the uſual method in that unquiet Country,) and one Redwald ſucceeded him, who, as ſoon as ever he was made King, fought a Battle with the Danes, at a place called Aluethelie, where the King and Earl Alfred were ſlain, with the greateſt part of their Army, and that then K. Ethelred was again reſtored to the Throne; but this Authour does not tell us by what means, nor is the Year expreſſed; and thô this Action is found in no other Authour, yet is it likely enough to be true, for Simeon of Durham in his Hiſtory of that Church; thô he does not mention this Kings Expulſion and Reſtitution to the Throne, yet he there expreſly mentions King Ethelred to have about this time ſucceeded his Father Eandred. Cap. 5.

Anno Dom. DCCCXLV. This Year, according to our Annals, Eanwulf the Ealdorman, with the Somerſet-ſhire) Men, and Ealſtan the Biſhop and Oſric the Ealdorman, with the Dorſet-ſhire Men, fought with the Daniſh Army at the mouth of Pedidan (called by Hoveden, Pendred's Mouth, and was indeed the River Parret in Somerſet-ſhire;) where they made a great ſlaughter of them, and obtained the Victory over the Danes; after which the Kingdom enjoyed Peace for divers Years.

Anno Dom. DCCCXLVIII. But the Northumbers ſtill continued their old cuſtom of driving out, or killing their Kings, for about 3 Years after, as Florence of Worceſter, and Simeon of Durham relate, Ethelred King of the Northumbers being Slain, Oſbert Reigned in his ſtead Eighteen Years; and the ſame Year there was an Eclipſe of the Sun, about the Sixth Hour of the Day, on the Kal. of October; this is that King Osbert, who was afterwards killed by the Danes.

Anno Dom. DCCCXLIX.

According to Florence, and Mat. Weſtminſter a Son called Ælfred, was now Born to King Ethelwulf at Wanating (now Wantige in Berk-ſhire,) his Mother was Osberge the Daughter of Aſlat, or Oſlac, chief Butler to King Æthelwulf, who was related to Stuffe and Whitgar, firſt Princes of the Iſle of Wight; ſhe was a Woman as remarkable for her Piety, as her Birth, and deſerved to be the Mother of him, who was afterwards to prove ſo great a Prince.

The ſame Year alſo (from the ſame Authours) Berthferth the Son of Bertwulf, King of Mercia, wickedly ſlew his Couſin Wulſtan, who was Nephew to both the late Kings of Mercia; but his Body was buried at the Famous Monaſtery of Rependun (now Repton in Darby-ſhire,) in the Tomb of Wiglaf his Grandfather, and, if we may believe our Hiſtorians, a Pillar of Light reaching up to Heaven, ſtood over the place for Thirty Days, which procured him the Title of a Saint.

Anno Dom. DCCCLI.

'This Year the Pagan Danes returned hither, and Ceorl the Ealdorman, 'together with the Forces of Devonſhire, fought with their Army at 'Wicganbeorch (ſuppoſed to be Wenbury in Devon-ſhire;) and there obtain'ed the Victory: And the ſame Year alſo King Æthelſtan, and Duke 'Ealcher, fought with them a Sea ~~Fight~~, and routed a great Fleet of them 'near Sandwic, (now Sandwich, in Kent) took 9 Ships and put the reſt to Flight; 'now alſo the Danes Wintered in the Iſle of Thanet, (or as Aſſer in his Annals 'relates in the Iſle of Sheppy;) and the ſame Year came 300 of their Ships 'into the Mouth of Thames, and the Danes landing took Canterbury and 'London; and routed Beorthwulf King of the Mercians, with his whole 'Army, who had come out to Fight with them; after which the Danes 'marched Southward beyond Thames into Surry, and there K. Æthelwulf, 'and his Son Æthelbald, with the Forces of the Weſt-Saxons, fought a'gainſt them at Aclea, (now called Oakley in Surry,) where they made a 'greater ſlaughter of the Pagan Army, than had been heard of at any 'time before; ſo that the greateſt part of them were deſtroyed.

The ſame Year alſo (according to Sir H. Spelman's 1. Vol. of Councils) was held the Council of Kingsbury under Berthwulf, King of the Mercians, Ceolnoth, Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury with the other Biſhops and Wiſe Men of the Province being preſent, wherein, beſides the publick buſineſs of the Kingdom, ſeveral grievances of the Monks were redreſſed, and the Charter of that King to the Abby of Croyland is confirmed under the Rule of St. Benedict, and is ſuppoſed by Sir H. Spelman in his Councils to be a great Council of that Kingdom; becauſe it bears date in the Week of Eaſter, when they were Aſſembled about the publick Affairs of the Kingdom, at which time as alſo at Whitſontide and Chriſtmaſs, the great Men of the Kingdom were wont of courſe to attend at the King's Court, to conſult, and ordain, what ſhould be neceſſary for the common Good, when alſo the King uſed to appear in State with his Crown upon his head; which cuſtom of holding great Councils, was alſo continued after the Norman Conqueſt, to the middle of the Reign of Henry the Second, as Sir H. Spelman learnedly obſerves in his Notes at the end of this Council.

Anno Dom. DCCCLII.

This Year (according to the Peterburgh Copy of the Saxon Annals) Ceolred Abbot of Medeſhamſtead, and his Monks leaſed out to one Wulfred the Land of Sempigaham (perhaps Sempingham in Lincoln-ſhire,) on Condition, That after his Death it ſhould again revert to the Monaſtery, he paying in the mean time a Yearly Rent of ſo many Loads of Wood, Anno Dom. DCCCLII.

Coals and Turf, and ſo many Barrels of Beer and Ale, and other Proviſions, with Thirty Shillings in Money, as is there ſpecified; at which Agreement Burherd King of the Mercians, who had (now ſucceeded Beorthwulf) was preſent, together with Ceolred the Arch-Biſhop, with divers other Biſhops, Abbots and Ealdormen.

I have inſerted this, to let you ſee the form of Leaſing out the Abbey Lands in thoſe Days, and which it ſeems required the Solemnity of the Common Council of that Kingdom to confirm it.

The ſame Year alſo, (according to Florence) Berthulph King of the Mercians deceaſed, and Burhed ſucceeded him, Anno Dom. DCCCLIII.

‘ Who this next Year together with his Wites, (that is the Wiſe ‘ Men of his Great Council,) deſired King Æthelwulf that he would ‘ aſſiſt them to ſubdue the Northern Welſhmen, which he performed, and ‘ marching with his Army through Mercia, made the Men of North-Wales* Subject to King Burhed; but of this, the Welſh Chronicles ‘ are ſilent.

‘ This Year alſo, King Æthelwulf ſent his Son Ælfred to Pope Leo to ‘ Rome, who there anointed him King, and adopted him for his Epiſcopal ‘ Son. It is much diſputed among ſome of our Modern Hiſtorians, of what the Pope anointed Alfred King, whether of any preſent, or elſe future Dominions; But ſince, an ancient Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library (containing an Hiſtory of the Kings of England) ſays expreſly, That he was anointed In Succeſſorem Paterni Regni, and that we do not read of any Territories King Alfred enjoyed till after the Death of his Brethren; it is moſt reaſonable to underſtand it in the plain Literal Senſe, as it is here ſet down, not only in theſe Annals, but in Aſſer's Account of this King's Life and Actions, that the Pope anointed him King as a Prophetical Preſage of his future Royal Dignity.

* Florence, and Math. Weſtminſter, call them the Midland Welch, or Britains: and if their Copies of the Annals are true, the Men of Powiſland are here meant.

‘ And the ſame Year Ealcher with the Kentiſh-men, and Huda with the ‘ Surrey-men, fought with the Daniſh Army in the Iſle of Thanet, and at ‘ firſt had the better of them, but there were many killed and drowned ‘ on both ſides, and both the Ealdormen or Chief Commanders periſhed.

‘ Alſo Burhed King of the Mercians now married the Daughter of ‘ King Ethelwulf. Aſſer relates the Marriage to have been kept with great Solemnity at a Town of the King's, called Cippenham (now Chipnam) in Wiltſhire.

[illegible]

Anno Dom. DCCCLIV.

‘ This Year the Danes winter'd in Scepige, (or Sheppie;) and the ſame ‘ year King Æthelwulf diſcharged the Tenth part of his Land through‘ out his whole Kingdom of all Tribute or Taxes for the Honour of God ‘ and his own Salvation.

This being the famous and ſolemn Grant of King Æthelwulf concerning Tythes, requires a more particular Relation, and therefore I ſhall here give you the Words of the ſaid Grant at large. ——— “ I Æthelwulf, King of the Weſt Saxons, with the Councel (or Conſent) of my “ Biſhops and Chief Men, &c. have conſented, That a certain Hereditary Part of the Lands heretofore poſſeſs'd by all Orders and Degrees “ of Perſons, whether Men or Women, Servants of GOD, (i. e. Monks “ or Nuns,) or meer Laicks, ſhall give their Tenth Manſion, and where “ it is leaſt, the Tenth Part of all their Goods, free and diſcharged of all “ Secular Servitude, and particularly of all Royal Tributes or Taxations, “ as well the greater as the leſs, which they call Wittereden, (which ſignifies a certain Fine or Forfeiture;) “ and that they be free from all other “ Things, Anno Dom. DCCCLIV

"Things, as Expedition, building of a Bridge, or fortifying of a Caſtle, &c. And that they may the more diligently pour out their Prayers to GOD for us without ceaſing, we do in ſome part diſcharge their other Service. Theſe Things were done in Wincheſter, in the Church of St. Peter, in the Year of our LORD's Incarnation 855, the Third Indiction, on the Nones of November, before the great Altar, in Honour of the Glorious Virgin Mary, the Mother of GOD, St. Michael the Arch-Angel, and St. Peter Prince of the Apoſtles, as alſo of our bleſſed Father Pope Gregory, all the Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops of England being preſent, and ſubſcribing to it; as alſo Beorhed King of Mercia, together with the Abbots, Abbeſſes, Earls, and other chief Men of the whole Kingdom, with an infinite multitude of other Believers, who all of them have witneſſed, and conſented to the Royal Grant; but the Dignitaries have thereunto ſubſcribed their Names.

But, as Ingulph relates, King Æthelwulf, for the greater firmneſs thereof, offered this Charter at the Altar of St Peter at Rome; but that the Biſhops received it in the Faith of God, and tranſmitted it to be publiſhed throughout all the Churches in their ſeveral Dioceſſes.

Thô this Grant of Tithes is mentioned by the Annals, as to be made before the King's going to Rome, yet it appears by the Date, as alſo from Aſſer and Ingulph, not to have been done till after his Return from thence; which makes Sir H. Spelman conjecture, (and not without good Grounds,) that this Grant was twice made; once before his going to Rome, it being there confirmed by the Pope, and was alſo regranted by a Great Council of the Kingdom after his Return, as appears by the Charter here recited.

I have been the more exact in reciting this Law concerning Tythes, both becauſe it gives us the form of paſſing an Act in the great Council of the Kingdom at that time, and who were the Parties to it, as alſo becauſe this was the firſt general Law that was ever made in a Mycel Synod of the whole Kingdom for the payment of Tythes, thô I do not deny but there had been before ſome particular Laws of King Ina and King Offa to the ſame effect; yet thoſe could only oblige the Weſt Saxon and Mercian Kingdoms.

Anno Dom. DCCCLV.

The next Year alſo (according to Florence and Aſſer's Chronicle) K. Æthelwulf went to Rome, carrying Ælfred, his youngeſt and beſt beloved Son along with him, but to what intent, having been ſo lately there before, we know not, any more than what the King did there, unleſs to repair the Engliſh School or Colledge for Youth, that had been lately burnt; but it is certain, he ſtayed abroad near a Year, and in his Return home, Charles, (Sirnamed The Bald,) King of the Franks, gave him his Daughter to Wife, who was called Leotheta, (in French Judith,) and ſo, together with her, he returned into England.

But as Aſſer relates, there was in the mean time an infamous Conſpiracy framed in the Weſtern Parts of England, for Prince Æthelbald, the King's eldeſt Son, and Ealchſtan Biſhop of Scirborne, and Æanwulf Earl of Somerſet, had plotted together, that King Æthelwulf, at his Return Home, ſhould never be received into his Kingdom; moſt Men laid this to the Charge of this Biſhop and Earl only, thô many do chiefly attribute it to the Perverſeneſs of this young Prince, who was alſo very obſtinate in other Wickedneſs. So the King his Father returning from

Rome;

Anno Dom. DCCCLV.

Rome, Prince Ethelbald, together with his Councellors, contrived this great Villany, viz. to expell the King from his own Kingdom, thô God would not permit it to take effect, neither did all the Noblemen of England conſent to it; yet leſt ſo great a Miſchief ſhould happen, that the Father and Son making War on each other, the whole Nation ſhould be engaged in mutual Slaughter, by the wonderful Clemency of the King, and with the Conſent of all his Nobility, the Kingdom, which was before united, became now divided between the Father and the Son, the Eaſtern Countries being allotted to the former, and the Weſtern to the latter; but where the Father ought indeed by Right to have Reigned, there Ruled this Rebellious and Undutiful Son, for the Weſtern part of England was always accounted before the Eaſtern. King Ethelwulf therefore coming back from Rome, the whole Nation (as it ought) highly rejoyced at his return, and would, if he had pleaſed, have expelled his wicked Son Æthelbald, with all his Adherents, out of the Kingdom; but the King would by no means ſuffer it, uſing great Clemency and Prudence, leſt the Kingdom might thereby be endangered.

All this Diſturbance ſeems to have been raiſed by his Son and his Faction, becauſe of his marrying this new Wife, whom notwithſtanding having now brought over with him, he placed by him on the Royal Throne as long as he lived, without any Diſpute or Oppoſition from his Nobles; thô (ſays this Author) the Nation of the Weſt Saxons did not permit the Queen to ſit by the King, or to be called Queen; which Cuſtom our Anceſtors relate to have proceeded from a certain wicked Queen, called Eadburga, the Wife of King Bryhtric, whoſe Story, Aſſer in his Annals, as alſo in his De Geſtis Alfredi, hath given us at large, where ſpeaking of the Occaſion of this ſevere Law, he tells us, it proceeded from the wicked Carriage of that Queen, (already mentioned at the end of the former Book,) who abuſing her Husband's Affections by untrue Accuſations, took away many Men's Lives; and being hated by the Engliſh after that King's Deceaſe, they made that Law now mentioned.

William of Malmesbury and Mat. Weſtminſter do aſſure us, That King Ethelwulf lived but two Years after his return from Rome, during which time he thought not only of the World to come, but alſo what ſhould happen in this after his Deceaſe; and therefore, leſt his Sons ſhould quarrel among themſelves after his Death, he commanded his Teſtament to be written, (Aſſer calls it an Hereditary, or Commendatory Epiſtle,) in which he ordained, his Kingdom ſhould be divided between the two eldeſt Sons, as alſo his own proper Inheritance between all his Sons and Daughters, and near Kinſmen; but for his Money, he ordered it to be divided between his Sons and his Nobles, and what was left, to be employed for the good of his Soul; to which end he ordained, That his Succeſſours throughout all his own Hereditary Lands, ſhould maintain out of * every Ten Families one Poor Perſon, (either Native or Stranger,) with Meat, Drink, and Apparel; always provided, that the Land did not then lie waſte, but was cultivated by Men and Cattle: It is alſo to be noted, That this Grant was wholly different from that of Tythes, thô Bromton's Chronicle hath confounded them together, and made them all one; he alſo ordered to be ſent every Year to Rome 300 Mancuſes, which William of Malmesbury renders Marks, thô what the Sum was is uncertain: but it was to be equally diſtributed between the Churches of St. Peter and

* From whence came the Corrodies, that ſtill remain in divers places.

Anno Dom. DCCCLV.

St. Paul, to provide Lights on Eaſter Eve; and of this 300 Marks, the Pope was to have 100 to himſelf. Theſe Grants are ſuppoſed by Sir Henry Spelman to have been made in a general Council of the whole Kingdom, but after this time we find no more of them for many Years, by reaſon of the frequent Invaſions of the Danes. But not long after King Ethelwulf died, and was buried at Wincheſter, having reigned 20 Years and 5 Months; for the Saxon Annals, which allow him but 18 Years and an half, are certainly miſtaken.

This Year alſo, (according to Florence of Worceſter,) Humbert the Biſhop anointed that Glorious Martyr, Edmund King of the Eaſt Angles, being then but 15 Years old, at a Town called Buram, being then the Royal Seat.

But having no Account of King Edmund's Pedigree, or of the Place of his Birth from any of our Engliſh Hiſtorians, you muſt be content with what Johannes Anglicus of Tinmouth hath told us, or in his Legend of Saints, (called Sanctilogium,) of this King and Martyr, viz. That he was the Son of one Alemond, a Nobleman of the Blood Royal of the Eaſt Angles, who having fled for fear of King Offa into Old Saxony, out of which his Family firſt came, had there by his Wife called Cywara a Son, whom he named Edmund, the pretended Miracles of whoſe Birth I purpoſely omit. This Prince having been inſtructed in all Chriſtian and Moral Duties, lived in Germany to the 14th Year of his Age, and upon his return into England was ſo acceptable to the Eaſt Angles, that he was by them Elected King, and, till his Death, continued in the quiet Poſſeſſion of that Kingdom, without any oppoſition of King Ethelwulf, or any of his Sons, then Kings of the Weſt Saxons, to whoſe Dominions that Kingdom of the Eaſt Angles had lately been made ſubject; and hence it may be reaſonably inferred, that it was by King Ethelwulf's Conſent, that Edmund being returned out of Germany, took Poſſeſſion of that Kingdom.

Being thus made King, and, by reaſon of his tender Age, not eſteeming himſelf capable of managing the Affairs of the Nation, he willingly ſubmitted them and himſelf to the Direction of the ſaid Biſhop of the Eaſt Angles, by whom he was Crowned, and by whoſe Councel and Direction he behaved himſelf as became a Prince, endued with all Kingly Virtues; ſo that during his Reign, his principal Care was to repair the Ruines which the Mercian Arms and Tyranny had brought upon the Churches of the Eaſt Angles, reduced by War to extream Poverty, and conſequently to a Neglect of Piety and Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline. And thus he Reigned 14 Years in Peace, with the Affection of all his Subjects, till GOD was pleaſed, by ſending the Pagan Danes as a Scourge to his Country, to render this Prince a high Example of Chriſtian Fortitude and Conſtancy.

Anno Dom. DCCCLVII.

After the Death of Ethelwulf King of the Weſt Saxons, his two eldeſt Sons divided their Father's Kingdom according to his Will: Ethelbald, his eldeſt Son, ſucceeded him in Weſt Saxony, whilſt his younger Brother Ethel~~red~~ Reigned in Kent, as alſo over the Eaſt and South Saxons. And now (according to our Annals) the Pope hearing of the Death of King Ethelwulf, anointed Alfred to be King, and alſo delivered him to a Biſhop to be Confirmed: If this was ſo, the King his Father muſt have left him behind at Rome; for Aſſer ſays expreſly, That he went thither with him; but over what Kingdom the Pope ſhould Anoint him, I know not, unleſs foretold by way of Prophecy, he would be King after his Brothers.

But as for King Ethelbald, above-mentioned, both Ingulph and Will. of Malmesbury give him a very bad Character, That he married Judeth, his Father's Widow, and was alſo beſides both Lazy, and Perfidious; but * Thomas Redborne, in his larger Hiſtory of Wincheſter, ſays, That by the Admonition of Swithin, Biſhop of that Church, he repented of his Inceſt, and put away Judeth his Mother-in-Law, and obſerved all Things that the Biſhop enjoyned him. This Author farther relates from one Gerard, of Cornwal's Hiſtory of the Weſt Saxon Kings, not now extant that I know of, That he died in a few Years after, without doing or ſuffering any thing that deſerves to be mentioned; for we do not find that the Danes troubled this Kingdom all his Reign, concerning the Length of which there is very different Relations amongſt our Hiſtorians; the Saxon Annals, and William of Malmesbury, making him to have reigned 5 Years, whereas Aſſer and Ingulph allow him but Two and an half, which ſeems to be the truer Account, for if King Ethelwulf returned from Rome in the Year 855, and lived above Two Years after, it is plain King Ethelbald could not Reign above Two Years and an half; for the Saxon Annals tell us, that in the next Year but one, viz.

I ſuppoſe our Author means, from Domeſtick Commotions; for he immediately tells us, That in this King's time there came an Army (of Danes) from the Sea, and took Wincheſter; with whom (in their return to their Ships) Oſric and Æthelwulf the Ealdormen, with the Hampſhire and Berkſhire-men, fought, and put the Danes to flight, and kept the Field of Battle, but the Annals do not tell us in what Year of his Reign this Invaſion happened.

Now concerning this holy Biſhop, as alſo Alſtan Biſhop of Shirborne, * William of Malmesbury gives us this Character, which omitting all the Bedroll of Miracles that follow, I ſhall here ſet down.

King Æthelwulf bearing a great Reverence to St. Swithune, whom he calls his Teacher and Maſter, deſiſted not till he had honoured him with the Government of the ſaid Biſhoprick, ſo that he was Conſecrated with the Unanimous Conſent and Joy of all the whole Clergy of that Dioceſs, by Ceolnoth Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury; hereby Biſhop Swithune's Authority encreaſing, his Councels, for the Good of the Kingdom, proved of greater weight; ſo that by his Admonitions, both the Church and State received great Benefit: And indeed he was a rich Treaſure of all Virtues; but thoſe in which he took moſt Delight, were Humility and Clemency; and in the diſcharge of his Epiſcopal Function, he omitted nothing belonging to a True Paſtor.

By

Anno Dom. DCCCLXV.

By his Aſſiſtance principally, together with that of the Prudent and Couragious Prelate Alſtan, Biſhop of Shirborne, King Æthelwulf was enabled to ſupport the Calamities his Kingdom ſuffered by the frequent Irruptions of the Danes, for theſe two were his principal Councellours in all Affairs. Biſhop Swithune, who contemned Worldly Things, informed his Lord in all Matters which concerned his Soul, whilſt Alſtan judging that Temporal Advantages were not to be neglected, encouraged him to oppoſe the Danes, and provided Money for his Exchequer, and alſo ordered his Armies; ſo that thô this King was of a ſlow, unactive Nature, yet by the Admonitions of theſe two worthy Councellours, he Governed his Kingdom prudently and happily: Many noble Deſigns for the good of the Church and State being well begun, were proſperouſly executed in his Reign.

‘This Year the Daniſh Army landed in Thanet, and wintering there, ‘made a League with the Kentiſh-men, who promiſed them Money, provided they would keep the Peace; under pretence of which, and of the ‘Money promiſed, the Danes ſtole out of their Camp, and waſted all the ‘Eaſt part of Kent.] For, as Aſſer well obſerves, they knew they could get more by Plunder, than by Peace.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXVI.

‘Now, according to the ſame Annals, King Æthelbryht died, to the ‘great Grief of his Subjects, having governed the Kingdom 5 Years with ‘a general Satisfaction, and was buried at Scyreburne, near to his Brother. This Prince is ſuppoſed to have had a Son call'd Ethelwald, whom you will find in this Hiſtory to have raiſed a Rebellion againſt King Edward the elder many Years after.

King ETHELRED.

‘Then (according to the Annals) Æthelred, Brother to the late King, ‘began his Reign; and the ſame Year a great Army of Danes landed in ‘England, and took up their Winter Quarters among the Eaſt Angles, and ‘there turned Horſemen, and that Nation was forced to make Peace ‘with them.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXVII.

‘Then the Pagan Army ſailed from the Eaſt Angles, and went up the River ‘Humber to the City of York, where was at that time great Diſcord between the People of that Nation.] I ſhall here give you Aſſer's Account of this Tranſaction, being to the ſame effect (thô more particular than that) in the Annals themſelves. For (ſays he) the Northumbers had now expelled Osbright, their lawful King, and had ſet up a Tyrant or Uſurper, one Ælla, who was not deſcended of the Royal Line; but now when the Pagans invaded them by the Interceſſion of the great Men, and for the Common Safety, the two Kings joyned their Forces, and ſo marched to York; at whoſe coming the Danes preſently fled, and endeavoured to defend themſelves within the City; which the Chriſtians perceiving, reſolved to follow them to the very Walls, and breaking in, and entering the Town with them; (for it ſeems, that City had not in thoſe Times ſuch ſtrong Walls, as they had when Aſſer wrote his Hiſtory;) therefore when the Chriſtians had made a Breach in the Wall as they deſigned, and that a great part of them had entred the City, the Pagans being compelled by Neceſſity and Deſpair, broke out upon them, and killed, routed, and put to flight the whole Army, as well within as without the Town; ſo that both the Kings were ſlain, together with many Noblemen, and a vaſt number of Common Souldiers; and a great many were taken Priſoners, and thoſe that remained alive were forced to make Peace with the Danes, who (according to the Chronicle of Mailroſs,) made one Egbert King over the Northumbers that were left, thô under the Daniſh Dominion; but it ſeems, it was only over thoſe that lay on the North ſide of the River Tine, as Simeon of Durham, in his Hiſtory of that Church, relates.

'The ſame Year alſo died Æalhſtan the Biſhop, after he had held his 'See of Scireborne 50 Years, whoſe Body was buried in that Town.

*Vid. X Script. Col. 802.

But ſince the Chronicle that goes under the Name of Abbot * Bromton undertakes to give ſome probable Account how the Danes came to invade the Kingdom of Northumberland, thô it looks ſomewhat like a Romance, yet I ſhall here give it you, ſince it is found in no other Author that I know of, being thus. Osbriht, King of Northumberland, going one day a hunting, as he returned home went privately to the Houſe of one of his Noblemen, called Bruern Brocard, to refreſh himſelf; Bruern knowing nothing of the King's coming, was gone to the Sea ſide, according to his Cuſtom, to ſecure the Shoar againſt Pirats; but his Wife, a Woman of great Beauty, entertained the King at Dinner very ſplendidly. The King having dined, took her by the Hand and led her to her Chamber, telling her, He muſt ſpeak with her in private; and there removing all out of the way, but ſuch as were privy to his Secrets, he by Force and Violence lay with her. Having thus had his Will, he ſpeedily returned to York, whilſt ſhe ſo lamented, and wept, that her Face was extremely altered; which cauſed her Husband at his return to ask the cauſe of ſo ſudden a Change, and ſuch an unuſual Sadneſs: Whereupon ſhe told him the whole Matter, how the King had forced her; which having heard, he comforted her, bidding her not to afflict her ſelf, ſince ſhe was not able to reſiſt a Man ſo potent; aſſuring her, becauſe ſhe had told him the Truth, he would not love her leſs than he had done before; and if GOD gave him leave, he would Revenge both himſelf, and her, upon him that had committed the Crime. Then did Bruern, being a Man both Noble and Powerful, call his Kindred together, to whom he revealed the Affront put upon him, and his Intention ſpeedily to Revenge it; To which they all conſenting, and approving his Purpoſe, he with them took Horſe and rode to York. The King, upon ſight of him, called him to him very civilly, but he having all his Relations at his Back, defied him, renouncing his Allegiance, giving up his Land, and whatſoever elſe he held of him. This ſaid, without any more Words he withdrew, making no ſtay at all at Court.

So his Friends conſenting, he went ſtraitways over to Denmark, where he made a great Complaint to the King of the Affront offered to him and his Wife by K. Osbriht, deſiring his ſpeedy Relief and Supplies to put him into a Capacity to revenge himſelf. At this News, Godrin and his Danes conceived very great Joy, having now ſome Reaſon to induce them to invade the Engliſh, and revenge the Injury offered to Bruern, who was deſcended of his Blood; whereupon he ſpeedily prepared a great Army, over which he made Captains, two Brothers, called Inguar, and Hubba, moſt valiant Souldiers; and to them he gave a Navy, furniſhed with all Neceſſaries, to tranſport an innumerable Company of Men. Theſe Adventurers landing in the Northern Parts, and taking their way through Holderneſs, deſtroyed all the Towns, with their Inhabitants; and coming to York, provoked Osbriht to come out and fight them, where he and his Brother-King were both ſlain, as you have already rd.

This Year the Daniſh Army marched into Mercia as far as Snotinga-m, (now Nottingham,) and there took up their Quarters; but Burh-d, King of the Mercians, with his Great or Wiſe Men, entreated Æthel-d, King of the Weſt Saxons, and Ælfred his Brother, to help them to ght againſt the Pagans; whereupon they likewiſe marched to the ſame ace, where finding the Daniſh Army ſtrongly fortified, they only be-eged Nottingham.] But (as Aſſer and Ingulph relate) the Chriſtians t being able to take either the Town or Caſtle, there was very little hting; ſo that the Mercians were forced to make Peace with the Pa-ns; whereupon the Danes marched back again into the Kingdom of rthumberland. & this year also [illegible]

Anno Dom. DCCCLXVIII.

The ſame Year Aſſer (in his Life of K. Alfred) tells us, That the ing married the Daughter of Æthelred the Ealdorman of the Gaini, i.e. of e Country about Gainesburrough in Yorkſhire.

[illegible] places his death in 870.

'But the next Year, the Daniſh Army returned again to York, and there ſtayed Twelve Months; and now there was alſo a great Mortality oth of Men, and Beaſts.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXIX.

But we cannot here omit the Relation of Mat. Weſtminſter under this ear, concerning what the Danes did before they left the North of Eng-nd, where he ſays, they ſlew both Old and Young, not ſparing the ives or Chaſtities ſo much as of the Nuns, where he gives us a ſtrange xample of an Heroick (if not too Great a) Love of Chaſtity; for Ebba, (afterwards Sainted,) then Abbeſs of Coldingham Nunnery ~~in York-~~ire, being more afraid of the loſs of her Virginity, than her Life, cal-ing her Nuns into the Chapter-houſe, there made a Speech to them, ſet-ing forth the Luſt and Cruelty of the Danes, and alſo exhorting them o follow her Example in avoiding it; which they all promiſing to obſerve, he then took a Razour and cut off her own Noſe and upper Lip, in which ſhe was immediately followed by all the Siſters; which being done, thoſe cruel Tyrants, Hinguar and Hubba, coming thither the next day, together with their Forces, and ſeeing ſo horrible a Spectacle, they not only ran out of the Monaſtery and left them, but alſo gave order to their Followers, that they ſhould ſet the Houſe on fire, which they forthwith did; ſo it was burnt to Aſhes, together with the Abbeſs, and all her Nuns, who thought themſelves happy in thus ſuffering Martyrdom for the preſervation of that which was dearer to them than their Lives. Nor did they diſcharge their Fury upon this Nunnery alone, but upon all the reſt of the Monaſteries of the Northumbrian Kingdom, having not long before deſtroyed the Monaſteries and Church of Lindiſfarne, with thoſe of Girwy and Weremuth, beſides the famous Nunneries of Streanſhale and Tinmuth; moſt of which were never rebuilt, and thoſe that were, not till ſeveral Ages after. But to proceed with our Annals. In the Peterborough Copy, it follows thus:

'Then the Danes quitting the North, and mounting themſelves on 'Horſeback, marched through Mercia into Eaſt England, and took up 'their Winter Quarters at Theodford; the ſame Winter King Eadmund 'fought with them, but the Danes gained the Victory, and ſlew that holy 'King, and deſtroying all the Monaſteries that lay in their way, they 'wholly conquered that Kingdom. The Names of the Princes who 'ſlew him were Higwais and Ubba, (whom other Writers call Hinguar

Anno Dom. DC.CLXX.

‘ and Hubba.) At the ſame time alſo they came to Medeſhamſtead, which ‘ Monaſtery they burnt and deſtroyed, killing the Abbots and Monks, ‘ with all the Men they found there, carrying away all the rich Spoil of ‘ that place.

But ſince the Saxon Annals are very ſhort in this Relation, I ſhall give you from Ingulph a more particular Account of what they did this Year in their march into Eaſt England, who further adds; That Winter being ended, the Danes took Shipping and went into Lindiſſe in Lincolnſhire, and landing at Humberſtan, ſpoiled all that Country, at which time that famous and ancient Monaſtery of Bardney was deſtroyed, the Monks and all others being ſlain in the Church without Mercy; and when they had there ſtayed, waſting the Country for the whole Summer: About Michaelmas they did the like to the Country of Keſteven, in the ſame Province, where they committed the ſame Murders and Deſolations.

The ſame Year, in the Month of September, Count Algar drew together all the Youth of Hoyland (now called Holland) in Lincolnſhire, with two Knights his Seneſcals, Wibert, and Leofric, who marched in the Head of them, together with a brave Body of 200 Men belonging to Croyland Abbey, who being all ſtout Fellows, were led by one Toly, then a Monk, but formerly a famous Souldier among the Mercians; theſe taking with them about 300 ſtout and warlike Men more from Deping, Lanioft, and Boſton, to whom alſo joyned Morchar, Lord of Branne, with his ſtrong and numerous Family, and being met by the Sheriff of Lincoln, a valiant and ancient Souldier, with the Lincolnſhire Forces, all which muſtering together in Keſteven on St. Maurice's Day, they joyned Battle with the Pagans, where GOD gave them the Victory, three Kings being ſlain, with a very great multitude of Souldiers; the Chriſtians purſued the Pagans to their very Camp, where finding a ſtout Reſiſtance, Night at laſt parted them, and the Earl drew back his Army.

But it ſeems there returned that Night to the Daniſh Camp all the reſt of the Princes of that Nation, who dividing the Country among them, had marched out to plunder; their names are Barbarous, and too long to be repeated, but their chief Kings were Godrum and Baſſeg, and their Earls or Leaders, Hingar and Hubba, with others, who then returned with great Forces, and a multitude of Captives, and a great deal of Spoil; and their coming being known, the greateſt part of the Chriſtians ſtruck with terrour fled away; whil'ſt thoſe that were left, early in the Morning, after hearing Divine Service, and receiving the Sacrament, being reſolved to dye for Chriſt, and in Defence of their Country, marched into the Field againſt their Enemies; but the Earl perceiving his Forces to be too much weaken'd appointed Fryer Toly with his Five Hundred Men to Fight in the Right Wing, becauſe they were the ſtrongeſt; and Earl Morchar with thoſe who followed him, as alſo the Sheriff of Lincoln making other Five Hundred in the Left Wing; whileſt he with his Seneſcals kept the main Body, as ready to help either Wing if there were occaſion; but the Danes being now enraged at the ſlaughter of their Men, having buried their Three Kings at a place, which is thence called Trekingham; afterwards 2 Kings and 8 Counts marched out, whilſt the reſt guarded the Camp, and Captives; but the Chriſtians, becauſe of their ſmaller Number, drawing themſelves up in one Body, made with their Shields a ſtrong Teſtudo againſt the force of their Enemies

Anno Dom. DCCCLXX.

Arrows, and kept off the Horſe with their Pikes; and thus being well ordered by their Commanders, they kept their Ground the whole day: But thô they remained unbroken till night, and had ſtill withſtood the force of their Enemies Arrows, but their Horſes being then tired, began to flag; the Pagans feigning a Flight, on purpoſe ſeemed to quit the Field, which the Chriſtians perceiving, althô their Commanders forbad and oppoſed it, yet nevertheleſs breaking their Ranks, were all diſperſed through the Plain without any Order or Command; but the Pagans returning like Lions upon a Flock of Sheep, made a great Slaughter amongſt them; whilſt the ſtout Count Algar, and Frier Toly, with ſome Souldiers, getting upon a riſing Ground, and being drawn up into a round Body, did for a long time endure the Pagans Inſults; and when the ſaid Earl and other Captains ſaw the ſtouteſt Men of their ſmall Army ſlain, they got upon the thickeſt heaps of the Chriſtian dead Bodies, and there being reſolved to ſell their Lives as dear as they could, they fell down dead, having received many Wounds; only a few young Men of Sutton and Gedeney flinging away their Arms, fled into a Neighbouring Wood, and ſo eſcaping, came the Night following to the Monaſtery of Croyland, and there related the ſlaughter of the Chriſtians, and the loſs of their whole Company: which when they had told at the Church door with great lamentations, the Abbot and Monks, being extreamly confounded at this ill news, reſolved to keep only with them the Elder Monks, and ſome few Children, to provoke compaſſion, and ſo ſent away all the Younger Men, together with the Reliques, Jewels, and Charters of their Monaſteries, by Boat to the Wood of Ancarig, adjoining to their Iſland; where they ſtaid with one Foret an Anchorite Four days, being Thirty in number, whereof Ten were Prieſts: But the Abbot having hid the reſt of the Plate; with the rich Table of the Altar, and put on his Sacred Veſtments, and had with his Brethren ſaid Maſs, and communicated; they had ſcarce finiſhed all this when the Pagans breaking into the Church, ſlew Abbot Theodore at the Altar, who periſhed by the hands of their King Oketule, all the reſt as well Old Men as Children, being alſo ſlain, except one handſome Boy of about Ten Years Old, who (being intended for a Monk) was ſaved by Count Sidroc the Younger, and ſtripping him of his Habit, put on him a Daniſh Coat, ordering him to follow him where ever he went, and ſo the Boy ſticking cloſe to him, his Life was ſaved, and he alone eſcaping, gave a relation of what he had ſeen; but the Danes, when they had broke open the Tombs of St. Guthleak, and the Princes there buried, and finding no more Plunder, ſet the Church on Fire, and burnt the dead bodies that were in it together.

So likewiſe of the deſtruction of the Monaſtery of Medeſhamſtead, this Author hath given us a larger account than what we find in this Copy of the Annals, viz. That four days after the deſtruction of Croyland, the Danes march'd towards that Monaſtery, where finding the Gates lock'd, they began to make an aſſault upon it; but receiving a Repulſe, at the ſecond Aſſault, Tuba the Brother of Count Hubba being knocked down with a Stone, was carried off for Dead, whereat Hubba was ſo enraged, that breaking into the Monaſtery he ſlew all the Monks that came in his way, whileſt the reſt of them deſtroyed the others, till at laſt all periſhed, ſo that in ſhort, the Monaſtery was wholly deſtroyed, and the Church, Anno Dom. DCCCLXX. together with a noble Library of Books, and all its Charters were reduced to Aſhes.

But the fourth day after this the Pagan Army having got together all the ſpoil they could, marched toward Huntington; but in their way thither, as the two Counts Sidrocs brought up the Rear of the Army, which had now paſſed the River Nene, two Waggon loads of rich moveables happened to be ſunk in the Ford, as alſo the Beaſts that drew them, in getting out of which, whileſt Sidroc and his Men were buſied, the Boy Turgar ſlipped away into the next Wood, and walking all Night about break of Day he got to Croyland, where he found the Monks returned again, and buſie in quenching the Fire, as well as they could; to whom he related all that had happened, and diſcovering where the body of the Abbot and moſt of the Monks lay, they removed the rubbiſh, and buried them, and then having choſen Godric, one of the Monks that eſcaped, for their Abbot, they were reſolved to go and do the like Pious Office for the late Prior and Monks of Medeſhamſtead, where arriving, they buried the Bodies of above fourſcore Monks in one Grave in the Church-yard, placing over them a Pyramidal Stone of about a Yard high, whereon were carved the Images of the Abbot and Monks about him, which was then to be ſeen in Ingulph's time.

In the mean time the Britains ſpoiling the Country as far as Grant-bridge (now Cambridge,) they then fell upon, and burnt the famous Nunnery of Ely, killing all that were therein both Men and Women, and carrying away a great deal of Riches, which had been brought thither from all parts for their better ſecurity; from whence they paſſed over into the Country of the Eaſt-Angles, where they ſlew Earl Wulketule coming againſt them, and making a ſtout reſiſtance with his ſmall Forces, from whence they marched againſt King Edmund himſelf, of whoſe Life and Martyrdom, I ſhall out of Aſſer's Annals, give you a particular account; and thô I will not paſs my word for the truth of all his Relation, being written after the manner of the Legends of thoſe times, yet the ſubſtance of it is no doubt true, and the reſt may ſerve, if not to inſtruct, yet at leaſt to divert the Readers.

But before I proceed to the Story of the Martyrdom of this King, it may not be amiſs to relate the occaſion, why the Danes invaded the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles, and put King Edmund ſo cruelly to Death, which ſtory thô it be not very probable; yet ſince it is found in Mat. Weſtminſters Flores Hiſtoriarum, I will from thence repeat it in as few words as I can, being to this effect; That in the Kingdom of Denmark there was one Lothbrook, who being deſcended from the Royal Family, had by his Wife two Sons, Inguar and Hubba: Lothbrook going to Sea by himſelf, in a Boat, with only a Hawke on his Fiſt, to ſeek for Game in a Neighbouring Iſland, being taken by a ſudden and violent Storm, was toſſed up and down for ſeveral Days, till at laſt he was by the Wind and Tide driven upon the Coaſt of that Country, we now call Northfolk; where being found alone with his Hawk, he is preſented to Edmund the King, and being kindly received for the comlineſs of his Perſon, continued in his Court, and told the King the Tale of his ſtrange Fortune, and often went out in the Field for his Recreation, with Beorn the King's Huntſman, being extraordinarily dexterous both in Hunting and Fowling; for this Reaſon, this Huntſman greatly envied him, Anno Dom. DCCCLXX.

and as they two were hunting together alone, he ſecretly murdered him, and hid his Body in a Wood. Now Lothebroc kept a Greyhound, which was exceedingly fond of him, and the Huntſman being gone away with the reſt of the Dogs, he ſtayed there alone by his Maſter's Body; next day, when the King asked for Lothebroc, Beorn anſwered, That the day before he ſtayed in the Wood, and ſince that he had not ſeen him. But behold, the Greyhound comes to Court, and fawning upon the King, as well as others, as ſoon as he had filled his Belly, again departed; till doing this often, he was followed to the place by ſome of the King's Servants, who there found out the Body, and brought the Relation of it to the King: The Matter being examined, and found out, the Huntſman is ſentenced to be put into the ſame Boat in which Lothebroc arrived, without any Oars or Tackling; in which, after a few days, (ſurely the Boat knew its way,) he was caſt upon the Coaſt of Denmark, where being brought to Lothebroc's Sons, and by them examined what was become of their Father, whoſe Boat they ſufficiently knew, he affirmed, That he was killed by Edmund, King of the Eaſt Angles; Whereupon they prepare a Navy, and paſſing into England, landed firſt in the Northern Parts, and, as was ſaid before, they grievouſly haraſs'd the Country of the Northumbers, and having brought it under Subjection, Hinguar quits his Company, and with a great Fleet ſailed to Eaſt England, where King Edmund Reigned.

But Saxo Grammaticus gives us quite another Account of the Death of theſe Prince's Father, whom he calls Regner, viz. That he was taken Priſoner in Ireland, and there killed in Priſon by Snakes, where none, you muſt know, ever were, a Story altogether as probable as the former; ſo I have here given you, from ſeveral Authors, two different Accounts of the Reaſon of the Danes invading England, and ſhall leave it to the Reader to believe one, or neither, ſince as they cannot both be true, ſo neither of them ſeem very probable.

This King Edmund had now Reigned five Years with great Affection of his Subjects, for, being a Prince of great Hopes, he ~~was~~ by the Unanimous Favour, and Conſent of the People of that Province, not only Elected, but rather forced to Rule over them. He had a Majeſtick Meen that became a King, and in his Countenance appeared a certain Air of Piety mixed with Meekneſs and Devotion. It was indeed but a ſhort time he Reigned, but in that time he did by his Charity to the Poor, and his Care over Widows and Orphans, perform all the Duties of a Pious Man, as well as of a Good King.

But to come to the Story it ſelf: The Danes, having now ſpoiled the Country, and routed the King's Army, as you have heard, came on a ſudden upon a certain City, and taking it by Surpriſe, they killed the Inhabitants, and raviſhed the Women, ſparing neither Age nor Sex; but when they had pretty well ſatiated their Fury, Hinguar their Captain examined ſome of the ordinary People that were left alive, where their King uſed to reſide; but here our Author ſuppoſes the King to have never yet reſiſted them, and therefore that they would firſt ſeize on him, to prevent him from raiſing any Forces againſt them; which is not at all likely, eſpecially ſince the Saxon Annals tell us expreſly, that King Edmund had already fought againſt him, and been put to flight: But this ſeems more probable, that the King being then fled to one of his Houſes in the Country, called Hegleſdune, was by the Danes diſcovered: Whereupon Hinguar ſent one of his Servants on a Meſſage to him, the Subſtance Anno Dom. DCCCLXX. ſtance of which was, ‘ That Earl Hinguar, his Lord, commanded him to ‘ deliver up all his Treaſures, and that he ſhould ſubmit himſelf and his ‘ Kingdom to his Power, which if he refuſed to do, he ſhould then be ‘ deprived both of his Kingdom and Life. To which the King anſwered, That he would never renounce the Vow he had made in Baptiſm, and being made King by the General Conſent of the whole People, he was reſolved never to do any thing to the Prejudice of the Common-weal of the English Nation, nor ever to ſubmit his Neck to any Yoke but that of Chriſt, whoſe Example he now intended to imitate, and by his Grace would Suffer for his Name: And ſo he bid the Meſſenger return, and tell this to his Maſter. It ſeems the King had no ſooner finiſhed what he had to ſay, but as the Meſſenger was going back with this Anſwer, Hinguar himſelf met him, to whom having told what the King had ſaid, he immediately commanded his Men to enter the Palace, and to lay hold of none but the King, and He, being there ſoon found, was immediately tied, and brought before the Captain, who commanded him firſt to be cruelly beaten, and then bound to a Neighbouring Tree, to be inhumanly whipped; all which he manfully endured, ſtill calling on the Name of Chriſt: Whereat his Enemies being enraged, in a moſt barbarous manner ſhot his Body ſo full of Arrows, that it ſeemed capable of receiving no more; yet none of the Wounds killing him outright, Hinguar at laſt commanded one of his Souldiers to cut off his Head; which our Author deſcribes with a great deal of Monkiſh Eloquence: This being done, and leaving his Body there, they carried away the Head along with them, that ſo it might not be buried with it; but at laſt they flung it into a Wood, (which John of Tinmouth, in his Hiſtoria Aurea, calls Heglesdun;) but the People, after they were gotten out of their Hiding-places, began to look for it, and having long ſearched up and down the Wood, they at length heard the Head when they cried out to one another, Where are you? Anſwer (in Engliſh,) Here, here: Nor ceaſed repeating thoſewords, till they came where it lay. As for this part of the Story, it ſounds ſo like a Legend, that I ſhall leave it to be ſwallowed by thoſe who are apt to be taken with ſuch Things. I have no more to add, but that King Edmund Suffered on the 12th of the Kal. of December, in the Year above-mentioned: But enough in Conſcience, if not too much, of this King's Martyrdom, who had afrerwards a Church and Monaſtery erected to his Memory, as you will find when you come to it; for it is certain, the Engliſh Saxons attributed as great Sanctity to this, as to any of their ancient Saints, and had as great a Belief of his Miracles, his Body being preſerved uncorrupt (whether by Art or Miracle I ſhall not determine) for many Ages after.

I have no more to Remark under this Year, ‘ but that now Ceolnoth the ‘ Arch-Biſhop deceaſed, and Ethelred Biſhop of Wiltun-ſcire was Elected ‘ Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury in his ſtead.

Alſo that the Town of Dunmoc, being now deſtroyed by the Danes, Helmham in Norfolk continued to be the ſole Biſhop's See for the Kingdom of the Eaſt Angles, till it was long after removed to Norwich.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXI. This Year (as both Aſſer and the Saxon Annals relate) the Army of the Danes leaving the Eaſt Angles, marched into the Weſt Saxon Kingdom, and came to a Town of the King's called Reading, lying on the South ſide of Thames, in that County which was then called Bearrockſhire, (now Berkſhire;) and the third Day after their coming, divers of their Commanders rid out with great part of their Forces to Plunder, whilſt the reſt remained behind to caſt up a Trench between the two Rivers, Thames and Kynton, on the right ſide of the Town, whom Earl Æthelwulf with his Forces met at Englefeild in that County, where it was ſtoutly fought on both ſides; but after a long Battle, one of the Counts Sydrock being ſlain, and a great part of his Army routed, the reſt eſcaping by flight, the Chriſtians got the Victory, and kept the Field. And four Days after, King Æthered and Ælfred his Brother joyning their Forces together, marched to Reading, and when they came to the Caſtle, they killed and deſtroyed all the Danes whom they found without the Gates; but they within did not make a leſs obſtinate Reſiſtance, for ſallying out, the Fight became very ſharp on both ſides, in ſo much that the Chriſtians were at laſt forced to turn their Backs, and the Pagans gained the Victory, and there Earl Æthelwulf above-mentioned was ſlain amongſt the reſt; with which the Chriſtians being much provoked, 4 days after they fought with them again at a place called Æſceſdune (now Aſton) in Berkſhire, when the Pagans divided themſelves into two equal Bodies, for they had then two Kings, beſides many Earls; ſo they allotted one part of the Army to the two Kings, and the other to the Earls; which the Chriſtians perceiving, they likewiſe did the ſame with their Army: But Elfred came ſooner into the Field with his Men, than did the King his Brother; for (as Aſſer tells us) he had heard from thoſe that were there, that the King was then in his Tent hearing Maſs, and poſitively affirming, that he would not depart thence till it was finiſhed, which he made good; and this Piety of the King's was thought to prevail much with God, for the Chriſtians had reſolved that King Ethered with his Forces ſhould maintain the Fight againſt the two Pagan Kings, whilſt Ælfred his Brother, with his Detachment, ſhould oppoſe the Earls. And now both Armies being drawn up in Battle Array, whilſt the King ſtayed ſomewhat long at his Prayers, Prince Ælfred, then his Brother's Lieutenant, was not ſtrong enough alone to ſuſtain all the Pagan Forces, for thô he ſaw he muſt either Retreat, or elſe Engage the Enemy before his Brother's coming up, which ſtill the King delayed, yet the Prince (truſting on the Divine Aſſiſtance, and) having put his Men in good Order, preſently marched againſt the Enemy, who had much the Advantage of him, by reaſon of the higher Ground they had got. There was alſo in the ſame Field a ſingle Thorn Tree, (which Aſſer ſays he himſelf had ſeen,) about which the Enemies Troops were all drawn up; but when they had both bloudily fought for a long time, the Pagans being no longer able to withſtand the Chriſtians Arms, a great part of their Troops was ſlain, and the reſt ſaved themſelves by flight, leaving behind them dead upon the place one of their Kings called Bachſeg, and ſeveral other great Men, with many Thouſands of common Souldiers, needleſs here to be particularly mentioned; but this King here called Bachſeg, the Daniſh Hiſtory names Ivar, the Son of Reynere; ſo the reſt of their Army fled that night to the Caſtle of Reading above-mentioned, whither the Chriſtians following killed them as long as day-light would permit.

But thô Aſſer, the Writer of King Alfred's Life and Actions, hath for his Honour attributed the whole Succeſs of this Battle to that Prince; yet it is more probable what the Manuſcript, called Scala Chronica, (cited by Mr. Speed,) relates, That when Prince Ælfred's Men, being now ſpent, Anno Dom. DCCCLXXI.

were ready to Retreat, King Ethered came into the Battle from his Prayers; and ſo well ſeconded his Brother with freſh Forces, that renewing the Fight, the Victory (the greateſt they had ever yet obtained) was chiefly owing to their Valour.

But Fifteen Days after this, King Æthered, with his Brother Ælfred, marched again towards Baſing to fight the Enemy, where another Battle happened, and the Pagans, making there an obſtinate Reſiſtance, obtain'd the Victory, and kept the Field; after which Fight, a freſh Army of Pagans coming from beyond Sea, joyned themſelves to the former.

But here the Saxon Annals further add, 'That about two Months after 'this, King Æthered and Ælfred his Brother, fought again with the Pagans 'at Meretune (~~now~~ nr Berks Merton, in Surrey) where the Army being divided into 'two Parts, at firſt put the Enemy to the Rout, and had the better for 'a great part of the day; yet at laſt, after a mighty ſlaughter, the Danes 'kept the Field, and there was ſlain Biſhop Heamund, with abundance 'of brave Men.

After this Battle, during the whole Summer following, the Danes remained in quiet at Reading; but the ſame Year King Æthered, having now for five Years ſtoutly and nobly Govern'd his Kingdom, thô with many Troubles, deceaſed, and was buried in the Monaſtery of Winburne in Dorſetſhire. But thô the Chronicle that goes under the Name of Abbot Bromton, (from I know not what Authority,) relates this King to have died of the Wounds which he had received in a Fight againſt one Somerled, a Daniſh King, who had newly deſtroyed the Town of Reading; and the Inſcription on this King's Tomb at Winborne, (cited by * Mr. Camde in his Britannia,) relates him to be ſlain by the Danes; yet ſince neither Aſſer, Ingulph, the Saxon Annals, nor William of Malmesbury, mention any ſuch thing, and that the Inſcription it ſelf is but Modern, I rather ſuppoſe him to have died a natural Death of the Plague, which then reigned.

* Tit. Dorſetſhire.

This King is ſaid, by the Annals of Ireland, to have had a Daughter named Thyra, married to Gormun, King of the Danes, who on her begat Sweyn, the Father of King Cnute. This Ethered had alſo ſeveral Sons, as Alfred, ſuppoſed to be Grandfather to Ethelwerd, called Quæſtor the Hiſtorian; as alſo Oſwald, who his Father mentions in his Charter to the Abbey of Abingdon.

King ÆLFRED, otherwiſe called ALFRED.

Immediately after King Ethered's Death, (as Aſſer relates,) Prince Alfre (who, during the Lives of his three Brothers, had been only their Deputy, or Lieutenant,) now by the General Conſent of the whole Kingdom took the Government upon him, which he might have had if he pleaſed during their Life-time, ſince he exceeded them all both in Wiſdom and Courage; ſo that indeed he Reigned almoſt whether he would or no. But before the firſt Month of his Reign was at an end, he, truſting on the Divine Aſſiſtance, marched his Army (thô but few in compariſon of the Pagans) to Wilton, lying on the South ſide of the River Willie, (from which both the Town and Country take their Names, where it was valiantly fought on both ſides for great part of the day, till the Pagans not being able any longer to endure the Force and Valour of the Engliſh, began to turn their Backs, but then finding the Number of the Purſuers to be ſmall, they rallied, and obtaining the Victory, kept the Field.

N

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXI.

Nor let this ſeem ſtrange to any, that will but conſider how ſmall the Number of the Chriſtians were, in compariſon of the Pagans; for the Engliſh had in the ſpace of one Year fought 8 or 9 Battles againſt them, beſides innumerable Skirmiſhes which King Alfred, or his Commanders, had with them, wherein thô they loſt one King and nine Earls, or Principal Commanders; yet receiving ſuch frequent Recruits from beyond Sea, whilſt the Saxons every day grew weaker, it is no Wonder if they prevailed; yet notwithſtanding Aſſer, and the Saxon Annals, tell us, That this Year there was a Peace made with the Danes, upon condition that they would depart the Kingdom; which they for the preſent obſerved, but to little purpoſe.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXII.

For the next Year, (as the ſame Author tells us,) the Danes having landed again, marched from Reading to London, and there took up their Winter-Quarters; and the Mercians were forced to make Peace with them.

Alſo this Year, (according to the Chronicle of Mailroſs, and Simeon of Durham,) the Northumbers expelled Egbert their King, and Wulſher Arch-Biſhop of York, who both (as Mat. Weſtminſter relates) flying to Bertulph King of the Mercians, were by him honourably received.

About the ſame time (according to Caradoc's Chronicle) alſo died Gwgan, King or Prince of Cardigan, who, as ſome Britiſh Chronicles relate, was drowned by misfortune; and at the ſame time the Danes deſtroyed the Town of Alcluid in Scotland.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXIII.

'This Year the Daniſh Army leaving the Countries about London, 'marched into the Kingdom of the Northumbers, and there Wintered in a 'place called Turſige (now Torſwick) in Lindſey, (which was then part of 'the Northumbrian Kingdom;) ſo that the Neighbouring Nations were 'again forced to renew their League with them.

And now alſo (according to Simeon of Durham) Egbert, King of Northumberland, dying, one Ricſige ſucceeded him, and Arch-Biſhop Wulſher was now reſtored to his Biſhoprick.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXIV.

'The next Year the Pagan Army leaving Lindiſſe, marched into Mer'cia, and wintered in a place called Hreoptun (now Repton) in Derby'ſhire, where they forced Burhred, King of the Mercians, to deſert his 'Kingdom, and paſs the Seas ~~to go~~ to Rome, where arriving, he lived 'not long, but there dying in the 22d Year of his Reign, he was honou'rably buried at the Engliſh School or College in the Church of St. Mary 'thereunto belonging. The Danes, after his Expulſion, brought the 'whole Kingdom of Mercia under their Dominion, and then delivered it 'to one Ceolwulf, an inconſiderable Fellow, and Servant of the late King, 'upon this miſerable Condition, That he ſhould deliver it up to them 'again whenſoever they required it; and for this he gave Hoſtages, 'ſwearing to obey them in all Things.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXV.

'Now the Daniſh Army leaving Hreoptun, became divided into two; and 'Halfden their Commander marched with one part of it into the King'dom of Northumberland, and there took up his Winter-Quarters near the 'River Tine, where they conquered the whole Country, and alſo ſpoiled 'the Country between the Picts and the Stræcled Welſh-men, (who then 'inhabited part of Galloway in Scotland,) whilſt another party of the~~m~~ Danes, un'der the Command of Godrun, Oskytel, and Amwynd, (three of their 'Kings,) marched to Grantbridge, and there Wintered: And the ſame Sum'mer King Ælfred fought at Sea againſt ſeven of their Ships, and took one 'of them, the reſt eſcaping. ; this year also [illegible] King of Cornwall was drowned, but the welsh Chronicle but relates [illegible] not telling us how it happened. This Anno Dom. DCCCLXXVI. This Year (as Aſſer and the Saxon Annals relate,) Rollo, the Dane or Norman, waſted Neuſtria, (afterwards called Normandy,) and, in ſome time after, made an entire Conqueſt of it: Aſſer alſo ſays, that this Rollo having had a Dream of a Swarm of Bees flying towards the South, he choſe to leave England, and go over into France; though, as other Authours affirm, it was becauſe he was ſo warmly received by King Alfred, that he did not like to ſtay here, but rather choſe to paſs into another Country of eaſier Conqueſt, as Normandy indeed proved, for he reigned there fifty Years.

The ſame Year (according to the Chronicle of Mailroſſe, and Simeon of Durham,) Ricſig, King of Northumberland, dying, another Egbert ſucceeded him; but we have no account of his Actions, more than that he reigned beyond Tyne as a Tributary to the Danes, who poſſeſſed all the reſt of the Country, as you will find by the Saxon Annals

For The ſame Year, (~~accordingly~~) the Danes ſtealing away by 'Night from Grantbridge, (where they had long encamped,) marched 'to Werham, (now Warham in Dorſetſhire,) being then a ſtrong Caſtle of 'the Weſt-Saxons; this place they took, and deſtroyed, together with the 'Nunnery there; then paſſing higher, as into a ſecure Harbour, they 'drew up all their Ships, ſo that now King Alfred was reduced to ſuch 'great ſtreights, that he was forced to make Peace with him; and they 'gave the King for Pledges ſome of the Nobleſt Perſons in their Army, 'and took an Oath upon a ſacred Bracelet they had, (which Oath they 'would never take to any Nation before,) that they would preſently 'depart the Kingdom; but in the mean while, that part of the Army, 'which had Horſes, ſtole away to Exanceaſter, (now Exeter,) whereupon the King put all their Hoſtages to Death.

'The ſame Year in the Month of Auguſt, Healfden the Daniſh King 'divided the Kingdom of the Northumbers among his People, who now 'ſettling there, ploughed and ſowed; from whence the Danes date their 'Reign over that Kingdom. But the Year following, Anno Dom. DCCCLXXVII The Danes having left Werham, and come to Exeter, (as you have already heard,) their Fleet in the mean time fetching a compaſs, ſailing towards the Weſt, (I ſuppoſe to Exmouth) there aroſe ſo violent a Storm, as that 120 of their Ships were caſt away near Swanawic, (now Swanwick in Hampſhire;) then King Ælfred followed that part of the Army as far as Exeter, thô he could not overtake them, till they had got into the Caſtle, which proved ſo ſtrong, that no body could come at them; but he ſtreightning them there, they gave him what Hoſtages he required, and took freſh Oaths, and for a ſmall time obſerved the league they had made; yet nevertheleſs in the Month of Auguſt following, the ſame Daniſh Army marched into the Province of the Mercians, where, dividing part of it between themſelves, they left the reſt to Ceolwulf above mentioned.

About this time alſo, according to Caradoc's Chronicle, the Engliſh, having entred Wales the Year before, fought a Bloody Battel with the Welſhmen, though this Authour neither tells who were the Commanders, nor who had the Victory; and the Year following there was another Battel between them, wherein Rodorick, Sirnamed The Great, King or Prince of Wales, and Gwyriad his Brother, or (as ſome ſay,) his Son, were ſlain.

This Rodorick had, by his Wiſe Engharaud, the Daughter of Prince Myric ſeveral Sons, as Anarawd his Eldeſt, to whom he gave Aberffraw, with North Wales: Cadelh the ſecond, to whom he left Dynevowr, with South-Wales; who alſo took by force Marthraval and Powyſland, after the Death of Mervyn the third Son; to whom their Father Rodorick had given the ſame; To which Dr. Powel likewiſe adds, That this Rodorick is eſteemed by all Writers, to be ſole King of all Wales; North-Wales deſcending to him from his Mother Eſylcht the Daughter and ſole Heir of Conan Tindaethwy; but South-Wales he had in Right of his Wife, the Daughter and Heir of Meyric ap Dyſnwal, King of Cardigan; Powis he had by Neſt, the Siſter and Heir of Congen ap Cadhel, King of Powis, his Father's Mother: Theſe three Dominions he appointed under their Meeres and Bounds, with a Princely Houſe in each of them. Theſe he had named Ytair Talaeth, and left them unto three of his Sons, Anarawd, Cadhel, and Mervyn, who were called Ytrit Twyſoc Talaethioc, that is, the three Crown'd Princes, becauſe each of them did wear upon his Bonnet, or Helmet, a Coronet of Gold, being a broad Lace or Head-band indented upwards, ſet and wrought with precious Stones; which, in the Britiſh or Welſh Speech, is called Talaeth; and to which Mr. Vaughan, in his Additional Notes to Caradoc's Hiſtory hath added, out of an ancient Welſh Manuſcript, That this Rodorick is ſaid to have corrected ſome of the old Britiſh Laws, and to have appointed new ones: He alſo ordained, that his Eldeſt Son ſhould have the Crown, or Coronet of Aberffraw, with the Fifteen Cantreds thereunto belonging. This Aberffraw is now a ſmall Village in the Iſle of Angleſey; and was anciently the chief Seat of the Princes of Guyneth, or North-Wales: He left to his ſecond the Crown or Coronet of Dinevowr or Cardigan, with its fifteen Cantreds, extending from the Mouth of the River Devi to the Mouth of Severne; and alſo that his Son ſhould have the Crown, or Coronet of Mathraval, with the Fifteen Cantreds of Powis, from the mouth of the River Dee, to the bridge over Severne at Glouceſter.

Anno Dom.
DCCCLXXVII.

He ordained alſo, That his Eldeſt Son, and his ſucceſſours ſhould continue the payment of the ancient tribute to the King of London, (i. e. King of England) and that the other two, their Heirs and Succeſſours, ſhould acknowledge his Sovereignty, and pay the like tribute to him and his Succeſſours; and that upon the Invaſions of Strangers, they ſhould all ſend him aid, and be alſo ready to protect them, when there ſhould be need.

Moreover he ordained, That when any difference ſhould ariſe between the Princes of Aberffraw, and Cardigan, the Three Princes ſhould meet at Bwlchy Pawl, and after hearing of Council on both ſides, the Prince of Powis ſhould be Umpire between them.

And if the difference were between the Kings of Aberffraw, and Powis, that they ſhould likewiſe all Three meet at Dolhrianedd, (perchance Morvarhianed, on the Bank of the River Dee) where the King of Cardigan was to end the Controverſie.

And if there ſhould be any difference between the Kings of Powis, and Cardigan, the meeting ſhould be at Llyſwen, upon the River Wy, and the King of Aberffraw to decide it.

This, thô it ſeems to have been as wiſe a courſe as could be taken to maintain amity in a divided Kingdom, yet did prove of no effect; for it ſeems the Princes of theſe Countries did not long obſerve this Conſtitution of their Anceſtour King Rodoric, but perpetually weakned each other with Civil Wars; ſo that the Engliſh taking advantage of their mutual diviſions, by aſſiſting the weaker Prince againſt the ſtronger; they they at laſt by degrees reduced them all under the Engliſh Dominion, ſhall be further ſhewn in its proper place.

About this time Anarawd, the Eldeſt Son of Rodorick above mention began his Reign over North-Wales.

This Year (according to Aſſer) the Danes ſtealing away privately af the Feaſt of Epiphany came to Cypenham, and having now got Horſes, march through all the Country of the Weſt-Saxons, and there began to fix th Quarters; forcing many of the Inhabitants beyond Sea, and ſubjecting t reſt of their Dominion, in ſo much that King Alfred was forced with few of his Nobles, and with ſome Souldiers and Vaſſals, to lu among the Woody and Boggy parts of Somerſet-ſhire, where he led very uneaſie Life, in great Trouble and Scarcity, having no Proviſion but what he could take away by frequent incurſions from the Enemies or elſe thoſe Chriſtians who had ſubmitted themſelves to their Dominion and it is found in the Life of St. Neot, as he lay hid with a certai Cow-herd, it happened one day, that as his Wife was making of Cakes the King ſate by the Fire, fitting up his Bow and Arrows, and othe Weapons; but when the Woman ſaw the Cakes which lay before th fire begin to burn, ſhe preſently ran and removed them, and chiding th King, (whom ſhe did not know,) ſaid thus, "Doeſt thou, Fellow think "much to turn theſe Cakes, which thou can'ſt eat faſt enough when they "are baked? At which the King laughing, took all in good part; but be the Story true or falſe, this much is certain, that the King lay at this time ſo private, that neither his Friends nor Enemies could tell where he was; in ſo much that all this while the Royal Patrimony became a prey, as well to the revolting Engliſh, as to the Danes themſelves.

But the Monkiſh writers of theſe times, (according to their uſual Cuſtom of interpreting all misfortunes to be God's Judgments) will needs have this to be a judgment upon this King, becauſe that in the beginning of his Reign, being taken up with the deſire of Learning, or elſe diverted by Hunting and other Juvenile Pleaſures; he had too much neglected the publick affairs; and that being admoniſhed by St. Neot, and refuſing to amend, the Holy Man foretold, there would be a time, when he ſhould be driven from his Kingdom, and from his own Houſe.

But be this as it will, whileſt King Alfred was thus over-powered by the great multitude of Danes that daily entred the Kingdom, he was forced to retreat; yet even then, being followed by a ſmall band of Stout and Loyal Souldiers, he often ſet upon the Enemies by ſurprize, and with ſo good ſucceſs, that he let them ſee, though he was overcome by numbers, yet he was not vanquiſhed, ſince he remained formidable even in his flight; but to this Retreat, the then Woody and Bogy parts of Somerſetſhire, between the Rivers Thone and Parret chiefly contributed, which were then almoſt an Iſland, and not to be enter'd without a Boat, unleſs by one narrow way, (as Leland in his Itinerary hath rightly obſerved) but Will. of Malmesbury tells us, That it is to no purpoſe to relate all the little Skirmiſhes and Adventures of this King, during his Retreat; only one paſſage will not be unpleaſant, whether it be true or falſe, it happen'd one Day that whil'ſt King Alfred lay private in a little Caſtle, or Fort, in the Wood Athelney, it being Winter time, and the Waters frozen up, he ſent out his followers to ſeek for ſome Fiſh or Fowle, whereby they might ſuſtain Nature, ſo that none were left at home, but himſelf ſelf and his Mother, (for it ſeems the Queen his Wife was either dead, or elſe lay concealed ſome where elſe;) but the King having to paſs away the time taken up a Book, and began to read, (as his cuſtom was, when he had nothing elſe to do) a certain poor Man knocked at the door, and begged an Alms; whereupon the King calling to his Mother, deſired her to ſee if there was any thing for him to eat; but ſhe told him, that there was no more than one Loaf left, and this would not be enough for the whole Company when they returned home; the King hearing this, ſaid no more, but let God be bleſſed for all his gifts, then praying his Mother, to beſtow half of it upon this poor Chriſtian, further added, that he who had fed 5000 Men with Five Loaves and Two ſmall Fiſhes, could alſo, if he pleaſed, make half a Loaf ſuffice their neceſſities; whereupon his Mother complying with his deſire, and the poor Man having got more than he looked for, went his way, but the King having read till he was tired, happened to fall aſleep, and dreamt that he ſaw St. Cuthbert (formerly Biſhop of Lindisfarne) coming to him, and telling him, that he was ſent from God to let him know, that he was now reſolved to put an end to the long and grievous puniſhments which the Engliſh had hitherto ſuffered for their Sins; and that the Alms which he had juſt now beſtowed, was ſo acceptable in his ſight, that he would reſtore him to his Kingdom, and ſaid, as a ſign of this, his Servants, who were then gone out a Fiſhing, thô with very ſmall hopes of catching any thing, ſhould return home ſo loaded, that he ſhould look upon it with wonder; but that which is more ſtrange, his Mother fell alſo a ſleep, and dreamed the like Dream at the ſame time, as ſhe told the King her Son when he awaked her; but whilſt they with great aſtoniſhment diſcourſed of this Miracle, his followers returned home, bringing Fiſh enough with them to have ſerved a little Army, if there had been occaſion.

Hist. Reg. Claid.

But be this Story true or falſe, it is certain that not long after, the King received news,*that Hinguar and Hubba, returning out of Wales, (where having made a great ſlaughter of the Britains, they had paſt the Winter) and being lately landed in Devon-ſhire with Twenty three Ships, there met with ſome of the King's party, by whom their Captain with, 1200 Souldiers were ſlain, near the Caſtle of Kenwith, the manner of which was thus; Odun, Earl of Devon-ſhire, with many others of the King's Subjects, upon the arrival of Hubba, had fled hither for refuge; but when the Danes knew the Caſtle was but weakly fortified, and they within were not provided of things neceſſary for a Siege; they then reſolved to ſit down before it, ſuppoſing that the Engliſh would quickly ſurrender for want of Proviſions; which they being alſo ſenſible of, were endeavouring to prevent, and reſolving either to obtain the Victory or dye; they ſallyed out early one Morning upon the Enemy, who lay Encamp'd without any good Guards, ſo falling upon them at unawares ſlew Hubba their Leader, with his whole Army, except a few who were forced to flee to their Ships.

Vid. Camdens Britan. Tit. Devonſhire.

And this Hubba being here buried under a heap of Stones, gave name to the place, being called Hubbeston ~~Hubbleſtones~~ to this day; but the Engliſh having ſtripped the dead bodies, they there found among the ſpoils, that famous Banner, called Reafan, (that is the Raven) being the Picture of a Raven embroidered by the Three Siſters of Hinguar, and Hubba, in one forenoon on purpoſe for this Expedition, and which being Enchanted by their Magic Arts, they put ſo great a confidence in it, that they believed if they were to meet with good ſucceſs, this figure would clap its Wings, as if it were alive, but if otherwiſe, would let them fall; but be this Story true or falſe, it ſeems they now loſt their Oracle before they had time to conſult it, and the loſs of it was certainly a great diſcouragement to them.

King Ælfred being now much encouraged with the news of this good ſucceſs of the Devon-ſhire-men, began to conſider how he might perform ſome worthy action againſt the Enemy; therefore this Year, (as the Saxon Annals relate,) 'having firſt fortified with his ſlender Forces a ſmall Caſtle or 'Fort at Ætheling-gaige (now called Athelney in Somerſetſhire) where he had reſided hitherto; he marched from thence the Seventh Week after, and with his Subjects and Vaſſals there, to fight againſt the Pagans; and it is alſo about this time, that we may place that memorable action of this King which is thus related by Ingulph, and Will. of Malmesbury, which if true, ſhews not only his great Courage, but Conduct too; for knowing the Enemy to exceed him in numbers, as well as other advantages, and that if he ſhould ſet upon them with open Force he would be able to do them little, or no prejudice, nor could he hope for any better ſucceſs, unleſs he knew in what condition the Enemie's Army was, and not having any one whoſe Sagacity or Fidelity he could well truſt, he was reſolved to go himſelf to ſpy out the Enemie's Camp: ſo taking upon him the Habit of a Country Minſtrel (or Fidler) he went with only one Companion into the Daniſh Camp, where he became ſo acceptable, as well for his Singing, as Playing, that at laſt he was introduced to the King's Tent, and when he had there, as well as in the reſt of the Daniſh Camp, learnt as much as he had a mind to know, he again returned to his Caſtle at Athelne; y where having called together all his chief followers, he related to them the careleſs condition of the Enemies Camp, and with what eaſe they might be deſtroyed: whereat they being extraordinarily ſurpriſed, he then reſolved to muſter up what Forces he could.

So the Seventh Week after Eaſter, he march'd to Ecgbyrth-ſtan (now ſuppoſed to be Brixſtan in Somerſet-ſhire,) lying on the Eaſt ſide of Selwood Foreſt, where met him all the Wilt-ſhire, Somerſet-ſhire and Hamptſhire Men; who were mightily pleaſed to behold their King after ſo many hazards; but ſtaying there only one night, he marched away to Iglay, (where the place was is not very well known,) and there encamped another night, at in which (as Aſſer relates) St. Neot, who had been formerly his Kinſman, and Friend, appeared to him in a Dream, and bid him not be afraid of the great Army of the Pagans, becauſe God would now have mercy upon him and his People; and that what had happen'd to him, was for his too great Arrogance in his Youth, and that God would Fight for him and his People: The King you may be ſure was much rejoyced at this Dream, and failed not to encourage his Men with it; ſo the next Morning removing his Camp from thence, he came in one Day more to Ethandune, (but where it is we cannot tell) where the Danes lay encamped, and marching againſt them in very cloſe order, he fought their whole Army, and though they did for a long time ſtoutly reſiſt the frequent charges the King's Men made upon them, yet at laſt they gave ground, and beginning to flye he obtained a notable Victory, making a great ſlaughter of the Pagans, as they retreated to a certain Caſtle not far off, and at which they lay encamped, where the King beſieged them for Fourteen Days; till being overcome by hunger, they were reduced to that neceſſity, as to deſire Peace on theſe Conditions, That the King ſhould receive from them what Hoſtages He ſhould name, but He not to return any to them; ſo they made ſuch a Peace with him, as they had never done with any King before; for they ſwore that they would depart his Kingdom, and that Gythram (or Gutrum) their King ſhould become a Chriſtian, all which was performed, for about Three Weeks after the ſaid King with about Thirty more of his Chief Noblemen came to the King, being then at Alrey (the place is now unknown) only that it lay near Athelney above-mentioned, where King Alfred receiving him from the Font at his Baptiſm, became his Godfather, and took him for his adopted Son: But he did not receive the Chriſme till Eight Days after, at a Town of the Kings called Wedmore, where he ſtaid with him for the ſpace of Twelve Days, who preſented him, and all thoſe that accompanied him, not only with Money, but Houſes and Lands, being now reſolved to fix here.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXIX.

So this next Year the Danes (according to their promiſe) removed from Cippenham (i. e. Chippenham in Wiltſhire) to Cirenceaſter, and there ſtaid one Year.

But now another Army of Pagans, arriving from beyond the Sea, ſailed up the River Thames, to whom (notwithſtanding their former Oaths) the Army that was here before alſo join'd, and took up their Winter Quarters at Fullanham (now Fulham, not far from London,) ‘and the ſame Year (according to the Annals) the Sun was Eclipſed for one whole hour; alſo now part of the Pagans who had quartered at Cirenceſter, (as ſay the Annals and Aſſer) marched from thence under the Conduct of King Gythrum, into the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles; and dividing the Country among them, began to inhabit it; which, having been in their poſſeſſion ever ſince the Death of King Edmund, King Alfred now yielded up to their King Gythram; ‘but thoſe Danes who had before ſtaid at Fulham, now ſailed into Frankland, and quartered at Ghent for one whole Year; from whence you may obſerve, that what we now call Flanders was then accounted part of France, or Frankland.

Vid. Lambard's Archaionom.

And to this time we may alſo refer, that League or Agreement made between King Alfred and King Guthram, which ſets out the Territories of each of theſe Princes.

‘The Firſt Article is, That it is agreed that the Limits of K. Alfred's Land are firſt upon the Thames, then proceed they to the River Lee, as far as his Fountain; then ſtraight to Bedford, and then along the River Ouſe, as far as Watling-ſtreet; which I ſuppoſe, is thus to be underſtood; that K. Alfred did hereby grant him Eaſt-England and Eſſex; ſo that the bounds of theſe Kings Dominions were firſt the Thames, then the River Lee, as far as Harford, whereabouts it ariſes: Then from Harford to Bedford, all along Watling-ſtreet, and then from Bedford all along the Ouſe to the Sea.

‘The Second Article appoints the value of a Man ſlain, whether Engliſh or Dane, to be four Marks of pure Gold, and the Redemption of each Four hundred Shillings.

‘But if the King's Servant or Thane was accuſed of Man-ſlaughter; the Third Article proceeds, That he then ſhould be tried by Twelve

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXIX.

‘other of the King's Servants; or in caſe he was not the King's Servant, but belonged to ſome inferiour Lord, he ſhould be tried by eleven of his Equals, and by one of the King's Servants. The ſame Order was taken in all Suits, which exceeded four Marks; but in caſe he refuſed to undergo this Trial, his Fine was to be encreaſed threefold.

‘The Fourth appoints Vouchers for the Sale of Men, Horſes, or Oxen.

‘The Fifth and Laſt Ordains, That none from either Army ſhould paſs to the other without Leave; and in caſe it be by way of Traffick, ſuch ſhall find Sureties for their good Behaviour, that the Peace may not be broken.

‘This was the League it ſelf, with ſome other Articles needleſs to be here recited; the Preface to which declares, That it was made betwixt the two Kings, Alfred and Gythrum, (ſo the Saxon Original,) by Conſent of all the Wiſe Men of the Engliſh, and of all thoſe that inhabited Eaſt England, and that not only in behalf of themſelves, but of their Poſterity.

This ſufficiently ſhews, that the Eaſtern Parts of England then belonged to the Danes; yet Polydore Virgil calling this King by the Name of Gormon, vehemently contends, that he had not that Country beſtowed upon him. Krantzius alſo denies, that this Gormon was converted to the Faith; yet confeſſes, that about this time one Froto was converted: But whatever they write, this League ſufficiently evinceth the Diſtinction of their Territories, and the Teſtimony of Aſſer is uncontrollable as to his Baptiſm, who lived himſelf at this very time, not to mention that the Saxon Annals alſo affirm the ſame thing.

After which follow the Eccleſiaſtical Laws, ſaid in their Title to be made between King Alfred and King Gythrum, as they are to be found in Abbot Brompton's Chronicle.

The Firſt of which is, That the Danes and Engliſh ſhould Love and Serve the true GOD alone, and Renounce Paganiſm.

And in the next place, That if any ſhould Renounce his Chriſtianity, and Relapſe to Paganiſm, then he ſhould pay his Weare, Wite, and Laſhlite, according to what he had done.

The Third Law is, That if any in Holy Orders ſhall either Fight, Perjure himſelf, or commit Fornication, let him likewiſe make Amends by the like Penalties above-mentioned; and likewiſe make Satisfaction to GOD according to the Canons of the Church; and alſo give a Pledge or Security to do ſo no more.

Note, That the Weare, Wite, and Laſhlite, above-mentioned, were all of them Fines, or Mulcts, which the Danes and Engliſh were to pay according to the value of their Heads, as hath been already ſhewn; but as for the laſt of theſe Words, Mr. Somner, in his Gloſſary, ſuppoſes it to be purely Daniſh, and ſignified no more than the two former Words, but was ſo called in relation to the Danes alone, who were to undergo it; after which follow ſeveral Conſtitutions againſt the Offences of Clergymen, againſt committing Inceſt, and with-holding of Tythes, and Romeſcot or Peter-pence; in all which Offences a Dane was to pay the like Weare, and Wite, with an Engliſh-man; as alſo againſt Buying, Selling, and Working on the Lord's Day; in which Caſes, if a Freeman wrought upon Holy-days, he was to loſe his Liberty, or pay his Wite; but if he were a Servant or Villain, he was to ſatisfie it with his Skin, (i.e. by Whipping,) or pay his Head-Gild; but if a Maſter compelled his Servant to work upon Holy-days, he was to pay his Laſhlite as the Danes, and his Wite as the Engliſh did, that is, according as he was a Dane, or an Engliſh-man; (which ſufficiently juſtifies Mr. Somner's Senſe of that Word:) The reſt of theſe Laws being againſt divers other Offences, as againſt violating the Faſts of the Church, againſt making Ordeal, or taking an Oath on Sundays or Faſt-days. Not that this Ordeal, or Trial by a hot Iron, or boyling Water, in caſe the Perſon was accuſed of a Crime, was to be uſed, unleſs there was ~~no~~ direct Proof againſt him. / no. The reſt of the Laws are againſt putting any Man to Death upon a Sunday; as alſo againſt Witches, Perjured Perſons, and Common Whores, all which Perſons were to be baniſhed the Country.

But the laſt Law ſaving one, is a ſort of Cruel Mercy; for thereby if a Man had loſt any of his Members for any Crime, and ſurvived the ſame four Nights, it was afterwards lawful with the Licenſe of the Biſhop for any one to give him Help and Aſſiſtance, which it ſeems before that time it was not lawful to do.

But the Reader may further from the Title of theſe Laws obſerve, the Subjection or Dependence which King Gytrum then had upon K. Alfred at that time; for King Gytrum and his Danes gave their Conſent to them in a Common-Council of the Kingdom, in the ſame manner as the Kings of Mercia, and of the Eaſt Angles, were wont to do in the General Council of the Weſt Saxon Kingdom, in acknowledgment of its Superiority over them, as may be proved by divers Examples; and if this King Gytrum could have made Laws by his own Authority, he might have called a Council of his own to do ſo, which we do not find he ever did, having received his Kingdom wholly from the Bounty of King Alfred.

Alſo about the Year laſt mentioned King Alfred new built the Town of Shafts bury, as appears by an old Inſcription cited by [*] Mr. Camden, out of an old Manuſcript Copy of William of Malmesbury, then belonging to the Lord Burghley; which Inſcription was in that Author's time to be ſeen in the Chapter-houſe of that Nunnery, which was built at this place by this King ſome Years after.

‘The Pagans entred further into France, where the French fought with ‘them, and (as it is ſuppoſed) were routed, for here the Danes found ‘Horſes enough to mount the greateſt part of their Men.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXII.

‘This Year the Danes ſailed up the Maeſe (now the Meuſe) into Frankland, and there ſtayed another Year. The ſame Year alſo King Ælfred ‘ſailing out with his Fleet, fought againſt four Daniſh Pirat Ships, and 'took two of their Men, and the other two (the Men being very much 'wounded and tired in the Fight) ſurrendred themſelves.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXIII

'The Danes ſailed up the Skeld to Cundoth, (which was then a Monaſtery, and is now ſuppoſed to be Conde upon the River Eſcaut) where 'they ſtayed a whole Year. Now alſo Marinus, that Religious Pope, 'ſent ſome of the Wood of our LORD's Croſs to Alfred, and in Return the King ſent to Rome the Alms he had vowed by the Hands of 'Sighelm and Ethelſtan: Alſo he ſent other Alms into India, to St. Thomas, 'and St. Bartholomew, (who being there martyr'd, are accounted the Indian Apoſtles.) And about that time the Engliſh Army lay encamped 'againſt the Danes, who held London, where yet (thanks be to GOD) 'all Things ſucceeded proſperouſly.

Alſo this Year, (according to the Chronicle of Mailroſs, and Simeon of Durham,) King Alfred having ſlain the two Daniſh Captains, Ingwar and Halfdene, cauſed the waſted Parts of Northumberland to be again Inhabited; then Edred the Abbot, being ſo commanded by Cuthbert in a Viſion, redeemed a certain Youth who had been ſold to a Widow at Withingham, and made him King of Northumberland by the joynt Conſent both of the Engliſh and Danes, King Alfred himſelf confirming the Election. This King Guthred, in Gratitude to St. Cuthbert, did alſo beſtow all the Land between the Rivers of Weol, ~~and~~ Tyne, ~~and ſays~~ upon that Saint, that is, upon the Biſhop of Lindisfarne, who this Year removed the Biſhop's See from thence to a place then called Concaceſtre, now Cheſter; and thither they alſo removed the Body of St. Cuthbert. But as for the Miracle of the Earth's opening and ſwallowing up a whole Army of Scots, who came to fight with King Cuthred, I leave it to the Monks to be believed by them, if they pleaſe. This is certain, that thus making this poor Youth King, the Church got all that Country now called the Biſhoprick of Durham. And who can tell but all this Viſion was a Contrivance of Abbot Edred's, for that very Deſign; yet if it were ſo, it was but a Pious Fraud, which highly tended to the enriching of that Church.

called Guthred

The ſame Year (according to Florence of Worceſter) died Aſſer, Biſhop of Shirburne; who could not be the ſame with that Aſſer, who writ the Life and Actions of King Alfred, ſince that Author writ to Anno 993, being the 45th Year of King Alfred's Age, as appears by that Work. Arch Biſhop Uſher ſuppoſes this Aſſer the Hiſtorian to have been he, who was afterwards the Biſhop of St. David's, and was the ſecond of that Name who ſate in that See; but without any good Authority.

'This Year the Danes ſailed up the River Sunne, (i. e. Some,) as far 'as Embenum (now Amiens, in Picardy, where they remained one whole 'Year. And now alſo deceaſed the worthy Biſhop Athelwold.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXV.

The Danes being thus employed abroad, did nothing this Year in England; but the next we find in Aſſer, that the Pagan Army divided it ſelf into two Bodies, the one whereof ſailed to the Eaſt Parts of France, whilſt the other making up the Rivers of Thames and Medway, beſieged the City of Rocheſter, and having built a ſtrong Fort before the Gates, from thence aſſaulted the City, yet could by no means take it, becauſe the Citizens valiantly defended themſelves, until ſuch times as King Ælfred came to their Aſſiſtance with a powerful Army; which when the Pagans ſaw, quitting their Forts, and all the Horſes which they had brought with them out of France, together with a great many Priſoners, to the Engliſh, they in great haſt fled away to their Ships, and being compelled by neceſſity paſſed again that Summer in France; King Ælfred having now reinforced his Fleet, was reſolved to fall upon the Daniſh Pyrates, who then ſheltered among their Country Men of Eaſt England; upon which he ſent his Fleet that he had got ready in Kent, (being very well Mann'd) into the mouth of the River Stoure, (not that in Kent, but another that runs by Harwich, where they were met by Sixteen Daniſh Pyrates, who lay there watching for a Prey; and immediately ſetting upon them, after a ſharp reſiſtance the King's Men boarding them, they were all taken, together with great Spoils, and moſt of the Men killed.

Engliſh,

'But as the King's Fleet were returning home, they fell among another 'Fleet of Danes, much ſtronger, with whom fighting again, the Danes 'obtained the Victory; thô with what Loſs to the Engliſh, the Annals 'do not ſay.

But the reſt of the Danes of Eaſt England, were ſo much incenſed at this Victory; as alſo with the ſlaughter of their Country Men, that ſetting out a greet Fleet very well Mann'd, they ſail'd to the mouth of Thames; where ſetting upon divers of the King's Ships, by ſurprize in the Night, when all the Men were aſleep, they had much the better of them; but what damage the King's Ships received, and how many Men were loſt, our Authour does not tell us.

'The ſame Year, ſomewhat before Chriſtmaſs, Charles, King of the 'Weſtern Franks, was killed by a wild Boar, which he was then hunting; 'but his Brother Lewis dyed the Year before: They were both Sons to 'that King Lewis, who deceaſed the Year of the laſt Eclipſe, and he 'was the Son of that Charles, whoſe Daughter, Ethelwulf King of the 'Weſt Saxons had married.

'The ſame Year happened a great Sea Fight among the ancient 'Saxons of Germany, but the Annals do not acquaint us with whom they 'fought, However, it is ſuppoſed to have been with the Danes; and they 'further add, That they fought twice this Year, where the Saxons being 'aſſiſted by the Friſians, obtained the Victory.

Here alſo Aſſer, as well as our Annals, proceed to give us a further account of the French and German affairs, with a brief deſcent of their Kings, from Charles the Great; as that this Year Charles King of the Allmans received all the Kingdoms of the Weſtern Franks, which lye between the Mediteranean Sea, and that Bay, which was between the Ancient Saxons and the Gauls, by the voluntary conſent of all the People; the Kingdom of Armorica, (that is, of leſſer Britain,) only excepted: This Charles was the Son of Lewis, Brother of that Charles laſt mention'd; and both the Kings were the Sons of Lewis, the Younger Son of Charles the Great, who was the Son of King Pipin. ^

'The ſame Year alſo the good Pope Marinus deceaſed, who freed the 'Engliſh School at Rome, at the entreaty of King Ælfred, from all Tax 'and Tribute.

'Alſo about the ſame time the Danes of Eaſt England broke the Peace, 'which they had lately made with King Ælfred.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXVI.

'The Pagans who had before Invaded the Eaſt, quitting that, now 'marched towards the Weſt parts of France; and paſſing up the River 'Seine, took their Winter Quarters at Paris.

^ and this year King Ælfred by the advice of Ethred Arch Bp. Cant: sent over certain Envoys to the Monastery of St. Bertine in France to invite Grimbald a learned Monk to come over into England to revive the Liberal Arts now almost lost, which he comply'd with and many excellent men were bred up under his tuition, such as were John the Presbyter Asser a bove mention'd and severall others. The

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXVI

The ſame Year (according to Aſſer, as well as the Annals,) King Alfred, after ſo many Cities being burnt, and ſuch great deſtruction of People, not only took the City of London from the Danes, who had it long in their Poſſeſſion; but he now repaired it, and made it habitable; and then committed it to the Cuſtody of his Son-in-Law, Ethered Earl of the Mercians; and now all the Engliſh, (viz.) the Mercians and Kentiſhmen, as alſo the Eaſt and Weſt Saxons, who had been before diſperſed, or made Priſoners with the Danes, being now returned home, put themſelves under King Alfred's Protection ^

^ But these good successes were mixt with some ill ones, for as Alfred in [illegible] this summer a great party of the citizens of London and the inhabitants of some adjoyning [illegible] [illegible] to take [illegible] certain fort or castle the Danes had built in those parts and which [illegible] them, but the Danes made a stout resistance, the English Christians were put [illegible] and four of King Alfred's thanes were there killed.

But theſe Daniſh Storms being pretty well blown over, King Alfred began now to make ſome uſe of the Learned Men he had ſent for from abroad; for as Mr. Camden ſhews us in his * Britannia, we have a large account of the Univerſity of Oxon. Under the Year of our Lord, 886, 'viz. That in the Second Year of St. Grimbald's coming over into England, 'the Univerſity of Oxford was founded; the firſt Regents there, and 'Readers in Divinity were St. Neot, an Abbot, an Eminent Profeſſor of 'Theology, and St. Grimbald, an Eloquent and moſt Excellent Interpreter of the Holy Scriptures; whilſt Grammer and Rhetorick were 'Taught by Aſſer a Monk, a Man of extraordinary Learning; Logick, 'Muſick and Arithmetick, were Read by John a Monk of St. Davids; 'Geometry, and Aſtronomy were profeſſed by John another Monk, and 'Collegue of St. Grimbald; one of a ſharp Wit, and Immenſe Knowledge.

* Oxfordſhire.

'Theſe Lectures were often honoured with the preſence of the moſt 'Illuſtrious and Invincible Monarch, King Ælfred, which is alſo aſſerted by Will. of Malmesbury, who tells us a conſtant Tradition of his 'time, that King Alfred by the Advice of Neot the Abbot, firſt founded 'publick Schools of various Arts at Oxford; which is further confirm'd by an Ancient Manuſcript Copy of Randolph Higden's Polychron, in Bayliol College Library, which in the beginning treating of all the Kings of England, when he comes to King Alfred, ſays thus, That he firſt founded the Univerſity of Oxford. John Rouſe in his Manuſcript Treatiſe, de Regibus Angliæ, (Lib. 1.) ſeems alſo to have ſeen this paſſage in Wincheſter Annals, and adds Three Halls to have been thus built, The one for Grammar, near the Eaſt-Gate; the Second near the North-Gate for Logicians; and the Third in the High-Street, for Divines.

But ſince this only proves that King Alfred firſt founded publick Schools here, and not that there was any ſuch thing here before; I ſhall recite alſo what follows, as it is quoted by the ſaid Mr. Camden, out of an ancient Copy of Aſſer de Geſtis Alfredi, which, I could wiſh may clear this point: 'About this time (ſays he) there aroſe a ſharp and grievous 'diſſention between Grimbald, and thoſe learned Men whom he brought 'hither with him, and the old Scholars whom he found here at his coming; for theſe abſolutely refuſed to comply with the Statutes, Inſtitutions and Forms of Reading perſcribed by Grimbald; the difference 'proceeded to no great height, for the ſpace of Three Years, yet there 'was always a private Grudge and Enmity between them, which ſoon 'after broke out with the utmoſt violence imaginable; to appeaſe theſe 'Tumults, the moſt Invincible King Ælfred, being informed of the 'Faction, by a Meſſage and Complaint from Grimbald, came to Oxford 'to accommodate the matter, and ſubmitted to a great deal of Pains and ‘Patience, to hear the Cauſe and Complaint of both Parties: The Con‘troverſie depended upon this; The Old Scholars maintain’d, that before ‘the coming of Grimbald to Oxford, Learning did here flouriſh, thô the ‘Students were leſs in number, than they had formerly been, becauſe ‘very many of them had been Expell’d by the cruel Tyranny of the ‘Pagans: They farther declar’d and proved, by the undoubted ‘Teſtimony of their ancient Annals, that good Orders and conſtitu‘tions for the Government of that place had been already made by Men ‘of great Piety, and Learning; ſuch as Gildas, Melkin, Ninnias, Kenti‘gern and others; who had there proſecuted their Studies, to a good ‘old Age: All things being then managed in happy Peace and quiet; ‘and that St. German coming to Oxford and reſiding there half a Year, ‘after he had gone through all England to Preach down the Pelagian ‘Hereſie, did well approve of their Rules and Orders: The King ‘with incredible Humility and great attention heard both parties, ex‘horting them with Pious and Importunate entreaties, to preſerve Love ‘and Amity with one another; upon this he left them, in hopes that they ‘both would follow his Advice, and obey his Inſtructions: But Grim‘bald, reſenting theſe proceedings, retired imediately to the Monaſtery of ‘Wincheſter, which King Ælfred had lately founded: and ſoon after he ‘got his Tomb to be removed thither to him, in which he had deſigned ‘his Bones ſhould be put after his Deceaſe, and laid in a Vault under the ‘Chancel of the Church of S. Peters in Oxford; which Church the ſaid Grim‘bald had raiſed from the ground, of Stones hewn and carved with great Art.

But ſince it muſt be confeſſed that this paſſage of the quarrel of St. Grimbald, and the Old Scholars of Oxford, is not to be found in that ancient Copy of Aſſer, which Arch-Biſhop Parker firſt publiſhed in Saxon Characters (like thoſe in which it is written, being ſtill Extant in the Cottonian Library) yet ~~though~~ it was publiſhed by Mr. Camden in that Edition of Aſſer, which was printed at Frankford, in 1603. The Original of which the Lord Primate Uſher in his Ant. Brit. Eccleſ. expreſly tells us, Mr. Camden never ſaw; from whence Sir John Spelman in his * Hiſtory of the Life of King Ælfred, hath made a very hard inferences, as if that clauſe was not to be found in any of the ancient Copies of that Authour, but had been foiſted in either by the Publiſher, or elſe by Mr. Camden himſelf; thô this Authour does not ſay ſo in expreſs terms.

I ſhall therefore repeat in ſhort what Mr. Ant. Wood hath anſwered to this Objection, in the * Antiquities of the Univerſity of Oxford, from a Manuſcript Teſtimonial, under the hand of the learned Mr. Twyne; viz. That he himſelf, long after diſcourſing with Mr. Camden on this Subject, and asking him expreſly about this paſſage, whoſe authority began to be then queſtioned, ‘His Anſwer was, that he very well knew that he had ‘truly tranſcribed, that paſſage from an ancient Manuſcript of Aſſer, ‘which he had then by him, and which as the ſaid Mr. Wood in his Notes ‘tells us, then belonged to Sir Henry Savile of Banke, near Halifax in ‘Tork-ſhire.

But I ſhall not now take upon me to Anſwer the reſt of the Objections which the ſaid Sir John Spelman does there produce againſt the validity of the above cited paſſage; which ſuppoſes publick Schools to have been at Oxford, before King Alfred’s time; for they are all reduceable to theſe two heads; Firſt the expreſs words of the Annals, of the Abbey of Hyde above-mentioned, as alſo that of Polychronicon, ‘That King Alfred was

'the firſt King who founded a Univerſity there: all which may be anſwered, by allowing that to be true in reſpect of a Univerſity, endow'd with Priviledges, and diſtinct Halls and Colledges built on purpoſe; and yet there might very well have been before that time a publick School, or Studium, (as it was then call'd,) where the Liberal Arts were taught; as for the other Objection of the improbability of the old Scholars falling out with the new Profeſſors, in the very firſt Year of the Inſtitution of the Univerſity, (that is, as ſoon as ever they came thither,) this may be alſo anſwered, by ſuppoſing that thoſe Annals were written many Years after the Death of King Alfred, from a Common received Tradition, and ſo this tranſaction might have been dated there, or Four Years later than it really happened: as John Rouſe in his Manuſcript Hiſtory of the Kings of England alſo places it.

I confeſs there is one Objection, which I wiſh I could Anſwer; and that is, How Gildas and Nennius could ſtudy at Oxford, when the latter was not ſo much as Born, till about the Concluſion of this, or Beginning of the following Century, and much leſs the Former; when even by the beſt Accounts of thoſe Times, the Pagan Saxons were then Maſters of that part of England.

Having ſaid thus much concerning the Antiquity of that Famous Univerſity, to which I owe my Education, I ſhall not trouble my ſelf with enquiry into the Reality of thoſe ſuppoſed Ancient Schools, of Creeklad and Leacklade; (which the Monkiſh Writers ſuppoſe to have been anciently called Greeklade, and Latinelade,) the latter of which Derivations, tho Mr. Camden juſtly explodes, yet he ſeems to have more Veneration for the former, ſince in the place from whence I have tranſcribed the abovecited Quotations; he alſo tells us, "That the Muſes were tranſported "to Oxford from Creeklade; (now a ſmall Town in Wilt-ſhire.) All the Authority for which (that I know of, beſide uncertain Tradition) depends upon the Credit of a Manuſcript, lately in the Liberary of Trinity Hall in Cambridge, and is cited by Mr. Wheelock in his Notes upon Bede; where ſpeaking of Theodorus, Arch Biſhop of Canterbury, he ſays, That he held or maintained Schools in a Village near the Water, which is called Greekiſlake; but Mr. Somner in his Learned * Gloſſary, hath given us a much more likely Derivation of this place, (viz.) from the Old Saxon Word Creek, ſignifying a River, or Torrent, running either into ſome River, or elſe into the Sea; and Gelad, which ſignified an emptying, for it was anciently written Crecca Gelade, and not Greeklade, as ſome would now write it.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXVII.

‘ and Witha, (called in Latine Beringarius, and Wido) held Lombardy, and all the Countries on that ſide the Mountains; all which Kingdoms they held with much Diſcord, Fighting two great Battles, and waſting thoſe Countries, till ſuch time as each of them had expell'd the other from his Kingdom; alſo the ſame Year Ethelelm the Ealdorman carried the Alms of King Alfred, and the Weſt Saxons to Rome.

This was the Benevolence, called Peter Pence, which is here juſtly termed an Alms, and not a Tribute, as Modern Popiſh Writers have termed it.

But to return to our own Domeſtick Affairs; Aſſer above-mentioned, informs us, that the Kingdom being now pretty well at quiet from the Danes, the King began to mind his Civil Government, to repair his Cities and Caſtles, and alſo to build others in the moſt neceſſary places, altering the whole face of the Country into a much better form; and having walled ſeveral Towers and Caſtles, he made them defenſible againſt the Pagans: Nor was he leſs careful in the Political Affairs of his Kingdom; for divers of his own Subjects, having, under the name of Danes, committed great Spoils and Rapines, theſe the King reſolving to puniſh, and reſtrain from theſe Exceſſes, he firſt of all divided all the Provinces of England into Counties, and thoſe again into Hundreds and Tythings; ſo that every Legal Subject ſhould dwell in ſome Hundred or Tything, whereby if any were ſuſpected of Robbery, and being thereof Condemned, or abſolved by his Hundred or Tything, they ſhould either undergo due puniſhment, or elſe if Innocent be acquitted.

But the Governours of Provinces, who were before called Vice Domini, and in Engliſh Saxon Geriffs, he divided into two Offices, That is, into Judges, whom we now call Juſtices, and into Sheriffs, who do yet retain that name; and by the Kings care and induſtry in a ſhort time, there was ſo great a Tranquility through out the whole Kingdom, that if a Traveller had happen'd to have loſt a Bag of Money in the High-way, he might have found it again untouched the next day.

And Bromton's Chronicle relates, That thô there were Gold Bracelets hung up at the parting of ſeveral High-ways; yet Juſtice was ſo ſtrictly executed, that no Man durſt preſume to touch them.

But in the Diſtribution of his own Family, he followed the Example of King Solomon; for dividing it into Three Companies, or Bands, he ſet a Chief over each of them; ſo that every Captain with his Band, performed his Service in the King's Palace for the ſpace of one Month; and, then going with his Company to his own Eſtate, he looked after his private Affairs for Two Months, and ſo did each of them in their Order, which Rotation of Officers this King obſerved all the reſt of his Reign.

And to this Year alſo, Sir H. Spelman refers that Great Council wherein King Alfred made thoſe Laws that go under his Name; in which, after a Preface, wherein he firſt recites and confirms the Ten Commandments, as alſo divers other Laws, which are ſet down in Exodus and Leviticus, he concludes to this effect, That whatſoever he found worthy of Obſervation either in the time of K. Ina, his Kinſman, or Offa, King of the Mercians, or of Ethelbert, the firſt Chriſtened King, he had gathered them all together, and committed thoſe to writing which he thought moſt deſerving, omitting others which he judged leſs convenient; in doing of which he had taken the Advice, and had the Conſent of his Wiſe-

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXVII. Men, and having reviſed the Laws of thoſe Princes, he tranſcribed ſuch of them as he liked into his own; and by the Conſent of the ſaid Wiſe-men he thereof made a Collection, and commanded them to be obſerved by all Engliſhmen; under which name the Saxon and Jutes were then included.

The firſt of his Laws requires (as moſt neceſſary to all his Subjects) that each Man keep his Oath or Pledge, (i. e. his promiſe to obſerve the Laws, and keep the Peace) and if any ſhould be compelled to Swear, or depoſite a pledge whereby he may be bound to betray his Lord, or unjuſtly to aſſiſt any Perſon, he ought to break his promiſe, rather than perform it: But in caſe he hath engaged to perform any thing which might juſtly be done, and doth it not, his Arms and all his perſonal Eſtate ſhall be put into the hands of his Friends; and he himſelf kept in the King's Priſon for Forty Days, till he undergo that Pennance which the Biſhop ſhall enjoin him; and alſo his Friends (i. e. Relations) require of him: but if he have not wherewith to ſuſtain himſelf in the mean while, if his Kindred are not able to provide him Victuals, the King's Officer ſhall do it; but if he reſiſt and be taken by force, he ſhall forfeit both his Arms and his perſonal Eſtate; and if he be killed, nothing ſhall be paid as the Value of his Head: and in caſe he eſcape before his time, viz. of Forty Days be out, and be retaken, he ſhall be returned back again to Priſon for other Forty Days: If he eſcape, he ſhall have no benefit of the Laws, but be Excommunicated from all Chriſts Churches, and if any Man have been ſecurity in his behalf, he ſhall make ſatisfaction for it according to Right, and do Pennance, till he make ſuch ſatisfaction as his Prieſt ſhall appoint.

'The Second bears the Title of the Immunity of the Church, and 'we ſhall ſpeak of it among the Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions.

'The Third is, concerning the breach of the King's Surety-ſhip, by 'the payment of a Mulct of Five Pounds of Mercian, (i. e. larger Money) 'but the Violation of Surety-ſhip, (or the Peace) made to an Arch-'Biſhop by a fine of Three Pounds: and if any one break or forfeit 'the King's Pledge, (or Recognizance,) he ſhall make amends according 'to Right, and the breach of the Surety-ſhip to a Biſhop or Ealdorman, 'by two Pounds.

'The Fourth Law is, concerning the Death of the King, or any other 'Lord; If any one, that, either by himſelf alone, or by any other per-'ſon, ſhall attempt againſt the King's Life, he ſhall loſe his Life and 'Goods; but if he will purge himſelf, let him do it according to the 'valuation of the King's Head; the ſame is alſo ordained in all Judg-'ments concerning other Men, whether Noble or Ignoble: whoſoever 'Conſpires againſt his Lord, ſhall loſe both his Life and Eſtate; or elſe 'pay the Valuation of his Lord's Head.

From which Laws we may obſerve, That according to the cuſtom of thoſe Times, there was a Rate ſet upon every Man's Life, even upon the King's himſelf, if he were killed.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXVII.

‘The Seventh Law is, againſt Fighters in the King's Palace; If any Man ſhall Fight, or ſhall draw a Weapon in his Houſe, his Life ſhall lye at the King's Mercy, whether he will Pardon him or not; but if the offender flee, and be taken, he ſhall redeem his Life, with the price of his head, or be fined according to his Offence.

Whereby it appears that the Offender might have redeemed this crime with Money at the firſt, or elſe the laſt Clauſe had been vain.

‘The Ninth Law ordains, What mulct a Man ſhall pay, that Kills a Woman with Child, which was to be according to the Value of her head; and he was alſo to pay for the Child in her Womb, half as much as for a living one, according to the quality of its Father.

‘The Tenth ordains, What fines or amends every Man ſhall pay to a Husband, for committing Adultery with his Wife; which was to be encreaſed according to the Eſtate, or Quality, of him againſt whom the Offence was committed.

The reſt of the Law, being about the quantity of the mulcts appointed for ſeveral Thefts, I omit.

‘The Eleventh appoints, What mulct a Man ſhall pay, that wantonly handles the Breaſts of a Country Man's Wife, or offers her any Violence, as by flinging her down, &c. though he does not lye with her.

This ſhews how careful the ancient Engliſh Saxons were of the Perſons and Chaſtity even of the meaneſt Subjects.

I ſhall ſkip over a great many of the other Laws, they only ordaining penalties for ſeveral petty treſpaſſes, and ſmall Offences, and ſhall paſs

‘To the Twenty Sixth Law, Which appoints what mulcts ſhall be paid by thoſe who ſhall Kill in Troops or Companies, and alſo to whom theſe Mulcts were to be paid. If the Slain and Innocent Party were an Ordinary Perſon, (that is, one whoſe head was valued but at Two Hundred Shillings,) he that ſlew him muſt pay the value of his head, and a Fine beſides to his Kindred: Alſo every one that was in the Company, muſt pay Thirty Shillings; which Penalty was ſtill to be encreaſed, according to the Value of the Eſtate of the Party Slain; ſo that as the Penalty for the Death of a Man valued at Twelve Hundred Shillings, every one that was preſent ſhall pay 120 Shillings, and the Man ſlayer himſelf the price of his Head, and a Fine beſides: But in caſe the whole Company ſhall deny that he gave the Mortal Wound, all of them are to be impeached together, and to pay both the Value and the Fine beſides.

Now concerning this Troop, or Company, which our Saxon Anceſtors called Hlothe, how many Men made up one of them, the Reader may pleaſe to take notice, that by the Laws of King Ina they were to be above Thirty.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXVII.

‘ The Twenty Seventh appoints, What ſhare of the Mulct, or ſatisfaction a Man's Kindred by the Mothers ſide ſhall receive, in caſe he have no kindred on his Father's ſide; and what ſhare thoſe of his Guild, or Fraternity ſhall pay in caſe he have committed Man-Slaughter in a quarrel, (viz.) The former ſhall pay a Third part, and the latter one half of the price of the head of the party ſlain.

But whether by thoſe here mentioned of the ſame Guild, are meant ſuch as were fellow Contributors to the ſame Pariſh Feaſts in honour of the Saints, as was the Cuſtom of thoſe Times; or elſe (which is more likely) ſuch as were bound together in the ſame Decenary, or Tything, it being very obſcure, I ſhall not take upon me to determine.

‘ The Twenty Eighth Law was made againſt publick defamers, or ſpreaders of falſe news, (whereby is meant ſpreaders of falſe news againſt the Government,) ‘ and Commands that ſuch a one being Convicted, ſhou'd ſuffer no leſs puniſhment, than the cuting out of his Tongue, except he redeem it by payment of the value of his Head, and even then he was afterwards to be eſteemed of no Credit.

‘ The Thirtieth Ordains, That Merchants when they Land ſhall bring ſuch as come on Shore with them, before the King's Officers in Folcmote, and there declare their number, that they may be ready to produce them to anſwer any thing that ſhall be demanded of them in the ſaid Folcmote; and if it happen that they bring many ſtrangers on ſhore, that they alſo certifie this to the King's Officer in that ſaid Aſſembly; that ſo they may be forth coming.

Now conſidering the Times wherein King Alfred lived, when there was ſuch flocking of Strangers, being Enemies, into England; this Law was very juſtly and ſeaſonably made.

‘ The Thirty Firſt inflicts upon him that ſhall put a Ceorles's Man (that is an ordinary Country-Man) without any fault into Bonds, viz. A Mulct of Ten Shillings; upon him that beats ſuch a one, Twenty Shillings; if he hang him up a-loft, Thirty Shillings; if he cut off his Hair to expoſe him like a Fool, Ten Shillings; if he ſhave his Head like a Prieſt, (yet bind him not) Thirty Shillings; and in caſe he only cut off his Beard, Twenty Shillings; but if he bind him, and ſhave his Hair like a Prieſt, then Sixty Shillings.

Which Law was no doubt made to reſtrain the Tyranny and Inſolence of the Engliſh Nobility, who were wont before that Law too much to domineer over poor Country-Men, (here called Ceorles-men;) and therefore it ſeems highly probable, that the Commons of England had then Repreſentatives in the Great Council, or elſe it is not likely the Nobility would ever have loſt that Power they then Uſurped over them: Wherefore I ſhall leave it to the Indifferent Reader to Conſider, whether the Common People of England were then ſuch Slaves, as ſome late Writers would fain make them; ſince not only ſatisfaction was to be made for their Lives,

Anno Dom: DCCCLXXXVI.

Lives, but alſo for the leaſt injury, or abuſe, that might be committed againſt their Perſons.

'The Thirty Fourth Law impoſes upon him that ſhall ſtrike or fight in open Court, before the King's Ealdorman, both the value of his own head, and ſuch a Fine beſides, as ſhall be thought fit; and alſo 120 Shillings to be paid to the Ealdorman by him, that by thus drawing his Weapon ſhall make any diſturbance in the Folcmote, or County Court; if the Ealdorman were not preſent, but the fact was done before his Subſtitute, or the King's Prieſt, then a Were or Amerciament of Thirty Shillings.

Here by the King's Prieſt, is meant either the King's Chaplain or Biſhop, I will not determine whether; who as we formerly ſaid in thoſe times preſided alſo in the Folemotes, and there diſpatched all buſineſs relating to the Church.

'The Thirty Fifth ordains, What ſatisfaction ſhall be made for breach of the Peace in any other place; as for Example, he that fights in the home-ſtall of a Country-man, ſhall pay the ſaid Country-man Six Shillings; if he drew his Sword, but ſtruck not, half as much; which Penalty alſo was to be encreaſed according to the Eſtate or Quality of him upon whoſe ground the Aſſault was made: So that if he fought in the Houſe of one worth 600 Shillings, he was to pay Three times as much; if of one worth 1200 Shillings, then the Amends was to be twice as much as the former.

'The Thirty Sixth Law of Burhbrice, or breach of the Peace, in a Town, confirms that part of King Ina's Law, concerning that matter, in impoſing upon the Offender, for the breach of the Peace in the King's Town or City, by ſetting the Mulct of an Hundred and Twenty Shillings; but if it be done in the Arch-Biſhop's Town, then Ninety Shillings; in that of a Biſhop or Ealdorman, Sixty Shillings; in the Town of a Man valued at 1200 Shillings Eſtate, Thirty Shillings; but half as much if done in a Village of one worth but half that Sum.

From whence we may obſerve, That in thoſe times not only the King and the Great Men, ſuch as Biſhops and Ealdormen, but alſo Gentlemen of ordinary Eſtates, had Villages or Townſhips of their own; and they themſelves received the Mulcts or Penalties impoſed for the breach of the Peace within their Precincts; which priviledge they loſt, I ſuppoſe, after the coming of King William. I.

'The Thirty Seventh is, That Law concerning Bocland, by vertue whereof he that holds Lands left him by his Anceſtors, was forbid to alienate it from his Kindred to others, in caſe it could be proved by Writing or Teſtimony, before the King, or the Biſhop, his Kindred being preſent, that the Man who firſt granted them, forbid him all Alienation. and laid on him this Condition.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXVII.

From the making of this Law Mr. Selden informs us, that we may here find an Eſtate in Fee-Tail, much more ancient than the thirteenth Year of Edward the Firſt.

The 38th Law is concerning Quarrels, or deadly Feuds, which, ſince it gives a ſtrange Licence for Men to take Satisfaction on their Enemies, even without the Preſence of any Officer, I ſhall likewiſe ſet down:

'First, It forbids any Man to attack his Enemy, if he find him in 'his own Houſe, except he firſt demand of him Satisfaction: But if he 'have force enough, he may beſiege the Houſe for ſeven days, yet he 'ſhall not aſſault him, if he will ſtay within; but if he then ſurrender 'himſelf, and his Arms, into the Defendant's hands, he may keep him 'thirty Days, without hurt, but then ſhall leave him ſo to his Kindred 'or Friends. In caſe he flie to a Church, the Honour of the Church is to 'be preſerved: But if the Demandant have not Strength enough to be'ſiege him in his Houſe, he may deſire the Aſſiſtance of the Ealderman, 'which, if he cannot obtain, he muſt appeal to the King before he can 'aſſault him. If any one by chance light upon his Adverſary, not 'knowing that he keeps himſelf at home, and he will deliver up his 'Arms to him, he ſhall keep him ſafe thirty Days, and then deliver him 'to his Friends: But in caſe he will not deliver up his Arms, then he 'may fight with him; but if he be willing to deliver up himſelf, and 'his Arms, to his Enemy, and any other Man ſets upon him, ſuch a Man 'ſhall pay the value of his Head, if he kills him; or give Satisfaction 'for his Wounds if any be given him, according to the Fact; beſides 'which, he ſhall be fined, and loſe all that may fall to him, by reaſon 'of Kindred.

From whence you may obſerve, that the nature of that Rough and Martial Age, did allow Men a greater Liberty of righting themſelves againſt thoſe that had injured them, than was afterwards thought fit to be allowed in more ſettled and peaceable Times.

The laſt of King Alfred's Laws is concerning Wounds and Maims, which being very long, I ſhall only give you an Abſtract of it. It is, (in ſhort,) to appoint what Satisfaction in Money any Man ſhall pay for wounding or maiming another, or for cutting off any Member or part of his Body, even to the Nail of his little Finger: All which was aſcertained according to the particular Sums there ſet down; and I ſhall leave it to wiſer Judgments to conſider, whether it would not be better if the Law were ſo at this day, ſince it would not only prevent the too great Favour of Juries in ſome Caſes, but alſo their over-Severity in others, by often giving either very ſmall, or elſe exceſſive Damages, according as the Plaintiff or Defendant is more or leſs known to them, or that they have a greater or leſs Kindneſs for them.

There was likewiſe made in the ſame Synod divers Eccleſiaſtical Canons, ſome of which, taken from amongſt the Civil Ones, I ſhall here likewiſe ſet down.

The firſt is concerning the Immunities of the Churches, by which it is ordained, That if a Man, guilty of any little Crime, flie to a Church, which does not belong to the King, or the Family of a private Perſon

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXVIII.

Perſon, he ſhall have three Nights to provide for himſelf, unleſs in the mean time he can make his Peace: But if any Man, within that Term, ſhall inflict upon him either Bonds or Blows, he ſhall pay the Price of his Head, according to the Cuſtom of the Country; and alſo to the Miniſters or Officers of the Church 120 Shillings, for violating the Peace thereof.

The next Law but one is likewiſe to the ſame effect, whereby is granted to every Church, conſecrated by the Biſhop, the like Peace, and if any Offender ſhall flie to it, none ſhall take him thence for ſeven Days; if any Man ſhall preſume to do ſo, he ſhall be culpable of breaking the King's and Churche's Peace: If the Officers ſhall have need of their Church in the mean time, he ſhall be put into another Houſe, which has no more Doors than the Church; only the Elder, (i.e. Presbyter) of that Church ſhall take Care he have no Meat given him: But if he will ſurrender himſelf, and his Arms, to his Enemies, he ſhall be kept thirty Nights, and then be delivered up to his Kinſmen. Alſo, whoſoever ſhall flie to a Church for any Crime, which he hath not yet confeſs'd, if he ſhall there make Confeſſion of it, in God's Name, half the Penalty ſhall be remitted to him.

From whence you may obſerve the Antiquity and Deſign of Sanctuaries in England, which were not then (as they were afterwards,) abuſed, being at firſt only intended for Places where Offenders might ſtay for a time, 'till they could agree with their Adverſaries or Proſecutors, as well as they could; ſince almoſt all Crimes whatever were redeemable with pecuniary Mulcts in thoſe days.

The 5th Law is, that if one ſhall ſteal any thing out of a Church, he muſt reſtore the value, and alſo forfeit as belongs to an Angild; the meaning of which you may ſee in the next Law.

The 6th Law is, That if any one ſhall ſteal on the Sunday, or on Chriſtmas, or Eaſter, or Aſcenſion-days; the Forfeiture ſhould be as belongs to an Angild, (i. e.) the whole value of his Head; Alſo the Hand with which he ſtole was to be cut off: But if he would redeem his Hand, it ſhould be permitted him to compound for it, according as it ſhould appertain to his Were, (i. e.) the Price of his Head.

Beſides which Laws, Alfred, Abbot of Rieval, in his Geneal. Regum Angliæ, mentions another Law of this King's, whereby every Freeman of the Kingdom, having two Hides of Land, was obliged to keep his Sons at School 'till they were 15 Years of Age, that ſo they might become Men of Underſtanding, and live happily; for (ſaid the King in this Law,) a Man Free-born, and unlettered, is to be regarded no otherwiſe than a Beaſt, or a Man void of Underſtanding.

The 12th is concerning the Breach of the Peace by Prieſts: If a Prieſt kill any one, he ſhould be taken, and all his Eſtate confiſcated; and alſo the Biſhop ſhould degrade him, and put him out from the Church, unleſs his Lord would obtain his Pardon by the Price of his Head. The reſt, being concerning the Penalties for the Violation of Nuns, I omit.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXVIII.

I have been the more particular in the reciting of theſe Laws of King Alfred, as well Eccleſiaſtical as Civil, that the Reader may ſee the Penalties that were inflicted upon Offenders in that Age; and how different they were from ours. But to return to our Annals,

‘ This Year Beocca the Ealderman carried the Alms of the Weſt-Saxons as well as the King's, to Rome; Alſo Queen Æthelſwith, who was the Siſter of K. Ælfred, and Widow of Burhed King of Menia, died in her Journey thither, whoſe Body was buried at Pavia: And the ſame Year Æthered, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Æthelwald the Ealderman, deceaſed in the ſame Month.

About this time alſo (according to Aſſer,) King Alfred built two Monaſteries; the one for Men at Ethelingaie, (now Athelney,) that is, The Iſle of Nobles, (where he had before lain ſo concealed;) and the other for Nuns at Shaftsbury, where he made Algiva, his own Daughter, Abbeſs; endowing them both with great Revenues.

Anno Dom. DCCCLXXXIX.

‘ This Year none went to Rome, unleſs two ordinary Meſſengers, whom the King ſent with Letters;] yet nevertheleſs Florence of Worceſter affirms, the King Commanded all the Biſhops and Religious Men of England to Collect the Alms of the Faithful, in order to ſend them to Rome, and Jeruſalem: And,

Anno Dom. DCCCXC.

The next Year, (according to the ſame Annals) Beornhelm, Abbot of the Weſt Saxons carried thoſe Alms to Rome; and alſo Godrun, (or Gythrum) King of the Normans, (i.e.) Danes, deceaſed, and being God-Son to King Ælfred, his Chriſtian Name was Ethelſtan; this was he who poſſeſſed the Country of the Eaſt-Angles, after the Death of King Edmund.

Alſo the ſame Year the Danes left the River Seine, and came to Sand-Laudan, which place lyes between the Bretons and the French; but the Bretons fighting with them, obtained the Victory, and drove them into a River, where many of them were drown'd.

This Year alſo the Annals relate, That Plegmond was Elected by God and all his Holy Men to the Arch-Biſhoprick of Canterbury, thô Florence of Worceſter places it, and that more rightly, under the Year before.

Anno Dom. DCCCXCI.

The Danes again Invaded the Eaſtern Franckland; and Arnulf the Emperour, being aſſiſted by the French, Saxons, and Bavarian Horſe, fought with the Daniſh Foot, and put them to flight.

Alſo Three Scots came now to King Alfred from Ireland in one Boat made of Hides, having quitted their Country, becauſe they would live the Life of Pilgrims (i. e. a Wandring Life) for God's ſake, not being ſolicitous about any place, wherefore they had brought only one Week's Proviſion with them, and after about Seven Days being at Sea, landing in Cornwall, they were preſently brought to King Alfred; their Names were Dubſlane, Macbeth, and Malinmun; alſo Swifneh, who was chief Preacher amongſt the Iriſh Scots, deceaſed; The ſame Year after Eaſter appeared a Comet.

Anno Dom. DCCCXCIII.

This Year, after Eight Years Intermiſſion, the Kingdom became again infeſted worſe than ever by a freſh Invaſion of the Danes; for their Army above-mentioned, being driven by the Emperour Arnulf out of France, marched Weſtward to Bunnan, (now Bologn) where taking Shiping in Two Hundred and Fifty Veſſels, together with their Horſes, they arrived in the Mouth of the River Limene, which then lay from the Eaſtern Part of Kent, as far as the Eaſt End of that great

Wood,

Anno Dom. DCCCXCIII.

Wood, which is called Andred; which Wood or Foreſt is in length from Eaſt to Weſt at leaſt an Hundred and Twenty Miles, and in breadth Thirty; (containing all that which we call the Weald of Kent to this Day; as alſo the Woodland part of Suſſex, as far as Hamptſhire;) but up this * River Limene they drew their Ships, as far as the ſaid Wood or Foreſt, viz. Four Miles from the furtheſt part where the Sea flows up, and there they made a Fort in that Fen, which was raiſed by ~~a few~~ some of their Ceorls, or Villains.

* Note, That the Mouth of this River than ran into the Sea near Rumney in Kent, but is now turned.

And not long after arrived Hæſtein the Dane, who, entring the Mouth of Thames with Eighty Veſſels, Built a Fort at Middletune in Kent, whil'ſt another part of the Army did the ſame at Apuldre or Apultre (now called Apledore in the ſame County) where as Ethelward relates, They took and deſtroyed an Old Caſtle being defended only by a few Country People; he alſo makes Hæſtein to have Fortified Middleton after Apuldore, and his Army to have Winter'd in both places.

Anno Dom. DCCCXCIV. S. C.

'This Year alſo, Wulfhere Arch-Biſhop of the Northumbers (i.e. of York) deceaſed.]

But to look a little upon the Affairs of Wales: The ſame Year Anarawd Prince of North-Wales, came with a great number of Engliſh Men (whom he had got to join with him) and made War upon his Brother Cadelh, Prince of Southwales, and ſpoiled the Countries of Cardigan, and Iſtradgwy.

What the Danes did immediately after their Landing, our Annals mention not; but we may with great probability hither refer that Action, (touched upon in our Annals, which are very confuſed and obſcure in the Relation of this War) viz. That it is moſt likely the Kings Army beſieged Hæſtein either at Middleton, or Beamfleot; where not long after his Landing, he had built a ſtrong Fort on the oppoſite Shore, and being reduced by the King to great Extremities, he was forced to ſurrender himſelf with his Wife, and his Two Sons to the King's Mercy, upon Condition that they ſhould be Chriſtened; which being done, (the King, and Æthered, Ealdorman of Mercia, being their Godfather;) Hæſten gave the King Hoſtages, and ſolemnly ſwore to depart the Kingdom; but as ſoon he got looſe, he broke all thoſe Agreements, and retiring into Beamfleot there fortified himſelf a freſh.

And the Spring after Æthelward aſſures us, That paſſing along the great Foreſt of Andredeſwood, they then waſted the adjacent Countries of Hamptſhire, and Berkſhire; but the Saxon Annals affirm, that about a Year after the Danes had raiſed that Fort, (I ſuppoſe of Middleton above-mentioned), in the Eaſt part of the Kingdom, K. Alfred the better to ſecure himſelf, cauſed the Danes of Northumberland, and Eaſt England, to take an Oath to be true to him; and the King alſo compell'd the Eaſt Angles to give him Hoſtages: yet nevertheleſs they broke this Peace; for when the Danes in Kent went out of their Ships in Troops to Plunder, they alſo went with them, or elſe the Danes carried the Prey into their Territories; wherefore King Alfred, gathering together his Army, and marching forward, Encamp'd between Two Parties of theſe Daniſh Robbers, where by reaſon of Woods, as alſo of Water on both ſides, he had a very convenient place for that purpoſe, inſomuch that he could ſet upon either Party whenever they marched into the Country to Plunder; but they Robb'd in Troops, as well on Horſe-back as on Foot, in all Parts where the King's Army was not; yet were repulſed almoſt every Day, as well by the King's Forces, as by the Neighbouring Towns: For the

the King had now divided his Forces into two Bodies, ſo that one half of them remained always at home, whileſt the other marched out, except thoſe whoſe buſineſs it was to defend the Towns; but the Danes oftener ſallied out of their Camp than the King's Men; ~~For the Danes~~ in one Body ~~ſallied not out of their Camp~~, but twice; Once when they firſt Landed, and another time when they were about to Decamp; and then having taken a great Booty, they endeavoured to carry it over the Thames, into Eſſex, toward their Ships; But the King's Forces prevented them, and fought them near Fernham, ~~and~~ put them to flight, and reſcued the Prey; from whence they fled beyond the Thames, and thence by the River Colne, into a certain Iſland (called by Mr. Speed, Breckleſey;) where the King's Army beſieged them, as long as their own Proviſions laſted, for they had only Victuals for a ſmall time: Then the King marched thither with the Forces of that Province, whil'ſt the former returned home; but the Danes in the mean time remained there, becauſe they could not carry away their King (being then wounded) along with them; but thoſe Danes that Inhabited Northumberland, and Eaſt England, got together an Hundred Ships with which they ſailed about the South Parts, whil'ſt with Forty others they did the like in the North; with the former they beſieged a certain ſtrong place lying on the Northern Coaſt of Devonſhire, and then fetching a Compaſs towards the South, beſieged Exanceſter (now Exeter;) which when the King heard, he turned all his Forces toward that place; but the Danes, (as Florence relates) affrighted at the News of his approach got again to their Ships, carrying their Prey to Ciſſeanceſter, (now Chicheſter in Suſſex,) where they were repulſed by the Citizens, and great part of their Army killed; but in the mean time while one Party of the King's Army remained behind, the other marched on to London, and then proceeded Eaſtward with the Citizens of that place, and other Auxiliaries that came from the Weſt, as far as Beamfleot, (now South Bemfleet) in Eſſex; whither Hæſtein was come with the Forces which had been before quartered at Middleton; to which alſo were joined thoſe that firſt arrived at Apuldre in the Mouth of the River Limene; for Hæſten had built a ſtrong Fort at Beamfleot, and was from thence marched out to Plunder, whil'ſt great part of his Army remained at home; but when the King's Forces came thither, they ſoon put his Army to flight, and demoliſhed the Fort, taking all that was within it, together with their Goods, Wives and Children, carrying them to London; and as for their Ships, part of them they broke to pieces, but carried the beſt of them to Rocheſter and London, and burnt the reſt; but the Wife of Hæſten and his Two Sons being brought to the King, he not long after ſent them back to him at his requeſt, becauſe one of the Boys had been the King's, and the other Earl Æthered's Godſon, (as hath been already ſaid).

H. Huntington places the Siege of Exeſter after the taking of Bemfleet; whereas the Annals ſuppoſe it to be done about the ſame time; but be it as it will, they all agree that whileſt the King was detained in the Weſt at that Siege, both Armies of the Danes (viz. as well thoſe which had been before routed at Bemfleet, as thoſe which were at the Iſle of Breckleſey) met at Sceobyrig (now South-Shoebury in Eſſex,) and there built a Caſtle, and then marching along the Thames, a great many of the Danes of Eaſt England, and Northumberland joined them; and ſo they marched from the Thames as far as the River Severne; then Æthered, Æthelm, and Æthelnoth the Ealdormen, and the King's Thanes who were left left at home in the Gariſons, drew all the Men together they could from every Town on the Eaſt-ſide of Pedridan (now Parret in Somerſetſhire,) and on the Weſt of Selwood (Foreſt) as alſo from both ſides of the Thames, even as far as North Wales, who when they were all aſſembled, followed the Pagans to Butdigingtune, on the ſide of Severne, (now called Budington in Shropſhire,) and there beſieged them on all ſides; in a certain Fort they had caſt up; but when they had ſtaid there for divers Weeks Encamp'd on both ſides the River, (the King being then in Devonſhire with his Fleet) the Pagans preſſed with Hunger, Eat their Horſes, and many of them periſhed with Famine; yet at laſt they broke out upon thoſe who lay on the Eaſt ſide of the River; where (as Æthelwerd tells us) was a very ſharp Diſpute, thô the Chriſtians got the Victory, and kept the Field; but there Ordhelm the King's Thane was kill'd, as alſo many others of the ſame Rank; but that part of the Daniſh Army which remained alive, eſcaped by flight. And when they were got into their Gariſons and Ships in Eaſt Saxe, juſt before Winter, they Muſter'd a great Army from among the Eaſt Angles and Northumbers; and committing their Wives, Ships and Goods to the keeping of the Eaſt Angles, marched Day and Night, till they took up their Quarters at a certain City in Werheal, called Legaceſter, (now Cheſter;) but the Kings Forces could not overtake them before they had got into the Caſtle, which nevertheleſs they beſieged for about Two Days, and took away all the Cattle that were in thoſe Parts, and kill'd all the Men they could find without the place; and partly burnt the Corn, and partly devoured it with their Horſes: This was done about a Twelve Month after the Danes arrival here.

Anno Dom. DCCCXCV.

Not long after this the Pagans went from Werheal into North Wales, but they could not ſtay there long becauſe the Cattle and Corn were all drove away and deſtroyed; ſo they were forced to march thorough the Country of the Northumbers and Eaſt Angles with ſuch ſpeed, that the King's Forces could not overtake them till they came into the Eaſt part of Eaſt Seaxe, to a certain Iſland ſeated near the Sea, called Mereſige (now Mercey) in Eſſex.

Alſo the ſame Year the Danes, who were encamp'd in Mereſige, drew their Ships up the Thames, and thence up the River Ligan, (now called Lee) which divides Middleſex from Eſſex; and there according to Florence they began to raiſe a Fort; this happen'd in the ſecond Year after their arrival.

Anno Dom. DCCCXCVI.

The Pagans having raiſed the Fortification near Ligan above-mentioned, about 20 Miles from London; this Summer a great part of the Citizens and others marched thither, and endeavoured to take and deſtroy it, but they were there forc'd to fly for it, and Four of the King's Thanes were kill'd on the ſpot.

This Autumn, when the King had pitched his Camp in thoſe Parts about Harveſt time, to hinder the Danes from carrying away their Corn, it happen'd one day, as the King rode by the River ſide, that he found a place where the River might be ſo diverted, that the Danes ſhould not be able to carry back their Ships; and thô they had built two Caſtles, one of each ſide the River to defend them; yet ſo ſoon as the Danes ſaw that (the ſtream being now diverted into ſeveral Channels) they could not carry back their Ships, they quitted them, and marched away on Foot, till they came to Quatbrige (now ſuppoſed to be Cambridge, not far from the River Severne) where they caſt up a Fort; but the King's Forces purſued them toward the Weſt on Horſe-back, whileſt the Citizens of London ſeized and broke their Ships, and carried all that was worth any thing to the City, but the Danes had left their Wives with the Eaſt Angles before they departed from that place; ſo that that Winter they ſtaid at Quatbridge, being the Third Year ſince their laſt arrival.

Anno Dom. DCCCXCVII.

But the next Year, according to our Annals, The Danes marched part of them into Eaſt England, and part into Northumberland, becauſe wanting Money, they could only there procure Ships, which having got they ſailed from thence Southward to the River Seine: Thus by God's Mercy this vaſt Army of Pagans did not wholly ruine the Engliſh Nation, altho it was very much weaken'd during theſe Three Years, as well by the Murrain of Cattle, as alſo by a great Plague upon Men; by which many of the King's nobleſt Thanes that were in the Kingdom dyed, of which number were, Swithulf Biſhop of Rocheſter, Beorthulf Ealdorman of the Eaſt Saxons, Wulfred Ealdorman of Hamptſhire, and Ethelheard Biſhop of Dorcheſter, with many others. But I have only noted the moſt remarkable.

The ſame Year, thoſe Robbers reſiding in Eaſt-England, and Northumberland, very much infeſted Weſt Saxony, eſpecially the Southern Coaſts, by their ſtolen Booties; chiefly with their Ships which they had got ready long before for that purpoſe; then King Alfred (being it ſeems at laſt ſenſible how much damage the want of a Fleet had done his Country) Commanded divers Galleys to be made which were almoſt twice as long as others, ſome whereof had ſixty Rowers; they were alſo ſwifter, higher, and leſs apt to rowle than others formerly built, for they were made neither according to the model of the Friſian Veſſels, nor the Daniſh, but after ſuch a manner, as was thought might prove moſt uſeful: And ſome time after in this Year, there arrived ſix Daniſh Ships at the Iſle of Wight, and Sailing along committed great ſpoil in Devonſhire, and all up and down that Coaſt. Then the King commanded that they ſhould ſet Sail with the Nine Gallyes newly built, and ſhut up the Enemies Ships from going out of the Harbour where they were; upon which the Pyrats ſailed out with Three Ships againſt them, the other three being left in the entrance of the Harbour upon the dry ground, and the Sea-men gone out of them; But the King's Fleet took two of the Daniſh Ships that came out of the Harbour, and ſlew the Men, but the Third eſcaped, though all, except Five, were kill'd: There came alſo other Ships thither, which were ſomewhat more conveniently poſted, Three of them being placed in that part of the Sea, where the Daniſh Ships had before taken up their ſtation, but all the reſt in another part, ſo that they could not aſſiſt each other, for the Tide had gone back many Furlongs from the King's Ships: And ſo the Danes going out of their Veſſels ſet upon Three Engliſh Ships which lay on the dry ground, and Fighting with them, there ſlew Lucomon the King's Admiral, and Wulfherd, Æbba, and Æthelerd, being all Frizelanders, (who it ſeems then ſerved in the King's Fleet) ſo that of the Friſons and Engliſh there were ſlain Sixty Two, of the Danes One Hundred and Twenty: But the Tide returning, the Daniſh Ships got away before the Engliſh could have out theirs at Sea, thô they were ſo ſhatter'd, that they could ſcarce reach the Coaſt of Suſſex, for two of them were ran on Shore, and the Men being brought to the King at Wincheſter, he Commanded them all to be Hang'd: But thoſe who were in the Third Ship, being very much wounded, with great difficulty reached Eaſt-England.

The ſame Year there periſhed no leſs than Twenty of their Ships together with the Seamen near the Southern Coaſt; and then alſo Wulfred Maſter of the King's Horſe Deceaſed, who was a Britiſh or Welſh Gereſe or Governour.

This Year (according to the Welſh Chronicle) Igmond the Dane, with a great number of Soldiers Landed in the Iſle of Man, or Angleſey, where the Welſhmen gave him Battle at a place called Molerain, or Meilon, wherein we may ſuppoſe the Danes got the Victory, for their Chronicle ſays nothing to the contrary, and beſides Merwy Son to Rodri King of Powis was there ſlain.

'Alſo now King Alfred Deceaſed ſix days before the Feaſt of All 'Saints. He was King over all the Engliſh Nation, (except what was 'under the power of the Danes.)

But ſince we are come to the end of this King's Life, I ſhall here give you * Florence of Worceſter's Character of him: viz. That Famous and Victorious Warriour, King Alfred, the Defender of Widows and Orphans, the moſt skilful of all the Saxon Poets, who excelled in Prudence, Juſtice, Fortitude and Temperance, being as Diſcreet and Diligent in hearing of Cauſes, and giving Judgments, as he was devout in the Service of God; was alſo moſt Liberal and affable to all Men; ſo that for theſe Vertues he was highly beloved by his Subjects, now died of an Infirmity under which he had long laboured, whoſe Body lies buried in the new Monaſtery of Wincheſter, in a ſtately Tomb of Porphyrie.

* Vid. the MSS. in Bib. Bodleian.

But I ſhall from * Aſſer's Hiſtory of this King's Life and Actions, give you a larger account of him from his Infancy.

* De Geſtis Alfredi.

He was (as you have already heard) born Anno Dom. 849, and had been twice at Rome, but after his laſt Return together with his Father, He tells us, He was bred up at Court with the great Care and Affection, both of his Father and Mother, who loved him above the reſt of his Brothers, becauſe he was not only more Witty and Handſome, but alſo of a ſweeter Diſpoſition; and it had been well if he could have improved his own excellent Parts by Humane Learning; for to his great regret afterwards, by the extream fondneſs of his Parents, or by the negligence of thoſe who had the care of his Education, he remained till the Twelfth Year of his Age, without ſo much as being taught his Letters; only having an excellent Memory, he learned by heart ſeveral Saxon Poems, being repeated to him by others; for he had a great, and natural Inclination to Poetry, as our Authour himſelf had often obſerved; and as an inſtance of the quickneſs of his Parts, gives us this Account, That one Day when his Mother ſhewed him and the reſt of his Brothers a certain fine Book in Saxon Verſe, with which they were very well pleaſed, he being taken with the beauty of the Capital Letters, at the beginning of it, ſhe promiſed to give it to him that ſhould ſooneſt underſtand and get it by heart; which Alfred undertaking to do, he carried it to his Maſter, and not only learned to Read it, but alſo got it without Book, and ſo repeating it to his Mother, had the Book given him for his pains:

after this he alſo learned the Daily Office, and then ſome Pſalms and Prayers by heart, which being writ together in a Book, he ſtill carried in his Boſome for his daily uſe: But alas! England, could not then ſupply him with any fit Tutors in the Liberal Arts, which he often complained was one of the greateſt hindrances in his Life, that at the time when he had moſt leaſure to learn, he had no Maſters that could teach him; and afterwards when he grew more in Years, he was troubled with inceſſant Pains both Night and Day, the cauſes of which were unknown to the Phyſicians, but when he came to be King, he was then taken up with the cares of the Government,and how to reſiſt the Invaſions of the Danes, ſo that he had but little time for Study; yet notwithſtanding all theſe impediments from his very Child-hood, to the day of his Death, he never ceaſed to have an inſatiable deſire after knowledge; inſomuch that he did not only at leiſure times learn himſelf,but alſo communicated that learning to others, by tranſlating into the Engliſh Saxon Tongue Oroſius's Roman, and Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtories, the latter of which Verſions is Printed, but the former is ſtill in Manuſcript, in the Library of Corpus Chriſti Coll. Oxon. as alſo in other places: he had likewiſe begun to Tranſlate the Pſalms of David, but was prevented by Death, from making an end of it.

But to how low an Ebb Learning was then reduced by the frequent Wars and devaſtations of the Danes, King Alfred himſelf tells us in his Preface to St. Gregorie's Paſtoral, that learning was ſo decay'd in the Engliſh Nation, that very few Prieſts on this ſide of Humber could underſtand the Common Service of the Church,and he knew none South of Thames, who could turn an ordinary piece of Latine into Engliſh, though things were now ſomewhat better, yet that he himſelf had turn'd this Book into Engliſh by the help of Arch-Biſhop Plegmond, with Grimbald and John his Prieſts; and had ſent one of them to every Biſhops See in the Kingdom, with an Æſtel, (as the Saxon Word is, or Stilus, as in the Latin Verſion) upon each Book of fifty Mancuſes in value, charging them in God's Name, neither to take away that Æſtel from the Book, nor any of thoſe Books out of the Church, ſeeing it was uncertain how long there would continue ſuch Learned Biſhops, as now (God be Thanked) were in all parts of this Kingdom.

But how this can conſiſt with the ſuppoſed Relation out of Aſſer, concerning the flouriſhing ſtate of Learning at Oxford, before that King's Founding the Univerſity, I do not underſtand.

But in the Twentieth Year of his Age, as ſoon as he was Married, that Diſtemper took him which held him till about his Fortieth Year, the cauſe whereof being unknown to his Phyſicians, it was ſuppoſed by ſome, that he was bewitched, and it was ſo ſharp that he feared the Leproſie or Blindneſs, or elſe ſome worſe Diſtemper, which often makes Men unuſeful or deſpiſed; but by Praying to God in a certain Church in Cornwal, (where St. Neot lay buried) and near which the King came by chance to Hunt, he was relieved of that Pain, which tho this Authour does not tell us what it was, yet it ſeems to have been ſomewhat proceeding from the ſtoppage of the Humours in the lower Parts, and which our Authour calls the Ficus, or Emerhoids.

I ſhall now in the next place ſhew you, how this King ſpent his time, as well in his private as publick Affairs, as the ſame Authour hath related it; by which the Reader will be better enabled to frame a true Character of this moſt Pious, Learned, and Magnanimous Prince.

Anno Dom. DCCCCI.

King Alfred (notwithſtanding his frequent hindrances, not only by the Daniſh Wars, but alſo his bodily Infirmities) was always mindful of the Affairs of State, thô at ſpare times he uſed Hunting (for his Recreation) and to overſee and direct his Artificers, Huntſmen and Faulkners; He built alſo his Houſes much more Magnificent than thoſe of his Predeceſſors, and at leiſure times was wont to read Engliſh Saxon Books, and learn Verſes in the ſame Tongue by heart, ſo that he never failed when he was alone to imploy himſelf well. And for the better performance of his Duty, he vowed to beſtow half his time (as far as his occaſions and Infirmities would permit) in God's Service. And becauſe it was impoſſible to know how the Hours of the Day and Night paſt, when often by reaſon of the Clouds the Sun could not be ſeen, (no Clocks being then invented) he began to think how he might diſtinguiſh the Hours by Night as well as by Day; and at laſt, by his own ingenious contrivance, he ordered Six Wax-Tapers to be made of equal length and bigneſs; ſo that each Taper being divided into Inches, and every Inch marked out upon the Taper; by this means thoſe Six Tapers being ſet up one after another before the Reliques of the Saints, (which he ſtill carried with him) gave a conſtant and certain Light during the whole Twenty four Hours, both by Night and by Day. But when ſometimes by reaſon of the Wind, which came in at the Windows or Doors of the Chappel, or thorough the Chinks of the Walls, or the Cloth of his Tents; the Tapers were made to burn out ſooner than they were uſed to do at other times; he firſt found out the Invention of making Lanthorns of Cow's Horns cut into thin Plates, whereby no Wind could waſt the Tapers; ſo that by this Invention none of them burnt out ſooner than another.

Afterwards he endeavoured to perform his former Vow in dedicating half his time to God, ſo that he was wont not only to hear Maſs every day, but alſo to repeat his Prayers, Pſalms, and other Nocturnal Offices, having made a Collection out of David's Pſalms for his own private uſe; which being with certain Prayers written in a ſmall Book, he always carried about with him in his Boſom; he likewiſe uſed to frequent the Church in the Night time, and there alone to ſay his Prayers: He was alſo very liberal in his Alms to Strangers, as well as his own People, treating all ſorts of Men with great Gentleneſs and Affability, he would often hear the Scriptures read by his own Servants, and alſo Prayers read by Strangers, when he came to any place by chance: He loved his Biſhops and all the Clergy very well, as alſo his Earls, Noblemen, and Servants; expreſſing his affection in Educating their Sons in his own Family, and by cauſing them to be conſtantly inſtructed in Letters and good Manners, with the ſame care, as if they had been his own Children: Yet for all this, the King was not ſatisfied, but was ſorry that God had not made him more capable of true Wiſdom, as well as Liberal Arts; admiring Solomon for nothing more, than that deſpiſing Riches and Worldly Glory, and deſiring of God Wiſdom, he thereby obtained not only thoſe outward things, but this Requeſt too over and above.

Thus our King imitated the Bee, which riſing early, gathers Honey from all ſorts of Flowers; So whatever was rare, that he had not in his own Kingdom, he fetched from abroad: for about this time God favouring his Pious Deſires, ſent him Werfriht, after Biſhop of Worceſter, one very well ſkilled in the Holy Scriptures, who by this King's Command, Elegantly and exactly Tranſlated the Dialogues of Pope Gregory, out of Latin, into the Engliſh Saxon Tongue; and after him Plegmond a Mercian, who was afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, a Venerable Man, and indued with all true Knowledge; to whom we may alſo add Æthelſtan, and Werwulf, Prieſts, and the King's Chaplains.

Theſe learned Men above-mentioned, King Ælfred had ſent for out of Mercia, whoſe Erudition, as it daily encreaſed the King's Love to it, ſo his greedy Thirſt after it could never be ſatisfied; for Night and Day, as often as he had leiſure, he Commanded ſome or other to read to him, for he was never without one of them near him, whereby he obtain'd a general Knowledge of almoſt all ſorts of Books; nor was he contented with thoſe he found at home, but he ſent Meſſengers into France to procure new Maſters; fetching from thence one Grimbald a Prieſt and Monk, a worthy Man, and an excellent Chanter, and one well ſkilled in all Secular, as well as Eccleſiaſtical Learning; as alſo John another Prieſt and Monk, throughly verſed in all manner of Litterature, by whoſe aſſiſtance, as the King's Mind became much inlarged, ſo in Requital he Honour'd and Enrich'd them.

And here I may likewiſe add, what ſome other Authors have written concerning theſe two laſt Learned Perſons, by whoſe aſſiſtance he firſt Founded the Univerſity of Oxford, as hath been already related; for John Rouſe, in his Hiſtory of the Kings of England, hath wrote of theſe two Monks, that Grimbald was ſent for from his Monaſtery in Flanders, (then counted part of France) as John was from his of St. Bertin, at St. Omers; this is that John commonly call'd Scotus and Erigena, (thô from whence he borrowed this laſt Name, I ſhall not determine, ſince the Learned differ ſo much about it) 'twas he Tranſlated Dioniſius his Hierarchia out of Greek into Latin, which is now publiſh'd by the Learned Dr. Gale.

About the ſame time Aſſer alſo relates, that he was ſent for by the King from the Weſtern, or furtheſt Parts of Britain, (that is, from St. David's in Wales) and being kindly received by him, he earneſtly entreated him to leave whatever he had on the other ſide of Severne, and Dedicate himſelf wholly to his Service; but he could not promiſe that for above ſix Months in the Year, ſtanding engaged the other ſix to reſide at his own Monaſtery; for the Abbot and Monks there hoped that by his Intereſt with the King, they might better avoid thoſe Troubles and Injuries from King Hemeid, who had often ſpoiled that Monaſtery and Dioceſs; by the Expulſion of its Biſhops, as he had done the Archbiſhop Novis, our Author's Kinſman; for he alſo tells us, that both at this time and long before, all the Countries on the South part of Britain did then belong to King Ælfred's Dominions; Hemeid with all the Inhabitants of South Wales, and Rodri with his ſix Sons having ſubjected themſelves to his Empire; Howel alſo the Son of Rice, King of Gleguiſing, Brochmail and Fermail Kings of Guent being oppreſſed by the Tyranny of Eadred Earl of the Mercians, deſired of the King, that he would pleaſe to take the Dominion over them, and be their Protector againſt their Enemies: Alſo Heliſed the Son of Teudyr King of Brechonoc being kept under by the power of the ſaid Sons of Rodri, ſought the Protection of the King, as did Anarawd the Son of Rodi, (together with his Brethren) who all at laſt forſaking the friendſhip of the Northumbers, by which they had received no advantage, bnt rather damage, came to the King deſiring his favour, and were honourably received by him.

And

John this Scotus being [illegible] by King Alfred's [illegible] settled at Malmesbury, he there taught Grammar and Rhetoric till becoming hated by his schollars for his too great severity, he was by them set upon, and stabbed to death by their Pen knives which was certainly a hainous and inhuman deed. his body was first buried privately in the church of St Laurence where it remained for some time till the Monks observing for many nights a Light to hang over y^e Place removed his body into their [illegible] and buried it on the left of the Altar. Hist. [illegible] Hoveden

Anno Dom. DCCCCI.

Prince Anarawd being enrichedwith many great gifts, ſubmitted himſelf to the King's Dominion, together with all his Subjects, promiſing to be obedient in all things to his Royal Pleaſure; neither did they deſire the King's Friendſhip in vain, for thoſe who loved to encreaſe their power obtained it, thoſe who deſired Money had it, thoſe who only ſought his Friendſhip enjoy'd it; but all of them did partake of his kindneſs and protection, as far as the King was able to defend them.

Then our Authour further adds, That after he had been with the King Eight Months, he gave him a grant of Two Monaſteries, called Ambreſbyri in Wiltſhire, and Banuwelle, together with all that was there, adding theſe words; That he had not now given theſe ſmall things, but in order to beſtow greater on him; for ſome time after he gave him alſo Exanceſter (now Exeter) with all the Lands that belonged to it in Weſt Saxony, and Cornwal; beſides other daily preſents, too long here to recite, which he ſays, he does not relate out of vain Glory, but to ſet forth this King's Liberality. Note, That by Exceſter he means only the Abbey.

Which alſo, as well as his Piety was very great; for the King had now order'd two Monaſteries to be built, the one at Æthelingey, the place of his Retreat above-mentioned, putting Monks therein of divers Nations, becauſe he could then find no Gentlemen nor Freemen of his own Country, that would undertake a Monaſtic Life; the other Monaſtery he built near the Eaſt-Gate of Shaftſbury, for an Habitation for Nuns, over which he made his own Daughter, Æthelgova Abbeſs, placing many Noble Virgins there, to ſerve God with her in a Monaſtic Life.

All which being finiſhed, he then conſidered how he might further add to what he had already done; and therefore being ſtirred up by the Divine Grace, he Commanded his Officers to divide all his Yearly Revenues into two equal parts, the firſt of which he allotted to ſecular Affairs; diſtributing it to skillful Artificers and Architects, who came to him from all parts far and near, whom he diſcreetly rewarded giving every Man according to his Merit; And the other half he dedicated to God, which he Commanded his Officers to divide likewiſe into four parts, ſo that one part ſhould be diſcreetly beſtowed upon poor Men of all Nations, that came to him; a ſecond part was to be reſerved for the two Monaſteries which he had founded; a third for that School which he had made up of many conſiderable perſons of his own Nation, as well as Foreigners. And which is ſuppoſed to have been the Univerſity of Oxford.

And the fourth part was to be ſent ſome Years to the Monaſteries in Weſt Saxony and Mercia, and other Years to the Churches and Monks, ſerving God in Brtiain, France, Cornwall and Northumberland, nay as far as into Ireland; to each of them by turns according to his preſent Abilities. Nor did he only thus dedicate one half of his Revenues, but alſo one half of the Labours of his Body and Mind to God's Service, as hath been already declared.

Nor was he leſs exact in all things elſe he undertook; for he was the Great Patron of the Oppreſſed, whoſe Cauſe and Defence he almoſt alone ſupported, having very little aſſiſtance from others; ſince almoſt all the Powerful and Great Men of that Kingdom rather addicted themſelves to Secular, then Divine imployments, and purſued every one his own private Intereſt, without any conſideration to the Common good: but the King in his Judgments ſtudied the advantage as well of the meaner ſort as of the

Anno Dom. DCCCCI.

Noble or Great, the latter of which, did often times in the publick Aſſemblies of the Ealdormen and Sheriffs pertinaciouſly quarrel among themſelves, ſo that none of them would ſcarce allow any thing that was adjudged by the ſaid Magiſtrates in their Courts, to be Right; and by reaſon of theſe obſtinate diſſentions, divers of them were compell'd to appeal to the King, which alſo both ſides often deſired to do; for they found that he diligently enquired into all the Judiciary Sentences that were given throughout his Kingdom, and if he found any injuſtice in them, he forthwith ſent for the Judges, before whom ſuch falſe Judgments were given and either by himſelf, or elſe by ſome truſty Commiſſioners had thoſe Judges examin'd, to know the reaſon wherefore they had given ſuch unjuſt Sentences, and then enquired whether they had done this through Ignorance, or elſe for Love, Hatred, or Fear, or elſe for lucres ſake; but if the Judges proteſted, (and it was alſo found upon Examination) that they had paſſed ſuch Sentence, becauſe they were able to judge no better in the Cauſe; then would the King with great moderation reprove their Ignorance and Unskilfulneſs; telling them, He wondred much at their preſumption in taking upon them the Office of a Judge, without having firſt duly ſtudied the Laws, and therefore enjoyned them either to lay down their Imployments, or elſe immediately to apply themſelves to ſtudy them with more care: Which when they had heard, they took this reproof for ſufficient puniſhment, and betook themſelves to ſtudy with all their might; ſo that moſt of all the Ealdormen, who were illiterate from their Youth, rather deſired to learn the Laws thô with labour, then lay down their Imployments; but if any one through Age, or great incapacity could not profit in thoſe ſtudies, he made either his Son or ſome near Kinſman read to him Engliſh, Saxon Books, when ever he had time, repenting that he had not employed his Youth in thoſe Studies, and eſteeming thoſe Young Men Fortunate, who could now be more happily inſtructed in all Liberal Arts.

* Chap. 2.

So far Aſſer hath given us a particular Account of this King's Life and Converſation, both in publick and private: But if Andrew Horne, in his Book call'd, * The Mirrour of Juſtices (a great part of which is ſuppoſed to be collected from divers ancient Saxon Records that are now loſt,) may be credited, this King condemn'd no leſs than Fourty four inferior Judges, in Hundred and County Courts, to be hanged, in one Year, for their falſe Judgments, either in condemning or acquitting Men without the Verdict of the Jury; but the particular Caſes being many, and long, I refer you to the Authour himſelf, wherein you will ſee the Difference between the manner of Judicial Proceedings in thoſe Times, from what they were preſently after the Norman Conqueſt.

But ſome of our Hiſtorians, (as particularly Harding in his Chronicle, make this King to have collected a Body of Laws, not only out of the Old and New Teſtament, but alſo from the Greek, Roman, Britiſh, and Daniſh Laws; which, if it were ever done, is not now extant.

Having thus finiſhed the Life of King Alfred, I cannot but take Notice of his laſt Will and Teſtament, (the only one we have left of all the Engliſh-Saxon Kings,) wherein, at the very beginning, he ſtyles himſelf, ' By the Divine Grâce, King of the Weſt-Saxons, with the Means and ' Aſſiſtance

Anno Dom. DCCCCI.

Aſſiſtance of Athelred the Archbiſhop; as alſo with the Aſſent and Conſent of the Nobility of all Weſt-Saxony, whom he there ſummons as Witneſſes of this his laſt Will; and to be Truſtees and Overſeers of his Goods and Eſtate, for the good of his Soul, as well of the Inheritance which GOD and the chief Men, together with the Ealdormen of the People, had affectionately and bountifully beſtowed upon him, as alſo of the Inheritance which his Father Æthelwulf had bequeathed to him and his three Brothers, viz. Æthelbald, Æthered and himſelf; ſo as that the Survivor of them ſhould enjoy the entire Dominion of the whole Kingdom: And then proceeds to ſhew the particular force of that Entail, according to his ſaid Father's Will, in theſe Words, as he gives it us, ſpeaking in the firſt Perſon.

‘ That if it ſhould happen, That Æthelbald, the eldeſt Son of our Father, ſhould firſt deceaſe, then Æthered, together with the Nobility of all Weſt-Saxony, ſhould be Witneſſes for us of our Share in the ſaid Kingdom, on the Day of his Coronation; whom we ſhould with all our Might endeavour to advance to the Throne, after the Death of Æthelbald our eldeſt Brother, according to the Agreement he made with us, viz. That the ſaid King Æthered ſhould permit us to enjoy our Diſtributions, as we had them before our ſaid Brother's Coronation; And alſo the Engagement he ſtood in to us concerning the ſaid Hereditary Diſtribution, was confirmed in like manner, to wit, that the Lands and Territories, which K. Æthered, by our Aſſiſtance, and the Power of our Men, ſhould acquire to himſelf; as alſo the Dominions which ſhould fall to him by Hereditary Right, he ſhould, in Brotherly Love, proportionably divide with us. ‘ But yet, if it ſhould ſo happen, that Æthered ſhould ſucceed to the Kingdom, he himſelf was to promiſe the ſame thing: But he refuſing, (as this Teſtament particularly takes notice,) ‘ to obſerve this Agreement, only promiſed, That as for the Lands and Territories which he, by Alfred's and his People's Aſſiſtance ſhould acquire to his Dominions, as alſo the Inheritance to which he was born, he would, after his deceaſe, confer upon none elſe but my ſelf: And being thus pacified, I thereupon remitted all further Complaints againſt my Brother.

Then he proceeds farther, ‘ That in caſe it ſhould happen, that we all ſhould fall by the hands of our Daniſh Enemies, then it was eſpecially provided, that every one of us ſhould ſo diſpoſe of our Eſtates to our Sons, that each of them ſhould ſucceſſively enjoy our Inheritance, and our Lands and Poſſeſſions in like manner, as the Inheritance it ſelf, with the Dominions, Lands and Poſſeſſions, which had been before conferred upon us. And then he goes on to recite what had been formerly done in a General Council of the Weſt Saxon Nobility at Swinbourne, wherein he had adjured them all to bear witneſs of the manner and intent of the former Entail; the ſum of which was, ‘ That ſince K. Æthered his Elder Brother was deceaſed, there was then none left but himſelf, who had any writing or Teſtimony concerning this Inheritance, nor any other Heir beſides himſelf; and that if any one ſhould offer to claim the ſaid Inheritance, he ſhould loſe his Right, unleſs he forthwith produced witneſſes of it; but then he heard that all his Kinſmen were dead, and ſo the whole Inheritance of King Æthelwulf his Father was devolved upon him, by a Charter made thereof at his General Council at Langdene; which Charter he had then like-

Anno Dom. DCCCCI.

‘wiſe commanded to be read before the Witneſſes of all Weſt Saxony; and after it was read, he ordered all there preſent to declare, whether they had heard or knew of any Man who could juſtly claim any Right to his Inheritance, which had never come to his Knowledge before; becauſe it was his intent to diſinherit none of his Kinſmen of any thing; and then all the Princes and Ealdormen of his People did firmly and poſitively declare, that they never heard of any who had a juſter Title to it than himſelf, and then they gave him full power to make his Will, and bequeath his Eſtate to his Kinſmen and Friends in ſuch manner as beſt pleaſed him.

‘Next King Alfred proceeds in the preſence of the ſaid Witneſſes, to make his laſt Will, and to confer upon his Eldeſt Son Edward divers Lands and Territories there particularly mentioned; lying in divers Countries in England, (* but without any mention of the Crown;) he alſo leaves other Lands there recited to his Younger Son; the like he does for each of his Daughters, to whom he gives divers Lands there particularly ſet down; and then bequeaths to Athelm and Æthelwald his Brother's Sons, divers Towns there alſo particularly recited; then follow his Legacies in Money to his Sons, Daughters and Servants, and to his Kinſmen above mentioned; as alſo to Ethelred, General of his Militia, and to the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, Aſſer Biſhop of Shireburne, and ſeveral other Biſhops; all which would be too tedious here to be ſet down,

* Vid. The Reaſon in the Introduction.

And to let you ſee that Entails were then in force,

‘He farther Wills, That thoſe to whom he had given his Free-Hold-Lands, ſhould not alienate them beyond their own Lives, and if they had no Children they ſhould go to the next of Kin, eſpecially to the Eldeſt Son as long as any one of them remain'd alive; for ſo his Father had bequeathed his Inheritance; but if it ſhould any ways happen that his ſaid Lands ſhould come into the hands of Women, then he Wills, That after their Deceaſe thoſe Lands ſhould revert to his next Male Kindred deſcending from their bodies, &c.

‘And then concludes with an earneſt Exhortation and deſire, that none of his Relations ſhould any ways diſquiet each other concerning thoſe things which he had already given and bequeathed to them; ſince the whole Nobility of the Weſt Saxon Nation had already agreed with him, that it was but Juſt and Right that he ſhould leave them as free as the Thought of Man could make them.

This is the ſubſtance of King Alfred's Will, which I have been the more particular in reciting, becauſe it is one of the moſt Remarkable Pieces in our Engliſh Saxon Antiquities, and ſhews us the manner of Succeſſion, not only to private Eſtates; but to the Crown it ſelf in thoſe Days. Thô we could have wiſhed that the Original had been preſerved, being in the Engliſh Saxon Tongue, of which this is only a Tranſlation made by Aſſer at the end of this King's Life.

The Latine of which is indeed ſo barbarous, and obſcure, that I would rather adviſe the curious Reader to peruſe the Original it ſelf, then venture to give him an imperfect interpretation of any more of it; having here already ſet down the moſt material heads, and which I thought did principally conduce to our preſent deſign.

King Alfred had born to him by the Queen his Wife above-mention'd, Æthelflede his Eldeſt Daughter, and after her Eadward his Eldeſt Son, then Æthelgeofeu, or Ethelgiva, then Ælfthryth, and laſtly Ethelweard, beſides thoſe thoſe who died in their Infancy: Æthelflede when ſhe came to mature Years, was Married to Eadred, Earl of the Mercians; Æthelgiva vowing Chaſtity, undertook a Monaſtic Life; Ethelward the youngeſt Child, was by the King's prudent Order, put to School under careful Maſters, together with moſt of the Nobility's Sons of the Kingdom; in which School both Latin and Saxon Books were conſtantly read; and here they alſo learned to write: So that before they were admitted to Hunt, or handle Arms, they were well improved in the Liberal Arts,

As for this Prince Ethelward, * Thomas Rudburne relates from the Annals of Wincheſter, that he was bred up at Oxford, and became learned above that Age; but being more given to Letters than Arms, we find nothing of him in our Annals more than the time of his Death, tho' he lived till he was about Forty Years of Age; but he had two Sons, Edwin, and Ethelwin, of a more Warlike Temper; who being Slain in a Fight againſt Anlafe King of the Danes, were by their Couſin King Athelſtan's appointment, buried in the Church of the Abbey of Malmsbury, as our William the Monk of that place recites.

As for the Princeſs Æthelflede, ſhe will make ſo great a Figure in her Brother's Reign, that I ſhall ſuſpend ſaying any more of her here.

Beſides theſe Children of King Alfred mentioned by Aſſer, the Chronicle of St. Swithune tells us of another Son born before Prince Edward, called Edmund, who lived to be Crowned King by by his Father's appointment, in his Life-time; but dying before him, he was buried under a Marble-Stone, on the North ſide of the Altar of the Abbey Church of Wincheſter: So that we may hence perhaps ſupply that Chaſme in Aſſer's Life of this Prince; where ſpeaking of thoſe Children of his, who died Young, ſays, In quorum numero eſt —— but no Name being found in any of the Copies extant, it poſſibly ought to be ſupplied with Edmundus: But ſince this Prince is not mentioned in any other Hiſtorian or Pedigree of our Kings, I leave it to the Reader's diſcretion to determine as he pleaſes concerning him.

As for the other Sons, Edward and Elfrithe, they were Educated in the King's Court, with great care of their Governors, and were taught by them to ſhew great reſpect toward Strangers, and a tender love to their own People, with a moſt Dutiful obſervance of their Father.

Immediately after this Excellent King's Death and Burial, his Eldeſt Son ſucceeded him under the Title of King EDWARD, commonly called the Elder.

Anno Dom. DCCCI.

THis Prince (according to Annals) now began his Reign, being (as Aſſer and Bromton in his Chronicle relate) anointed King at Kingſton, by Plegmund Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, of whom Ethelwerd in his Hiſtory expreſly tells us, That he ſucceeded to the Monarchy, and tho' the Eldeſt Son of King Alfred, yet was he Elected by all the Chief Men of the Kingdom, and Crowned on Whitſunday. Will. of Malmsbury obſerves, that tho' this Prince was much inferior to his Father in Learning and Knowledge; yet far exceeded him in Power and Grandeur, enjoying the benefit of thoſe Labours which his Father had undergone.

But ſo ſoon as ever he came to the Crown, as the Saxon Annals relate, he met with a very great diſturbance; for Æthelwald his Couſin German, (Son as is ſuppoſed to Ethered his Father's Elder Brother) pretending he had better right to the Crown than King Edward, Rebelled againſt him, and went over to the Danes: So the Prince preſently invaded the King's Territories, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the Royal Towns of Tweoneam, (now Tweoxbeam) and Winburne, without the King's privity; whereupon he advanced his Army, and pitched his Camp at a place called Baddanbyrig, (a Hill near Winburne;) but Æthelwald, with thoſe Men who were joined with him, kept themſelves within the Town, and having ſhut up all the Gates, King Edward commanded them to Surrender; but he Swore that he would there either Conquer or Die; yet notwithſtanding all this bluſtring, he privately withdrew himſelf by Night, and marched back to the Daniſh Army in Northumberland: Upon this, the King gave Orders to his Men to purſue him; yet tho' they did ſo, they could not overtake him; ſo he got ſafe to the Daniſh Army, where they joyfully received him for their King.

But Ranulh Higden in his Polychron tells us, That having taken away a Nun along with him out of the Monaſtry of Winburne, he went over to the Danes, which if ſo, (as is moſt likely) the King could not then Apprehend her; but it ſeems King Edward followed him ſo cloſe, that he forced him to go over into France, (as Mat. of Weſtminſter relates) that he might there obtain more Recruits, to give the King freſh diſturbance; and therefore it is moſt probable, what Mat. Weſtminſter, and Bromton's Chronicle tells us, That the King after Æthelwald's departure, ſeized his Wife, whom (having been a Nun) he had taken againſt the Command of the Biſhop, from the Monaſtry above-named, whither ſhe was now brought back again.

In the mean time (according to Mat. Weſtminſter) the King improved his Dominions, by building new Towns, and repairing ſome Cities, which had been before deſtroyed.

Anno Dom. DCCCCII.

'This Year was fought a Battle at Holme, between the Kentiſh Men 'and the Danes.] But Florence of Worceſter with greater probability places this Action two Years after, wh~~en Adelwald (as he there calls him)~~ was ~~now returned out of France~~. of which we shall say more [illegible]

Anno Dom. DCCCCIII.

'About this time deceaſed Athulf the Ealdorman, Brother of Q. Ealſwithe, King Edward's mother, as alſo Virgilius the Scotiſh Abbot, and 'Grimbald the Prieſt, (one of King Alfred's Inſtructors) 8 Ides of July. 'This Year alſo was conſecrated the new Monaſtery of Wincheſter, about 'the Feaſt of St. Judoc.

Here was alſo a Colledge of Secular Chanons, firſt placed by King Edward, according to the will of his Father King Alfred, and it was called the New Minſter, to diſtinguiſh it from the Old Minſter or Cathedral.

The nearneſs of theſe two Monaſteries afterwards occaſioned great differences between them, until the Monks of this new Abbey, (who were placed here in the room of the Secular Chanons, by Biſhop Ethelwald, Anno Dom. 963.) were removed without the Walls, to a place called Hyde, as you ſhall hear in due time; and here alſo the Bones of King Alfred were new Buried by King Edward his Son, (as Will. of Malmsbury relates) becauſe of ſome fooliſh Stories made by thoſe of the Old Monaſtery, concerning the dead King's Ghoſt walking in ſome Houſes adjacent to the Church.

This Year alſo, according to our Annals, the Moon was Eclipſed.

Anno Dom. DCCCCIV.

a proclamation being return'd out of France

The next Year Prince Ethelwald incited the Daniſh Forces in Eaſt-England to Arms; ſo that they over-ran and ſpoiled all the Country of Mercia, as far as Crekelade, (~~now Crekelade~~ in Wiltſhire); and there paſſing the Thames, they took in Brædene, (now Brædon Foreſt in Wiltſhire) whatſoever they could find, and then return'd home. In the mean time King Edward, ſo ſoon as he could get his Army together, followed them, and deſtroyed all the Country which lies between the Ditch and the River Ouſe, as far as the Northern Fens.

Anno Dom DCCCCV.

By the Ditch above-mention'd, Florence of Worceſter underſtands that bound, or limit drawn between the Territories of the late King Edmund, and the River Ouſe, which at this day is known by the name of the Devil's Ditch, that formerly divided the Mercian Kingdom from that of the Eaſt-Angles.

And Bromton's Chronicle under this Year further adds, That Ethelwold having thus paſſed the Thames at Crekelade, ~~took Crikelden~~, and marched as far as Brandenſtoke (now Bradenſtoke in Wiltſhire) ſo that (as Mr. Camden well obſerves in his Britannia) our Modern Hiſtorians have been much miſtaken in ſuppoſing that place to be Baſing-Stoke in Hampſhire: But to return to our Hiſtory.

As ſoon as the King reſolved to quit thoſe parts, he order'd it to be proclaimed throughout the whole Army, that they ſhould all march off; but the Kentiſhmen ſtaying behind, contrary to his command, he ſent Meſſengers to them to come away; yet it ſeems, before they could do it, the Danes had ſo hemmed them in, that they were forced to fight, and there Eadwald the King's Thane, and Cenwulf the Abbot, with many more of the Engliſh Nobility were ſlain; and on the Danes part were kill'd Eoric their King, and Prince Ethelwald, who had ſtirred them to this Rebellion, and Byrtſig the Son of Prince Beornoth, and Yſopa General of the King's Army, and abundance of others; which it would be too tedious to enumerate: But it was plain that there was a great ſlaughter made on both ſides, yet nevertheleſs the Danes kept the Field of Battel.

Alſo this Year Queen Ealſwithe, (the Mother of King Edward) deceaſed; in which alſo a Comet appeared.

Who this Eoric, King of the Danes, was, is uncertain; I ſuppoſe him to have been the Daniſh King of the Eaſt-Angles, whoſe death (according to Will. of Malmesbury's Account) falls about this time, for he ſays thus; That this King was killed by the Engliſh, whom he treated tyrannically, but for all this, yet they could not recover their Liberty; certain Daniſh Earls ſtill oppreſſing, or elſe inciting them againſt the Weſt-Saxon Kings; till the Eighteenth Year of this King's Reign; when they were all by him overcome, and the Country brought under obedience.

To this time we may alſo refer that great Council, which was held by King Edward the Elder, where Plegmond, Archbiſhop of Canterbury preſided; though the place where is not ſpecified, yet the occaſion of it (as we find from Will. of Malmesbury, as well as the Regiſter of the Priory of Chriſt-Church in Canterbury, cited by * Sir H. Spelman) was thus; Pope Formoſus had ſent Letters into England, threatning Excommunication, and his Curſe to King Edward and all his Subjects, becauſe the Province of the Weſt-Saxons had been now for Seven Years without any Biſhops; whereupon the King ſummoned a great Council or Synod of Wiſe men of the Engliſh Nation, wherein the Archbiſhop read the Pope's Letters; then the King and the Biſhops, with all his Lay-Subjects, upon mature deliberation, found out a ſafe courſe to avoid it, by appointing Biſhops over

* Council, I. Vol. p. 387.

Anno Dom. DCCCCV. over each of the Weſtern Counties, dividing what Two Biſhops had formerly held, into Five Dioceſſes.

The Council being ended, the Archbiſhop went to Rome, and reciting the King's Decree with the Advice and Approbation of the Chief Men of his Kingdom; He thereby, and with rich Preſents, ſo pacified the Pope, that Plegmond obtain'd his confirmation thereof; and then returning into his own Country, he ordained five Biſhops in one day, (to wit) Frideſtan to the Church of Wincheſter, Aldeſtan to Cornwall, Werſtan to Shireborne, Athelm to Wells, and Eadwulf to Crediton in Devonſhire.

But Archbiſhop Parker, in his Antiq. Britannicæ, under this very Year thus recites this Tranſaction out of a very Ancient Manuſcript Author, whom he does not particularly name; viz. That Plegmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, together with King Edward, called a great Council of the Biſhops, Abbots, Chief men, Subjects and People, in the Province of the Gewiſſes, where theſe two Biſhopricks were divided into five.

So that you ſee here was no leſs than five new Dioceſſes erected at once, by the Authority of both the King and the Great Council of the Nation, though, it ſeems, the Pope took upon him the confirmation of this Decree.

The ſame Authors likewiſe tell us, That Archbiſhop Plegmond ordained two more Biſhops over the Ancient Provinces (to wit) one Bernod, for the South Saxons, and Cenwulf for the Mercians, whoſe See was at Dorcheſter in Oxfordſhire.

Cardinal Baronius in his Annals, having given us a Copy of theſe Letters of Pope Formoſus, hath found a notable Error in the Date of them, for being written Anno Dom. 904, or 905. they could not be ſent by that Pope who was dead about 9 or 10 years before, and therefore the Cardinal would put the time of this Council back to Anno Dom 894. but then as Sir H. Spelman in his Notes upon it well obſerves, the fault will be as great this way as the other; for King Edward, under whom this Council was held, was not King till above 10 years after; therefore ſome would place this Council in the latter end of King Alfred's Reign, after the Kingdom came to be ſetled upon the expulſion of the Danes; but Sir H. Spelman affirms, That theſe things being written long after the time when they were tranſacted, the name of Formoſus might be put into the Copies of theſe Letters, inſtead of Pope Leo the Fifth, and then all things will fall right enough. But as to Fritheſtan Biſhop of Wincheſter, this Account of Will. of Malmesbury will not hold, for our Annals tell us, That he was not made Biſhop till Anno Dom. 910. upon the death of Biſhop Denulph, and therefore that See could not be ſo long void, as this Relation would have it. The like miſtake is in making Werſtan to be then Biſhop of Shireborne.

Anno Dom. DCCCCVII. This Year Elfred, who was Gereſe of Bathe, died, and about the ſame time there was a Peace made between King Edward and thoſe of Eaſt-England and Northumberland; That is, as Florence interprets it, with the Daniſh Army inhabiting thoſe Provinces, at Ityngaford; but where the place was, is now unknown to us, unleſs it be Ilford near Chriſt-Church in Hampſhire, which is ſeated in the new Foreſt, called Itene in Engliſh-Saxon. T~~his Year alſo Ligceaſter, now~~ Leiceſter, ~~was rep~~aired.

And Florence of Worceſter likewiſe relates it to have been done in the Year 908. by the care of Ethelred Duke of Mercia, and the Lady Elfleda his Wife; and this Author does alſo inform us, That this Year the King ſubdued Eaſtſeax, Eaſt-England, and Northumberland, with many other Provinces, which the Danes had a long time been poſſeſſed of, but Eaſt-England was not reduced till ſome Years after; alſo that he conquered the borders of the Scots, Cumbrians and Galloway Men, with the Weſtern

Britains, and forced their Kings to yield themſelves to him, and then he returned home with great Glory and Honour. Anno Dom. DCCCCVII. Chron: Wal.

This Year alſo Cadelh, Prince of South Wales, died; he was ſecond Son to Roderic the Great, and Father to Howel Dha, (i. e. the Good,) who ſucceeded him in that Dominion.

Some of the South Wales Antiquaries have endeavoured to prove this Cadelh to have been the eldeſt Son of Roderic the Great; but Mr. Vaughan hath ſo Learnedly confuted this Miſtake in a ſmall Treatiſe which he publiſhed on that Subject at Oxford 1663, that I think no Man can have any Reaſon to be diſſatisfied with it.

Anno Dom. DCCCCVIII. S. A.

This Year (according to Florence ~~of Worceſter~~) the ancient City of Caerlegion, th~~at is in the English Legeceſter, (and~~ called now Weſtcheſter,) was by the Command of Earl Ethered, and Ethelflede his Wife, repaired. Which thô Mr. Camden in his Britannia will needs have to be Leiceſter, yet that it was not ſo, may appear from the Britiſh Name of Caerlegion, i. e. the Town of the Legions which was never given to Leiceſter, but ~~only~~ to Weſtcheſter by the ancient Britiſh Inhabitants.

Anno Dom. DCCCCIX. Alfred

'This Year deceaſed Denulph, who was Biſhop of Wincheſter.] This is he of whom our Hiſtorians tell us, That ~~the~~ King lighting on him as he lay concealed at Athelney, being then but a Swineheard, and finding him a Man of excellent Natural Parts, ſet him to School to learn, and he became ſo good a Proficient in Letters, that he was made firſt a Doctor, and afterwards a Biſhop.

'This Year alſo the Body of St. Oſwald once King of Northumberland was tranſlated from Bardenigge '(that is, Bardeney in Lincolnſhire) into Mercia.

Anno Dom. DCCCCX.

'Frithestan now took the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, and Biſhop Aſſer alſo 'deceaſed ſoon after, who was Biſhop of Shireburne. Alſo the ſame Year 'King Edward ſent an Army of ~~the~~ Weſt Saxons, together with the Mercians, 'who very much waſted Northumberland, and ſtaying there five Weeks, 'deſtroyed many of the Danes.

Florence of Worceſter and Simeon of Durham give us a very good Reaſon for this Action, viz. That the Danes had now broken the League they had entred into with King Edward; ſo that he never left them till he had forced their Kings and Commanders again to renew the Peace; which however it ſeems they kept not long.

For the next Year our Annals tell us,

Anno Dom. DCCCCXI. S. A.

'That the Daniſh Army in Northumberland not regarding the Peace 'which King Edward and his Son had made with them, again waſted the 'Province of the Mercians; but the King being then in Kent, had got together about 100 Ships, which ſailed toward the South-Eaſt to meet 'them, and then the Danes ſuppoſing that the greateſt part of the King's 'Forces were in his Fleet, thought they might march ſafely whither they 'would without fighting; but ſo ſoon as the King underſtood they were 'gone out to plunder, he ſent an Army conſiſting of Weſt Saxons and 'Mercians, who following the Danes in the Rear, as they returned home 'met with them (in a place called Wodnesfield,) and fought ~~with~~ them, 'routing and killing many Thouſands of them, with Eowils and Healfden 'their Kings, with ſeveral Earls and Chief Commanders of their Army; whoſe Names I forbear to give, becauſe I would tire my Reader as little as I could.

But to theſe Kings, as the * Annals of Winchelcomb inform us, one Reginald ſucceeded.

Alſo the ſame Year, as Florence hath it, there was ~~a~~ remarkable Battle between the Engliſh and the Danes in Staffordſhire, ~~but~~ the former obtained the Victory.

Anno Dom. DCCCCXII.

This Year Æthered, the Ealdorman of the Mercians, deceaſed; and the King then took the Cities of London and Oxenford into his own hands, with all the Territories belonging to them.

But ~~it ſeems~~ the Lady ~~Elflede, now a~~ Widow, still kept all the reſt of Mercia; for this Year the Annals ſay, That ſhe being Lady of the Mercians, came on the Vigil of the Feaſt of Holyrood to a place called Sceargeat, (which is now unknown,) and there built a Caſtle; and the ſame Year did the like at Bricge, which Mr. Camden ſuppoſes to be Bridgenorth in Shropſhire, that Town being called Brigge by the common People at this day. And Florence alſo adds, That about this time ſhe built the Town of Bremesbyrig.

Anno Dom. DCCCCXIII.

this year ‘~~Now~~ about the Feaſt of St. Martin King Edward Commanded the Town ‘of Heortford to be new built, lying between the Rivers Memar, Benefican, ‘and Lygean, the firſt and ſecond of which Rivers is now hard to name ‘right, only it is certain they were two Rivulets that diſcharged them‘ſelves into the River Lee, (then called Lygean,) between Hartford and ‘Ware.

If we look into wales we find that this year Anarawd K. of South wales deceased, and that Edwal Voel succeeded as all the Chronicles agree

Anno Dom. DCCCCXIV.

‘After this, the Summer following, between Lent and Midſummer, the ‘King marched with part of his Forces into Eaſt-Seax as far as Maldune, ‘(now Maldon,) and there encamped, whilſt a Town could be built and ‘fortified at Witham, (near adjoyning,) and then a great part of the ‘People, who had before been under the Daniſh Dominion, became ſub‘ject to him: In the mean time, whilſt part of his Forces built the Town ‘of Heortford, on the South ſide of Lee, the Lady Æthelfleda marched ‘with all the Mercians to Tamaweorthige (now Tamworth) in Staffordſhire, ‘and there built a Caſtle; and before the Feaſt of All-Saints did the like ‘at Staford; and the Year following ſhe built another at Eadesbyrig, (ſup‘poſed by Mr. Camden to be Edesbury in Cheſhire;) and alſo the ſame Year, ‘about the end of Autumn, ſhe built another at Weringwic, (now War‘wick;) and the Year following that, another at Cyricbyrig (now Cher‘bury) in Shropſhire; and another at Wearbyrig, (ſuppoſed by Mr. Camden ‘to be Wedesbury in Staffordſhire;) and before Chriſtmas another at Run‘Caſan; (that is, Runckhorne in Cheſhire.) But Florence places theſe Actions more rightly three Years after.

All which Caſtles (being built in the ſpace of the two following Years) muſt be ſuppoſed to have been done not caſually, but as the exigence of Affairs required, to ſecure the Mercian Frontiers againſt the Daniſh, as well as the Welſh Incurſions.

But it is now time to caſt our Eyes a little on the Affairs of that part of England, called Wales; where we find in the Chronicle of Caradoc, That this Year Anarawd chief King of Wales died, leaving behind him two Sons, Edwal Ugel, (i. e. the Bald,) who Reigned after him, and Eliſe; and (as ſome ſay) a third Son named Meyric. This Edwal is he, whom our Hiſtorians ſtile Idwal Rex omnium Wallenſium; i. e. Supreme King of all Wales.

And I ſhall here likewiſe ſubjoyn what Mr. Vaughan, in his Notes upon this Chronicle, hath alſo added concerning the Welſh Affairs during the Reign of this Prince, thô happening ſomewhat before this time, viz.

Anno Dom. DCCCCXIV

'That after the Death of Rodric the Great, the Northern Britains of Stratclwyd and Cumberland were (as Hector Boetius and Buchanan relate) much infeſted and weakened with the daily Incurſions of the Danes, Saxons, and Scots; which made many of them (that is, all that would not ſubmit their Necks to that Yoke) to quit their Country, and ſeek out more quiet Habitations; ſo that under the Conduct of one Hobert they came to Gwyneth (i. e. North Wales) in the beginning of Anarawd's Reign, who commiſerating their diſtreſſed Condition, gave them the Country from Cheſter to the River Conwey to inhabit, if they could beat out the Saxons, who had lately poſſeſſed themſelves thereof.

'Theſe Britains having returned Thanks to Prince Anarawd, (as was meet,) fell upon the Saxons, and Neceſſity giving edge to their Valour, they ſoon drove them out thence, being yet ſcarce warm in their Seats; and Edred, or Ethered, Earl of Mercia, made great Preparations for the regaining of the ſaid Country: But the Northern Britains, who had ſettled themſelves there, having Intelligence thereof, for the better ſecuring of their Cattle and Goods, removed them over the River Conwey. In the mean time Anarawd was not idle, but gathering together all the Strength he could make, his Army encamped near the Town of Conwey, at a place called Cymryt, where his Men, making a gallant Reſiſtance againſt the Aſſaults of the Saxon Forces, at length after a bloody Fight obtained a compleat Victory over them. This Battle was called Gwaeth Cymryt Conwey, becauſe it was fought in the Townſhip of Cymryt, hard by Conwey; but Anarawd called it Dial Rodri, becauſe he had there revenged the Death of his Father Rodri. In this Battle Tudwal, the Son of Rodri Mawr, received a Hurt in the Knee, which made him be called Tudwall Gloff, or The Lame, ever after.

'His Brethren, to reward his Valour and Service, gave him the Lands of Unchellogoed Gwynned; and then the Britains purſuing their Victory, chaſed the Saxons quite out of Wales into Mercia, where having burnt and deſtroyed the Borders, they returned home laden with rich Spoils. And Anarawd, to expreſs his Thankfulneſs to GOD for this great Victory, gave Lands and Poſſeſſions to the Church of Bangor, as the Records of that See do teſtifie, and likewiſe to the Collegiate Church of Clynnoc in Arvon, as we read in the Extent of North Wales. After this the Northern Britains came back from beyond the River Conwey, and poſſeſſed again the Lands aſſigned to them between Conwey and Cheſter, which for a long time after they peaceably enjoyed. Some Engliſh Writers, as Mat. Weſtminſter, &c. not conſidering that the Britains had Lands in Loegria and Albania, after King Cadwalader's time, miſtake thoſe of Cumberland and Stratclwyd for the Britains of Wales; but Aſſer Menev. who lived about the Year 875, ſaith, That Halden the Dane marched into Northumberland, which he ſubdued, having before conquered the Picts and Britains of Stratclwyd in Northumberland.'

I have given you this Relation at length, becauſe it is not found in any of our Hiſtorians, and it lets us ſee, that the Engliſh, as well as the Welſh, have been very ſparing to record their own Defeats. But to return again to our Hiſtory.

About this time, (according to the * Copy of a Charter of King Edward, extant in an old Manuſcript belonging to Clare Hall in Cambridge,) he by the Command of Pope John and Arch-Biſhop Plegmund, and by the Advice of all the Biſhops and Chief Men of his Kingdom, confirmed to the Doctors and Scholars of Cambridge, as alſo to their Servants, all Priviledges which had been granted by himſelf or his Predeceſſours for ever to endure by a perpetual Right. This Charter bears Date at Granteceſter (i. e. Cambridge) in the Year 915, and is directed to Fritheſtan, then Chancellor and Doctor.

But if Sir John Spelman thought he had Reaſon to ſuſpect the Truth of that Paſſage we have cited out of Aſſer's Hiſtory of the Life of King Alfred, concerning the Studium or School at Oxford before King Alfred's time, our Antiquaries may have as much (if not more) Reaſon to queſtion the Truth of this Charter; ſince the Original of it is not to be found, but only this Tranſcript in the Book above cited; for they ſay it looks very improbable, that Cambridge ſhould have continued an Univerſity during all the time of the Daniſh Wars, and under the Poſſeſſion of thoſe three Daniſh Kings, the laſt of whom enjoyed it till the latter end of this King's Reign, as appears by our preſent Hiſtory: And beſides all this, the barbarous and pedantic Latine at the Concluſion of this Charter, where the King is made to confirm it in theſe Words: Stabili jure grata & rata decerno durare, quamdiu vertigo Poli circa terras atque Æquora, Æthera Syderum juſto moderamine volvet: Which ſeems to betray the ignorant Monk's Pen that counterfeited it; but John Rouſe, in his Manuſcript Hiſtory De Regibus Angliæ, cited by Bale, ~~relates~~ from an ancient Table and Chronicle of the Abbey of Hyde near Wincheſter, (which himſelf by the Favour of the Abbot had peruſed) the Reſtoration of the Univerſity of Cambridge by King Edward, as follows.

Cent. 8. Num. 53.

'Therefore for the Augmentation of Clerk-like Learning, as his Father 'had done to Oxford, ſo he again raiſed up Cambridge to her firſt Glory, 'which for a long time, with other general Schools, had lain deſolate 'and deſtroyed; as alſo, like a moſt loving Nouriſher of Scholars, he 'commanded that Halls for Students, Chairs and Seats of Doctors and 'Maſters, ſhould there be erected, and built at his own proper Charges, 'for he ſent from Oxford Univerſity, (which his Noble Father the King 'had founded,) Maſters of thoſe Arts which we call Liberal, together 'with Doctors in Divinity, and invited them there formally to Read 'and Teach.

But ſince the Author here cited is but of modern Times, in compariſon to this famous Univerſity, and alſo that Paſſage he hath cited out of the Annals of Hyde, is not now to be found in the Copies we have of them: I ſhall give the Reader a much more ancient Teſtimony out of Tho. Rudborn's larger Hiſtory of the Church of Wincheſter, where he cites an Epiſtle of one Bonagratia de Villa Dei, to the Black Monks of England, wherein there is this Paſſage, which I ſhall here Tranſlate, viz. That whilſt he was baniſhed from his Country into England, and ſojourned with the moſt Holy and Religious Monks in the City of Wincheſter, Helmeſtan Abbot of the ſaid Cathedral Church, and the Venerable Swithune, Præpoſitus, (i. e. Biſhop of the ſame,) who had been before in Profeſſione ſacræ Theologiæ in Studio Canterbriggienſi Cathedratus, (i. e. Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Cambridge,) had often relieved him during the many Hardſhips he ſuffered in his Baniſhment, which ſpecial Favour he deſired always ſhould be acknowledged.

Lib. 3. c. 2.

If we were aſſured that this Epiſtle was Genuine, it would advance the Antiquity of this Univerſity far higher than the time we are now treating of, and would make it Ancienter than the time of King Alfred, in the latter end of whoſe Reign St. Swithune ſate Biſhop of Wincheſter: But ſince we have not the Originals, but only Citations from theſe ancient Pieces, I ſhall not take upon me to determine of their Validity, but leave that, as alſo this Author's Credit, to the Reader's Judgment. But to return to our Annals.

Anno Dom. DCCCCXV.

'This Year Egbriht, the innocent Abbot, was ſlain on the 16th Kal. of July, a little before the Summer Solſtice; and about three Days after Æthelfleda ſent an Army againſt the Welſh, which took Brecenanmere, (ſuppoſed to be either Brecknock Caſtle, or elſe ſome place near it,) and there ſhe took the King's Wife, and about thirty four Priſoners.

'The Danes marching now on Horſeback after Eaſter from Hamtune (i.e. Northampton) and Lygraceaſter, (now Leiceſter) ſlew many Men at Hocneratune, (now Hoocnorton in Oxfordſhire) and the places adjoyning; and as ſoon as they had returned home again, they ſent out another Company of Robbers, which marched towards Ligtune, (moſt likely to be Leighton in Bedfordſhire;) but the People of that Country being forewarned of their coming, fought with them, and not only put them to flight, but alſo recovered whatſoever they had taken away, ſo that they left a great many of their Horſes and Arms behind them.

Anno Dom. DCCCCXVII.

'Now a great Fleet ſailed from the Southern Parts of Armorica, under the Command of two Earls, Ohtor and Rhoald, and ſailing about toward the Eaſt, entred the Mouth of the River Severne, and there ſpoiled all the Coaſts of North Wales toward the Sea, as far as they could; and they alſo took Cumeleac the Welſh Biſhop in Ircingafield (now Archenfeld) in Herefordſhire, and carried him Priſoner to their Ships; but King Edward within ſome time Ranſomed him for Forty Pounds; but after this, the Danes quitting their Ships, marched again towards Ircingafeild, where the Men of Hereford and Gleawceſter, and the neighbouring Towns, fought them, and put them to flight, and there ſlew Rhoald, and a Brother of Earl Ohtor's, with a great part of their Army, and drove them into a certain Wood, where they beſieged them, till they made them give Hoſtages to depart out of King Edward's Kingdom: But at laſt it ſeemed adviſable for the King to place a good Guard from the South part of the Mouth of Severne, and from the Weſt of Wales toward the Eaſt as far as the River Avon, that ſo the Danes might not Land any more on that ſide; nevertheleſs leaving their Ships, they ſtole away privately by Night in two Companies to plunder, the one to Weced (now Watchet in Somerſetſhire,) and the other to Portlocan (now Portlochbay) in the ſame County, but they were routed in both places; inſomuch, that few of them eſcaped alive, unleſs it were thoſe who ſwam off to their Ships: Then they beſieged an Iſland at Bradanrelic, (Florence calls it Reoric,) which is ſuppoſed to be a little Iſland (now called Shepholm) in the Mouth of Severne, where they were in ſuch great want of Victuals, that many died with Hunger, becauſe they could get no Proviſions there. After this they went to Deomed, (ſuppoſed to be South Wales) from whence they paſſed into Ireland.

Anno Dom. DCCCCXVIII.

All this happened in Autumn: And the ſame Year, a little before Martinmaſs, King Edward marched with his Army to Buckingaham, and there ſtayed a Month, building two Forts on each ſide the River Ouſe; before he parted thence, Thurkytel the Daniſh Earl owned him for his Lord, as alſo all

* Veſp. A. 5.

Alſo we read, in the Collections of that Learned Antiquary Mr. Lambert, (and by him given to the * Cottonian Library,) that it is found in an Ancient Chronicle, once belonging to the Monaſtry of Rocheſter, and collected by one Edmund de Hadenham, That this Year the Lady Elfleda, by the Aſſiſtance of the King her Brother, beſieged the City of Canterbury, and taking it, ſlew a great many Danes that were therein.

Anno Dom. DCCCCXIX.

‘King Edward marching with his Army to Bedanford about Martinmaſs, had the Town ſurrendred to him, and then all the Inhabitants ‘who were his Subjects returned thither, and there he ſtayed a Month; ‘and before he departed, he commanded a Caſtle to be built there on ‘the South ſide of the River.

Anno Dom. DCCCCXX.

x S. A

‘After this King Edward went to Mældune (now Maldon,) and rebuilt ‘the Town, and ſaw it fortified whilſt he was there. Alſo Earl Thurkytel ‘paſſed over into France by K. Edward's Leave and Convoy, with all thoſe ‘Danes that would follow him; as likewiſe Æthelfleda brought under her ‘Dominion the Town of Legraceſter (now Leiceſter,) and a great many ‘of the Danes, belonging to that place, became ſubject to her, as alſo ‘thoſe who were at York; nay, ſome of them confirmed it both with an ‘Oath, and by giving of Hoſtages, that they would continue ſo; but as ſoon ‘as this was done, ſhe departed this Life twelve days before Midſummer ‘at Tammeworth, it being the Eighth Year of her Government over the ‘Mercians (after her Husband's Death,) with great Moderation and Juſtice: ‘Her Body lies buried at Gleawceſter in the Eaſt Iſle of St. Peter's ‘Church.

This Lady's Death is placed in our printed Annals, under the Year 918, and that more rightly, for the Cottonian Copy of theſe Annals is certainly miſtaken, in putting the Death of this Princeſs two Years later than this, viz. 920. though they all agree in Subſtance, viz. that ſhe died at Tamworth about a Fortnight before Midſummer; and that thereupon King Edward going thither, the whole Nation of the Mercians ſubmitted to him. But whenever this Princeſs died, ſhe was certainly a Woman of great Virtue, Prudence, and Courage; and truly reſembled her worthy Father King Alfred, as far as the Difference of Sex would permit.

But to return again to our Annals,

‘The ſame Year the Daughter and Heir of Ethered, Lord of the Mercians, called Ælfwinna, whom her Mother had left her Heir, was deprived by the King of that Dominion; and ſhe was, about three weeks before Chriſtmas, brought into Weſt-Seax.

John Bevour, (who calls himſelf Caſtoreus,) in his Manuſcript Hiſtory of the Kings of England, gives us a very good Reaſon, if true, why the King dealt thus ſeverely with this young Princeſs his Niece, which was this; That Ælfwinna, not making the King her Uncle, (whom her Mother had appointed her Guardian,) privy to her Deſigns, had contracted a Mariage with Reginald, King of the Danes: Whereupon King Edward, to prevent his Enemy, entred the Country of Mercia, and took it into his own Hands, and alſo carried the ſaid Lady away with him. The ſame Author likewiſe reporteth, That about this time Leofred a Dane, and Griffyth ap Madoc, Brother-in-Law to the Prince of Weſt-Wales, came from Ireland with a great Army to Snowdon in Caernarvonſhire; and deſigning to bring all Wales and the Marches thereof to their ſubjection, over-ran and ſubdued all the Countrey as far as Cheſter, before ever King Edward had Intelligence of their Arrival; whereat he was very much offended; but being loath to trouble his Subjects in that behalf, he made a Vow, That he and his Sons with their own people, would be revenged on Leofred and Griffyth; and thereupon he came to Cheſter, and took the City from them: After this he made two Diviſions of his Army, whereof he and his Son Athelſtan led the firſt, and Edmund and Edred the ſecond; and followed them with ſuch Celerity, that he overtook them at the Foreſt of Walewode (now Sherwood), where Leofred and Griffyth ſet upon him ſo fiercely, that the King at the beginning was in ſome diſtreſs, until Prince Athelſtan ſtepped in between his Father and Leofred, and gave the Dane ſuch a Wound in the Arm, that it diſabled him from holding his Spear, whereupon he was ſoon taken, and committed to the Cuſtody of Athelſtan. In the mean time Prince Edmund and Edred encountering with Griffyth, ſlew him, and brought his Head to their Father: Upon that Athelſtan cauſed Leofred to be beheaded likewiſe, and ſo both their Heads were ſet up together on the top of the Tower of Cheſter; and Edward and his Sons returned home with great Triumph.

But it appears by the Age of Prince Edmund when he came to the Crown, that this Relation concerning himſelf and his Brother Edred's commanding part of their Father's Army, cannot be true; for he was not above Four years old when King Edward his Father died, and not above Eighteen when he began to reign.

Anno Dom. DCCCCXXI. 5. A

'This year (according to our Annals) King Edward commanded 'his men to go to the Town of Toſeceaſter (now Toceſter in Northamptonſhire) and to rebuild it; after which, the ſame year about Lent, he 'commanded the Town of Wigingamere (now Wigmore in Herefordſhire) to be rebuilt: But the ſame Summer, between Whitſuntide and 'Midſummer, the Danes of Hamptune (i. e. Northampton, as was ſaid 'before) and Ligeraceſter, and thoſe that lay Northward, broke the 'Peace, and marched to Toſeceaſter, and aſſaulting the Town a whole 'day hoped to take it, but thoſe that were within defending it until ſuch 'time as more men could come to their aſſiſtance, the Danes were forced to leave the Town, and march'd off: After this they often went 'out by night to plunder, and falling upon thoſe that were unprovided, 'took a great many men and much Cattle, between Barnewoode and 'Eglesbyrig (the former of which was Barnwood Foreſt near Bury-hill, 'and the latter Aliſbury, both in Buckinghamſhire). About the ſame 'time the Danes of Huntandune (i. e. Huntington) and the Eaſt-Angles, 'marched out and built a Caſtle at Temsford, where they ſettled themſelves, for they had left that at Huntandune, ſuppoſing that from thence 'they might recover a greater ſhare of the Countrey; and ſo they 'march'd till they came to Bedanford, (now Bedford) but the men who were within it 'going out to meet them, killed great numbers of them, putting the 'reſt to flight: After this a great Army of Danes being got together, 'advanced to the Town of Wiggingamere, and ſtormed it for moſt part 'of the day; but thoſe who were within defending it very well, they 'were

Anno Dom. DCCCCXXI.

'were forced to leave the Town, and retreat, carrying away with them all the Cattel they found thereabouts: After this alſo, the ſame Summer, there were great Forces aſſembled of King Edward's Subjects from the Towns round about Temesford, whither they went, and laying cloſe Siege to the Town, they at length took it, and kill'd a Daniſh King, and Tagloſſe an Earl, and Mannan his Son, together with his Brother, and all thoſe who defended the Town.] From which time (according to Florence) the Daniſh Power did by little and little decreaſe, and that of the Engliſh increaſe. But this Author places all theſe actions of this year under Anno 917.

'The ſame year a great many men aſſembled together in Autumn, as well from Kent, Surry, and Eſſex, as from the neighbouring Towns, and marching to Colneceaſter (i.e. Colcheſter) aſſaulted that City till they took it, and all the Plunder they found in it, and killed all the men, except thoſe that eſcaped over the Wall: After which alſo the ſame Autumn a great Army of Danes were got together with the Eaſt-Angles, both Land-Soldiers and Pyrates, whom they had invited to their aſſiſtance, hoping thereby to revenge the Defeat they had lately received; wherefore they went directly to Mældune, and beſieged that Town, till ſuch time that more men coming to its aſſiſtance, the Danes were forced to quit it, and retreat; but the men who were within it, together with thoſe that came to their aſſiſtance, overtaking the Danes, killed many hundreds of the Land-men as well as Pyrates; not long after which, King Edward marched with an Army of South-Saxons to Paſſenham (i.e. Paſham in Northamptonſhire and there continued till the Town of Tofeceaſter could be encompaſſed with a Stone-Wall, where Earl Thurferth and the chief Commande of the Daniſh Forces that belonged to Hamtune, with all towards th North as far as Weolade (that is, the River Weland) accepted King Edward for their Lord and Protector; but about the time that the King's Army was to return home, he ſent out freſh Forces to the Town o Huntandune, who repaired and rebuilt it in thoſe places that were deſtroyed, according to the King's Command; ſo that all the people o that Countrey that remained alive, ſurrendred themſelves to King Edward, and ſought his Peace and Protection. Likewiſe this very yea before Martinmaſs the King marched with an Army of Weſt-Saxons t Colneceaſter, and rebuilt the Wall, and repaired all places which wer ruinous. Then many as well of the Eaſt-Angles, as alſo of the Eaſ Saxons, who were before under the Daniſh Dominion (and had bee ſo for above thirty years), now delivered themſelves up to th King, and alſo all the Daniſh Army in Eaſt-England ſwore Allegianc to him, promiſing to do whatever he thought good, and to defend hi Subjects as well by Sea as by Land; but the Army that belonged t Grantanbyrig (i.e. Cambridge) did by themſelves chuſe the King fo their Lord and Patron, confirming it by their Oaths as he had appoin ed him. This year alſo Sytric (the Daniſh King) ſlew Neil hi Brother.

And under this year I ſuppoſe we may juſtly place the total ſubduin of the Danes, and ſubjection of the Eaſt-Angles, and conſequently the being freed from the Daniſh Yoak, under which they had groaned fo above fifty years; though what Government they had from the Dea of the laſt Daniſh King Eoric, is hard to determine; William of Malm bur ury, the only Ancient Author that hath mentioned theſe Affairs, elling us in general, That after the Death of this Eoric, the Daniſh Earls or Governors either oppreſſed them, or elſe excited them againſt the Weſt-Saxon Kings, until this King Edward by driving out the Danes reſtored the Engliſh to their Liberties, and added this Kingdom to his own Dominions fifty years after the death of King Edmund, which falls out much about this time.

Anno Dom. DCCCCXXI.

But Polidore Virgil (I know not from what Author) hath a long Story how King Eoric above-mentioned made War againſt King Edward, and being routed by him in a great Battel, and returning home, fell ſo far into the Hatred and Contempt of his Subjects, that they roſe up againſt him, and murthered him; and being then divided into Factions, were forced to ſubmit themſelves to King Edward. This (if it were true) would give a great light into this dark part of the Hiſtory of the Eaſt-Angles, of which we have but a very imperfect Account: But ſince this Relation is found in no other Author except Polydore; and beſides, expreſly contradicting the Teſtimony of William of Malmeſbury, a much more Authentick Writer, by whoſe Account (as well as by the Saxon Annals) it appears that this Eoric was dead long before: I think we may juſtly look upon Polydore's Relation as a mere Fiction, either invented by himſelf, or elſe taken from ſome Modern Author of no great Credit: Therefore I muſt now warn the Reader concerning this Hiſtorian, That though he had the Peruſal of a great many Rare Manuſcripts, yet ſince he very ſeldom cites any Authors, and that we find he ſometimes differs from our moſt Ancient Writers, and is plainly miſtaken in divers Relations, we have great reaſon to refuſe his Teſtimony, where it is not agreeable with more Authentick Authorities.

now

I have nothing elſe to add under this year, but that as William of Malmeſbury tells us, the Body of King Edmund the Martyr having lain for above Fifty Years obſcurely buried at a place called Haleſdon in Suffolk, was now by ſome devout people removed to a Town adjoining, called Badriceſworth (now St. Edmundsbury), where there was quickly a Church built over him, and unto which King Edmund, Brother to King Athelſtan, was a great Benefactor; though this place was not much taken notice of, until King Cnute, to gain the Favour of this Saint whom his Countreymen had murthered, here afterwards built a Noble Monaſtery.

De Geſt. Pontif. lib. 2.

This year alſo (according to Florence of Worceſter and Mat. Weſtminſter) the King of Scots, Reginald the Daniſh King of Northumberland, with the Duke or Earl of the Gallawy Welſhmen or Britains, came to King Edward, and ſubmitting themſelves to him, made a firm League with him. This is the firſt time we find any Submiſſion of the King of Scots; which whether it amounted to a downright Homage, and to hold that Kingdom of the Crown of England, may be much queſtioned, and is abſolutely denied by the Scotiſh Hiſtorians.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxii.

‘ of the Northern Britains, deſired to take the King for their Lord. But in this the Welſh Chronicles are wholly ſilent, as commonly they are of any action that tends to the leſſening of their Countrey.

‘ Out of Wales the King marched to Snottingaham, and took the Town, ‘ and commanded it to be repaired, and Gariſon'd with Danes as well a ‘ Engliſh; and then all the people in the Province of Mercia, of both ‘ thoſe Nations came over to him.

This year alſo (according to Florence) Athelward, Brother to King Edward died, and was buried at Wincheſter: This is that Learned Prince, Son to King Alfred, whoſe Character we have already given.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxiii.

‘ This year King Edward carried his Army about the end of Autumn ‘ to Thælwæle, (that is, Thælwalle in Cheſhire, and which is ſuppoſed to ‘ have been ſo called from its being encompaſſed at firſt with a Wall ‘ made of Bodies of Trees, called in the Saxon Tongue Thæl), where ‘ he ordered that Town to be repaired; and he commanded another ‘ part of his Forces, whilſt he ſtayed there, to march out of Mercia to ‘ Manigeceaſter, (now Mancheſter in the Kingdom of Northumberland) ‘ and order'd it to be rebuilt, and ſtrengthened with a Gariſon: This ‘ year alſo Plegmond Archbiſhop of Canterbury deceaſed, and Reginol ‘ (the Daniſh King) took Eoferwick (that is, York.)

Anno Dom. Dccccxxiv.

‘ Before Midſummer King Edward marched with his Army to Snottingaham, and ordered a new Town to be built on the South ſide of the ‘ River Trent, over-againſt that on the other ſide, and made a Bridge ‘ over the River between the two Towns; from thence the King went ‘ into Peakland (that is, the Peak in ~~that~~ Shire) to Bedecanwell (which ‘ is ſuppoſed may be Bakewell in ~~Derby~~ſhire), and commanded a Town ‘ to be built near to it, and to be fortified with a Gariſon. Then ‘ alſo the King of Scots, with all the Scotiſh Nation, and Reginald ‘ the Son of Eardulph (the Daniſh King of Northumberland) with all ‘ the Inhabitants of that Kingdom, whether Engliſh or Danes, together ‘ with the King of the Stræcled Welſhmen, and all his Subjects, did chuſe ‘ King Edward for their Patron and Lord.

But this year's actions are placed by Florence of Worceſter and Mat. Weſtminſter three years ſooner; which ſhews the Copies they had of theſe Annals differ'd from thoſe we have, though which of them is the trueſt, I ſhall not now take upon me to affirm; but it ſufficiently ſhews, that both theſe Copies were not written at one and the ſame time.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxv.

‘ And now King Edward deceaſed at Fearndune in the Province of the ‘ Mercians (now called Farrington in Berkſhire); and Ælfweard his ‘ Son alſo deceaſed not long after him at Oxnaford; (i. e. Oxford).

But the Canterbury Copy of theſe Annals, as alſo Florence of Worceſter, place the Death of theſe two Princes under the foregoing year; and indeed they ſeem to have been in the right. But this is moſt certain, that this Prince, who is called Æthelward by William of Malmesbury, was his Eldeſt Son by Queen Ælfleda his Wife, the Daughter of Earl Æthelune, and being very well inſtructed in Learning, did much reſemble King Ælfred his Grandfather as well in Face as Diſpoſition: yet though he ſurvived his Father, he never took upon him the Title of King, becauſe he outlived him ſo little a time, that he could not be ſolemnly Elected and Crowned King according to the Law and Cuſtom of Succeſſion in thoſe times.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxv.

I have nothing more to add to this Reign of King Edward the Elder, but only the Laws he made, which ſince it is not ſpecified in what year of his Reign, nor in what Common-Council of the Kingdom they were enacted, I thought beſt to refer to this place.

“In the Preface to his Laws he ſtrictly charges and commands his Officers, that as much as in them lies they do Juſtice according as it ſtands in the Judicial Book (ſuppoſed to be ſome Book of Preſidents or Judgments); and without all fear boldly diſpenſe common Right to all men; and that they ſet and appoint certain days for determination of the ſeveral Cauſes depending before them.

“The firſt Law is concerning Traffick, and in way of confirmation of the fourth Article of the League made betwixt his Father and the Daniſh King Guthrun, ordains, that if a man will ſell any thing, he ſhall have one to vouch and make good the ſale; and that no man buy any thing without the Town, unleſs he have the Portreeve for witneſs, or ſome other men worthy of Credit; otherwiſe he ſhall undergo the Penalty of Contumacy againſt the King: This Vouching or Warranty ſhall alſo proceed from one to another, till it end with him who firſt ſold it: The reſt of this Law, containing in what caſes the Buyer, and likewiſe the Demandant, ſhall find ſufficient Teſtimony or Oaths of the true buying of the Goods ſo bought, being long, I refer the Reader to the Law it ſelf.

“The ſecond of King Edward's Laws ordains, That whoſoever denies another man his Right either in Bocland or Folcland, demanding it before the King's Sheriff, when as he hath no Right in either, ſhall pay to the King for the firſt Offence Thirty Shillings, and as much more for the ſecond; and if he offend the third time, then to pay an Hundred and twenty ſhillings for his Contumacy againſt the King.

“The third adjudges that for one who had forſworn himſelf, or born falſe witneſs, no credit ſhould be given to him for the time to come, but that he be put to Ordeal, in all caſes where his Oath is required.

“The fourth declares, That King Edward lying at Exeter, and conſulting with his Wiſe Men by what means he might beſt provide for the Publick Peace and Tranquility, it then ſeemed to them that what he had commanded was too remiſly executed; therefore he now required all that will amend and reform theſe things, and would with him enjoy common ſociety, that they would proſecute with their utmoſt hatred the ſame perſons as he did both by Sea and Land; and that they would take care not to do wrong or injury to any man. He that doth contrary, let him (as was formerly ordained) pay thirty ſhillings to the King; and if he offend the ſecond time, as much more; if the third, an hundred and twenty ſhillings.

“The fifth commands, that that Reeve or Judge who doth not Juſtice according to the teſtimony of ſuch as are ſummon'd, pay an hundred and twenty ſhillings for his Contumacy againſt the King.

“The ſixth wills, That if a Servant be accuſed of Theft, he that recommended him to his Maſter, or other of his Friends (if he have any), be Sureties for him that he diſcharge himſelf of what is depoſed againſt him; and if he have none to interpoſe on his behalf, thoſe that are concerned may ſeize his Goods; but if he have neither Goods nor Friends, let him be taken into cuſtody.

“The

Anno Dom. Dccccxxv.

“ The eighth Law enjoins that no man knowingly and voluntarily
“ have peace with, or harbour one that is condemned for any Crime;
“ he that acts contrary, and thereby breaks his Oath, and the Faith gi“ ven by him and all the people, let him undergo the Mulct preſcribed
“ in the Judiciary Book; which if he refuſe to pay, he is to be deprived “ of the King's Favour, and all other mens Friendſhip, and farther for“ feit all his Eſtate; and if any afterwards relieve him, let him alſo incur
“ the Penalty expreſſed in the ſaid Book; and farther, whoſoever ſhall “ relieve a Fugitive either in this Countrey, or in the Eaſtern or Northern “ parts of the Kingdom, (i. e. in Eaſt-England and Northumberland)
“ let him be puniſhed as by the Articles of Peace is ordained.

“ The ninth provides, that if one deprived of his liberty for ſtealing, “ ſteal again, ſo that all his Kindred forſake him, and none will engage “ for him, he is to be ſet to ſervile and hard labour, as opportunity ſhall “ offer, and his Kindred ſhall loſe the valuation of his head.

“ The tenth Law forbids any man to receive another man's Servant “ without his leave, and that he hath fully ſatisfied his Maſter; he “ that doth otherwiſe, ſhall be puniſhed as contumacious againſt the “ King.

“ The eleventh and laſt commands, That about every fourth Week
“ every Sheriff or Judge hold the Gemot or Aſſembly, and adminiſter “ Juſtice to every man, and determine all Cauſes at the days appointed;
“ if he do otherwiſe, he is to be puniſhed as was before ſaid.

From all which Laws we may obſerve, Firſt, That the Law concerning redeeming of all Crimes by Pecuniary Fines was not yet aboliſhed, nor in ſome Ages after; but the ſtrict Laws for vouching of Goods ſold, as alſo againſt Fugitives and Runaway Servants, were but neceſſary in ſuch licentious and turbulent times, when it was ſo very eaſy for Offenders to paſs out of the Engliſh Territories into thoſe of the Danes. You may alſo here obſerve the Antiquity and Power of the County Court, which was then held (as now) every Month, but had much more Power anciently than at this day.

As for the Laws that follow, and which are entituled in Mr. Lambard's Copy, The Eccleſiaſtical Laws of Edward the Elder, King of England, and Gutherne King of the Danes in Eaſt-England, which were firſt made by the Kings Alfred and Gutherne, and were now ſaid to be again confirmed by King Edward Son to Alfred, and the ſame King Gutherne, there muſt certainly be an Error in the Name of the Daniſh King here mentioned, ſince it appears by our Annals that Gutherne died ten years before King Alfred; therefore ſince we do not find any other Daniſh King of this Name, we may rather ſuppoſe that theſe Laws were made by King Edward and Eoric the Daniſh King who ſucceeded Gutherne in that Kingdom; but be it as it will, I ſhall not trouble the Reader with their Recital, ſince they relate chiefly to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, and are in moſt points but a Repetition of thoſe things which had been before agreed upon by King Alfred and King Gutherne ſome years before.

King Edward dying, after four and twenty years Reign, was buried in the Monaſtery at Wincheſter, which his Father had founded, leaving by his Teſtament Athelſtan his Eldeſt Son to ſucceed him; who (as Florence of Worceſter, and William of Malmesbury, and moſt other Writers relate) was not born of the Queen, but of one Egwinna a Lady

the Daughter of a Nobleman; whoſe Name, though William of Malmesbury does not tell us, becauſe he ſays he had not found it in writing, yet the Chronicle aſcribed to Abbot Bromton tells us a long and improbable Story of the getting and Birth of this Prince; which being no where elſe to be found, as I know of, I ſhall here give you: That in the Reign of King Ælfred, when his Son Edward was young, there was in a Village of the Weſt-Saxons, the Daughter of a certain Shephard, called Egwinna, who falling aſleep, dreamed that the Moon ſhone out of her Womb ſo bright, that all England was enlighten'd by its Splendor: This Dream ſhe told to a Grave Matron, that had been Nurſe to ſeveral of the King's Children: Upon this ſhe takes her into her houſe, and educates her as carefully as if ſhe had been her own Daughter, inſtructing her ſo to demean her ſelf, as might become a Perſon both of Birth and Breeding. In proceſs of time it happen'd, that Prince Edward, the King's Eldeſt Son, paſſing upon ſome occaſion through this Town, thought himſelf obliged in Honour and Good Nature to viſit his Nurſe; by which means he got ſight of this Maid, and ſhe being exceeding beautiful, fell paſſionately in love with her, and by his violent Importunity he got her Conſent to lye with him, and by one Night's Lodging ſhe proved with Child, and being afterwards delivered of a Son, in reſpect to the Mother's Dream the Father gave him the Name of Athelſtan, which ſignifies, The moſt Noble.

If this Story be true, that he married this Woman without the Conſent of his Father, and kept the Marriage private, the Authors abovecited had good cauſe to ſuppoſe her to have been rather his Concubine than his Queen; though there be alſo other Hiſtorians, who make her to have been his Lawful Wife: But thus much is more certain, That King Edward had Prince Ethelward^ above-mentioned, by his Wife Ælfleda the Daughter of Earl Æthelem, as alſo another Son, called Edwin, of the manner of whoſe Death William of Malmesbury ſays he cannot certainly tell us; but gives us an exact account of what became of all the reſt of his Children: He had alſo by her ſix Daughters, viz. Edelfleda, Edgiva, Ethelhilda, Ethilda, Edgitha, and Elgiva; of whom, the firſt and third vowed their Virginity to God, and both of them lye buried by their Mother in the Monaſtery of Wincheſter; as for Edgiva, her Father beſtowed her upon Charles King of France; and for Ethilda, her Brother King Athelſtan beſtowed her in Marriage upon Hugo, a King or Prince of the French; and Edgitha and Elgiva their Brother ſent to Henry the German Emperor, the Second of which he married to Otho his Son, and the Elder to a certain Duke near the Alpes. King Edward alſo begot of his Third Wife Edgiva, Edmund and Edred, who both reigned ſucceſſively after their Brother King Athelſtan, as alſo two other Daughters, Eadburga and Edgiva; the former became a Nun, but the latter being a great Beauty, was beſtowed ~~in Marriage by her Brother Athelſtan~~ on Lewis Prince or Duke of Aquitain: But King Edward had ſo well bred all his ſaid Daughters from their Infancy, that they were wont all of them to beſtow their leiſure time upon good Letters, and after that were wont to exerciſe both their Diſtaff and the Needle; and in this manner they paſſed the firſt years of their Virginity: Likewiſe his Sons were ſo inured to Learning, that not being rude and ignorant in Knowledge, they became (like Plato's Philoſophers) fit to Govern the Commonwealth; as our Author handſomly expreſſes it.

or 2 [illegible],

This

Anno Dom. Dccccxxv.

This King ſeems by his Hiſtory to have been a Prince of great Mild neſs and Humility, as well as Courage; which appears by this Story but tho it be not found in any of our Hiſtorians, is yet related by Walte Mape in his Nugis Curialium in Manuſcript, as follows; That when K. Ed ward the Elder came to Auſtelin, (I ſuppoſe, that which we now call Auſt where is a Ferry to paſs out of Somerſetſhire into Wales) Lewelyn Princ of North-Wales came to Betheſley about a Treaty of Peace, he refuſe firſt to croſs the Severne; but when King Edward heard it, he too Boat and rowed towards him; but the Prince (being then by the Wa ter-ſide) when he ſaw him, and knew who he was, he caſt off th Rich Robe he then had on (which he had provided for that meeting) and entring the River breaſt-high, taking hold of the end of the Boat ſubmiſſively ſaid, Moſt Sage King, thy Humility hath overcome my Inſo lence, and thy Wiſdom triumph'd over my Folly: Come, pray Sir, get upo this Neck, which I (like a Fool as I am) have lifted up againſt thee; an thus enter that Land which thy benign Clemency hath made this day thin own: So taking the King upon his Shoulders, and ſetting him on ſhore he made him to ſit down upon his own Royal Robe, and putting hi own hands between the King's, there did him Homage.

But this Circumſtance only ſerves to bring all the reſt of this Story into queſtion; for it is certain this Ceremony of doing Homage wa not in uſe till after the coming in of the Normans.

Beſides, the Welſh Chronicles mention no ſuch thing, nor can I find any Prince either of North or South Wales, called Lewelyn at that time till Anno 1015, in the Reign of King Cnute, above a hundred year afte the death of King Edward the Elder; but perhaps the Story may b true, being told by Tradition, though the Name of the Prince may b miſtaken; and Lewelyn put inſtead of Howel, who was now King o South-Wales, and in whoſe Territories this Action muſt have happen'd

But whether this Relation be true or falſe, we may from it draw this Obſervation, That it is not always Wiſdom in Princes to inſiſt too nicely upon Circumſtances, eſpecially in Ceremony, but that ſometimes to recede from them, may tend to the greater Advantage of that Princ that doth it.

King ATHELSTAN.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxv.

THE ſame year, not long after King Edward's deceaſe, the Saxon Annals tell us, 'That Æthelſtan was elected King by 'the Mercians, and afterwards Crowned at Kingſtune upon 'Thames (being then a Royal Town). Note, He was crowned in the midſt of the Town upon a Scaffold built on purpoſe, whereon the Ceremony of the Coronation was performed in the open view of all men, by Athelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with great Acclamations of the People.

'Alſo St. Dunſtan was born, and Wulfhelme was conſecrated Archbiſhop of Canterbury, upon the Death of Athelm.

From whence you may obſerve, the Mercians had not yet loſt their Ancient Right of chuſing their own King; and no doubt but the Weſt-Saxons did ſo likewiſe, though it be not particularly expreſs'd in the Annals: For an Ancient Manuſcript Chronicle in the * Cottonian Library, ſays only, Electus eſt in Regem.

And you may alſo hence obſerve, That the King's Conſecration or Coronation is placed as a different action from his Election; as it is alſo in the Author laſt cited, and in H. Huntington, who therein follow our Annals, and ſay expreſly, That he was Elected. But it ſeems before his Election, one Alfred, with ſome factious men of his Party, endeavour'd to hinder King Athelſtan's coming to the Crown, becauſe he was begot on a Coucubine; which, ſays William of Malmesbury, if it were true (as he ſeems there to doubt), yet had he nothing elſe ignoble in him, for he ſurpaſſed all his Succeſſors as well in his Devotion as his Victories: So much better is it (as he well obſerves) to excel in good Qualities, than in his Anceſtors, the former only being truly a man's own.

Hither we may alſo refer what the ſame Author tells us concerning this Alfred above-mentioned, out of the Preface to King Athelſtan's Charter, whereby he confers the Lands once belonging to this Alfred, upon the Church of Malmesbury, for the Souls of his Couſins, Ethelred, Edwin, and Ethelwin, there buried: And to teſtify to the world, that he gave what was his own, he there at large relates the whole Conſpiracy which Alfred had laid, together with his Complices, to ſeize him in the City of Wincheſter, and to put out his Eyes; but the Plot being happily diſcovered, and Alfred denying it, he was ſent to Rome there to purge himſelf before Pope John; where coming to take his Oath at the Altar of St. Peter, he fell down, and being carried by his Servants into the Engliſh School, there died the third night after: but, it ſeems, the Pope would not diſpoſe of his Body, till he had ſent to ask King Athelſtan's Judgment what ſhould be done with it; when by the Advice and at the Requeſt of the Chief Men, the King aſſented that it ſhould (though unworthy of that Honour) be laid among the Bodies of other Chriſtians; but his whole Eſtate was adjudged confiſcated for ſo black a Treaſon.

* Jul. D. 7.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxv.

But one of the firſt things this King performed after his coming to the Crown (as we find in Florence of Worceſter) was his beſtowing his Siſter Edgitha in Marriage to Sihtric the Daniſh King of Northumberland, who deſired the Alliance of King Athelſtan: And, as Matthew Weſtminſter relates, this Prince profeſſing himſelf a Chriſtian, was a little before his Marriage baptized; but did not long continue ſo, for he relapſed again to his former Paganiſm. And the next year, Anno Dom. Dccccxxvi.

According to Florence, and Simeon of Durham, he deceaſed; after whoſe death the Lady above-mentioned retiring to her Brother King Athelſtan, became a Nun at Polleſworth.

Nor can I here omit the Falſhood of the Scotiſh Hiſtorians, who out of ſpight to King Athelſtan's Memory, make Sihtric to have been poyſon'd by this Lady, whom they call Beatrix, and that at the Inſtigation of her Brother King Athelſtan; whereas her Name was not Beatrix, but Edgitha, or Orgiva; and was a Woman of as great Reputation for her Sanctity, as the King her Brother was for his Valour and other Noble Virtues, which render'd him above the putting his Siſter upon ſo baſe an Action.

But before I diſmiſs this Relation, I cannot omit what John of Wallingford adds concerning this King Sihtric, whom he calls Sictric; viz. That upon this Marriage with King Athelſtan's Siſter, he advanced him to the Title of King, that his Siſter might not ſtoop ſo low as to that of Counteſs; and that Sictric then had for his Kingdom all the Countrey from the River Theys, as far as Edinburgh, from which time the Danes began to ſettle in thoſe parts, who before rambled about over all England; to which Settlement, as alſo to a freſh acceſſion of more, the Northerly Situation of that Countrey, lying over-againſt Denmark, contributed very much, as this Author well obſerves.

This year (according to Florence of Worceſter, and Simeon of Durham) Sihtric King of the Northumbers departed this life; ſo that it ſeems that this King ſurvived his Marriage but a ſmall time.

Alſo the ſame year (according to Florence) Hugh, the Son of Robert King of the French, married King Athelſtan's Siſter; and after the death of King Sihtric, Guthfrith his Son ſucceeded him, though but for a little while; for the year following our Annals tell us,

Anno Dom. Dccccxxvii.

'That King Æthelſtan expelled the ſaid Guthfryth King of Northumberland, and added his Dominions to his own: And the ſame year 'Wulfhelm the Archbiſhop went to Rome.

From which Conqueſt of the Kingdom of Northumberland we may obſerve, That as King Edward had before conquered the Danes of Eaſt-England, and had alſo added Mercia to his own Kingdom; ſo King Athelſtan, by the Expulſion of King Guthfrith (who was alſo of the Daniſh Race) became the firſt King that ruled all England, without any King under him.

Of this Prince alſo John of Wallingford relates, That being a Young Man he was ſtirred up to this Rebellion by the ſuggeſtion of the Northumbers, who told him that their Countrey had always enjoyed a King of their own, without being Tributary to the Southern Engliſh: And indeed, from the firſt arrival of the Engliſh Saxons, they had been never ſubject to any of the Weſt-Saxon Kings, except King Athelſtan: Therefore this Guithfrith, or Gutred, moved by theſe inſtigations, took upon him the Name of King, without King Athelſtan's conſent, and caſting

ing out the Gariſons, ſeized all the Forts and Caſtles of that Country, and flatly denied to pay the Tribute impoſed upon his Father; with which K. Athelſtan being much provoked, he not only raiſed great Forces of his own Subjects, but alſo ſent for Aid to his Friends in Neighbouring Kingdoms; and ſo in few days gathering together a great Army, totally expell'd him his Kingdom.

And therefore Alfred of Beverly, an Ancient Author ſtill in Manuſcript, very well obſerves of this Prince, That by ſubduing the Scots, Welſh, and all the Kings of Britain, he juſtly deſerved the Title of the firſt Monarch; though his Modeſty was ſo great, that he never gave himſelf that Title, but left it to his Brother Edred to take, as ſhall be ſhewn in his Reign.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxviii.

'This year William (Son to Rollo) ſucceeded to the Dukedom of 'Normandy, and held it fifteen years.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxxii.

'Byrnſtan was conſecrated Biſhop of Wincheſter, and held that Bi'ſhoprick two years and an half.] The year following,

Anno Dom. Dccccxxxiii.

'Frithelſtan the Biſhop deceaſed.] Florence of Worceſter, and Simeon of Durham, as alſo the Chronicle of Mailroſſe, do all agree, that this Biſhop Frithelſtan did before his death ordain Biſhop Byrnſtan in his room; and if ſo, he reſigned the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter to him, and lived only one year after it.

'Alſo the ſame year (according to our Annals) Edwin Ætheling 'was drowned.

This Edwin here mentioned in our Annals, was Brother to King Athelſtan, whoſe Death being the greateſt Blot of this King's Reign, divers Authors have concealed it; but notwithſtanding, it is thus given us by William of Malmesbury, and the Chronicle called Abbot Bromton's; Alfred above-mentioned having conſpired againſt King Athelſtan, (as you have already heard) had ſeveral Complices in that Treaſon; and there were not wanting ſome Court-Sycophants to accuſe Prince Edwin of being in that Plot, for he was the eldeſt Legitimate Son then living of King Edward by his Lawful Wife; ſince therefore the apprehenſion of a Rival uſually overpowers all Obligations both of Friendſhip and Nature, though Edwin both by Word of Mouth, and by Oaths and Imprecations, proteſted his Innocence; yet all this would not prevail againſt theſe Court-Whiſperers, who affirmed that if he were only baniſhed, he would be commiſerated by Foreign Princes, and ſtill more endanger the King's ſafety; whereupon ſuch a way was found out, that under the Notion of Baniſhment he might with the leaſt appearance of Cruelty be diſpatch'd: In ſhort, an old rotten Veſſel was provided, and only the Prince and his Eſquire were put into it, without any Pilot or other body to ſteer or manage it; and thus for ſome time they weather'd it at Sea; but the Young Prince being brought up tenderly, and not uſed to hardſhip, deſpairing of his Life, caſt himſelf headlong out of the Veſſel, and ſo periſhed in the Ocean; whilſt his Servant being more couragious, was reſolved to ſave himſelf if he could; and meeting with better fortune, was driven on ſhore at a place called Whitſand, on the Coaſt of Picardy, not far from Dover.

The Fact was not long done, before Athelſtan ſorely repented of it; which he is ſaid by a Seven Years Penance to have teſtified to the world, as alſo by the Puniſhment of him who was the principal Inſtrument in this Fratricide, and had whiſpered this Jealouſy into his Breaſt, who who being his Cup-bearer, as he was going to preſent a Cup of Drin to him, one of his Feet ſlipped; but by the Nimbleneſs of the other re covering himſelf, he ſaid, Thus one Brother helps another; which th King hearing, and ſadly calling to mind how little he himſelf had a ſiſted his Brother, oppreſſed by the Calumnies of this Paraſite, cauſe him to be put to death.

This is the Tale told by William of Malmesbury, and th other Author; the latter of whom delivers it as a certain Truth, an whilſt the former tells it only as an old Story, ſung in certain Ballad of which he himſelf doubted the Truth. But Buchanan the Scot Hiſtorian (I ſuppoſe out of malice to this King's Memory for routin his Countreymen) makes King Athelſtan not only to have procured th Death of his Brother Edwin, but alſo of his Father King Edward, whom he therefore fancies to have been called Edward the Martyr; and not content with this neither, he adds, that he put his Brother Edred to deat alſo: Yet certainly there can ſcarce be more Miſtakes committed i ſo few Lines than he has been guilty of in theſe; for in the firſt place it i agreed by all our Hiſtorians, that King Edward died a Natural Death and as for him whom he calls the Martyr, he was the Son of King Edgar nor did he begin to reign till above an hundred and fifty years after, a ſhall be ſhewn when we come to his Reign.

But as for what Buchanan objects againſt ſome of our later Hiſtorians for making Athelſtan to be King of all Britain, and to have reſtored Conſtantine King of Scots to his Kingdom, and to have forced him to d him Homage for it; we muſt confeſs, that Buchanan is ſo far in the right that neither our Saxon Annals, nor Marianus Scotus, nor Florence o Worceſter, mention any thing of it, though they all do relate the grea Victory which King Athelſtan obtain'd over the Scots, but yet are wholl ſilent either about his driving of the King of Scotland out of his Kingdom, or of cauſing him to do him Homage for reſtoring him to i This is to ſhew, that I would not be partial to the Hiſtorians of ou own Countrey, as if they could not alſo be ſometimes guilty of grea Errors; and therefore I thought good to take notice of it here.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxxiv.

‘This year (as our Annals relate) King Athelſtan made an Expedi
‘tion into Scotland with a great Army by Land, as alſo with a conſiderabl
‘Fleet by Sea, and laid waſt great part of that Kingdom. The ſame yea

But as for the Cauſes of this War made by King Athelſtan againſt Scotland, ſince not only our Annals but many of our other Authors ar ſilent in it, we muſt ſupply that defect from William of Malmesbury, and Roger Hoveden, and the Chronicles of Mailroſſe, who relate, that Anlaf the Son of Sihtric King of Northumberland, having fled into Ireland and the late King Godefrid, his Brother, into Scotland, King Athelſtan ſent Ambaſſadors to Conſtantine King of Scots, demanding the Fugitive to be given up to him, or elſe upon his Refuſal denouncing a ſpeedy War againſt him, which War indeed he made; for marching into Scotland with a great Army both by Sea and Land, he drove his Enemies before him as far as Dunfeodor and Wertermore, and by Sea as far as Cathneſs; but Malmesbury affirms, that they not daring in any thing to diſpleaſe him, went to a place called Dacor (or Dacre) in Cumberland, where each ſurrender'd up himſelf and all his into the hands of the Engliſh King, who was Godfather to the Son of Conſtantine, and now ordered him to be baptized in teſtimony of that Accord; whom alſo (together with great Preſents) he left as a Hoſtage with the King; and ſo Peace being thus happily concluded, he returned home into his own Countrey. But the Scotiſh Hiſtorians do not mention this Invaſion at all, nor will allow King Conſtantine to have had any Son: And indeed it ſeems improbable, that if Conſtantine had now given his Son to King Athelſtan as a Hoſtage, he would have dar'd to renew the War again ſo ſoon after this Agreement. But for all this, Godefrid eſcaped while they were preparing for the Journey, and travelling with one Turfrid into ſeveral parts of the Countrey, at length got ſome men together, and laid Siege to York, the Inhabitants of which they tempted both by fair and foul means to let them in; but not being able to prevail with 'em, they went their ways, and were both taken ſhortly after, and ſhut up in a Caſtle; from whence making their eſcape by deluding their Keepers, Turfrid not long after was ſhipwreck'd at Sea, and became a Prey to the Fiſh; but Godefrid endured much more miſery both by Sea and Land, and at laſt came as a Suppliant to the King's Court, who kindly received him: but after he had been profuſely feaſted for four days together, he got away again to his Ships, and then returned to his old trade of Piracy. In the mean time Athelſtan demoliſhed a Caſtle which the Danes had fortified at York, that ſo they might not ſhelter themſelves any more there; and the large Booty he found in it, he divided amongſt his Soldiers, to every one a ſhare: For ſo Worthy and Liberal was this Prince, that he never ſought to hoard up Money for himſelf, but beſtowed whatever he got, either upon thoſe Servants he found faithful to him, or elſe upon Monaſteries: No wonder then if he won the hearts of all the Monks, who were the only Hiſtorians of thoſe times.

Now alſo (as Florence relates) Wulfhelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury deceaſing, Odo Biſhop of Wells ſucceeded him.

This Man was of a Daniſh Race, whoſe Parents had come over hither in King Alfred's Reign; but their Son had been firſt a Soldier under him, and then turning Prieſt, was at laſt by King Athelſtan's Recommendation made a Biſhop; but having never been a Monk, and none but Monks having been hitherto made Archbiſhops of Canterbury, he for a long time refuſed it; till at laſt he was perſuaded to go over into France, and there taking upon him the Habit of a Monk, and returning home, was immediately conſecrated Archbiſhop. This Man was a Prelate of great Sanctity according to thoſe times, and a ſevere Exactor of Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, as you will find hereafter.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxxv.

'This year alſo (according to the Annals) Biſhop Byrnſtan above-'mentioned deceaſed at Wincheſter. And the following year,

Anno Dom. Dccccxxxvi.

'Biſhop Elfeage ſucceeded him in that Biſhoprick.

About this time, according to * William of Malmeſbury, King Athelſtan drove the Welſh out of Exeter, and built new Walls about it; and then founded a Monaſtery of Benedictines, which was afterwards changed (upon the removal of the Biſhop's See from Crediton to this City) into a Dean and Secular Chanons, as ſhall be ſhewn in due time. But after two years,

Anno Dom. Dccccxxxviii.

The War was again renewed between King Athelſtan and Conſtantine King of Scots, and a great Battel followed, of which our Annals give us (contrary to their cuſtom) a Poetical, if not a Romantick Relation, tion, which to tranſlate verbatim would be ridiculous; but the Subſtance of it is thus; 'That this year King Athelſtan and his Brother Eadmund ' Ætheling overcame the Scots in Battel about Brunanburh (now Bromrige in the County of Northumberland, as Cambden ſuppoſes) breaking ' through their Works, and killing many of their Noblemen; ſo that ' both Armies fighting from Sun-riſing to Sun-ſet, there periſhed a ' great multitude of Scots, Iriſh, and Danes.] For it ſeems by Florence of Worceſter, that another Anlaf, Son to the King of Dublin, being excited by his Father-in-Law, King Conſtantine, had ſail'd up the River Humber with a great Fleet, and landing, King Athelſtan and his Brother Edmund met them with a powerful Army at the place above-mentioned; and if ſo, it could not be in Northumberland, as Mr. Cambden ſuppoſes, but rather in Yorkſhire or Lincolnſhire.

But to proceed with our Annals; the Succeſs of this Fight was, ' That the Engliſh-Saxons towards the latter end of the day utterly rout' ed and put to flight the Enemies Forces, and purſued them as long as ' day-light laſted; ſo that in that place there fell no leſs than five Kings, ' beſides ſeven other Commanders on Anlaf's ſide, (not reckoning thoſe ' of the Naval Forces, and the Scots Fleet, who were kill'd without ' number); ſo that Anlaf was forced to ſave his Life by going on board ' his Ships with a ſmall Company; as alſo one Froda by flight returned ' into his own Countrey.] This Froda was (it ſeems) ſome Norman or Daniſh Commander, who came to aſſiſt Anlaf.

'Neither could King Conſtantine brag much of the ſucceſs of this ' Fight among his Relations, for they moſt of them fell that day in Bat' tel, the King leaving his Son dead upon the Spot behind him, having ' received many Wounds. Nor could King Anlaf himſelf boaſt of ' much better good fortune, for they had all reaſon enough to repent ' their having tried the Valour of theſe Engliſh Princes. And not only ' the Scotch but Iriſh King with great difficulty got home to Difline ' (now Dublin) in Ireland. But King Athelſtan and the Prince his Bro' ther return'd home with Honour and Glory into their own Countrey, ' leaving their Enemies Carcaſſes to be devoured by the Fowls of the ' Air, and Beaſts of the Field; inſomuch that there never was a greater ' Slaughter in this Iſland mentioned by Hiſtorians, ſince the time that ' the Engliſh-Saxons conquered this part of Britain.

So far you have from the Peterburgh Copy of theſe Annals; but that in the Cottonian Library ſays no more, than that 'This year King Athelſtan and King Eadmund his Brother led their Army to Brunanburgh, and ' there fighting with Anlaf, by the help of Chriſt obtained the Victory.

But having given you a ſhort Relation of this Battel from the Saxon Annals, who only relate the Succeſs of this Fight, without giving us any Cauſes or other Circumſtances of it; I ſhall both from Ingulph, as alſo from William of Malmesbury, give you a more perfect Account of it; which is thus:

Conſtantine King of the Scots being exaſperated by the late Invaſion made in his Kingdom, joined with Anlaf the Son of Sihtric (whom Florence more probably ſuppoſes to have been not this Sihtric, but ſome other of his name, who was King of Ireland and the Iſles adjacent, and had married the Daughter of King Conſtantine) who alſo drew in Eugenius Prince of Cumberland, with great Forces which he had raiſed out of ſeveral Countries, to their Aſſiſtance; and after near four years

eparation, they invaded England by the River Humber, and paſſed rough the Countrey to a place called Brunanburgh, or Bruneford; thelſtan all this time feigning a Retreat, on purpoſe that he might ob- in ſome better advantage againſt them, as ſome write; or, as others, at they being fearful to grapple with him; Anlaf perceiving with hom he had to do, puts off his Royal Habit, and becomes a Spy upon n in the Diſguiſe of a Muſician, attending with an Harp in his Hand Athelſtan's Tent; by which means he was eaſily admitted into the ng's Preſence, diverting them by his Muſick, till ſuch time as they ving eaten and drank ſufficiently, they began to debate ſeriouſly out the Work they had in hand; and he all the while made what ſervation he could; at laſt, when he had received his Reward, and s commanded out of the Tent, he ſcorning to carry the Money ay with him, hid it in the Earth, which a certain Soldier who had merly ſerved him, taking notice of, thereby came to know him, and er he was gone, acquainted the King who he was; but being blamed not giving him more timely notice, the Soldier excuſed it, as having merly taken a Military Oath in Anlaf's Service; affirming, that had betrayed Anlaf, he himſelf to whom now he was in the ſame Rela- n, might have expected no better Fidelity; but however, he adviſed ng Athelſtan to remove his Tent into another place: This Advice s looked upon as good and wholſome, and indeed, how ſeaſonable roved, very ſhortly appeared; for a certain Biſhop coming to the mp that night, pitched his Tent in the ſame place; when Anlaf, th a deſign to deſtroy the King, aſſaulted that part of the Camp, ng ignorant of what had paſſed, and eaſily killed the Biſhop with his Followers.

Ingulph (who ſeems more exact than any other Hiſtorian in this mat-) writes, That Anlaf, tho he had brought with him an infinite multi- de of Danes, Norwegians, Scots, and Picts, yet either out of Diffi- nce, or Craft familiar to his Nation, choſe rather by night to ſurprize Enemy, than fairly to give him Battel in the open field, and by day- ht; ſo he fell ſuddenly upon the Engliſh, and kill'd a Biſhop who was me but the Evening before to the Camp, which cauſing a great Cla- our and Tumult, the King, tho a Mile off, took the Alarm with his hole Army, who putting themſelves into ſuch order as the Surprize ould permit, by break of day came up to the Enemy, where finding em tir'd and diſorder'd by their late March for want of ſleep, King helſtan in Perſon leading on the Weſt-Saxons, fell upon Anlaf him- f, whilſt Turketul his Kinſman and Chancellor, (who had the Conduct the Londoners) and the Mercians, aſſaulted Conſtantine the Scotiſh ng; their Miſſil Weapons being quickly ſpent, they came to hand- ws, and to fight it out with Sword and Buckler, where many of em loſt their Lives, and the Carkaſſes of mean perſons lay confu- lly together with the ſlain Bodies of Princes, Death making no di- ction. The Diſpute continuing very long and violent by reaſon multitude of Enemies was ſo great, Turketul took with him ſome the Londoners whom he knew to be moſt valiant, and a Captain of Worceſterſhire-men, called Singin, one of approved Courage, who ng taller than the reſt, and of well compacted Limbs, and the ſtout- of all thoſe London Heroes that accompanied him; then Turketul hing into the very midſt of his Enemies, and laying vigorouſly about him, hewed down whole ranks of men on both ſides of him, i ſomuch that he paſſed through whole Troops of Orcadians and Pi bearing a Wood of Arrows on his Breaſt-plate, and making his wa through whole Companies of Cumbrians and Scots, he at length reache Conſtantine himſelf, whom he diſmounted, and would have taken alive but the Scots were ſo concerned for their King, that they had a ve ſmart Conflict about him, and many of them preſſing upon the fe Engliſh that followed him, and all of them aiming chiefly at Turketu he began to repent of his Raſhneſs, ſeeing no means either of eſcapin himſelf, or getting off his Priſoner ; when on the ſudden Captain Sing coming in afreſh to his Reſcue, killed King Conſtantine: And no their King being ſlain, the Scots were ſo diſcouraged, that they ſoon re tired ; and the Report of their Diſcomfiture flying about the Army Anlaf and all his Followers ran away, after an incredible Slaughter Danes and Scots upon the place.

So much Ingulph relates, for the greater Honour of this Turketu the Chancellor, who was afterwards Abbot of the Abby of Croyla and his Predeceſſor in the Government of that Monaſtery, where h left a large Memorial of his Secular Employments. And the ſame A thor farther adds, that beſides Conſtantine, five other Kings were the ſlain, twelve Earls, and an infinite number of Common Soldiers.

But though Ingulph and William of Malmesbury do thus confident relate Conſtantine King of Scots to have been ſlain in this Battel, yet a the Scotch Hiſtorians, as well as our own Annals, aſſerting the contrary is not to be inſiſted on as true, and therefore I ſhall paſs it by ; yet gra ing he was not kill'd in that Battel, John Fordon and Buchanan do bo agree, that he became not long after dead to the world ; for bei quite tired out with his late ill ſucceſs, he profeſſed himſelf a Mo amongſt the Culdees of St. Andrews, (an Order of Monks ſo called of whom this King became Abbot. But the Scotch Hiſtorians do a confeſs the greatneſs of the Victory on the Engliſh, and the great Lo on their own ſide ; acknowledging the Fall of Eugenius King of Deir (whom our Hiſtorians call King of Cumberland), but will not own Ki Conſtantine to have been ſo much as preſent at this fight, but only Ma colme his Couſin, who upon his retiring into a Monaſtery, was declare King in his room : Yet Hector Boethius, and Buchanan, to leſſen this Vi ctory as much as they can, do ſuppoſe, (though I do not know fro what Authority, ſince Fordon mentions no ſuch thing) "That th " Engliſh under King Athelſtan being much weaker in Forces, he wa " fain to ſupply that by Cunning and Artifice ; and having ſtrengthen " his Army by freſh Supplies, he commanded them at the firſt Onſet t " make as if they fled, and when they found the Enemy had broken the " Ranks, to turn again on their Purſuers ; which being punctually ob " ſerved by King Athelſtan's Army, the Danes and Scots ſuppoſin " themſelves to be Victors, immediately fell to ſpoiling the Enemie " Camp ; and thereupon a Sign being given by King Athelſtan, they fe " upon the Enemy, now laden with Prey, and deſtroyed them like " many Sheep, inſomuch that in this Fight moſt of the Scotch Nob " lity were ſlain, whilſt they rather choſe to dye than to ſurvive the Ig " nominy of having deſerted their Companions.

But this ſounds very Romantick, as does alſo his Relation of th Battel, which neither agrees with the plain downright way of fightin

Anno Dom. Dccccxxxviii.

uſed in that age, nor with the Stout and Martial Genius of this King: But let the Manner of gaining the Victory be as it will, they all agree upon the Effect of it; That King Athelſtan (his Enemies being aſtoniſh'd with ſo great a loſs) took Cumberland and Weſtmorland from the Scots, and recovered Northumberland from the Danes.

But ſince the Monks will ſcarce let ſo great a Victory paſs without a Miracle, I cannot forbear relating what Fordun, and the Chronicle aſcribed to Abbot Bromton, have related from a certain Legend of St. John of Beverly; viz. That King Athelſtan going to make War againſt the Scots, and by the way paying a Viſit to the Tomb of that Saint, there pawn'd his Knife at the Altar, promiſing to redeem it at his return; but when they had thus fought againſt the Scots, he begged of God a Sign, whereby it might appear to future Ages, that they were juſtly vanquiſhed by the Engliſh; and thereupon the King ſtriking a certain Rock with his Sword near the Caſtle of Dunbar, he made a Gap in it an Ell deep; this Miracle is ſo groſs, that even John Fordon himſelf ridicules it. But it ſeems King Athelſtan made good his Promiſe, and upon his return with Victory, enrich'd the Church of St. John with great Poſſeſſions; and ſo, I ſuppoſe, got his Knife again.

As for the other Miracle related alſo by the Monks, of King Athelſtan's Sword being loſt out of the Scabbard juſt when he was ready to fight, and another was by Miracle put in the place, at the Prayers of Archbiſhop Odo; which Sword they pretend was kept in the King's Treaſury; it is no leſs a Wonder than the former; and one ſuch as theſe is enough at one time.

Anno Dom. Dccccxl.

This year (according to Florence) King Athelſtan founded the Abby of Middleton in Dorſetſhire, to expiate the Death of his Brother Prince Edwin, whom through falſe ſuggeſtions he had deſtroy'd, (as you have already heard).

About this time alſo (according to the Welſh Chronicle) Howel Dha, Prince of South-Wales and Powis, after the death of Edwal Voel, is Couſin, Prince of North-Wales, took upon him the Government f all Wales, the Sons of Edwal being then in Minority. This Howel ade that Excellent Body of Laws that go under his Name, and which ou may find in Sir H. Spelman's firſt Volume of Councils: This rince, for his Diſcreet and Juſt Government, not only made himſelf ighly beloved, but alſo rendred his Memory very glorious to After-ges.

Anno Dom. Dccccxli.

But it ſeems King Athelſtan did not long ſurvive this Victory; for (as r Annals relate) 'he deceaſed this year on the 6th Kal. Novemb. juſt Forty years after the death of King Alfred his Grandfather, having eigned Fourteen Years and Ten Months:] But there is certainly an rror in this Account; for either this King muſt have reigned a year ſs, or elſe the King his Father muſt have died a year ſooner than our nnals allow him; and perhaps with greater Certainty; for Florence Worceſter places his Death in Anno Dom. 924.

Nor can we before we finiſh this King's Life, omit taking notice, hat Bromton's Chronicle and other Modern Writers do place the long ory of the Danes invading England in this King's Reign; and that e Guy Earl of Warwick returning home by chance from the Holy nd in the Habit of a Pilgrim, juſt when King Athelſtan was in great treſs for a Champion to fight with one Colebrand a monſtrous Daniſh

Anno Dom. Dccccxli.

Gyant, whom the King of the Danes had ſet up to fight with any Champion the Engliſh King ſhould bring into the field; that Earl Guy accepted this Challenge, and without being known to any man but the King, fought the Gyant near Wincheſter, and killing him, the Danes yielded the Victory; whilſt Earl Guy privately retired to a Hermitage near Warwick, and there living a Hermit's life, ended his days.

But though John Rouſe in his Manuſcript Treatiſe de Regibus Anglorum, places this Action under Anno 926, as ſoon as ever King Athelſtan came to the Crown; and that Tho. Rudburne in his Hiſtory of Wincheſter ſays, That this Gyant's Sword being kept in the Treaſury of the Abby of Wincheſter, was ſhewn in his time; yet ſince neither the Saxon Annals, nor any other Ancient Hiſtorian, mention any Invaſion of the Danes in this King's Reign, nor any thing of ſuch a Combat, it ought to be looked upon as a Monkiſh Tale, only fit for Ballads and Children.

But ſince the Monks are very profuſe in the Praiſes of this Prince, I will give you William of Malmeſbury's Character of him; That as for his Perſon, he did not exceed the ordinary Stature, being of a ſlender Body; his Hair (as he had ſeen by his Reliques) was Yellow; that as for his Natural Temper and Diſpoſition, he was always kind to God's Servants (i.e. the Monks), for there was ſcarce a Monaſtery in England, but what had been adorned by him with Buildings, Books, or Reliques. And though he was grave and ſerious amongſt his Nobles, yet was he affable to the Inferior ſort, often laying aſide the Majeſty of a King, to converſe the more freely with ordinary men. This made him as much admired by his Subjects for his Humility, as he was fear'd by his Enemies and Rebels for his Invincible Courage and Conſtancy.

An Eminent Inſtance of this was, in that he compell'd the Kings of North-Wales (for ſome time ſtanding out) to meet him at Hereford, and ſubmit themſelves to him: I wiſh our Author had told us the Year when it was done, ſince our Annals have wholly omitted it; for tho Ran. Higden in his Polychronicon has put it under Anno 937; and alſo relates from Alfred of Beverly, that this King reſtored both Conſtantine King of Scot and Hoel King of the Britains, to their Kingdoms; ſaying, It was mo glorious to make a King, than to be one; yet I do not ſee any Authori for it: But this is agreed upon by all, That Athelſtan did abou that time enter Wales with a powerful Army, and effected wha no King had ever preſumed to think of before; for he impoſed a Year Tribute upon thoſe Kings, of Twenty Pounds in Gold, and Three hundred Pounds in Silver, and Twenty five thouſand Head of Cattel. Ye the Laws of Howel Dha appointed the King of Aberfraw to pay year to the King of London, no more than Sixty ſix Pounds for a Tribute, be ſides Hawks and Hounds.

John of Wallingford makes this King the firſt who reduced all England into one Monarchy, by his Conqueſt of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Wales; yet that he was in his own nature a Lover of Peac and whatever he had heard from his Grandfather, or obſerved in h Father, he put in practice, being Juſt in his Judgments, and by a happy conjunction of many Virtues, ſo beloved by all men, that to this d Fame, which is wont to be too ſevere to the Faults of Great Men, c relate nothing to his prejudice.

William of Malmesbury alſo gives us a ſhort Account of his Life a Actions from his very Childhood; wherein he tells us, That this Prin wh

Anno Dom. Dccccxli.

Nor does he only relate him to have been Valiant, but alſo competently Learned, as he had been informed from a certain old Author he had ſeen, who compared him to Tully for Eloquence; though (as he rightly obſerves) the Cuſtom of that Age might very well diſpenſe with that Talent; and perhaps a too great Affection to King Athelſtan, then living, might excuſe this Author's over-large Commendations.

But this muſt be acknowledged, that all Europe then ſpoke highly in his Praiſe, and extoll'd his Valour to the Skies; Neighbouring Kings thinking themſelves happy if they could purchaſe his Friendſhip either by his Alliance, or their Preſents. Harold King of Norway ſent him a Ship whoſe Stern was Gilded, and its Sails Purple; and the Ambaſſadors by whom he ſent it, being Royally received in the City of York, were rewarded with Noble Preſents. Hugh King of the French, ſent Anwulf, Son of Baldwin Earl of Flanders, (Grandſon to King Edward by Æthelſwine his Daughter) as his Ambaſſador, to demand his Siſter in Marriage; who when in a Great Aſſembly of the Nobility at Abingdon he had declared the Deſires of this Royal Woer, beſides Noble Preſents of Spices, and Precious Stones, eſpecially Emeralds, ſuch as had never been ſeen in England before, and alſo brave Horſes richly equipped, he ſent the King a certain Veſſel made of an Onyx, curiouſly engraven with Vines, and the Figures of Men; he likewiſe preſented him with the Sword of Conſtantine the Great; in the Hilt of which (being all overlaid with Plates of Gold) was ſet one of the Nails of Chriſt's Croſs; alſo with the Lance of Charles the Great, and the Banner of the Martyr St. Maurice, both which the ſaid King had made uſe of in a Battel againſt the Saracens; and a Gold Crown or Diadem ſet with Precious Stones: But that which was more Valuable than all the reſt, was a little Piece of Chriſt's Croſs, and a Bit of his Crown of Thorns, both ſet in Chryſtal, and which the King afterwards beſtowed upon the Abby of Malmesbury, with very large Endowments, (as appears by his Charters above-cited) and in whoſe Church he had ordered the Bodies of his Couſins Ælwin and Æthelwin, the Sons of his Uncle Æthelward, to be interr'd, whom he loſt in the Battel againſt King Anlaf: And though this King died at Glouceſter, yet was his Body carried to Malmesbury, and there interr'd with great Pomp.

There is yet to be ſeen in the ſaid Church (of which only the Nave is now left) an Image made for him in Stone, though of no Antiquity, as any one may eaſily diſcover, that obſerves it.

But ſince this King alſo made many good Laws, ſome of them which are the moſt remarkable, I ſhall here ſet down from Mr. Lambard's Saxon Copy.

Theſe Laws were made at Grætanleage, in a Great Council there held by King Athelſtan; but the Year not being expreſs'd, it is ſuppoſed to be about Anno 928.

"The ſeventh ordains concerning ſimple Ordeal, That if one accuſed "ſeveral times of Theft, be caſt by it, and have no body to be Surety "for him, he ſhall be ſent to Priſon, and thence freed by his Kindred, "as was before ſaid.

"The tenth forbids any Commutation of Goods, unleſs in the pre"ſence of the King's Reeve, the Prieſt of the Town, or the Lord of the "Soil, or ſome other credible perſon, under the penalty of thirty ſhil"lings, and the forfeiture of the thing changed to the Lord of the Soil; "and if any ſhall bear falſe witneſs, he ſhall be infamous, and no credit "given to him ever after, and alſo ſhall forfeit 30 ſhillings.

"The twelfth confirms the firſt part of the Law of King Edward "the Elder, decreeing no man's buying any thing out of a Town which "exceeds the value of twenty pence; and within the Town, unleſs in "the preſence of the Portreeve, or ſome other credible perſon; or elſe "in the preſence of the King's Sheriff or Juſtice in Folcmote.

"The fourteenth appoints through all the King's Dominions that one "and the ſame Money be currant, and that it ſhall not be coined out of "ſome Town; and if any Minter or Coiner ſhall embaſe the Coin, he ſhall "loſe his hand; which being cut off, ſhall be affixed to the Workhouſe: "If any be accuſed of adulterating Money, and will purge himſelf, he "ſhall by the Ordeal of hot Iron cleanſe his hands of ſuch wickedneſs; "but if by Ordeal he be caſt, then he ſhall be puniſhed as now was ſaid.

"Then

Anno Dom. Dccccxli.

"Then follow the places appointed for Publick Mints; viz. at Canterbury there ſhall be ſeven Minters or Coiners, whereof four for the King, two for the Biſhop, and one for the Abbot. At Rocheſter there ſhall be three, whereof two for the King, and the third for the Biſhop. At London eight. At Wincheſter ſix. At Lewes two. At Haſtings one. At Chicheſter one. At Hampton two. At Werham two. At Exceſter two. At Saliſbury as many, and in every other great Town one.

"That which follows, commands, That for every Plow a man ſhall keep two well-furniſhed Horſemen.

Which ſhews, that this Law for the Militia's being laid according to the Rate of Eſtates, is one of the ancienteſt of this kind in England, as alſo the moſt general Tax, being laid upon Corn, then the moſt ſtaple Commodity of the Kingdom.

"The eighteenth forbids Horſes to be tranſported, except ſuch as are ſent abroad as Free Gifts or Preſents.

"The twentieth Law enacts, That if any one abſent himſelf from Folcmote thrice, he ſhall be puniſhed as contumacious againſt the King, if ſo be that the holding of the Aſſembly was declared a ſeven-night before; in ſuch caſe if he refuſe to do Right, and pays not his Mulct to the King, the ancient men of the Countrey are to go and ſeize upon all that he hath, and take Security for his appearance.

"The twenty ſecond, in confirmation of a former Law, requires, that no perſon receive another man's Man (as this Law words it) into his Family, without leave firſt obtained of his Maſter; he that doth otherwiſe, ſhall reſtore the man, and pay the Mulct of Contumacy againſt the King; and no man is to put away his men accuſed of any Crime, till they have firſt made ſatisfaction.

By this it appears how ancient in this Nation the Cuſtom is of calling a Servant by the word uſed for the whole Species of Mankind, a Phraſe in uſe as well with the Romans and others more ancient, as with modern people.

"The twenty fourth is concerning Traffick; and in confirmation of former Laws ordains, That if a man buy any thing with witneſs, which another man challenges for his own, the Seller ſhall make it good, and ſecure the bargain, whether he be Bond or Free: But on the Lord's day no Market ſhall be held, under penalty or forfeiture of the Wares, and a Mulct of 30 ſhillings beſides.

The next thing that follows at the end of theſe Laws, relating to the Civil State, is the Valuation of mens Heads, which we have often heard mentioned by theſe Laws, but never yet to what it particularly amounted: Firſt then, ſaith the Text, "The valuation of the King's Head, according to the Engliſh Common Laws, is thirty thouſand Thrymſes, whereof fifteen thouſand are properly the value of his Head, the reſt being due to the Kingdom; ſo that the latter fifteen belonged to the Nation, the former to his Kindred. An Archbiſhop's and Earl's Weregild (as the Saxons called the valuation of his Head) is fifteen thouſand Thrymſes: A Biſhop's and Ealdorman's eight thouſand. A General's of an Army, or an High Marſhal's four thouſand Thrymſes. The valuation of a Spiritual Thane or Prieſt, as alſo of a Temporal Thane, was two thouſand Thrymſes. That of a Countreyman (or Ceorl) by the Daniſh Law was 267 Thrymſes. But if a Welſhman grow ſo rich as to maintain a Family, have Land, and pay a yearly Rent to

Anno Dom. Dccccxli.

“ the King, he ſhall be valued at 120 ſhillings; if he poſſeſs half Hide of Land, at 80 ſhillings: If he have no Land, yet if he be Freeman, the value of his Head ſhall be ſeventy ſhillings. If a Ceor or Countreyman be ſo wealthy as to poſſeſs five Hides of Land, i caſe he be killed, the price or value of his Life ſhall be two thouſand Thrymſes; but if he come to have a Corſlet, an Helmet, and a Gil Sword, tho he have no Land, he ſhall be accounted a Sithcundmon and if his Children or Grandchildren ſhall grow ſo rich as to poſſeſ five Hides of Land, all their Poſterity ſhall be reckoned as ſo many Sithcundmen, and be valued at two thouſand Thrymſes. The Mercians value a Countreyman at two hundred ſhillings, a Thane at twelve hundred. They are wont to equal the ſingle value of the King's Head with ſix thouſand Thanes, that is, thirty thouſand Sceats, for ſo much is the value of the King's Head, and as much more muſt be paid as a recompence for his death; the value of his Head belongs to his Kindred, and the compenſation of his Death to the people. He that is valued at 1200 ſhillings, his Oath ſhall be of the ſame eſteem as thoſe of ſix Countreymen; for where ſuch an one is ſlain, ſix Countreymen would ſatisfy over and above for the value; therefore the value of him and all them ſhall be the ſame. By the Engliſh Law the Oaths of a Prieſt and a Thane are of the like eſteem.

By theſe valuations of Heads from the higheſt to the loweſt Rank, we may perceive that in thoſe Ancient Times Puniſhments conſiſted rather in Mulcts than in Blood; contrary to our preſent Cuſtom, whereby ſmall Offences in compariſon (eſpecially if reiterated) are become Capital; which whence it hath proceeded, whether from this conſideration, that Crimes in latter Ages do more abound, or from other reaſons, is not evident. As for the Sithcundmon mentioned in this Law, Mr. Somner derives this word from Syth or Gethyſa, an Equal or Companion, and cund kind, and Mon man; ſo that he ſeems to have been one equal to a Thane.

King

King EDMUND.

NOT long after King Athelſtan's Deceaſe, Prince Edmund his Brother ſucceeded him at the Age of Eighteen Years, and reigned Six Years and an half.

Anno Dom. Dccccxlii.

'This year (according to the Annals) King Edmund, 'Lord of the Engliſh, and the Protector of his Subjects, invaded Mercia 'on that ſide where the River Humber and the * Way of the White 'Fountain divide the Countrey; he there took in five Cities (viz.) Li'goraceſter (now Leiceſter), Lindcolne (now Lincoln), and Snotinga'ham, Stanford, and Deorby, which were all before under the power of 'the Danes, being forced to ſubmit to them, having been long under 'their Tyrannical Yoke.

This ſeems very ſtrange, for moſt of thoſe places are mentioned to have been before recovered from the Danes by King Edward his Father; and how they could be conquered again in the time of ſo great a Warrier as King Athelſtan was, I could not underſtand, were it not explained by other Authors.

'The ſame year King Ædmund received King Anlaf to Baptiſm, and 'ſome time after he likewiſe received King Reginald at his Confirmation. 'This year alſo King Anlaf deceaſed, and Richard the Elder took upon 'him the Dukedom (of Normandy) and governed it 52 years.

But R. Hoveden and Mat. Weſtminſter (from what Authority I know not) relate, That this Anlaf the Dane, above-mentioned, and Norwegian by Extract, who had been in the time of King Athelſtan expell'd the Kingdom of Northumberland, about this time landed in Yorkſhire with a great Fleet, reſolving to ſubdue the whole Kingdom of England; and marching Southward beſieged Northampton; but not ſucceeding there, he marched back to Tamworth, where having waſted the Countrey round about, came at laſt to Legaceſter (now Weſtcheſter); which when King Edmund heard of, he march'd with a powerful Army, and met him at that City, and having fought with him moſt part of the day, the two Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, ſeeing the great Danger and Hazard the Kingdom was then in, made an Agreement betwixt the two Kings, That Anlaf ſhould poſſeſs that part of England lying North of Watlingſtreet, and King Edmund that part which lay South of it, and that the Survivor of them ſhould quietly enjoy the whole Kingdom; and thereupon Anlaf married Alditha the Daughter of Earl Orme, by whoſe Counſel and Aſſiſtance he obtained the late Victory. But William of Malmesbury tells this Story ſomewhat different; viz. That about this time the Northumbers rebelling, recalled this Anlaf out of Ireland, whom they made their King, but whom nevertheleſs King Edmund conquered, and at laſt expell'd the Kingdom, and ſo once again added Northumberland to his own Dominions; which ſhews the great uncertainty of the Hiſtory of theſe times.

* This way we know not.

Anno Dom. Dcccxlii.

But R. Hoveden and Mat. Weſtminſter do further add, That whe this Anlaf had not long after his Marriage ſpoiled and burned th Church of St. Balther, and had burnt Tiningaham; by the juſt Judgment of God, he miſerably ended his Life, but without telling us b what means.

And they both further relate, That Anlaf the Son of Sihtric afte this reigned again over the Northumbers, and was this year expelled tha Kingdom by King Edmund. But it ſeems R. Hoveden and Mat. Weſtminſter make this latter Anlaf a quite different perſon from the former, who is ſuppoſed to have reigned in Ireland; whereas this was the Son o Sihtric late King of Northumberland, and whom we ſhall meet wit again more than once in the following Hiſtory. But John of Walingfords Chronicle, makes this King, whom he calls Olaf, a Norwegian, whom the Northumbers had called in, and beſtowed upon him the Titl of King, and under him rebelled againſt K. Edmund. As for this Reginal here mentioned in our Annals, I ſuppoſe he is the ſame whom H. Huntington calls King of York, becauſe he had conquered that Countrey: But tho the Hiſtory of theſe Tranſactions are very ſhort and obſcure, yet that which has been already related from theſe Authors, will ſerve to explain what would have been otherwiſe in the dark; viz. how the Cities and Towns above-mentioned now came to be recovered from the Danes, as having been taken by their King Anlaf aforeſaid.

Anno Dom. Dcccxliii.

This year Queen Ælgiva was brought to Bed of Prince Edgar (afterwards King) as Florence relates: Yet ſhe lived not long after, but died the year following, according to Ethelward's Chronicle.

Anno Dom. Dcccxliv.

'King Edmund reduced all the Countrey of Northumberland under 'his own Dominion, expelling thence the two Kings, Anlaf the Son of 'Sihtric, and Reginald the Son of Guthferth.

But Ethelwerd relates this action to have been done by this King's Lieutenants; viz. Biſhop Wulſtan, and the Ealdorman of Mercia, whoſe Name he does not give us, only that theſe two expelled certain Deſerters, viz. Reginald and Anlaf out of the City of York, and reduced it wholly under this King's Power.

John of Wallingford alſo makes this Anlaf to be the King's Nephew, and different from Anlaf the Norwegian.

Anno Dom. Dccccxlv.

'King Eadmund ſubdued the whole Countrey of Cumberland, and 'gave it to Malcolme King of Scots, upon condition that he ſhould aſſiſt 'him in his Wars both by Sea and Land.

For the Reader is to obſerve, that hitherto the Britains, though much diſturbed by their Neighbours (the Picts, Scots, and Engliſh), had ever ſince the coming in of the Saxons ſtill there continued a diſtinct Principality, and after ſeveral of them had been wearied out, they retired into North Wales, and there erected the Colony of Stratcluyd, as we formerly ſaid; though the Hiſtory and Succeſſion of theſe Kings are wholly loſt, unleſs it be ſuch ſcattered Remains as we have given you in the former Book. But Mat. Weſtminſter (though under the next year) adds that which is very unlikely to be true, that King Edmund conquered this Countrey by the Aſſiſtance of Lewellyn Prince of Wales, and put out the Eyes of the two Sons of Dunmaile King of that Province; though what he adds further, appears ſomewhat more probable, That he granted it to the King of Scots upon this condition, viz. To defend the North-parts of England from the Invaſion of Enemies both by Sea and Land.

Anno Dom. Dccccxlvi.

Land. To which Bromton's Chronicle adds likewiſe, That he was alſo to attend the King of England at ſeveral Great Feaſts in the year, when he held his Common Council; and that the King of Scots had for that end ſeveral Houſes aſſigned him to lye at by the way.

Alſo this year Mat. Weſtminſter relates, that King Edmund gave one of his Royal Towns, then called Beadriceſworth, with divers other Lands, to build a Church and Monaſtery, in Memory of St. Edmund the Martyr, whoſe Body was there enſhrin'd.

This year likewiſe (as Florence relates) King Edmund ſent Ambaſſadors to Prince Hugh of France, for the Reſtitution of King Lewis; whereupon the ſaid Prince held a Solemn Council with all the Chief Men of the Kingdom concerning it: But not long after,

King Edmund deceaſed at the Feaſt of St. Auguſtin; having held the Kingdom Six Years and an half.

But the Laudean or Peterburgh Copy of theſe Annals, as alſo Ethelwerd's Chronicle, place the Death of this King Anno Dom. 948; which without doubt is the trueſt Account.

So that he died in the very Flower of his Age, being not yet Five and twenty years old: But we ſhall give you the manner of his Death, from William of Malmesbury, as well as from other Authors, ſince he met with ſuch an End, the like to which I have not read ~~of any~~ other Prince, concerning taking all the Circumſtances together: And thus we find it: He having made a Great Entertainment at a place called Pucklekirk, npon the Holiday of St. Auguſtin Archbiſhop of Canterbury, for all his Nobility and Chief Men, and there ſpying towards the end of Dinner a certain Notorious Thief called Leof, ſitting at the Table, whom he had before baniſhed, commanded Leon his Sewer to lay hold on him: But the Thief not only reſiſted him, but was alſo like to have killed the Sewer: Whereupon the King (leaping from the Table, and) going to reſcue him out of the Villain's hands, and having now laid hold on him, and thrown him on the ground, he twiſted his hands in his hair; upon which the Thief pulling out a Dagger, ſtabbed the King (who lay upon him) into the Breaſt, ſo that he immediately expired; but the King's Servants preſently coming in, ſoon cut the Villain to pieces; though ſome of them were firſt wounded by him. The King's Body was thereupon carried to Glaſtenbury, and there buried; and the Town wherein he was killed was beſtowed on the ſame Monaſtery to ſing Maſſes for his Soul. To this Place the Prince (as well as his Brother) was a great Benefactor; as appears by his recited Charter in William of Malmesbury, whereby he confers divers large Privileges upon that Abby, of which St Dunſtan was then the Abbot: And it is alſo to be obſerved, that He there ſtiles himſelf in the beginning of his Charter, "Edmund, King of "the Engliſh, and Governor and Ruler of the other Nations round "about; and ſays, That with the Advice, and by the Conſent of his "Chief Men, and for the Remiſſion of his Sins, He made that Grant "to the Church of St. Mary at Glaſtenbury. This Charter bore date Anno 944. in Letters of Gold, and was written at the end of a Book of Goſpels which he had given to the ſame Church, moſt curiouſly bound. So that it is no wonder if he had the good words of the Monks; though he might alſo very well deſerve them; yet this laſt Action ſpeaks him to have been extremely tranſported with Paſſion, thus to debaſe the Majeſty of a King, in going about to ſeize a common Malefactor with his own own hands; and indeed he paid too dear for thus acting below his Character.

This King made divers good Laws; which ſince the Title does not recite in what year they were made, I have referred to this place; ſom of which I ſhall here give you, tranſlated from the Latin Copies in Abbot Bromton's Chronicle, as well as from Mr. Lambard's Collection.

In the Preface of which we are told, "That at the ſolemn Feaſt o
" Eaſter the King had held a Great Council at London, as well of Ec-
" cleſiaſticks as Laicks, where were preſent Odo and Wulſtan, Archbi-
" ſhops, with many other Biſhops, to conſult for the good of their ow
" Souls, and of thoſe that were committed to their Care and Govern" ment.

At which Synod or Council were enacted ſeveral Laws; viz. ſix i number, but they being of mere Eccleſiaſtical Concernment, as for payin Tythes, and againſt Fornication with Nuns, and Perjury, I omit them.

Then follow, in Bromton's Copy, ſeven other Conſtitutions of Civi Concernment, ſaid to have been made by the King, his Biſhops, and Wiſe Men, at Cullington, not extant in the Saxon Edition.

" The firſt of theſe requires an Oath of Fidelity to be taken by all to " King Edmund, in like manner as a man ought to bear Faith to his " Lord, without any Controverſy or Sedition, both in publick and pri" vate; to love whom the King ſhould love, and to hate whom he
" ſhould hate; and before the Oath be given, that no man ſhould con-
" ceal a Crime in his Brother or Neighbour, more than in a Stranger.

" The ſecond, concerning the apprehenſion of Thieves, enjoins, that " if it be known for certain where a Thief is, the Twelfhind and Twi-
" hind men (i. e. the former worth Twelve hundred, and the latter
" Two hundred Shillings of Eſtate) ſhould combine together, and
" take him either alive or dead; but in caſe any man take up a mortal
" Feud againſt another for ſo doing, he is to be eſteemed as the Enemy
" of the King, and all his Friends: And if any refuſe to aſſiſt in his " apprehenſion, he ſhall forfeit to the King an 120 ſhillings, and to the " Hundred 30 ſhillings.

" The fourth enjoins, That if ſeveral Thieves do ſteal, the eldeſt of " them ſhall be hanged, and each of the reſt be whipp'd thrice, and for " an Example have his little finger cut off.

This I take notice of, becauſe it is the firſt Law whereby Thieves are expreſly ordered to be hanged, without being admitted to pay their Weregild, or Price of their Heads.

The fifth and ſixth being againſt buying and receiving Strangers Cattel, I paſs by.

" The ſeventh enjoins, that every Perſon make his Servants, and all " that live within his Peace (i. e. his Diſtrict), and on his Lands, to " give Security; and alſo that all others of Ill Fame who lye under Ac-
" cuſations, ſhould have Security given for them; and what Officer,
" Thane, Ealdorman, or Countreyman ſoever he be, that refuſeth to " do according thereunto, ſhall forfeit an 120 ſhillings, and further be " deemed worthy of ſuch Puniſhments as have been before mentioned.

After theſe follow ſeven other of King Edmund's Laws, found both in Bromton and Lambard's Copies; before which alſo we find a Preface,
" Wherein the King ſignifies to all his Subjects both old and young, that " he had moſt ſtudiouſly enquired in a Solemn Aſſembly of Eccleſiaſticks
"and

Anno Dom. Dcccxlvi.

“and Laicks, by what means the Chriſtian Life might beſt be maintained; and that it ſeemed moſt convenient to them all, that he ſhould cheriſh and procure Love and mutual Friendſhip through all his Dominions; for they were much troubled at the unjuſt Diviſions and Contentions among them; therefore the King and they did now ordain, “Firſt, That if hereaſter one man kill another, he alone ſhould bear the Deadly Feud or Enmity of the Kindred of the Party ſlain, unleſs within Twelve Months by the aſſiſtance of his own Kindred, he ſhould pay the Weregild, or value of the ſlain man's head, of what condition ſoever he was; and then they ſhould not be taken for Enemies; in the mean time they ſhall not relieve him, nor have peace with him, and if they do or have, they ſhall forfeit all their Eſtate to the King; and he that ſhall kill any man, ſhall be taken as an Enemy by all the Kindred of the ſlain, and they may maintain Deadly Feud againſt him; and if any ſhall revenge himſelf upon, or proſecute any other of his Kindred beſides the Manſlayer himſelf, he ſhall forfeit all he hath, and be taken as an Enemy both by the King and all that love him.

Which Law was made, becauſe before this, if one man killed another, the Kindred of the ſlain had a Mortal Feud, and revenged his Death upon any of the Relations of the Murderer; as they do among the Indians even to this day.

“The ſecond denounces, That if a man fly to a Church, or to the King's Town, and there any one ſet upon him, or do him harm, he ſhall be puniſhed in the ſame manner.

“By the third, the King expreſly forbids, that any Fyhtwite, or Manbote (that is, any Fine for fighting or killing) be remitted.

“By the fourth, the King openly declares that his Houſe ſhall afford no ſhelter to him that hath ſhed blood, except he have firſt made ſatisfaction to God, and the Kindred of the Party ſlain, and done whatſoever was enjoined him by the Biſhop in whoſe Dioceſs the Fact was committed.

“The ſixth enjoins, That he that breaks the Peace, and ſets upon a man in his own houſe, ſhall forfeit all he hath, and his Life to be at the King's Mercy.

“The ſeventh and laſt of theſe Laws is alſo concerning Enmities or Deadly Feuds; declaring that it is the Duty of all Wiſe Men to ſuppreſs them, and preſcribing the way and means of doing it. As “Firſt, That an Indifferent Friend be ſent before to the Kindred of him that is ſlain, to ſignify to them, that he that killed him will make all due ſatisfaction; upon which the Manſlayer ſhall be delivered into his hands, that he may ſafely appear, and give Caution for the Payment of the value of the dead man's head; which as ſoon as he hath done, the King's Peace is next to be made betwixt them: Then after the end of one and twenty days, he ſhall pay Halsfage (according to Bromton's Copy, or as the Saxon Text has it, Healfange) that is (as Mr. Lambard interprets it) that which was paid in Commutation for the Puniſhment of hanging by the Neck, to the King or Lord. The reſt, as being tedious, I omit; for I think this ſufficient to let the Reader underſtand the nature of theſe Deadly Feuds, or Family Quarrels, among the Engliſh who were derived from the Ancient Saxons, Ger- mans, and other barbarous Northern Nations, that commonly maintained private Quarrels by their whole Kindred, thereby rendring thei Feuds as it were Hereditary. So Tacitus writes concerning the Germans, that they were forced to take up the Quarrels and Friendſhips o their Fathers and Kinſmen.

Beſides theſe Laws before mentioned, there is ſome other Conſtitutions aſcribed to the ſame King Edmund, concerning the Manner an Rites of Marriage; and though found by Sir H. Spelman in Saxon (i an Ancient Book belonging to Corpus Chriſti College in Cambridge) tacked to the Laws of King Alfred; yet Bromton* reckons them amongſ the Laws of King Edmund, and I think they ought rather to be ſuppoſe his: They are to this effect; "That where a man reſolves to marry "Woman with her Friends Conſent, the Bridegroom ſhall give Cautio "or Security by his Friends, not only to marry her, but alſo to fulfil th "Covenants made between them, and ſhall alſo engage to maintai "her. After that, the Bridegroom is to declare what he will give hi "Bride, beſides that which ſhe formerly made choice of with his goo "liking, if ſhe ſurvive him. In caſe they ſo agree, it provides, tha "after his Deceaſe ſhe ſhall have the one half of all his Eſtate; and i "they have a Child betwixt them, the whole, till ſuch time as ſhe marry again. Then when they have agreed on all things, the Kindred o "the Bride ſhall contract her to him, and engage for her Honeſty; an "at the ſame time they ſhall give Caution for the Celebration of th "Marriage. The reſt being not very material, I omit; and have onl ſet down theſe, to let the Reader ſee the Antiquity of Covenants befor Marriage, and of Bonds for the performance of them; as alſo of Joi tures, the Thirds of the Eſtate not being then ſettled by Law, as Dowe by what I can find.

Having now finiſhed the Reign of King Edmund, I have no more t obſerve, but that though he left two Sons by the Queen his Wife, (vi Edwi and Edgar), yet notwithſtanding his Brother Edred ſucceeded t him as Next Heir, (for ſo Ethelwerd, as well as Florence of Worceſter ſtiles him.

King EDRED.

Anno Dom. Dccccxlvi.

‘THIS year (according to our Annals) Eadred Ætheling ‘after his Brother's Deceaſe was made King, and preſently ‘reduced all Northumberland under his Obedience: Upon ‘which the Scots alſo ſwore to perform whatever he would ‘require of them.

But the Manuſcript Life of St Dunſtan, written by a Monk of thoſe times, and which is now in the Cottonian Library, is much more particular concerning this King's Succeſſion; ſaying, That King Edmund being ſlain, Eadred took the Kingdom, ſucceeding to his Brother as his Heir. Which is alſo confirmed by Florence of Worceſter, who ſays, That Edred being Next Heir to his Brother, ſucceeded him: And Ethelwerd gives us the reaſon of it more fully, That he ſucceeded him quippe ejus Hæres, becauſe he was Next Heir. And Simeon of Durham further adds, That this King was Crowned at Kingſton, by Odo Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Cleop. D. 7.

H. Huntington and Mat. Weſtminſter give us the Particulars of this War againſt the Northumbers and Scots more at large; viz. That he ſubdued the Northumbrians with a powerful Army, they refuſing to ſubmit to his Dominion; and that the Scots thereupon being afraid, ſubmitted themſelves to him without any War at all; and that the King of the Scots ſwore Fidelity to him.

It ſeems here by Ingulph, that this Submiſſion of the Northumbers was wrought by the means of Turketule, Chancellor to King Edred, and afterwards Abbot of Croyland, who was now ſent Ambaſſador to the Northumbers, to reduce them to their Duty; which he upon his Arrival at York performed with that Prudence and Diligence, that he brought back the Archbiſhop and all the People of that City to their former Allegiance.

Anno Dom. Dccccxlvii.

But R. Hoveden places the Oath taken by the Northumbrians, under this year; and that Wulſtan Archbiſhop of York, and all the Northumbrian Lords, ſwore Fealty to King Edred, in a Town called Tadencliff, though they did not long obſerve it.

Anno Dom. Dccccxlviii.

Under this year moſt of the Welſh Chronicles place the death of that Worthy Prince Howel Dha; and ſay, That he left his four Sons, Owen, Run, Roderic, and Edwin, his Heirs of all his Territories in South-Wales: But as for North Wales, it returned to the two Sons of Edwal Voel, called Jevaf and Jago, (becauſe Meyric their Elder Brother was not thought fit to govern): Theſe, as being of the Elder Houſe, would have had the Supreme Government of all Wales, which, being denied them by the Sons of Howel, cauſed great and long Wars between them.

Yet notwithſtanding, other of the Welſh Chronicles place the death of Howel Dha much later, for they make him Contemporary with our King Edgar, as ſhall be ſhewn when we come to the Hiſtory of his Reign in the next Book.

Alſo

Anno Dom. Dccccxlviii.

Alſo the ſame year (according to R. Hoveden) King Edred being much provoked by the Treachery of the Northumbers, laid all Northumberland waſte; in which devaſtation the Monaſtery of Ripun which had been built by Biſhop Wilfrid, was burnt: But our Annals defer this Rebellion of the Northumbers to the year following; ‘When Anlaf ‘again returned into the Countrey of the Northumbers.

Anno Dom. Dccccxlix.

This is alſo confirmed by Florence of Worceſter, and H. Huntington; viz. That King Edred being returned into the Southern parts of the Kingdom, Anlaf who had been formerly expell'd the Kingdom of Northumberland, returned thither with a great Navy, and being received with joy by the people, was again reſtored to his Kingdom.

About this time, Jago and Jevaf, Princes of North-Wales, entred South-Wales with a great and powerful Army, againſt whom came over the Eldeſt Son of Howel with his Brethren, and fought a Battel at the Hills of Carne, where Jevaf and Jago obtained the Victory. And the year following, the ſame Princes twice invaded South-Wales, and ſpoiled Dyvet, and ſlew Dunwallon, Lord thereof. And, to place theſe Welſh Wars together, in the year 952. the ſaid Sons of Howel Dha gathered their Forces together againſt Jevaf and Jago, and entred their Countrey as far as the River Conwy; where they fought a cruel bloody Battel, at a place called Gwrhuſtu, or Llanrwſt, Multitudes being ſlain on both ſides, as Edwin the Son of Howel Dha, with other Welſh Princes; and the Sons of Howel being vanquiſh'd, Jevaf and Jago purſued them as far as Cardigan, deſtroying their Countrey with Fire and Sword.

Anno Dom. Dcccclii.

‘The Northumbers again expelled King Anlaf, and ſet up Eric the ‘Son of Harold for their King.

This is the ſame with Eric mentioned by Hoveden, who yet did not immediately enter upon the Throne (as that Author ſuppoſes) till Anlaf had been expell'd; but Florence of Worceſter and the Chronicle of Mailroſſe, place the expulſion of Anlaf, and the ſetting up of Eric, two years ſooner, and perhaps with better reaſon: For the ſame year, according to Hoveden, King Edred made Wulſtan Archbiſhop of York, cloſe Priſoner at Witharbirig, becauſe he had been often accuſed to him upon divers accounts; Yet Will Malmesbury tells us expreſly, it was for favouring or conniving at his Countreymen in their late Rebellion. But after he had kept him a long time in Priſon, he thought fit to pardon him, out of reverence to his Function: And the year following, the Chronicle of Mailroſſe relates, that Archbiſhop Wulſtan being ſet free, was reſtored to his Epiſcopal Function at Doncaceſter. But this is certain, King Edred could not have done this till after Eric had been driven out (as this Author more truly reckons), tho our Annals do it the next year; ſaying, That Anno Dom. Dccccliv.

‘The Northumbers drove out King Eric, and King Eadred again poſ‘ſeſſed himſelf of that Kingdom.] With which alſo H. Huntington agrees, tho he places it a year ſooner, relating, That then the Northumbers being weary of the Government of this Eric, did as eaſily caſt him off, as they had before lightly received him; and calling in Edred, they again placed him on the Throne; though this does not accord with William of Malmesbury his Account, that King Edred expell'd Eric by force, and waſted all that Kingdom with fire and ſword. After which the Northumbrians being wholly ſubdued, were no more governed by Kings but Earls; a Catalogue of which Roger Hoveden hath there given us, as far as the Conqueſt.

Anno Dom. Dcccclv.

King Edred having been (as Malmesbury informs us) long tormented with frequent Convulſions in ſeveral parts of his Body, being admoniſhed by Archbiſhop Dunſtan of his approaching death, did not only bear that affliction with Patience, but ſpending his time in acts of Devotion, made his Palace a School of all Vertues, and being at length conſumed by a tedious long ſickneſs, he (according to the Annals) departed this life at the Feaſt of St. Clement, in the very flower of his Age, to the great grief of all his Subjects, after having Reigned Nine Years and an half.

But the Manuſcript life of St. Dunſtan (already cited) is much more particular as to the Diſeaſe he died of, viz. that not being able to ſwallow his Meat, he could only eat Broth, ſo that being waſted away, he died, for want of nourishment

This Relation of King Edred's not being able to ſwallow his Meat, gave occaſion to John of Wallingford abſurdly to tell us in his Chronicle (not long ſince Printed) that King Edred having his Teeth fallen out by reaſon of Old Age, could not Chew his Meat, and the Broths they made for him were not ſufficient to keep him alive, and ſo he died of Hunger.

Edit. Oxon. 1691.

But this is altogether as true as the ſtory that follows, not only in this Author, but in moſt other Monkiſh Writers of the Hiſtory of thoſe times (from the Relation of the above-cited Author of St. Dunſtan's Life) that St. Dunſtan hearing how dangerouſly Ill the King was, and making haſte to Viſit him before he died, as he rode on the way thither, there came a Voice from Heaven, which cried aloud to him, King Edred is now dead; at which all preſent being aſtoniſhed, the poor Horſe, upon which St. Dunſtan was then Mounted, immediately fell down dead. But William of Malmesbury, though he mentions this ſtory of the Voice, yet is ſo wiſe as to paſs by the death of the Horſe, being ſenſible it was a Pill too large to be eaſily ſwallowed.

As for the Character of this King, the Monkiſh Writers of thoſe times, give him that of a moſt Vertuous and Pious Prince; and as to his Valour, William of Malmesbury ſaith, he was not inferior in Magnanimity to either of his Brothers; he was alſo the firſt King of England who (as I can find) ſtiled himſelf Rex Magnæ Britanniæ, King of Great Britain, in a Charter to the Abbey of Croyland recited by Ingulphus; as alſo in another Charter to the Abbey of Reculver; in Monaſt. Anglic. he ſtiles himſelf Totius Albionis Monarchus, i.e. Monarch of all England; In which Stile he was alſo followed by his Nephew King Edgar; from whence we may obſerve, That King James was not the firſt who took upon him the Title of King of Great Britain, though as being alſo King of Scotland, he did much better deſerve it than the former.

Vol. 1.

But as for King Edred, he could not fail of the good will of the Monks, ſince the ſame Manuſcript Author of St. Dunſtan's Life relates, That he put ſuch great confidence in that Holy Abbot, that he committed the chief Muniments and Treaſures of his Kingdom to his Care, to be kept at his Abby of Glaſtenbury; and that as the King lay on his Death-

Anno Dom. Dccccxlv.

Death-bed, St. Dunſtan was then carrying them back to him to be diſpoſed of as he ſhould think fit, but he juſt before received the News o his death, as you have already heard.

Nor did this King die without Iſſue (as many believe) for Mr. Spee proves the contrary from certain ancient Charters Cited by him at th end of this King's Life; wherein you will find that his Two Sons E frid and Bertfrid were Witneſſes to them, tho they did not Succee their Father, but Edwi Son to his Elder Brother Edmund.

King EDWI.

Anno Dom. Dccccl v.

IMmediately after King Ed~~mund~~red's deceaſe, our Annals tell us, 'Edwig, Son to the late King Edmund and Elgiva, began his 'Reign; and he baniſht St. Dunſtan out of England.] This King, as all our Hiſtorians agree, was crowned at Kingſton by Odo Archbiſhop of Canterbury; but William of Malmesbury gives us the cauſe of this Diſgrace of St. Dunſtan, to this effect: That this King being a Youth of great Beauty, and amorous above his years, was mightily in love with a young Lady, his near Kinſwoman, whom he fain would have married, but the Biſhops and Nobles of his Kingdom were utterly averſe to it, not only becauſe of the nearneſs of their Relation, but becauſe ſhe had none of the beſt Reputation, as to her Chaſtity.

But though William of Malmesbury gives us all the reſt of this Story, yet I ſhall rather chuſe to take it from the * Manuſcript Life of St. Dunſtan, who lived about the ſame time, and out of which that Author borrowed it; and it is thus: That on the very day, that by the common Election of all the chief Men of England, Edwig was anointed King; after the Coronation-Dinner was over, he and the chief Biſhops and Nobility being retired into a private Room, there treating of the Great Affairs of the Kingdom, the King (perhaps at that Critical Juncture being weary of their company) ſtole into the Apartment of this Beautiful Lady, to enjoy ſome pleaſurable moments with her; which the Nobility hearing of, they highly reſented it, but none would adventure to bring him back; only Abbot Dunſtan, and a Biſhop whoſe Name was Cyneſius, the King's Couſin, went boldly into the Chamber, where they found him with his Crown off his head, lying between the Mother of this Lady, and her Daughter, upon which they not only reproved him, but putting on his Crown again, and taking him by the hand, they pulled him away from them, and carried him back by force into the Room where his Nobles were; but Athelgiva (for it ſeems ſo was this Lady ſometimes called) being highly provoked at this Affront, did not fail to exaſperate the King againſt Dunſtan; ſo that in revenge he baniſhed him the Kingdom; who thereupon (as R. Hoveden relates) retired to a Monaſtery in Flanders.

* In Bib. Cotton. Cleop. B. 13.

De Geſt. Pont. Lib. 1.

Nor did the King's Reſentments ſtop here, but out of hatred to Dunſtan, he not only turned the Monks out of Glaſtenbury, but out of divers of the greateſt Monaſteries in England; where alſo, as William of Malmesbury words it, his own Abbey was turned into a Stable for Clerks; that is, Secular Chanons were put in their places, not only there, but in all other Abbeys where the Monks were expelled.

But tho the King's violence to Abbot Dunſtan, and the Monks, is by no means to be juſtified, yet this rudeneſs to the King, and preſſing upon his privacy, and carrying him by force out of the Room from his Miſtreſs, or Wife, (for ſome Hiſtorians tell us that he had been privately married to her) can as little be excuſed: So that no wonder if a young King, and an enraged Woman, did all they could to revenge ſo great an Affront.

Yet it ſeems by the ſame Author of St. Dunſtan's Life, that Archbiſhop Odo was ſeverely revenged on this Lady; for he not only ſent Armed men, to take her out of the Court by force, but alſo branded her with a hot Iron on the Cheeks, to take off the King's Affections from her, and then cauſed her to be ſent into Ireland; but whether this was done by the Great Council of the Kingdom, or by his own Authority, I do not find: But it ſeems, upon her return thence again, being on her way to the King, the ſaid Archbiſhop's Officers met her, and cut her Hamſtrings; ſo that not being able to ſtir, ſhe is ſuppoſed to have died not long after, of this cruel Treatment. But however, this did not happen immediately, but ſome time after; for this Year all the People North of Humber, together with the Mercians, as far as the River Thames, roſe againſt King Edwi, with an intention to expel him the Kingdom, for his violence done to the Monks; ſo that, as * Osberne in the Life of Dunſtan relates, he was forced to fly with his Adultereſs to the City of Gloceſter: But Florence of Worceſter, and Simeon of Durham, are more particular in this Relation, ſaying, that the Mercians and Northumbrians hating and deſpiſing King Edwi for his Evil Government, deſerted him, and having depoſed him, they elected his Brother Prince Edgar King over them; which it ſeems was alſo confirmed by the Common Council of the Kingdom; for the above-cited Author of the Life of St. Dunſtan, ſaith it was done by the Common Conſent of all the Wiſe men of the Kingdom. So that Edwi having no more left him than the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons for his ſhare, the River Thames was made the Boundary between their two Kingdoms.

Henry de Knighton, out of ſome Ancient Chronicles then preſerved in the Abbey of Leyceſter, here farther relates, That after the Expulſion of King Edwi for his Evil Life, and the Enormous Deeds which he committed againſt the Church, the Throne was vacant for above a year, and many Murthers and Robberies, and other Miſchiefs were committed in the Kingdom, for want of Government, till ſome Good men of the Clergy and Laity, ſeeking God by frequent Prayers, heard at laſt a Voice from Heaven, commanding them to Crown Prince Edgar (being yet a Youth) their King, which they immediately obeyed.

But this ſounds like a Monkiſh Legend, only to enhance the Excellency of King Edgar's Reign, which with them muſt owe its Original to no leſs an Author than Heaven it ſelf; but no other Hiſtorians mention any ſuch thing, but agree that King Edwi was never deprived of more than the Kingdoms of Mercia and Northumberland, and there was no Vacancy of the Throne, that Diviſion being made preſently upon the aforeſaid Defection of the People of theſe Kingdoms, and immediately confirmed by an Act of the Witena Gemote, as hath been already related.

But however it happened, King Edwi was forced to reſt contented with this unequal diviſion, ſince not having the good-will of his Subjects, it was well he could keep what he had. From whence we may obſerve, how dangerous a thing it was, for Princes to provoke the Ruling Part of the Prieſts and People of thoſe times, who could ſo eaſily turn the hearts of their Subjects againſt them.

Our Annals, though they are very ſhort in this Relation, yet confirm the depoſing of King Edwi; viz. That this Year Edgar Atheling took upon him the Kingdom of the Mercians; and alſo adds, That not long before, Wulſtan, Archbiſhop of Tork, deceaſed.

Anno Dom. Dccccli x.

Although the printed Copy of the Saxon Annals place the Death of King Edwi under the year 957, yet it appears by the Manuſcript Laudean Copy of theſe Annals, as alſo by Florence of Worceſter, that he died not till this very year; for we cannot otherwiſe make up the ſpace of near four years, which all our Hiſtorians allow to this King's Reign: Of whom they give us this Character, That though he was extraordinary Handſome, yet he abuſed that Comelineſs of his Perſon by his exceſſive Luſt; and yet we do not hear of above one Miſtreſs he kept, and that too whom he was either married to, or elſe lived withal like a Wife. But it is no wonder if he have a very bad Character of them, when the Monks, his Enemies, are the only perſons that have given it to us: But H. Huntington, who was a Secular Prieſt, and no Monk, is more moderate, by telling us that this King did not uncommendably hold the Scepter. But when in the beginning of his Reign his Kingdom began to flouriſh, an Untimely Death put a ſtop to thoſe happy Expectations from him. His Body was buried at Wincheſter, with his Uncle's.

And with this King's Reign I ſhall alſo put a Period to this Book, leſt it ſhould ſwell beyond a due proportion.

ENGLAND:
As well Eccleſiaſtical, as Civil.

BOOK VI.

Containing the General Hiſtory of England from the Reign of King Edgar, to the Death of King Harold; being One hundred and ſeventeen Years.

King EDGAR.

I Have begun this Period with this Prince's Reign; for though it does not exactly divide the Space of Time between King Egbert and the coming in of King William, ſirnamed the Conqueror, into two equal parts, yet will it much better ſuit with the Proportion of the Books into which we have divided this Period: Beſides, King Edgar by again reuniting the Kingdom, and enjoying by his Valour as well as his good Fortune, a happy and peaceable Reign, though he was not the firſt Prince who took upon him the Title of Monarch of all Albion or England, as hath been already ſhewn, yet ſince all the Kings of this Iſland did willingly ſubmit themſelves to his Dominion, he ſeems to have beſt deſerved that Title, of any I can find.

King Edwy being now dead, as our Annals have related, King Edgar his Brother began to reign, not only over the Mercians and Northumbers, but alſo over all the Weſt-Saxon Kingdom; that is, (as the Manuſcript Author of St. Dunſtan's Life relates) he ſucceeded in his Brother's Kingdom as Heir, and was elected by the Clergy as well as Laity, over both Kingdoms: Which is alſo confirmed by Florence of Worceſter, and R. Hoveden, who expreſly tells us he was elected King by the whole Engliſh Nation, in the Sixteenth Year of his Age: So that (as the Annals obſerve) "In his days all things ſucceeded proſperouſly, God "giving him Peace as long as he lived, becauſe he loved his Law, and "conſulted the Good and Peace of his People, beyond all the Princes "that had been in the memory of man before him; and therefore that "he had greater Honour in all Nations round him, as well as in his "own; and he was by a peculiar Bleſſing from above ſo aſſiſted, that "Kings and Princes every where ſubmitted themſelves to him; inſo-"much that he diſpoſed of all things as he pleaſed, without fighting.

* his ~~[illegible]~~ Abbot being at Rome [illegible]

An: Dom DCCCCLX

But one of the firſt things (that we find in the ſaid Author of St. Dunſtan's Life) he did, was, That a great Council ~~being~~ held at a place called Bradanford (now Bradford in Wiltſhire) ~~Abbot~~ Dunſtan was by the general conſent of all there preſent, choſen Biſhop of Worceſter, for his great Piety and Prudence. And alſo King Edgar being now well inſtructed by the ſaid Biſhop and other Wiſe Men of the Kingdom, in the Arts of Government, began to diſcountenance the Wicked and Vicious, and to favour and advance the Good; as alſo to repair the decay'd and ruined Monaſteries, and then to repleniſh them with God's Servants, (i. e. the Monks); and in ſhort, to undo whatſoever his Brother had done before.*

* this King re-built or repaired 40 monasteries. no wonder then, the Monks cryed him up for a Saint.

Anno Dom. DCCCCLXI.

This year, according to our Annals, Odo, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, dying, Dunſtan, Biſhop of Worceſter, ſucceeded in the Archbiſhoprick: But in this the Author of theſe Annals is miſtaken; for William of Malmesbury, as well as other Authors, aſſure us, That it was not Dunſtan, but Elſin, Biſhop of Wincheſter, who by the means of ſome Courtiers whom he had gained over to him by the prevailing Power of his Preſents, procured King Edgar's Precept to make him Archbiſhop. From whence we may obſerve, That notwithſtanding the former Decrees of Synods and Councils in England, yet theſe Elections which were called Canonical, were neither then nor a long time after this obſerved.

But as for Biſhop Elſin, he is ſaid by our Authors to have trampled upon the Tombſtone of that Pious Archbiſhop, Odo, his Predeceſſor, and to have uttered opprobrious Language againſt his Memory; which his Ghoſt (it ſeems) ſo far reſented, that appearing to the new Archbiſhop in a Viſion, it threatned him with a ſpeedy deſtruction; but he looking upon it only as a Dream, made what haſte he could to Rome, to get the Pope's Confirmation, by receiving of his Pall; but in his Journey over the Alpes he was frozen to death, being found with his Feet in his Horſe's belly, which had been killed and opened, to reſtore heat to them.

But no ſooner did the News arrive of Elſin's death, when (according to Florence) Brythelm, Biſhop of Wells, was made Archbiſhop; But becauſe neither of theſe laſt Archbiſhops ever received their Palls from Rome, which was then counted eſſential to that Dignity, I ſuppoſe theſe two laſt were omitted in our Annals: But this Brythelm being not found ſufficiently qualified for ſo great a Charge, he was (as Osbern relates) commanded by the King and the whole Nation to retire; whereupon he quietly ſubmitted, and returning again to his former Church, Dunſtan, now Biſhop of London, (who alſo held the See of Worceſter in Commendam) was by the general Conſent of the King and all his Wiſe Men in the great Council of the Kingdom, elected Archbiſhop of

This year, I suppose that Howel Dha, King of North wales to have deceased, for tho' ~~the~~ divers Welch Chronicles (as well the former as [illegible]) make him to have died above 10 years sooner, yet I cannot allow of it, since in that ancient Book of the Church of Landaff, ~~it is~~ this King Howel and K. Edgar are said to have been contemporaries and that the latter having summoned the former to his Court and there decided a controversy between him, and another Welsh Prince called Morgan Hen about certain Lands in dispute, and the original Charter containing that King's decision, (as entered in the Register of that Church.

of Canterbury, for his ſuppoſed great Sanctity: Of which the Monks of that Age relate ſo many Miracles, that it is tedious to read, much more to repeat ſuch ſtuff; inſomuch, that one would admire, (were it not for the extreme Ignorance of that Age) how men could ever hope they ſhould be believed in ſo ſhort a time after they were ſuppoſed to be done.

Such are thoſe of this Biſhop's Harp being hung againſt the Wall, and playing a whole Pſalm without any hands touching it; nay, the Monks can tell us, not only the Tune, but the very Words too. Then the ſtopping of King Edmund's Horſe, when he was juſt ready to run down a Precipice, at that King's only pronouncing of St. Dunſtan's Name to himſelf. Next, his often driving away the Devil with a Staff, troubling him at Prayers ſometimes in the ſhape of a Fox, ſometimes of a Wolf or a Bear. But above all, his taking the Devil by the Noſe with a Pair of red hot Tongs; who (being, it ſeems, an excellent Smith) was once at work in his Forge, when the Devil appeared in the ſhape of a Handſome Woman, but met with very rough entertainment; for going about to tempt his Chaſtity, he took his Deviliſhip by the Noſe with a Pair of red hot Tongs, till he made him roar. Now if ſuch Grave Authors as William of Malmesbury are guilty of relating ſuch Fictions, what can we expect from thoſe of leſs Judgment and Honeſty?

But this muſt be acknowledged, that this Archbiſhop was a great Propagator of Monkery; many Monaſteries being either new built or new founded in his time; and the Clerks or Secular Canons of divers Churches being now to be turned out, were put to their choice, either to quit their Habits or their Places; moſt of whom rather choſe the former, and ſo gave place to thoſe who being of William of Malmesbury's own Order, our Author calls their Betters.

Archbiſhop Dunſtan alſo exerciſed Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, without reſpect of perſons, impoſing upon King Edgar himſelf a Seven Years Pennance, part of which was, to forbear wearing his Crown during all that time; and this was for taking a Nun out of a Cloyſter at Wilton, and then debauching her. From all which we may obſerve, how neceſſary it was in thoſe days for a Prince's Quiet as well as Reputation, to be blindly obedient to that which was then called the Church-Diſcipline; ſince King Edwin having to do but with one Woman whom they did not like, is branded as one exceſſively given to Women; whilſt King Edgar, who gave many more Inſtances of his Failings in this kind, is reckon'd for a Saint. But as for this Nun, whom they call Wilfrede, William of Malmesbury tells us, that tho ſhe were bred in that Monaſtery, yet was ſhe not then profeſſed, but took upon her the Veil, only to avoid the King's Luſt, which yet, it ſeems, could not ſecure her from it; for he begot on her that beautiful Lady Editha, who became alſo a Nun in the ſame Monaſtery of Wilton, where her Mother had been profeſſed before; and of which this Young and Virtuous Lady being made Abbeſs, died in the flower of her Age, as William of Malmesbury informs us.

The ſame Year alſo, according to the Welſh Chronicle, North Wales was ſorely haraſs'd by the Forces of King Edgar: The Cauſe of which War, was the Non-Payment of the Tribute due from the King of Aberfraw to the King of London: But in the end, as John Beaver informs us, a Peace was concluded on this condition, That King Edgar hearing the great Miſchief which both England and Wales then received by the vaſt multitude of Wolves which then abounded, eſpecially in Wales, releaſed the Tribute in Money, which the King of North-Wales was hitherto obliged to pay, and inſtead thereof engaged the Prince of Wales to ſend him a Yearly Tribute of ſo many Wolves Heads, in lieu of that Tribute; which the ſaid Prince performed, till within ſome Years, there being no more Wolves to be found either in England or Wales, that Tribute ceaſed.

But to proceed with our Annals: 'This Year deceaſed Ælfgar, Couſin 'to the King, (and Earl alſo of Devonſhire) whoſe Body lies buried at 'Wilton. Sigeferth likewiſe (here called a King, though he was indeed 'no more than Vice-King, or Earl of ſome Province) now made himſelf away, and was buried at Winborne. The ſame Year was a great 'Mortality of Men, and a very Malignant Feaver raged at London: 'Alſo the Church of St. Pauls (at London) was this Year burnt, 'and ſoon after rebuilt; and Athelmod the Prieſt went to Rome, and 'there died. And Prince Edmund Eldest sonne to King Edgar also di and was buried at the Abbey of Ramsey. Hist. R

I have nothing elſe to add that is remarkable, under this Year, but the Foundation of the Abby of Taviſtock, by Ordgar Earl of Devonſhire, afterwards Father-in-law to King Edgar; though it was within leſs than fifty years after its foundation burnt down by the Danes in the Reign of King Ethelred; but was afterwards rebuilt more ſtately than before.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxiii.

'This Year Wolfſtan the Deacon deceaſed, and afterwards Gyric the 'Prieſt. Theſe, I ſuppoſe, were ſome men of remarkable Sanctity, in that Monaſtery, to which this Copy of theſe Annals did once belong.

'The ſame Year alſo, Abbot Athelwald received the Biſhoprick o 'Wincheſter, and was conſecrated on a Sunday, being the Vigil of St. An'drew: The ſecond year after his Conſecration, he repaired divers Mo'naſteries, and drove the Clerks (i. e. Canons) from that Biſhoprick, 'becauſe they would obſerve no Rule, and placed Monks in their ſtead 'He alſo founded two Abbies, the one of Monks, and the other o 'Nuns; and afterwards going to King Edgar, he deſired him to be'ſtow upon him all the Monaſteries the Danes had before deſtroyed, be'cauſe he intended to rebuild them; which the King willingly granted 'Then the Biſhop went to Elig, where St. Etheldrith lieth buried 'and cauſed that Monaſtery to be rebuilt, and then gave it to the care o 'one of his Monks, named Brightnoth, and afterwards made him Abbo 'of the Monks of that Monaſtery, where there had been Nuns before 'Then Biſhop Athelwald went to the Monaſtery which is called Mede'ſhamſtead, which had alſo been deſtroyed by the Danes; where h 'found nothing but old Walls, with Trees and Buſhes growing amon 'them; but at laſt he ſpied hidden in one of theſe Walls, that Charte 'which Abbot Headda had formerly wrote; in which it appeared, tha 'King Wulfher, and Ethelred his Brother, had founded this Monaſtery 'and that the King with the Biſhop had freed it from all ſecular ſerv'tude; and Pope Agatho had confirmed it by his Bull, as alſo the Arch'biſhop Deus Dedit.

Which Charter, I ſuppoſe, is that, the Subſtance of which is alread recited in the Fourth Book, Anno 656. and which I have there pr ved to be forged; for the Monks had then a very fair opportunity forge that Charter, and afterwards to pretend they found it in an old Wall: But letting that paſs, thus much is certain from the Peterburgh Copy of theſe Annals, 'That the ſaid Biſhop then cauſed this Monaſtery to be rebuilt, placing a new Set of Monks therein; over whom he appointed an Abbot called Aldulf: Then went the Biſhop to the King, and ſhewed him the Charter he had lately found; whereby he not only obtained a new Charter of Confirmation of all the Lands and Privileges formerly granted by the Mercian Kings, but alſo many other Townſhips and Lands there recited; as particularly Undale, with the Hundred adjoining, in Northamptonſhire, which had formerly been a Monaſtery of it ſelf, as may be obſerved in the account we have already given of the Life of the Archbiſhop Wilfrid.

'The King likewiſe granted, That the Lands belonging to that Monaſtery, ſhould be a diſtinct Shire, having Sac and Soc, Tol and Team, and Infangentheof, (* which terms I ſhall explain in another place); the King there alſo grants them a Market, with the Toll thereof; and that there ſhould be no other Market between Stamford and Huntington; and to the former of theſe the King alſo granted the Abbot a Mint. But as for the Names of the Lands given, together with the Limits and the Tolls of the Market there mentioned, I refer the Reader to the Charter it ſelf. Then follows the Subſcription of the King with the Sign of the Croſs, and next the Confirmation of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with a dreadful Curſe on thoſe that ſhould violate it; as alſo the Confirmation of Oſwald Archbiſhop of York, Athelwald Biſhop of Wincheſter, with ſeveral other Biſhops, Abbots, Ealdormen, and Wiſemen, who all confirmed it, and ſigned it with the Croſs: This was done Anno Dom. 972. of our Lord's Nativity, and in the ſixteenth year of the King's Reign; which ſhews this Coppy of the Annals to be written divers years after theſe things were done; as does alſo more particularly that ſhort Hiſtory concerning the Affairs of this Abby, and the Succeſſion of its Abbots for many years after this time. As how 'Abbot Adulf bought many more Lands, wherewith he highly enriched that Monaſtery, where he continued Abbot, till Oſwald Archbiſhop of York deceaſed, and he ſucceeded him in the Archbiſhoprick; and then there was another choſen Abbot of the ſaid Monaſtery, named Kenulph, who was afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter; he firſt built a Wall round the Monaſtery, and gave it the name of Burgh, which was before called Medeſhameſted; but he being ſometime after made Biſhop of Wincheſter, another Abbot was choſen from the ſame Abby, called Ælfi, who continued Abbot fifty years: He removed the Bodies of St. Kyneburge, and St. Cyneſuith, which lay buried at Caſtra; and St. Tibba, which lay entomb'd at Rehala, (i. e. Ryal in Rutlandſhire) and brought them to Burgh, and dedicated them to St. Peter, keeping them there as long as he continued Abbot. I have been the more particular in the Account of this ſo Ancient and Famous Monaſtery, as having been the Epiſcopal See of the Biſhops of Peterburgh almoſt ever ſince the Diſſolution of that Abby in the Reign of King Henry the Eighth.

* Vid. the Introduction.

This Year alſo (according to Simeon of Durham) King Edgar married Ethelfreda, the Daughter of Ordgar Earl of Devonſhire, after the Death of her Husband Ethelwald, Earl of the Eaſt-Angles: Of her he begot two Sons, Edwald and Ethelred, the former of whom died in his Infancy, Anno Dom. Dcccclxiii. Infancy, but the latter lived to be King of England. But before he married this Lady, it is certain he had an Elder Son by Elfleda, ſirnamed The Fair Daughter of Earl Eodmar; of whom he begot King Edward, called the Martyr: But whether King Edgar was ever lawfully married to her, may alſo be doubted; ſince Osbern, in his Life of St. Dunſtan, ſays, That this Saint baptized the Child begotten on Ethelfleda the King's Concubine; with whom alſo agrees Nicholas Trevet, in his Chronicle; though, I confeſs, the Major part of our Hiſtorians do make her to have been his Lawful Wife. And it was upon this Pretence of Illegitimacy, that Queen Elfleda, and thoſe of her Party, would have afterwards put by Prince Edward her Son, from being choſen King; as ſhall be further related in its proper place. But Florence of Worceſter, and R. Hoveden, place King Edgar's Marriage with this Lady, under the next year.

[illegible]
Edward

Anno Dom. Dcccclxiv. This Year King Edgar expelled the Prieſts (or Chanons) both from the old and new Monaſtery of Wincheſter; as alſo from Ceorteſige, (or Chertſy) and Middletune, and put Monks in their rooms; he alſo ordained Æthelgar Abbot of the new Monaſtery, and Ordbryght Abbot of Ceorteſige, and Cyneweard of Middletune. But as ſoon as Dunſtan was made Archbiſhop, he went to Rome, and there obtained his Pall of the Pope.

This Year alſo, the Iriſhmen (according to the Welſh Chronicles) landed in Angleſey, and deſtroyed Aberfraw, and alſo ſlew Rodoric, one of the Sons of Edwal Voel, late Prince of Wales.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxvii. King Edgar (according to R. Hoveden, and Simeon of Durham) placed Nuns in the Monaſtery of Rumſey in Hampſhire, which his Grandfather King Edward had founded, and made his Daughter Merwina Abbeſs over them.

About this time (as Caradoc's Chronicle relates) there aroſe a great Quarrel between the two Brothers, Princes of North-Wales, Jevaf and Jago, who had governed jointly ever ſince the death of Howel Dha, till then; when Jago ſeizing upon his Brother Jevaf by force, kept him cruelly in Priſon for near ſix years; about which time alſo Eneon the Son of Owen, Prince of South Wales, taking advantage of theſe Civil Diſſentions, made War upon North-Wales, and ſubdued all the Country of Gwyn: So that it is no wonder if the Engliſh were too hard for theſe Britiſh Princes, ſince they never could agree amongſt themſelves.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxix. ‘King Edgar this year commanded all the Countrey of Thanet to be ‘laid waſte.

As Bromton's Chronicle informs us, the King did not do as an Inſulting Enemy, but as a King, who puniſhed one Evil with another, becauſe the Inhabitants of that Iſland had deſpiſed his Royal Laws. But Matthew Weſtminſter's account of the reaſon of the King's ſevere proceeding with them, ſeems far more ſatisfactory; viz. That it was becauſe certain Merchants coming with Goods from York, and touching upon this Iſland, the Inhabitants ſeized the men, and plunder'd them of what they brought.

This Year alſo, (according to the Hiſtory of the Abby of Ramſey) Aylwin the Ealdorman, by the perſuaſion of Oſwald Archbiſhop of York, and with the conſent of King Edgar, founded the Abby of Ramſey, to the Honour of St. Mary and St. Benedict, as appears by the Charter of King Edgar, which you will find at large in * Monaſt. Anglican. Alſo King Edgar, at the perſuaſion of Biſhop Athelwald, now cauſed the Chanons to be driven out of all the greater Monaſteries in Mercia, and Monks o be put in their places. [illegible]

Anno Dom. Dccccclxx.

'This Year Archbiſhop Oskitel deceaſed, who was firſt conſecrated Biſhop of Dorceſter, and afterwards by the conſent of King Edward and all his Wiſe-Men, conſecrated Archbiſhop of York. He was Two and twenty years Biſhop, and deceaſed on the Vigils of All-Saints, at Thame; but Thurkytel being his Kinſman, carried the Biſhop's Body to Bedford, becauſe he was Abbot there at that time.

But there is certainly a miſtake in the King's Name; and inſtead of Edward, it ſhould be Edred; for King Edward the Elder was dead long efore this Biſhop's Conſecration.

Anno Dom. Dccccclxxi.

'Eadmund Etheling, Son to King Edgar, died this year, whoſe Body lies buried at Rumſeig, i.e. Rumſey in Hampſhire.

Anno Dom. Dccccixxii.

Oskytel Archbiſhop of York deceaſing, his Kinſman Oſwald, Biſhop f Worceſter ſucceeded him, (as Florence of Worceſter relates.)

About this time alſo, Godfred, the Son of Harold the Dane, ſubdued he whole Iſle of Angleſey; which yet he enjoyed not long.

Anno Dom. Dccccclxxiii.

'This year, Edgar, Ruler of the Engliſh, was with great Honour crowned King, in the Ancient City called Akmanceaſter, which the Inhabitants called Bathan; ſo that there was great Joy among all men that happy Day, being that which is commonly called Pentecoſt; where was a frequent Aſſembly of Prieſts and Monks, as alſo a great Council of the Wites, or Wiſemen. This happen'd in the Thouſandth Year of Chriſt, wanting but 27; and in the Thirtieth Year of this King's Age.

Alſo about this time, (according to Caradoc's Chronicle) Howel the on of Jevaſ, having raiſed great Forces againſt his Uncle Jago above-entioned, to deliver his Father out of Priſon, and having vanquiſh'd s Uncle, and driven him out of the Countrey, reſtor'd his Father o his Liberty, though not to his Dominion; for he took upon him- lf the ſole Government of all North Wales.

But Mr. Vaughan, in his Additional Notes to this Chronicle, farther lates from ſome other Welſh Annals, That Jago being thus expelled, ed to King Edgar, and prevailed ſo far, that he brought an Army into orth Wales, to reſtore him; but coming as far as Bangor, Howel met im, and at the King's requeſt conſented that his Uncle Jago ſhould en- y that part of the Countrey which he had in his Father Jevaſ's time; o King Edgar having founded a new Church at Bangor, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, returned with great Honour to Cheſter, having eſe two Welſh Princes in his Company; where alſo met him by his ppointment, Six other Princes; as ſhall be farther related by and by.

It hath been much queſtioned, what ſhould be the reaſon that this ing ſhould thus long defer his Coronation: Some of the Monks im- ute it to the Pennance impoſed upon him by Archbiſhop Dunſtan, for ebauching the Nun above mentioned; but that is not at all likely, nce that Pennance was but for Seven Years, whereas he had now reign- twice as long ſince that Sin was committed. But I do rather ſuppoſe, at he was Crowned long before, in the very beginning of his Reign, ough our Monkiſh Chroniclers have either forgot to mention it, or elſe ve omitted it on purpoſe, to add the greater Luſtre to Archbiſhop

Anno Dom. Dccccl xxiii.

Flet.

Dunſtan: For it is very certain, that neither in this King's time, no long after the Conqueſt, was it ever known, that the King Elect took the Title of King, till after his Coronation.

Now that our Kings did upon ſome great occaſion repeat the Ceremony of their Coronation, I ſhall prove from the Examples both o King Ethelred, as well as of King Richard the Firſt, and Henry th Third; and why it might not be ſo in the Reign of this King, as well a in either of them, I can ſee no reaſon; though the occaſion of it is no any where expreſſed, as I know of.

But to return to our Annals: 'After this the King ſail'd with all hi 'Fleet to Legancester, (i. e. Weſt-Cheſter) where met him Six Kings 'who all making a League with him, promiſed to be his Aſſiſtants bot 'by Sea and Land.

And now we have ſpoke of this King's Fleet, it is fit we give a large Relation of it, as alſo of theſe Princes that here met him, from Willia of Malmesbury, Florence of Worceſter, and other Authors, who increa their Number to Eight ~~Thouſand~~; which being ſo glorious for ou Nation, I ſhall here ſet down at large.

Six

This King was the firſt who was truly Lord of our Seas; for ever Summer (ſaith William of Malmesbury) immediately after Eaſter, com manding his Ships from every Shore to be brought into one collecte Body, he ſailed uſually with the Eaſtern Fleet to the Weſtern part o the Iſland; and then ſending it back, ſailed with the Weſtern Fleet unt the Northern; and thence with the Northern he returned to the Eaſter Coaſts; ſailing in this manner quite round the Iſland; being exceedin diligent to prevent the Incurſions of Pyrates, and couragious in the de fence of his Kingdom againſt Foreigners, and diligent in the trainin up of himſelf and his People for Military Employments.

Each of theſe Fleets (as we are told) conſiſted of One thouſand an two hundred Ships, and theſe alſo very ſtout ones for thoſe times: S that the number of all muſt have amounted to Three thouſand and ſi hundred Sail, as ſome of our Authors expreſly relate, but others, Fou thouſand Veſſels; and there are ſome alſo that add to theſe Three, Fourth Fleet; by which means the Number will be increaſed to Fou thouſand and eight hundred Sail; as may be ſeen in Mathew Weſtmin ſter. To ſuſtain which Charge, beſides the private Contributions o his Subjects, he had alſo (in the latter end of his Reign) Six Pett Kings ~~under him~~, who were bound by Oath to be ready at his Com mand, to ~~ſerve him~~ both by Sea and Land; which Oath they took a Cheſter, (as the Annals relate) where he had given them order to me him, as he ſailed about the North of Britain with a great Navy. The Names are, Kened or Kineth, King of the Scots; Malcolm King of Cum berland, (who at this time, it ſeems, were ſo called, though, as w ſaid, the Cumbrians had now thrown off that Title, and taken that Earls); Maccuſe, Lord of the Iſles; with five Princes of Wales, th Names of whom were, Duſnal, Griffyth, Hunald, Jacob, and Judethi who all meeting him at his Court at Cheſter, to ſet forth the Splend and Greatneſs of his Dominion, one day he went into a Galley, an cauſed himſelf to be rowed by theſe Petty Princes, he himſelf holdin the Stern, and ſteering the Veſſel along the River Dee, was waited on all his Nobles in another Barge; ſo he ſailed to the Monaſtery of St. Jo Baptiſt; where an Oration being made to him, in the ſame State an Pom omp he retutned to his Palace : Where when he arrived, he is ſaid to ave told his Nobles about him, That then his Succeſſors might boaſt emſelves to be truly Kings of England, when they ſhould be (like im) attended by ſo many Princes his Vaſſals ; as Florence of Worceſter, nd William of Malmeſbury relate it. As for theſe Petty Kings above-entioned, Maccuſe, by the ſaid Florence, Matthew of Weſtminſter, and R. Hoveden, is called a King of Man, and many other Iſlands ; but illiam of Malmeſbury ſtiles him an Arch-pirate ; by which word a obber is not to be underſtood, but (as Aſſer, and others of that Age ſe that Appellation) one ſkilled in Sea Affairs, or a Seaman ; ſo called rom Pira, which in the Attique Tongue, ſignifies a Craft or Art ; ut afterward it came to be applicable only to ſuch as without any Right nfeſted the Seas.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxiii.

~~Another of the Kings, and~~ that of Wales, was ~~Huual~~ or Hewal, who ho he be not placed the firſt in order, yet if we follow the account of me Authors, muſt have been the chief of them all, the Prince to whom ll the reſt performed Obedience : The Book of Landaff bids us take otice, that at the ſame time with Edgar lived Howel Dha, and Morgan Hen, (which two yet were the Subjects of King Edgar.) But in this, ither that Author, or the Chronicle of Caradoc muſt be miſtaken, who laces the Death of Howel Dha under the year 948 : And therefore it s more likely that the Howel here mentioned, was not Howel Dha, but Howel the Son of Jevaf, who had the year before expell'd his Uncle, nd taken upon himſelf the Principality of Wales, notwithſtanding his Father was then alive.

But as for all the reſt of theſe Welſh Princes, I do not know how to make them out from their Chronicles, (which give no account of this Action); only I take Duſnal to be the Son of Howel Dha, and as Matthew of Weſtminſter ſays, was then Prince of South-Wales. As for Jacob and Judethel, I ſuppoſe they muſt have been the ſame with Jevaf and Jago, as they are called in the Welſh Chronicles : But as for this Prince Gryffith, I can find none ſuch among any of the Welſh Princes ruling at that time. But to return to our Annals.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxv.

'This year Eadgar King of the Engliſh, changed this frail Life, for 'another more Glorious, on the 18*th*. day of July : But his Body was buried with great Solemnity at the Abby of Glaſtenbury, to which he himſelf had been a great Benefactor ; as appears by his Charter, recited at large by William of Malmeſbury in his Treatiſe of the Antiquity of that Monaſtery ; in which Charter he alſo ſtiles himſelf, Totius Britannia Baſileus, i. e. King of all Britain.

But ſince our Hiſtorians are ſo very large and full in their Commendations of this Prince, as that he was moſt Religious, Valiant, and Wiſe, and exceeded all his Predeceſſors (except King Alfred, and King Athelſtan) it will not, I hope, be amiſs to ſhew you how partial theſe Monks were to the Memory of this Prince; who though they will needs have to be a Saint, becauſe he either built or repaired ſo many Monaſteries, yet was certainly (if the ſame Monkiſh Writers are to be believed) guilty of as great Exceſſes of Luſt and Cruelty, as any of his Predeceſſors ; for William of Malmeſbury tells us, that Ordgar Duke of Devonſhire had a Daughter named Elfreda, fam'd for an extraordinary Beauty, which caus'd the King to have great Inclinations for her, upon the bare Report made of her to him ; but to be more certain, he ſent a Knight called Athelwold, his Confident to ſee her, reſolving to mar her, if ſhe were found to be ſo handſome as ſhe was reported. Ath wold made haſte, and got a ſight of her, wherewith he was ſo ſmitte that he concealed the Errand on which he came, and reſolved to obta her for himſelf; which being eaſily done, he leſſened her to the Kin as a Woman but very ordinary, and of ſo ſmall a Stature, as wou misbecome his Royal Bed; ſo that he married her with the King's co ſent, whoſe Thoughts were now diverted to other Objects: But at la the Earl's Enemies diſcovered the Intrigue, and told the King how had deceived him; and whom the more to enrage, they omitted words whereby to ſet out and enhance the extraordinary Beauty of t Lady: Upon which, the King concealed his Anger, but was reſolv by another Stratagem to over-reach him. And the better to effect wh he intended, he one day told him pleaſantly, that at ſuch a time would come and ſee whether his Wife was ſo fair as ſhe was repreſent to be. This unexpected Surprize ſo exceedingly ſtruck him, that earneſtly begg'd of her to conſult his Preſervation, by putting on her wo Cloaths, and deforming her ſelf by what other means ſhe thought be for ſhe had now perceived, that inſtead of a King ſhe had married Subject, though an Earl; which raiſed ſuch a Female Indignation her, that againſt the coming of King Edgar ſhe dreſſed her ſelf in t moſt Gay and Charming manner her Pride and Reſentment to be th cheated, could deviſe; which had ſuch powerful effects upon him, tha his Love being ſo much the more inflamed, as it had been ſo long d frauded, he for a Blind appointed a day of hunting in the Foreſt calle Warewell, (now Harwood Foreſt) and there ſlew Athelwold with Dart. The Earl's Son coming by when the Fact was juſt committe and looking upon his Father's dead Body, the King asked him, How liked this Game? To which he anſwered, That whatſoever pleaſed t King, ought not to diſpleaſe him: With which flattering Reply, t King's angry Mind was ſo appeaſed, that he ever after highly favour the Youth; and expiated the Crime committed upon the Father, by t great kindneſs he ſhewed to the Son. But an Ancient Manuſcript ca led Brutus (now in the Archbiſhop's Library at Lambeth) relates t latter end of this Story ſomewhat more for King Edgar's Reputation which ſince I meet with no where elſe, I ſhall here give you: It is, Th King Edgar, not long after, ſending this Athelwold (now made an Earl to ſecure the Coaſt of Northumberland againſt the Danes, then like t invade it, as he was in his way thither he was ſet upon by certain u known Soldiers, who there ſlew him, but whether by the King's Orde or no, is not ſaid. As ſoon as the Earl was dead, the King made Love to hi fair Widow, and marrying her, cauſed her to be crowned Queen, thoug it much diſpleaſed Archbiſhop Dunſtan, who could never after this en dure her: But William of Malmesbury adds, that to expiate the Murthe of her firſt Husband, ſhe built a Nunnery in the place where he wa ſlain.

[illegible]

Another thing laid to his charge, ~~and which~~ ſhews him to have bee more conſtant in his Love, than could be expected from a Young Prince ſo ~~univerſally~~ addicted ~~as he was~~ to the Fair Sex, of which you have ſe veral Inſtances in Story; ~~one of them here~~ ſhall ſuffice. It ſeems coming one time to Andover, (a Town not far from Winchester) h would have had the enjoyment of a certain Ealdorman's Daughter mightil mightily celebrated for her Beauty, and commanded her to be brought to his Bed: The Mother of the Virgin not daring flatly to deny, yet abhorring to be a Bawd to her own Daughter, reſolved to put a Trick on him by the favour of the Night, and ſo ſent a Waiting-Maid ſhe had, in her room, one that was Handſome enough, and not Unwitty, as ſhe quickly made to appear; for as ſoon as it was morning ſhe offering to get up, the King asked her, Why ſhe would make ſuch haſte from him? She replied, ſhe could no longer have the Happineſs of his Company, becauſe her Lady had ſet her ſome Work to do. He ſtartling at this, wonder'd what ſhe meant (for he did not in the leaſt queſtion, but that his Bedfellow had been the Earl's real Daughter); ſhe then moſt paſſionately beſought him to ſet her free from the hard and cruel Service of her Lady, as a Reward for her loſt Virginity: But the King being confounded at his diſappointment, was for ſome time divided between Compaſſion for the poor Maid, and Anger at his being thus abuſed; but at laſt he put it off with a Jeſt, and ſetting her free, carried her along with him, and loved her to that degree, that he kept himſelf to her alone, until ſuch time as he married Elfreda above-mentioned.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxv.

Theſe were the Stories commonly told in thoſe days of King Edgar, and of which more noiſe had been made by the Monks, if he had not built ſo many Monaſteries, which ſtopp'd their mouths from ſaying much ill of one ſo devoted to their Order, and who perhaps admired Chaſtity in others, though he could not practiſe it himſelf.

But it's certain England highly flouriſhed under his Government, being a Man ſo truly anſwering Homer's Deſcription of a King, that not only ſecured his people from Foreign Enemies, but Savage Beaſts, by laying a Yearly Tribute of Three hundred Wolve's Heads on the Prince of Wales, as hath been already related.

What his Employment was in Summer, we have already ſeen; in Winter he hunted, but in the Spring he uſually rode a kind of Circuit round the Kingdom, to adminiſter Juſtice to his People, and take care that his Officers did the like. He was ſmall of Stature, and Slender, yet of ſuch mighty Courage and Strength, that he would challenge the moſt Robuſt to wreſtle with him, forbidding them to ſpare him out of reſpect to his Perſon.

It happen'd one time, that Kened King of the Scots, came to his Court, to whom (as Matthew Weſtminſter relates) he gave Rich Preſents, with the whole Countrey of Lothian, on condition that he and his Succeſſors at his Feſtivals ſhould come and attend on the Kings of England when they ſate Crowned; beſides, he aſſign'd certain Lodgings for them by the way, which to eaſe them in their Journey, were till the time of King Henry the Second, held by the Kings of Scotland.

This Kened, as he once ſate at his Cups with his Courtiers, ſaid jeſtingly to them, It was very ſtrange that ſo many Provinces ſhould obey ſuch a Little, Contemptible Figure of a Man, as this Edgar was. Theſe Words ſoon reach'd the King's ears; upon which he preſently ſends for Kened, and as if he had a mind to conſult him about ſome Important Affair, carries him into a Wood, where none being preſent beſides themſelves, he delivers into his hands one of the two Swords he had brought along with him, and then tells him, That as they were now alone, ſo they had a very good opportunity to try their Strength and Skill; and therefore he was reſolved to have it forthwith determined which of them ought to Rule, and which to Obey, commanding him not to ſtir a foot, but decide the Controverſy with him; for it was a baſe and pitiful thing for a King to vapour loud at a Feaſt, and not to be as forward to ſhew his Courage at a Fray. Kened being ſtruck out of countenance at theſe words, fell down at his feet, and earneſtly begged his Pardon for what he had ſpoken in Jeſt, without any deſign of Malice in the leaſt. Upon which the King being as Generous as he was Couragious, freely forgave him.

But though this King Edgar was certainly a very Great and Heroick Prince, yet queſtionleſs that Charter which makes him to have ſubdued the greateſt part of Ireland, with the City of Dublin, and to be Lord of all the Iſles as far as Norway, is fictitious, and nothing but a piece of Monkiſh Forgery, no Author of that Age making mention of any ſuch thing; and inſtead of a Great Warrior, he is uſually ſtiled Edgar the Peaceable; for he never made any Foreign Wars, that we can learn. However, ſuch was his mighty Fame, that if he did not go himſelf to Foreigners, they came to him, out of Saxony, Flanders, Denmark, and other places: Though William of Malmesbury obſerves, their coming over did much detriment to the Natives; who from the Saxons, learned Rudeneſs; from the Flemings, Effeminacy; and from the Danes, Drunkenneſs; the Engliſh being before free from thoſe groſs Vices, and contented themſelves to defend their own with a natural Simplicity, and not given to admire the Cuſtoms and Faſhions of other Nations: Hereupon the Monk tells us he is deſervedly blamed in Story for his too great Indulgence to Strangers.

This Noble Prince died when he had Reigned about Sixteen Years, in the very flower of his Age, being ſcarce Two and thirty years old, and with him fell all the Glory of the Engliſh Nation; ſcarce any thing henceforth being to be heard of among them, but Miſery and Diſorder.

He had by Egelfleda, ſirnamed the Fair, the Daughter of Earl Ordmer, (it's uncertain whether his Wife or Concubine) a Son named Edward, who ſucceeded him: By Wilſrida the Nun he had a Daughter named Editha, who was alſo a Nun, as hath been already related: And by Elfreda the Daughter of Duke Ordgar, a Son called Edmund, who died five years before his Father; and another, called Ethelrede, who reigned after him; but was wholly unlike him in Prudence and Courage.

I have nothing elſe to add that is conſiderable, under this year, but the death of the Noble Turketule, Abbot of Croyland, who from Chancellor to King Edred, was (at his own deſire) by him made Abbot. He repaired and much enriched that Abby, after its being ruined by the Danes; and was the firſt that by adding to the Two Great Bells of that Monaſtery, Six more, made the firſt Tuneable Ring of Bells in England; as Ingulph at the end of the account he gives of his Life, informs us.

But before I diſmiſs this King's Reign, it is fit I give you a ſhort account of the chief Laws he made; which ſince neither the time nor place of their enacting are any where mention'd, I refer to this place.

The Preface to theſe Laws is thus; ' This is the Decree or Law which ' King Edgar made, with the counſel (or conſent) of his Wites or ' Wiſemen, for the Honour of God, the Confirmation of his Royal Dig' nity, and for the Good of his People.

‘The Laws themſelves begin with ſome Eccleſiaſtical Canons, the firſt of which is concerning the Immunities of the Church, and about paying Tythes out of the Lands of the Thanes, as well as of thoſe of Ceorles, or Countrey-men.

‘The Second is concerning payment of Tythes and Firſt fruits, as well where a Thane had a Church with a Burying-place, as alſo where he had not.

‘The Third appoints the times the Tythes ſhould be paid at; and what Remedy was to be had, in caſe they were not paid at the time when they were due.

‘The Fourth ordains at what time of the year Peter-pence ſhould be paid; and the Penalty that ſhould be incurred by thoſe that ſhould neglect to pay them in accordingly.

‘The laſt ordains every Sunday to be kept holy, and to begin at Three a Clock in the Afternoon on Saturday, and to end at break of day on Monday, upon the penalty appointed by the Judiciary Book.

From which laſt Law you may obſerve, how early keeping the Sunday like the Jewiſh Sabbath, began in England.

Then follow the Secular, or Temporal Laws.

‘The Firſt of which enjoins, that every man poor or rich enjoy the benefit of the Law, and have equal Juſtice done him; and for Puniſhments he would have them ſo moderated, that being accommodated to the Divine Clemency, they may be the more tolerable unto men.

‘The Second forbids Appeals to the King in Suits, except Juſtice cannot otherwiſe be obtained. And if a man be oppreſſed he may betake himſelf to the King for relief; and in caſe a Pecuniary Mulct be inflicted for a fault, it muſt not exceed the value of the man's head.

From whence we may gather, that Fines at this time were not Arbitrary, nor could be ſet above a known conſtant Rate; ſuch as a man, according to his Quality, was able to pay, without the loſs of his Life or Liberty.

‘The Third impoſes a Mulct of an Hundred and twenty Shillings to the King, upon a Judge that paſſes an unjuſt Sentence againſt any man, except ſuch Judge will take his Oath that he did it not out of any malice, but only from Unſkilfulneſs, and Miſtake in Judgment; and in ſuch caſe he is to be removed from his Place, except he can obtain favour of the King longer to retain it; and then the Biſhop of the Dioceſs is to ſend the Mulct impoſed upon him to the King's Treaſure.

‘The Fourth commands, That whoſoever maliciouſly ſhall defame another man, whereby he receives any damage either in his Body or Eſtate, ſo that the defam'd Party can clear himſelf of thoſe Reports, and prove them falſe, then the Defamer's Tongue ſhall either be cut out, or he ſhall redeem it with the value of his Head.

‘The Fifth is to the ſame effect as in another Law we have formerly cited, commanding every one to be preſent at the Gemote, or Aſſembly of the Hundred; and further ordains, That the Burghmotes, or Aſſemblies of the great Towns or Cities, be held thrice a year, and the Shiregemotes, or general Meeting of the whole County twice, whereat were to be preſent the Biſhop and the Ealdormen, the one to teach the people God's Law, and the other Man's.

From whence you may obſerve the Antiquity of our Charges at our Aſſizes and Seſſions, which no doubt do ſucceed thoſe Diſcourſes which the Ealdorman and Biſhop then made to the people upon the ſubjects above-mentioned.

Anno Dom. Dccccl xxv.

‘The Sixth requires, that every man find Sureties for his Good Behaviour; and in caſe any one commit a Crime, and fly for it, the Sureties ſhould undergo what ſhould be laid upon him. If he ſtole any thing, and be taken within a Twelvemonth, he ſhould be brought to Juſtice, and then the Sureties ſhould receive back what they had paid on his account.

Hence we may alſo take notice, not only of the Antiquity of Frank-Fledges, which had been long before inſtituted by King Alfred, but alſo the continuation of this Law by King Edgar; from whence it appears, that it was no Norman invention, introduced to keep under the Engliſh Commonalty, as ſome men have without any juſt cauſe imagined.

‘The Seventh ordains, That when any one of evil report is again accuſed of a Crime, and abſents himſelf from the Gemotes, or publick Meetings, ſome of the Court ſhall go where he dwells, and take Sureties for his Appearance, if they may be had; but if they cannot get them, then they ſhould take him alive or dead, and ſeize on all his Eſtate; whereof the Complaining Party having received ſuch a ſhare as ſhould ſatisfy him, the one half of the remainder ſhall go to the Lord of the Soil, and the other half to the Hundred: And if any of that Court (being either akin to the Party, or a ſtranger to his Blood) refuſe to go to put this in execution, he ſhould forfeit 120 ſhillings to the King: And farther, That ſuch as are taken in the very act of ſtealing, or betraying their Maſters, ſhould not be pardoned during life.

‘The Eighth and laſt ordains, That one and the ſame Money ſhould be current throughout the King's Dominions, which no man muſt refuſe; and that the meaſure of Wincheſter ſhould be the Standard; and that a Weigh of Wool ſhould be ſold for half a Pound of Money, and no more. The former of theſe is the firſt Law whereby the Private Mints to the Archbiſhops and ſeveral Abbots being forbid, the King's Coin was only to paſs.

But to return to our Annals: ‘Ten days before the Death of King Edgar, Biſhop Cyneward departed this life.

King

King EDWARD, ſirnamed the Martyr.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxv.

KING Edgar being dead, (as you have now heard) Prince Edward ſucceeded his Father, though not without ſome difficulty, for (as William of Malmeſbury, and R. Hoveden relate) the Great Men of the Kingdom were then divided, Archbiſhop Dunſtan, and all the reſt of the Biſhops, being for Prince Edward, the Eldeſt Son of King Edgar; whilſt Queen Ælfreda, Widow to the King, and many of her Faction, were for ſetting up her Son Ethelred, being then about Seven Years of Age, that ſo ſhe might govern under his Name: But beſides, the pretence was, (which how well they made out, I know not) That King Edgar had never been lawfully married to Prince Edward's Mother. Whereupon the Archbiſhops, Dunſtan and Oſwald, with the Biſhops, Abbots, and many of the Ealdormen of the Kingdom, met together in a Great Council, and choſe Prince Edward King, as his Father before his Death had ordained; and being thus Elected, they preſently Anointed him, being then but a Youth of about Fifteen Years of Age.

But it ſeems, not long after the Death of King Edgar, though before the Coronation of King Edward, Roger Hoveden, and Simeon of Durham, tell us, that Elfer Earl of the Mercians, being luſtily bribed by large Preſents, drove the Abbots and Monks out of the Monaſteries, in which they had been ſettled by King Edgar, and in their places brought in the Clerks (i.e. Secular Chanons) with their Wives; but Ethelwin, Ealdorman of the Eaſt-Angles, and his Brother Elfwold, and Earl Brythnoth, oppoſed it; and being in the Common Council or Synod, plainly ſaid, They would never endure that the Monks ſhould be caſt out of the Kingdom, who contributed ſo much to the Maintenance of Religion; and ſo raiſing an Army, they bravely defended the Monaſteries of the Eaſt Angles; ſo it ſeems that during this Interregnum, aroſe this Civil War about the Monks, and the above-mentioned Diſſention amongſt the Nobility, concerning the Election of a new King.

But this ſerves to explain that Paſſage in our Annals, which would have been otherwiſe very obſcure; viz. 'That then there was (viz. upon the Death of King Edgar) great Grief and Trouble in Mercia, among thoſe that loved God, becauſe many of his Servants, (that is, the Monks) were turned out, till God being ſlighted, ſhewed Miracles on their behalf; and that then alſo Duke Oſlack was unjuſtly baniſhed beyond the Seas; a Nobleman, who for his Long Head of Hair, but more for his Wiſdom, was very remarkable: And that then alſo ſtrange Prodigies were ſeen in the Heavens, ſuch as Aſtrologers call Comets; and as a Puniſhment from God upon this Nation, there followed a great Famine.

Which ſhews this Copy of the Annals was written about this very 'time: And then the Author concludes with Ælfer the Ealdorman's commanding many Monaſteries to be ſpoiled, which King Edgar had 'commanded Biſhop Athelwold to repair. All which being in the Cottonian Copy, ſerves to explain what has been already related. But the next year

Anno Dom. Dccccclxxvi.

'Was the great Famine in England, as juſt now mentioned. About the ſame time, (according to Caradoc's Chronicle) Æneon, the Son of Owen Prince of South-Wales, deſtroyed the Land of Gwyr the ſecond time.

Anno Dom. Dccccclxxvii.

This year, after Eaſter, was that great Synod at Kirtlingtun, which Florence of Worceſter, and R. Hoveden, call Kyrleing; but where that place was is very uncertain; Florence places it in Eaſt-England, but Sir H. Spelman acknowledges, that he does not know any place in thoſe parts, that ever bore that name, but ſuppoſes it to have been the ſame with Cartlage, (now the Seat of the Lord North): But had not Florence placed it in Eaſt-England, that Town whoſe name comes neareſt to it, is Kyrtlington in Oxfordſhire; which is alſo the more confirmed by that which follows in theſe Annals, viz. That Sydeman ~~the~~ Biſhop of Devonſhire (i. e. of Wells) died here ſuddenly, who deſired his Body might be buried at Krydeanton, his Epiſcopal See; but King Edward and Archbiſhop Dunſtan order'd it to be carried to St. Maries in Abingdon, where he was honourably Interr'd in the North Iſle of St. Paul's Church: Therefore it is highly probable, that the place where this Biſhop died, was not far from Abingdon, where he was buried, as Kirtlington indeed is: But what was done in this Council can we no where find; only it is to be ſuppoſed that it was concerning this great Difference between the Monks and the Secular Chanons, as the former Council was.

The ſame year alſo were great Commotions in Wales; for Howel ap Jevaf, Prince of North-Wales, with a great Army both of Welſh and Engliſhmen, made War upon all who defended or ſuccoured his Uncle Jago, and ſpoiled the Countries of Lhyn, Kelynnoc, Vawr; ſo that Jago was ſhortly after taken Priſoner by Prince Howel's men, who after that enjoyed his part of the Countrey in peace.

* Julius, D. 6.

Nor can I here omit what ſome of our Monkiſh Writers, and particularly John Pike in his compendious Supplement of the Kings of England, (now in Manuſcript in the * Cottonian Library) relates, That there being this year a Great Council held at Wincheſter again to debate this great Affair concerning the turning out of the Monks, and reſtoring the Secular Chanons, and it being like to be carried in their favour, a Crucifix which then ſtood in the room, ſpoke thus, God forbid it ſhould be ſo; This amazing them, they reſolved to leave the Monks in the condition they then were. x But whether theſe words were ever ſpoke at all, or if they were, whether it might not be by ſome perſon that ſtood unſeen behind the Crucifix, I ſhall leave to the Reader to determine as he pleaſes.

x [illegible] borrow [illegible] life of St. [illegible] [illegible]

Anno Dom. Dccccclxxviii.

'Next year all the Grave and Wiſe Men of the Engliſh Nation being 'met about the ſame Affair, at Calne (in Wiltſhire) fell down together 'from a certain Upper Room, (where they were aſſembled in Coun'cil) unleſs it were St. Dunſtan the Archbiſhop, who fixed his foot up'on a certain Beam; but ſome were ſadly bruiſed and hurt, whilſt 'others were killed outright.

But ſince William of Malmesbury hath given us a larger account of this Council, and what was done in it, I ſhall give it you in his words:

But mens minds being not yet ſettled, another Council was ſummoned at Calne in Wiltſhire, (but the King was abſent by reaſon of his Youth) where the ſame Affair was again debated with great Heat and Contenion: But when many Reproaches were caſt upon Archbiſhop Dunſtan, that Bulwark of the Church, who could by no means be ſhaken, upon a ſudden the Floor of the Chamber fell down, all there preſent being ery much bruiſed, except Dunſtan, who eſcaped upon a Beam; all the eſt being either hurt or killed. This Miracle, ſays he, obtained quiet for the Archbiſhop and all the Monks of England, who were for ever fter of his opinion.

Anno Dom. Dccccclxxviii.

This Accident is alſo related by Mat. Weſtminſter, and copied by Cardinal Baronius into his Annals, and is likewiſe mentioned by other Authors. But it is very probable, that this Misfortune did not happen without the fore-knowledge (if not the Contrivance) of Archbiſhop Dunſtan, ſince he had now perſuaded the King not to be there, though e was preſent at the laſt Council. But H. Huntington would have it e a ſign from Heaven, that they ſhould fall from God's love, and be ppreſs'd by Foreign Nations; as followed not long after.

And (according to Florence of Worceſter) there was a Third Syod at Ambresbury; but what was done there, he does not tell us.

But to return to our Annals; 'The ſame year King Edward was killed at Corfeſgeate, now Corfe-Caſtle in the Iſle of Purbeck, on the 15th of the Kalends of April, and was buried at Werham, without any Royal Pomp. There was not ſince the time that the Engliſh Nation came into Britain, any thing done more wickedly than this: But though men murthered him, yet God exalted him; and he that was an Earthly King, is now a Saint in Heaven; and though his Relations would not revenge his Death, yet God perform'd it ſeverely. The ſt to the ſame effect in theſe Annals I omit, becauſe I would not be dious. But I ſhall give you a more particular account of the manner this Prince's Death, from William of Malmesbury, and the Chronicle lled Bromton's; the former of which relates it thus; That as for King dward, he was of ſo extraordinary Religious and Mild a Nature, that r quietneſs ſake, he let his Mother-in-Law order all things as ſhe leaſed, giving her all Reſpects, as to his own Mother, and regarding s Younger Brother with all the tenderneſs imaginable: She on the ntrary, from his Kindneſs and Love, conceives greater and more imacable Malice againſt him; and with the Sovereignty ſhe already enyed, was ſo ill ſatisfied, that ſhe muſt needs take from him the very itle alſo: This Deſign ſhe covered with notable diſſimulation, till a nvenient opportunity preſented it ſelf for the execution of it: At ngth the poor Innocent Prince being one day wearied with hunting, d being very thirſty, (while his Companions followed the Game, d minded not what became of him) knowing that the Queen's ouſe was not far off, rode thither all alone, fearing nothing, becauſe his own Innocence, and ſuppoſing every one meant as honeſtly as mſelf.

Whereupon the Queen receives him with all the ſeeming kindneſs aginable, and fain would have had him to light from his Horſe, but e refuſing that, and only asking to ſee his Brother, ſhe cauſed ſome rink to be preſently brought him; but whileſt the Cup was at his outh, one of her Servants, privately before inſtructed, ſtabbed him with

with a Dagger in the Back. He, exceedingly aſtoniſhed at this unexpected ill treatment, clapp'd Spurs to his Horſe, and fled away as faſt as he could towards his Company; but the Wound being Mortal, and he ſpent with loſs of blood, fell to the ground, and having one foot in the Stirrup, was dragged through By-ways; but being trac'd by his Blood by thoſe ſhe ſent after him, they brought back the Dead Corps, which they buried privately at Werham, where they imagin'd they had alſo buried his Memory as well as his Body; but the place of his Sepulture (as it's ſaid) ſoon grew famous for Miracles. and his body was removed from thence to the Church of Shaftesbury by Elpher Duke of the Mercians. Hist. Reg. Hoveden.

Queen Elfreda was upon this ſo convinced of her Wickedneſs, that from her Courtly and Delicate Way of Living, ſhe betook her ſelf to very ſevere Penances, as wearing Hair-cloath, ſleeping on the ground without a Pillow, with ſuch other Auſterities as were uſed in that Age; ~~and~~ w herein ſhe continued all her life.

So fell this good King Edward, after he had only born the Name of King Three years and an half; who for his Innocence, and the Miracles ſuppoſod to be wrought after his Death, obtained the Sirname of Martyr: Which opinion of his Sanctity was the more confirmed by the ~~other~~ great Miſeries which ſhortly after befel the Land; which the people did verily believe were inflicted on ~~them~~ as his Judgments for his Murther.

This year (according to Florence) a ſtrange Cloud appeared about Midnight all over England, being firſt ſeen of the Colour of Blood, then of Fire, and then like a Rainbow of divers Colours.

King

King ETHELRED.

Anno Dom. Dccccxxviii.

IMmediately after the unfortunate Murther of King Edward, there being no other Male Iſſue of King Edgar left alive, Ethelred his Brother was without any difficulty Elected, as the Ancient Annals of Thorney Abby, preſerved in the * Cottonian Library, relate; and was alſo Crowned King by the Archbiſhops Dunſtan and Oſwald, and ten other Biſhops, at Kingſton, the 8th Kal. May; he being (as R. Hoveden deſcribes him) a Youth of a moſt Comely Aſpect, but not being above Twelve Years of Age, William of Malmesbury gives us this ſhort Character of Him and his Reign: That he rather diſtreſſed than governed the Kingdom for Seven and thirty years; that the courſe of his Life was cruel at the beginning, miſerable in the middle, and diſhonourable in the concluſion: To Cruelty he attributes the Death of his Brother, which he ſeemed to approve of, becauſe he did not puniſh; he was remarkable for his Cowardice and Lazineſs; and miſerable in reſpect of his Death. His Sluggiſhneſs was predicted by Archbiſhop Dunſtan, when at his Chriſtening he ſuperadded his own Water to that of the Font; and thereupon Mat. Weſtminſter makes him to ſwear, By God and St. Mary, this Boy will prove a Lazy Fellow: But all this looks like a Monkiſh Story, invented by thoſe who did not love his Memory; ſince the ſame thing, though of ſomewhat a groſſer nature is likewiſe related of the Emperor Conſtantine, from thence named Copronymus.

Yet ſure it was no ſign of ill nature, if what William of Malmesbury, and Bromton's Chronicle relate, be true, That when he wept at the News of his Brother's Death, it put his Mother into ſuch a violent Paſſion, that having not a Rod by her, ſhe beat him ſo unmercifully with a Wax Taper which ſhe then light upon, that he was almoſt dead; which cauſed in him ſuch an averſion to Wax-Lights ever after, that he could never endure any ſuch to be brought before him. But this ſounds too Romantick, and therefore I leave it to the Reader's diſcretion what credit to give it.

But to come to ſomewhat more certain and material; all Authors agree, that Archbiſhop Dunſtan crown'd this King with great reluctancy; yet he was forced to do it, as not having any of the Blood Royal fit to ſet up: But becauſe the Monks will have their St. Dunſtan to have had the Spirit of Prophecy (like the Prophets in the Old Teſtament) they relate, that denouncing God's Judgments againſt this King at his Coronation, he ſaid thus, Becauſe thou haſt aſpired to the Kingdom by the Death of thy Brother, thus ſaith the Lord God, The Sin of thine Ignominious Mother ſhall not be expiated, neither the Sin of thoſe that were her Counſellors, but by great Bloodſhed of thy miſerable People; for ſuch Miſeries ſhall come upon England, as it never underwent ſince it had that name. But this Doom was very unjuſt; for it is certain that the King never knew of, nor deſired his Brother's Death; and it was very hard to denounce God's Judgments upon the whole Nation, for the Contrivance of one wicked Woman, and which was put in execution by but a few of her Accomplices: So that if the Nation was guilty of any fault, it was only in ſo far conniving at the Crime, as out of fear or partiality, to permit the Authors of it to paſs unpuniſhed ; and for this the Biſhops, they having then ſo great a ſway in the whole Council of the Nation, had as much to anſwer for, as any of the Laity: But paſſing by God's Judgments, which are too deep for us to fathom , About this time (as the Welſh Chronicles relate) Cuſtenyn Dhu (i. e. Conſtantine the Black) Son to Prince Jago (then a Priſoner) hired Godfryd the Dane to bring his men againſt his Couſin Howel ap Jevaf, Prince of North-Wales; ſo joining their Forces together, they deſtroyed Angleſey and Lhyn: Whereupon Prince Howel gathered an Army, and ſetting upon the Danes and Welſhmen (who aſſiſted them), at a place called Gwayth Horborth, routed them, and Conſtantine was ſlain. I ſhall now return to our Annals, which under the next year relate, That Anno Dom. Dcccclxxx.

* Nero c. 7.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxviii.

'Archbiſhop Dunſtan and Elfer the Ealdorman, having taken up the 'Body of King Edward, which lay buried at Werham, they carried and 'buried it at Scaftesbyrig, (i. e. Shaftsbury) with great Funeral Pomp. The occaſion of which Removal by Elfer, Earl of the Mercians (according to Bromton's Chronicle) was that old ſign of an Engliſh Saxon Saint (ſo often repeated in this Hiſtory) whether true or falſe, I ſhall not affirm ; viz. a Column of Light ſtreaming down from Heaven, over the place where his Body lay buried ; as alſo, that when it was taken up out of the Grave, it was as whole and uncorrupt as when it was firſt buried three years before ; whereupon having waſhed and dreſſed it in new Cloathes, they buried it with great Solemnity at the Monaſtery above-mentioned, where his Siſter Edith, the Daughter of King Edgar by Wulfritha the Nun, was then her ſelf profeſſed. But as for the ſtrange Miracles which are here related to have been done at his Tomb, I willingly omit them. But William of Malmesbury further adds about this Queen Elfreda, That ſhe took upon her the Habit of a Nun at Werewell, a Nunnery which ſhe lately founded, and there paſſed the reſt of her days in great Auſterities and Devotions : She alſo about the ſame time built another Nunnery at Ambresbury in Wiltſhire ; this being the uſual way to expiate the moſt horrid Murthers in thoſe dark times.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxxi.

'This year came ſeven Daniſh Ships (full of Pyrates) and deſtroy'ed Southampton ; and (as Florence adds, though under the year before) plundered the Town, and either killed or carried away the Townſmen Priſoners. William of Malmesbury alſo takes notice of this, becauſe they were ſo much talked of, as being the firſt that had invaded England after above 60 years intermiſſion, and were only the forerunners of many more that follow'd : To which we may alſo refer that which is added by Simeon of Durham under the year before, but ſhould be put under this ; That the ſame Fleet alſo waſted Tænetland, (that is, the Iſle of Thanet) ; and the ſame year alſo the Province of Cheſter was much ſpoiled by the Norwegian Pyrates.

The ſame year the Daniſh Pyrates landed in Cornwal, and burnt the Church and Monaſtery of St. Petroc. Alſo Godfryd the Son of Harold the Dane, landed with a great Army of his Countreymen in Weſt-Wales, where ſpoiling all the Land of Dyvet, with the Church of St. Davids, he fought the Battel of Lhanwanoc ; though who had the Victory, the Welſhmen or the Danes, Caradoc's Chronicle (which gives us this relation) does not tell us.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxxii.

This year, according to R. Hoveden, Three Ships of theſe Pyrates landed in Dorſetſhire, and ſpoiled the Iſle of Portland: The ſame year alſo the City of London was miſerably deſtroyed by Fire.

About this time alſo, according to the ſame Author, Alfred an Ealdorman, or Engliſh Earl, joining (as the Welſh Manuſcript Annals relate) with Howel the Son of Edwal, deſtroyed Brecknock, and ſpoil'd a great part of the Lands of Owen Prince of South-Wales; againſt whom Eneon the Son of the ſaid Owen, and Howel King of North Wales, raiſing an Army, met with them, and totally defeated them; ſo that the greateſt part of Earl Alfred's Army was ſlain, and the reſt put to flight.

Alſo about this time the Churches of Wales began firſt to acknowlege the Superiority of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, Gacon Biſhop of Landaffe being now conſecrated by Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxxiii.

This year Ælfer the Ealdorman deceaſed, and Ælfric his Son took his Government; ſome of the Monks further add, That he was eaten up with Lice; the reaſon is plain, for this Ælfer had not long before turn'd the Monks out of their Cloyſters (as you have heard), and they ſeldom fail'd to revenge ſuch an Affront upon thoſe that did ſo, either alive or dead.

And the ſame year the Gentlemen of Gwentland in Southwales rebelled againſt their Prince, and cruelly ſlew Eneon the Son of Prince Owen, though he came only to appeaſe them: This Eneon was a Gallant Young Prince, that did many brave Actions for the Defence of his Countrey in his Father's life time; he left behind him Two Sons, Edwyn and Theodore, from whom deſcended the Princes of South-Wales.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxxiv.

'This year deceaſed Athelwald that good Biſhop of Wincheſter, who 'was the Father of the Monks. And well might they call him ſo; for he rebuilt or repaired above a dozen great Monaſteries; ſo that (as William of Malmesbury obſerves) it is a great wonder how a Biſhop's Purſe could afford to do that in thoſe days, which a King could ſcarce perform when he wrote; but the wonder will be much abated when we conſider that he had the King's Purſe at his command, beſides thoſe of other people, who then looked upon ſuch Works as meritorious. But to return to our Annals.

'Elfeage, whoſe ſirname was Goodwin, ſucceeded Athelwald, and 'was conſecrated 14. Kal. Novemb. but was enthron'd at Wincheſter, at 'the Feaſt of St. Simon and Jude R. Hoveden tells us, he was firſt Abbot of Bathe, and then Archbiſhop of Canterbury; but at laſt was killed by the Danes, being a man of great Sanctity of Life.

Alſo the ſame year Howel ap Jevaf, Prince of North-Wales, came into England with an Army, where he was fought with and ſlain in Battel; but the place is not mentioned. This Howel having no Iſſue, his Brother Cadwalhan ſucceeded him.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxxv.

'This year, according to the Saxon Annals, Ælfric the Ealdorman 'was baniſh'd the Land. Mat. Weſtminſter ſtiles him Earl of Mercia, and ſays he was Son to Earl Alfure; but neither of them inform us of the Crime for which he ſuffered that Puniſhment.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxxvi.

'King Ethelred laid waſte the Biſhoprick of Rocheſter; and alſo there 'was a great Mortality of Cattel in England. William of Malmesbury, and R. Hoveden, do here add much light to our Annals; That the King

becauſe

becauſe of ſome Diſſentions between him and the Biſhop of Rocheſter, beſieged that City, but not being able to take it, went and waſted the Lands of St. Andrew, (i. e. thoſe belonging to that Biſhoprick); but being commanded by the Archbiſhop to deſiſt from his Fury, and not provoke the Saint to whom that Church is dedicated, the King deſpiſed his Admonition, till ſuch time as he had an Hundred Pounds ſent to him, and then he drew off his Forces; but the Archbiſhop abhorring his ſordid Covetouſneſs, is there ſaid to have denounced fearful Judgments againſt him, though they were not to be inflicted till after the Archbiſhop's death.

This year, as the Welſh Chronicles relate, Meredyth, Son to Owen Prince of South-Wales, entred North-Wales with what Forces he could raiſe, and ſlew Cadwalhon ap Jevaf in a Fight, together with Meyric his Brother, and conquered the whole Countrey to himſelf: Wherein we may obſerve how God puniſhed the wrong which Jevaf and Jago did to their eldeſt Brother Meyric, who being diſinherited, had his eyes put out; for firſt Jevaf was impriſoned by Jago, as Jago himſelf was by Howel the Son of Jevaf, and then this Howel, and his Brethren Cadwalhon and Meyric were ſlain, and loſt their Dominions.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxxvii.

'This year Weedport (that is, Watchet in Somerſetſhire) was deſtroy- 'ed by the Danes.

About this time (as appears by the Charter in the Monaſt. Angl. p. 284.) the Abby of Cerne in Dorſetſhire, was founded by Ailmer Earl of Cornwall, near to a Fountain, where it was ſaid that St. Auguſtine had formerly baptized many Pagans. And where alſo long after, Prince Edwold, Brother to St. Edmund the Martyr, quitting his Countrey, then over run by the Danes, lived and died an Hermit. But it ſeems from the Manuſcript Hiſtory of Walter of Coventry, this Abby was only enlarged by this Earl Ailmer, having been built ſome years before by one Alward, his Father, a Rich and Powerful Perſon in thoſe Parts.

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxxviii

'Goda a Thane was killed, and there was a great Slaughter. But the ſame Author laſt mentioned, writing from ſome other Copy of Annals, relates this Story another way; That this Goda being Earl of Devonſhire, together with one Strenwald a valiant Knight, marching out to fight the Danes, they were both there killed; but there being more of them deſtroyed than of the Engliſh, the latter kept the field. But to return to our Annals;

'This year Dunſtan, that Holy Archbiſhop, exchanged this Terre- 'ſtrial Life for a Heavenly one; and Ethelgar (Biſhop of Selſey) ſuc- 'ceeded him, but lived not long after, (viz.) only One Year and Three 'Months. x

Anno Dom. Dcccclxxxix.

'Edwin the Abbot (I ſuppoſe, of Peterborough) deceaſed; and Wulf- 'gar ſucceeded him. The ſame year alſo Biſhop Syric was conſecrated 'Archbiſhop, in the room of Ethelgar abovementioned; and afterwards 'he went to Rome, to obtain his Pall.

[illegible] a place [illegible] pointed in his life time

This man is commonly written Siricins; but his Name in Engliſh Saxon was Syric, or Sigeric.

Anno Dom. Dccccxc.

About this time, according to the Welſh Chronicle, Meredyth, Prince of North Wales, deſtroyed the Town of Radnor; whilſt his Nephew Edwin, (or, as ſome Copies call him, Owen) the Son of Eneon, aſſiſted by a great Army of Engliſh, under Earl Adelf, ſpoiled all the Lands of Prince Meredyth in South-Wales, as Cardigan, &c. as far as St. Davids, taking Pledges of all the Chief Men of thoſe Countries; whilſt in the mean time Prince Meredyth with his Forces ſpoiled the Countrey of Glamorgan: So that no place in thoſe parts was free from Fire and Sword: Yet at laſt, Prince Meredyth and Edwin his Nephew, coming to an agreement, were made Friends. But whilſt Meredyth was thus taken up in South-Wales, North-Wales lay open to the Danes, who about this time arriving in Angleſey, deſtroyed the whole Iſle.

Anno Dom. Dccccxci.

'This year Gipiſwic was waſted by the Danes (this was Ipſwich in 'Suffolk); and ſhortly after Brightnoth the Ealdorman was ſlain at Mal'dune. All which miſchief Florence of Worceſter tells us was done by the Danes, whoſe Captains were Juſtin and Guthmund, when the Perſon abovementioned, fighting with them at Maldon, there was a great multitude ſlain on both ſides, and the ſaid Earl or Ealdorman was ſlain there; ſo that the Danes had the Victory.

'The ſame year alſo (according to the Annals) it was firſt decreed, 'that Tribute ſhould be paid to the Danes, becauſe of the great Terror 'which they gave the Inhabitants of the Sea-Coaſt: The firſt Payment 'was Ten thouſand Pounds; and it is ſaid Archbiſhop Syric firſt gave 'this Counſel.

To which alſo R. Hoveden adds, That Adwald and Alfric the Ealdormen, join'd with him in it; but which (as William of Malmesbury well obſerves) ſerved only to ſatisfy for a time the Covetouſneſs of the Danes; and being a thing of infamous example, a generous Mind would never have been prevailed upon by any violence to have ſubmitted to; for when the Danes had once taſted the ſweetneſs of this Money, they never left off exacting ſtill more, ſo long as there was any left; but they now met with a weak and unwarlike Prince, moſt of whoſe Nobility were no better than himſelf; and ſo, as the ſame Author farther obſerves, they were fain to buy off thoſe with Silver, who ought to have been repell'd with Iron.

Anno Dom. Dccccxcii.

'This year Oſwald, that bleſſed Archbiſhop of York, departed this 'life; as alſo did Ethelwin the Ealdorman.

The former of them, Simeon of Durham tells us had the year before conſecrated the Abby Church of Ramſey, which the latter had newly founded; and as Florence adds, was buried in the Church of St. Mary in Worceſter, which he had newly built.

'The ſame year alſo the King and all his Wiſe and Great Men de'creed, That all the ſtronger Ships ſhould be got together at London; 'and the King made Ealfric and Thorod the Ealdormen, Admirals of 'this Fleet; as alſo Ælfſtan and Æſtwig, Biſhops; commanding them 'that they ſhould endeavour, if it were poſſible, to encompaſs the Daniſh 'Fleet; but Ealfric ſent to them underhand, to take care of themſelves; 'and the Night before they were to give Battel, he (to his perpetual 'Infamy) ſecretly withdrew himſelf from the King's to the Daniſh 'Fleet; ſo that all the Danes eſcaped by flight. But Florence is more plain than the Annals in the Relation of this Flight; and tells us, that the King's Fleet immediately purſued them, and took one of their Ships, Anno Dom. Dccccxcii. all the reſt eſcaping; only the Londoners meeting with the Ships of the Eaſt-Angles by chance, and fighting with them, killed many Thouſands of the Danes, and took the Ship wherein Earl Ealfric was, with all the men, himſelf hardly eſcaping.

The ſame year the Inhabitants of the Iſle of Angleſey, having been cruelly haraſs'd by the Danes, and finding no Protection or Defence from Meredyth their Prince, then employed in other Wars (as you have already heard) they caſt him off, and received Edwal ap Meyric, the right Heir of North-Wales, for their Prince, who better defended his Subjects from Foreign Invaſions; for not long after, Meredyth, Prince of North-Wales, reſolving again to recover ſo conſiderable a part of his Dominion, entring Angleſey, Prince Edwal with his Forces met him at Lhangwin, and routed him in a ſet Battel; ſo Theodor, or Tewdor Mawr, Nephew to Prince Meredyth, was there ſlain, and he himſelf forced to fly.

Anno Dom. Dccccxciii. 'This year alſo (according to our Annals) Unlaf, (or Anlaf) the 'Dane, came with Ninety three Ships as far as Stane, (now Staines up'on the River Thames), and there waſted the Countrey round about; 'and from thence they went to Sandwic, and from thence to Gypſwic, and 'ſpoiled all that Countrey.

But I ſuppoſe this is a Miſtake in the Cambridge Copy of theſe Annals; which repeat that Action of the Danes, together with the Death of Duke Bryghtnoth, which had been already ſaid in the Laudean and Cottonian Copies to have happened Anno 991; and therefore what follows, ſeems likewiſe miſplaced in this Copy, concerning the Receiving and Baptizing of this King Anlaf, which it makes to be the effect of the Victory now obtain'd; for Anlaf was not baptized till the year following; as will by and by appear.

But this is more certain which comes after; viz. 'That this year the 'Town of Bebanburgh (i.e. Banborow in Northumberland) was deſtroy'ed by the Danes, and a great Prey there taken; after which the Danes 'came up the River Humber, and did much miſchief as well to thoſe of 'Lindſige, as the Northumbers: Then were muſter'd together a great 'number of Soldiers, but when they were going to give them Battel, 'they fled, the firſt Encouragers of their flight being their own Captains, 'Fræna, Godwin, and Frithegiſt; (all Three of the Daniſh Race.)

'This year alſo (according to the ſame Copy) King Ethelred com'manded the Eyes of Ealfric the Ealdorman's Son, to be put out: But 'it does not tell us for what: But William of Malmesbury is more expreſs, and ſays it was a Puniſhment for his Father's Perfidiouſneſs; which if done now, was not only very unjuſt, to puniſh the Son for the Father's faults, but alſo ill tim'd, to do it ſo long after the Crime had been committed: But he further tells us, that he not only revolted once, but again; and ſo perhaps it was for this laſt Rebellion, that the King inflicted this cruel Puniſhment upon his Son; for had the Father been in his power, it is moſt likely he would have made him to have ſuffer'd himſelf: But this being ſo much in the dark, I ſhall leave it to the Reader to make what he pleaſe on't.

King Ethelred &

There having been for ſome time great Enmity between Richard Duke of Normandy, which it ſeems had broke out into open War, Pope ~~John~~ ſent Leo Biſhop of Treve, as his Nuncio, firſt to the King of England; who having received the Pope's Letters, called a Council of all the insomuch (that as the Chronicles of Normandy relate) the King about this time invaded Normandy with an Army transported for that purpose, which met with ill success it was put to rout and forced to return home by a great multitude of Paisants who took to defend their Country against these Invaders: which Pope John XV being sent he Great and Wiſe Men of the Nation; who agreed, That upon the Pope's Admonition, Ambaſſadors ſhould be ſent to the Marqueſs of Normandy, (for ſo he is called) to treat of a Peace; and when they were there, the ſaid Marqueſs agreed to a laſting Peace, upon the Pope's Admonition x; ~~ſo that none~~ for the future ſhould receive each other's Enemies: All which appears in the Epiſtle of the ſaid Pope John concerning this affair; which is recited at large in William of Malmesbury, in his Reign of this King, to which I refer the Reader.

x the Conditions were that King Ethelred should put away his Maistresses and treat his Queen Emma, sister to the Duke more kindly for the future his unkind usage haveing been the chief cause of this war and further agt [illegible] of them for the &c.

About this time, according to the Welſh Chronicles, Sweyn, the Son of Harold the Dane, having deſtroyed the Iſle of Man, enter'd North-Wales, and ſlew Edwal ap Meyric in Battel: This Prince left behind him one Son, an Infant, who at laſt came to be Prince of Wales: So that it ſeems there was an Anarchy in North Wales for ſome time; unleſs Owen, formerly expell'd, now recover'd his Principality; which my Author does not mention.

Anno Dom. Dcccccxciv.

'This year Sigeric (or Syric) Archbiſhop of Canterbury, deceaſed, 'and Ælfric Biſhop of Wincheſter was elected in his ſtead, on Eaſter-'Day, at Ambresbyrig, by King Ethelred and all his Wiſe Men. This 'ſame year alſo, Anlaf and Sweyn came to London, on the Nativity of 'St. Mary, with Ninety four Ships, and aſſaulted the City very ſharp-'ly, endeavonring to burn it; but here they received much more da-'mage than they believed it to be in the power of the Citizens ever to 'have done them; for the Holy Mother of God out of her great mercy 'took care of the Citizens, and delivered them from their Enemies: Or, as William of Malmesbury more plainly tells us, the Beſiegers deſpairing of taking the City, (becauſe the Citizens made ſo vigorous a defence) were forced to march away.

'But as they went off, they did as much miſchief as any Army ever 'did, by burning and waſting the whole Countrey thereabouts, and 'killing all the Inhabitants in Eſſex, Kent, and Suſſex, as alſo in Hampſhire: And, as Florence relates, ſparing neither Man, Woman, nor Child.

'But at laſt they provided themſelves with Horſes, and riding where-'ever they pleaſed, did unſpeakable Miſchiefs: Whereupon it was or-'dained by the King and his Wiſe Men, That Meſſengers ſhould be ſent 'to them, promiſing them both Tribute and Proviſions, if they would 'deſiſt from their Spoil and Rapine: To which requeſt they conſented; 'and ſo the whole Army came to Hamtune, and there took up their 'Winter-Quarters; and in the mean time the Weſt-Saxon Kingdom was 'forced to maintain them; and Sixteen thouſand Pounds were given to 'them, beſides their maintenance.

'Then the King ſent Biſhop Elfeage to King Anlaf, as alſo Æthelward 'the Ealdorman; and leaving Hoſtages at the Ships, they brought Anlaf 'with great Honour to the King to Andefer, (that is, Andover in Hamp-'ſhire); then King Æthelred received him at his Confirmation, from 'the Biſhop's hand; whereupon Anlaf promiſed him (which he alſo 'performed) that he would never again infeſt the Engliſh Nation. And as Florence farther adds, he now returned into his own Countrey—

So it ſeems the Kingdom was rid of Anlaf; but what became of Sweyen or Sweyn, the Annals do not tell us; for we hear no more of him till Anno 1004, as you will find ~~by and by~~: So that whether he went away with Anlaf, or commanded thoſe who infeſted the Kingdom the next year, is uncertain. But perhaps we may to this time refer that which Adam of Bremen relates of this King Sweyn, who having made "War upon his Father Harwold the Great, whom he outed of his Kingdom and Life together, was afterwards himſelf overcome, and expelled his Kingdom by Ærick King of Sweden; thus juſtly rewarded for his horrid Crimes, he wander'd up and down without relief. Thrucco the Son of Haco, then Prince of the Normans, rejected him as a Pagan; and Ethelred the Son of Edgar (he calls him Adalred) remembring what miſchiefs the Danes had brought on England, with ſcorn repell'd him: So that at length he was entertained by the King of the Scots, who taking compaſſion on him, gave him free Quarter for Fourteen years together. But ſo enraged was he at the repulſe given him by the King of England, that ever after he ſtudied all he could how to plague and afflict that Countrey, one while by his own particular Forces, and another by the aſſiſtance of others.

How true this Story is, we cannot affirm; the Affairs of the Northern Nations, as to thoſe Times, being involved in ſo great an obſcurity: However, we thought it not amiſs to give it you, as ſuiting with the Fortunes and Inclinations of this man, which proved ſo great a Plague to this our Countrey, that he ſeems to have been acted by ſome extraordinary Paſſion, whether of Ambition or Revenge, or both together. But to return to our Annals.

'This year alſo Richard the Elder (Duke of Normandy) died; and Richard his Son ſucceeded him, and reigned One and thirty years.

Anno Dom.
Dccccxcv.

'This year appeared a Comet. Alſo the ſame year, as Simeon of Durham relates, Aldune Biſhop of Lindisfarne, removed the Body of St. Cuthbert, which had for above an Hundred years remained at Cunccæaſter, that is, Cheſter, in the Biſhoprick of Durham, to the place where the City of Durham was afterwards built, it being then altogether uninhabited. Here Biſhop Aldune built a ſmall Church of Stone, dedicating it to St Cuthbert; and a Town being here ſhortly after built, it was called Durham.

'The Kingdom had reſt this year, as alſo the next; but

Anno Dom.
Dccccxcvii.

'The Danes ſail'd round about Devonſhire, to the mouth of the River Severne, and there took much Plunder, as well among the North Welſh, as in Cornwall and Devonſhire.

Yet here it ſeems that North-Wales was miſ-put in theſe Annals, inſtead of the South; for no part of the Severn Sea borders upon North-Wales.

'But after this, the Danes going up as far as Wecedport, (or Watchet) they did much hurt, both by burning the Houſes, and killing the Inhabitants whereever they came. After this they ſail'd round Penwith-ſteort, (i. e. the Point called the Land's-End) toward the South Coaſt, and ſailing up the River Thames, went with their Ships as far as Hildaford (now Lideford) burning and killing whatever they met, as they paſſed along: They alſo burnt the Monaſtery of Ordulph, which had been lately built by him at Æteſingſtoce (now Taviſtock in Devonſhire) and carried a very great deal of Plunder along with them to their Ships. This year alſo Ælfric the Archbiſhop went to Rome to obtain his Pall.

'Then

Anno Dom. Dccccxcviii.

'Then the Danes turned toward the Eaſt up the mouth of the River Frome, and there marched as far as they would into Dorſeta, (i. e. Dorſetſhire) where an Army got together againſt them ; but as often as the Engliſh fought with them, ſo often were they by ſome misfortune or other put to flight; ſo that the Danes ſtill obtain'd the Victory: After this they quarter'd in the Iſle of Wight, but fetch'd their Proviſions from Hamptunſeire and Southſeax.

Alſo this year, according to Caradoc's Chronicle, the Danes landing again in South-Wales, deſtroyed St. Davids, and ſlew Vrgeney Biſhop of that See: And now Meredyth ap Owen, Prince of North-Wales, deceaſed, leaving one only Daughter, who was married to Lewelyn ap Sitſylt, afterward in her Right Prince of North-Wales: But after the death of this Prince Owen, Edwin his Nephew, above-mentioned (as the Manuſcript Chronicle relates) poſſeſſed himſelf of South-Wales, and reigned there ſome years.

Anno Dom. Dccccxcix.

'This year the Danes ſail'd up the River Thames, and from thence went into the Medway to Roſceaſter, where the Kentiſh Forces met them, and there was a very ſharp Diſpute; but alas! they preſently gave place to their Enemies, and fled, becauſe they had not aſſiſtance enough; ſo that the Danes kept the field; and then getting Horſes, rode whereever they pleaſed, ſpoiling and laying waſte all the Weſtern part of Kent: Then it was ordained by the King and his Wiſe Men, that an Army ſhould be forthwith raiſed againſt them both by Sea and Land; but when the Ships were ready, they delayed the time from day to day, oppreſſing the poor people that ſerved on board; and if at any time the Fleet was ready to ſail, it was ſtill put off from one time to another, ſo that they ſuffered the Enemies Forces to increaſe; and when the Danes retired from the Sea-Coaſt, then our Fleet was wont to go out; ſo that at the laſt theſe Naval Forces ſerved for no other end, but to haraſs the People, ſpend their Money, and provoke the Enemy.

This year (as Simeon of Durham relates) Malcolm King of the Scots with a great Army waſted the Province of the Northumbers, and beſieged Durham: At that time Waltheof Earl of the Northumbers, being very old, and unable to fight with the Enemies, encloſed himſelf in Bebbanburgh; whilſt Vthred his Son, a Valiant Young Man, aſſembling an Army out of Northumberland and Yorkſhire, fought with the Scots, and deſtroyed in a manner their whole Army, inſomuch that the King himſelf very hardly eſcaped: After this he made choice of a certain number of ſlain Scotchmen's Heads, the beſt adorn'd with Hair he could get, and gave them to an Old Woman to waſh, allowing her for each Head a Cow for her pains; theſe Heads when waſh'd, he ſet upon high Poles round about the Walls of Durham.

King Ethelred being informed of this Action, ſent for the Young Man, and as a Reward for his Valour, not only gave him his Father's Countrey, but added to it that of Yorkſhire: Upon this Vthred returning home, diſmiſſed his Wife the Daughter of Ældhure Biſhop of Durham; but becauſe he caſt her off contrary to his Promiſe, he ſurrender'd up to her Six Mannors which the Biſhop her Father had given him with her. Then Vthred married Siga, the Daughter of Styre, the Son of Vlfelme.

Anno Dom. M. ‘The King marched into Cumerland, (i. e. Cumberland) and laid it ‘almoſt waſte; but neither our Annals, nor any other Author, tell us wherefore he made this War, nor upon whom it was made; but John Fordon in his Scotch Hiſtory gives us this Account of it; That King Ethelred having paid great Tributes to the Danes, ſent to Malcolm then Prince of Cumberland, under Gryme King of the Scots, commanding him that he ſhould make his Subjects of Cumberland pay part of this Tribute, as well as the reſt of the People of England; which he denying, ſent the King word, That neither he nor his Subjects ought to pay any Tribute, but only were obliged to be ready at the King's Command, to make War, together with the reſt of the Kingdom, whenever he pleaſed; for he ſaid it was much better to fight manfully, than only to buy Liberty with Money: For this cauſe, as well as for that the King affirmed that the Prince of Cumberland favoured the Danes, King Ethelred invaded that Countrey, and carried away great ſpoils from thence; but preſently after, the two Princes being reconciled, they entred into a firm Peace for ever after.

But to proceed with our Annals: ‘After the King had thus waſted ‘Cumberland, he commanded his Ships to ſail round by Legceaſter (i. e. ‘Cheſter) to meet him there; but they could not do it, by reaſon of the ‘contrary Winds; ſo they waſted the Iſland Manige (now called An‘gleſey); for the Daniſh Fleet was turned this Summer upon the Duke‘dom of Normandy. But the next year,

Anno Dom. MI. ‘Their Fleet being now returned into England, there aroſe great ‘Troubles in this Iſland, by reaſon of this Fleet, which every where ‘ſpoiled the Countries, and burnt the Towns; and landing, they ‘marched in one day as far as Ætheling-gadene (which is ſuppoſed to be ‘Alton in Hampſhire); but there the Forces of that County marched ‘againſt, and fought with them; and there Æthelweard the King's ‘High Sheriff, and Leofric, Gerif of Whitcircan, (i. e. Whitchurch in ‘Hampſhire) and Leofwin the King's High-Sheriff, and Wulfer the ‘Biſhop's Thane, and Godwin the Gerif, were all ſlain at Weorthige, ‘(the place is now unknown); as alſo Ælfſige the Biſhop's God-ſon, ‘and of all ſorts of men, Eighty one; yet many more of the Danes ‘were ſlain there, though indeed they kept the Field of Battel: But ‘from thence their Fleet ſail'd toward the Weſt, until they came to ‘Devonſhire, where met him Pallig with what Ships he could gather ‘together: He had revolted from King Ethelred divers times, notwith‘ſtanding his Faith plighted to him, and though the King had largely ‘rewarded him both with Lands and Money. Then they burnt Teng‘ton (i. e. Taunton) and many other good Towns, more than we can ‘now name; which being done, there was a League clapt up with ‘them: After this they went to Exanmuthan (i. e. Exmouth) from ‘whence they marched in one day to Peanhoe (now Pen in Somerſet‘ſhire), where Cola the King's High-Sheriff, and Eadſig the King's ‘Gerif, met them with what Forces they could; but they were put to ‘flight, and many of them ſlain, and the Danes kept the Field; ſo the ‘next morning they burnt the Towns of Peanho, and Cliſtune, (or ‘Clifton) and ſeveral other good Towns. Then the Danes returned ‘to the Iſle of Wight, and there one morning burnt the Town of Wel‘tham, with divers other Villages; and preſently after a League was ‘made with them, and they hearken'd to Terms of Peace.

But

Anno Dom. MI.

But the Laudean and Cottonian Copies differ very much from that of Cambridge, in the telling of this ſtory; for they make the Danes to have firſt ſailed up the River Exe, as far as Eaxceſter, and to have beſieged the City, but not being able to take it, they raiſed the Siege, and then marched all over the Countrey, killing and deſtroying whatever they met with; and that then a ſtrong Army of the Devonſhire and Somerſetſhire men fought with them at Peanho, with the ſucceſs above-mentioned. The reſt differs but little from the Printed Copy; but this laſt relation ſeems moſt likely to be true.

Anno Dom. MII.

'The year following it was decreed by the King and his Wiſe Men, That a Tribute ſhould be paid to the Daniſh Fleet, and Peace ſhould be concluded with them, upon condition that they would ceaſe from doing miſchief: Then the King ſent Leoſſig the Ealdorman to the Fleet, who treated with them on the behalf of the King and his Council of Wiſe Men, propoſing that they would be content with Proviſions and Money, which they agreed to: Then, not long after, they paid them Four and twenty thouſand Pounds. In the mean time Leoſſig the Ealdorman killed Ælfric the King's High Sheriff; upon which the King baniſhed the other the Kingdom. And the Lent afterwards came hither Ælgiva, Daughter of Richard ye first Duke of Normandy, to be married to the King.

'The ſame Summer Eadulf Archbiſhop of York deceaſed: And this year alſo the King commanded all the Danes in England to be ſlain at the Feaſt of St. Brice, becauſe it was told the King that they endeavoured to deprive him and all his Great and Wiſe Men of their lives, and to ſeize the Kingdom to themſelves without any oppoſition.

Matthew of Weſtminſter caſts the Odium of this Action from the King, and lays it upon one of his Evil Counſellors, whom he calls Huena, General of the King's Forces, who to manage the chief Affairs of the Kingdom: He ſeeing the Inſolencies of the Danes, and that after the late Agreement they were grown inſupportable to the Kingdom; for they violated the Wives and Daughters of Perſons of Quality, and committed divers other Injuries not to be endured: Thereupon he came in great ſeeming trouble to the King, making moſt diſmal Complaints of theſe unſpeakable Outrages; at which the King was ſo incenſed, that by the Counſel of the ſaid Huena he ſent private Letters into all parts of the Kingdom, commanding all his Subjects without exception, That upon a certain Day they ſhould every where privily ſet upon the Danes, and without mercy cut them off. In theſe Letters was alſo ſignified, that the Danes had a deſign to deprive him of his Life and Kingdom, and to deſtroy all the Nobility, in order to bring the whole Iſland under their ſubjection. And thus the Danes, who a little before by a League ſolemnly ſworn on both ſides, had been admitted quietly to inhabit among the Engliſh, were moſt treacherouſly and barbarouſly murthered, not many of them eſcaping; even the very Women were put to death, and their Children's Brains daſh'd out againſt the Walls; particularly at London, when this Bloody Decree was to be executed, many of the Danes fled into a certain Church of that City, but for all that it proved no Sanctuary to them, for they were all there cruelly murthered even at the very Altar.

H. Huntington moreover adds, That he himſelf being a Child, had heard it from certain Old Men, that by the King's Command Letters were were privately diſpatch'd all over England, to make away the Danes in one Night.

But ſo much Innocent Blood being thus perfidiouſly ſhed, cry'd aloud to Heaven for Vengeance, and the Clamours of it likewiſe quickly reached as far as Denmark: And Walſingham hath given us in his Hiſtory a particular Account of the manner of it; for on the day when this barbarous Decree was executed at London, certain young men of the Daniſh Nation being too nimble for their Purſuers, got into a ſmall Veſſel then in the Thames, and by that means eſcaped and fled to Denmark; where they certified King Sweyn of what had paſſed in England; who being moved with indignation at this treatment, thereupon called a great Council of all the Chief Men of his Kingdom, and declaring to them this Cruel Maſſacre, deſired their Advice what was beſt to be done: and they being inflamed with Rage and Grief for the loſs of ſo many of their Friends and Kindred, decreed with one conſent, That they ought to revenge it with all the Forces of their Nation: Upon which, great Preparations were made in the ſeveral Provinces, and Meſſengers ſent to other Nations, to deſire their Alliance with him, promiſing them their ſhare in the Spoils of that Countrey which they were going to conquer: So King Sweyn having got ready a vaſt Fleet of above Three hundred Sail, arrived in England: But as Bromton's Chronicle relates,

Anno Dom. MIII.

The year following, Sweyn King of Denmark, hearing of the Death of his Subjects, ſail'd with a mighty Fleet to the Coaſt of Cornwall, where he landed, and marched up to Eaxceaſter, which, (as our Annals tell us) ‘by the Careleſneſs or Cowardiſe of a certain Norman, one ‘Count Hugh, whom the Queen had made Governor there, the Pagans ‘took, and quite deſtroyed the City, and carried thence a great Booty. ‘Then a Numerous Army was raiſed from Wiltſhire and Hampſhire, and ‘being very unanimous, they all marched briskly againſt the Danes; ‘but Ælfric the Ealdorman, who commanded in chief, here ſhewed his ‘wonted tricks; for as ſoon as both Armies were in ſight of each other, ‘he feigned himſelf ſick, and began to vomit, pretending he had got ‘ſome violent Diſtemper, and by that means betray'd thoſe whom he ‘ought to have led to Victory; according to the Proverb, If the General's heart fails, the Army flies.

But though this was very ill done of Ælfrick thus to betray his truſt, yet certainly the King was no leſs to be blamed himſelf, for truſting a man that had ſo often betray'd him, and whom he had already ſufficiently provoked, by putting out the Eyes of his Son, as you have already heard.

But to return to our Annals: ‘Sweyn now finding the Cowar‘diſe or Inconſtancy of the Engliſh, marched with his Forces to Wil‘tune, which Town he burnt; from thence he marched to Syrbi‘rig, (i. e. Old Sarum) which they alſo burnt; and from thence to ‘the Sea-ſide to their Ships.

After the death of Edwal ap Meyric, and Meredyth ap Owen, Princes of North-Wales, as you have already heard, North-Wales having for ſome years continued under a ſort of Anarchy, without any Prince, Meredyth leaving behind him no Iſſue Male, and Edwal but one Son an Infant, it gave occaſion (as the Welſh Chronicles relate) to great diſturbances; for one Aedan ap Blegored (or Bledhemeyd, as the Cottonian Copy of the Welſh Annals call him) tho an abſolute ſtranger to the Britiſh Blood-Royal, about this time poſſeſſed himſelf of the Principality of North-Wales, and held it about twelve years; but whether he came in by Election, or Force, is not ſaid; only that one Conan ap Howel, who fought with this Aedan for the Dominion, was this year ſlain in Battel: So that Aedan for a time held that Countrey peaceably, ſince we do not read of any other Wars he had, till the laſt year of his Reign.

Anno Dom. MIV.

'This year Sweyn came with his Fleet to Northwick, i. e. Norwich, (the River it ſeems being navigable up to it in thoſe days) and wholly deſtroyed and burnt that City; then Ulſkytel the Ealdorman conſulted with the Wiſe and Great Men of Eaſt-England, and by them it was judged moſt expedient to buy Peace of the Daniſh Army, to prevent their doing any more miſchief; for the Danes had taken them unprovided, before they had time to draw their Forces together: But theſe Danes not valuing the Peace which they had newly made, ſtole away with all their Ships, and ſailed to Theatford; which as ſoon as Ulſkytel had learnt, he ſent a Meſſenger with Commands to break or burn all their Ships (which notwithſtanding, the Engliſh neglected to do), whilſt he in the mean time tried to get together his Forces with what ſpeed he could: But the Danes coming to Theodford three Weeks after the deſtruction of Norwich, ſtayed within the Town of Theodford only one night, and then burnt and laid it in aſhes: But the next morning as they returned to their Ships, Ulkytel met with them, and there began a very ſharp Fight, which ended in a very great ſlaughter on both ſides, and abundance of the Engliſh Nobility were there killed; but if all the Engliſh Forces had been there, the Danes had never reached their Ships.

Vid. Monaſt. Angl.

But notwithſtanding theſe cruel Wars in the Eaſtern and Southern Parts of England, Wulfric Spot, an Officer in the Court of King Ethelred, now built the Monaſtery of Burton in Staffordſhire, and endowed it with all his Paternal Inheritance, which was very great, and gave that King Three hundred Mancuſes of Gold, to purchaſe his Confirmation of what he had done. This Monaſtery, though its Rents at the Diſſolution were ſomewhat below the Value of Five hundred Pounds per Annum, yet being an Abby of great Note in thoſe Parts, and alſo render'd more famous from its Annals publiſh'd at Oxford, I thought good to take particular notice of it.

Anno Dom. MV.

'This year Ælfric Archbiſhop of Canterbury deceaſed; and Ælfeag (Biſhop of Wincheſter) was made Archbiſhop.] But the Laudean and Cottonian Copies place this under the next year.

'So cruel a Famine alſo raged here, as England never ſuffer'd a worſe.] Florence relates the Famine to be ſo great, that England was not able to ſubſiſt.

'The ſame year alſo King Sweyn with the Daniſh Fleet ſail'd into Denmark; but in a ſhort time return'd hither again.

Anno Dom. MVI.

'This year Ælfeage was now conſecrated Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Brightwald took the Biſhoprick of Wiltonſhire; as alſo Wulfgeat was deprived of all his Honours, and Wulfeath had his Eyes put out. (Theſe were Noblemen who ſuffered under the King's diſpleaſure; but what the cauſe of it was, I find not.) And this year Biſhop Kenwulph deceaſed: Then after Midſummer, the Daniſh

'Fleet

Anno Dom. MVI. ‘Fleet came to Sandwic, and did as they uſed to do, killing, waſting, and plundering whatever they met with: Therefore the King commanded all the Weſt Saxon and Mercian Nations to be aſſembled, who kept watch all the Autumn by Companies, againſt the Danes; but all this ſignified no more than what they had done often before; for the Danes made no leſs Incurſions, but went whereever they pleaſed, and this Expedition did the people more damage than any Army could do.

‘Winter coming on, the Engliſh Forces return'd home, and the Danes about Martinmaſs retired to their old Sanctuary, the Iſle of Wight, whither they carried whatever they had need of; and afterwards about Chriſtmaſs they marched out to ſeek for freſh Proviſions in Hamptunſhire and Berrocſeire, as far as Reading; and havocking according to their uſual cuſtom, burnt the Beacons whereever they found them; and from thence they marched to Wealingaford, (i. e. Wallingford) which Town they wholly deſtroyed: Then marching to Æſceſdune, (now Aſton, near Wallingford) they came to Cwicchelmeſlaw, (now Cuckamſley-hill in Berkſhire) without ever touching near the Sea; and at laſt return'd home another way.

‘About the ſame time an Engliſh Army was muſtered at Cynet, (i. e. Kennet in Wiltſhire) where a Battel was fought, but the Engliſh Troops were immediately worſted; after which the Danes carried off all their Booty to the Sea-ſide. There might one have ſeen the Wiltſhire men (like a Cowardly ſort of people) ſuffer the Danes to return to the Sea-ſide, even juſt by their doors, with their Proviſions and Spoils. In the mean time the King marched over Thames into Scrobbesbyrigſcire, (i. e. Shropſhire) and there kept his Chriſtmaſs. At that time the Danes ſtruck ſo great a Terror into the Engliſh Nation, that no man could deviſe how to get them out of the Kingdom, nor how well to maintain it againſt them, becauſe they had deſtroyed all the Countries of the Weſt-Saxons with Burnings and Devaſtations. Then the King often conſulted with his Wiſe Men about what was beſt to be done in this caſe, whereby they might ſave the Countrey before it was quite ruined; and after mature deliberation, it was at length decreed by them all, for the Common Good of the Nation, (though much againſt their wills) That Tribute ſhould be again paid to the Danes. Then the King ſent to their Army, to let them know, that he was contented to enter into a Peace with them, and to pay them Tribute, and alſo find them Proviſions during their ſtay: To which Terms all the Danes aſſented: So it ſeems the whole Engliſh Nation was forced to maintain them. And the beginning of the year following, Anno Dom. MVII. ‘This Tribute was again paid to them; to wit, Thirty thouſand Pounds. Alſo the ſame year Ædric was made Ealdorman over all the Kingdom of Mercia.

This Ædric, though he had married the King's Daughter, is characterized by all our Hiſtorians, for a Proud, Falſe, and Unconſtant Man; and who by his Treachery proved the Ruin of his Countrey, as well as of many particular Perſons of great Worth: For not long before, (as Florence relates) he made away Athelme that Noble Ealdorman at Shrewsbury, inviting him to a Feaſt, and afterwards carrying him out a hunting, where he hired the City-Hangman to ſet his Dog upon him, called Porthund, which tore him to pieces: And not long after his two Sons Walfheage and Vfgeat had their Eyes put out by the King's Order at Cotham, where he then reſided.

But

Anno Dom. MVII.

But we may hence obſerve, to how ſad a ſtate the Nation was reduced under a Voluptuous and Cowardly King, and a Degenerate Nobility: And the reaſon why the Annals ſay, That the People's being kept in Arms all the Winter, did them as much harm as the Enemy; was, becauſe having then no ſtanding Forces, the Countrey Militia were fain to be kept upon Duty at their own Charges, whilſt their Families were ready to ſtarve at home: So impoſſible a thing it is to maintain any long War either at home or abroad, without a Standing Army.

But now the King having too late perceived his Error, viz. That the greateſt Cauſe of his Ruin proceeded from the want of a good Fleet,

Anno Dom. MVIII

'He then commanded Ships to be built all over England; (to wit) to 'every Hundred and ten Hides of Land, one Ship; and of every Eight
'Hides a Helmet and Breaſt plate: And ſo by the next year,

Anno Dom. MIX.

'His Ships were all finiſhed, and they were both ſo many and withal
'ſo good, that (as our Hiſtories affirm) England never ſaw the like
'before: Then after they were all well mann'd and victual'd, they were 'brought to Sandwic, and there remain'd, in order to defend the King'dom againſt the Invaſion of Strangers; yet notwithſtanding all theſe
'Preparatives, the Engliſh Nation was ſo unhappy, that this great Fleet
'met with no better ſucceſs than often before; for it happen'd about
'this time, or a little ſooner, that Brightric (a falſe and ambitious man)
'the Brother of Ædric above mentioned, accuſed Wulfnoth a Thane of 'the South Saxons, (and Father of Earl Godwin) to the King; upon
'which Wulfnoth ſaving himſelf by flight, got together twenty Ships,
'and with them turning Pyrate, took Prizes all round the Southern Coaſt,
'and did a world of miſchief; but as ſoon as it was told the King's 'Fleet, that they might eaſily ſurprize him if they would but cruiſe
'about that place, Brightric upon this taking Eighty Sail along with 'him, had mighty hopes by ſeizing of him either alive or dead, to make 'himſelf ſignally famous; but as he was ſailing thither, ſo great a Tem-
'peſt aroſe, as never had been in the memory of man, by which all his 'Fleet was ſhipwrack'd, or ſtranded on the ſhore; and Wulfnoth coming
'thither preſently after, burnt all the reſt that were left. Now when
'this News came to that part of the Fleet where the King was in Perſon,
'the whole Action ſeem'd to be undertaken very precipitately, without 'any good Advice at all. And thereupon the King with all his Ealdor-
'men and Great Men return'd home, leaving both the Ships and Men to 'ſhift for themſelves: But thoſe that were in them, carried them up to 'London. And thus did all the Labour and Expence of the whole Na'tion come to nothing, without in the leaſt diminiſhing the Power of 'their Enemies as the people hoped they would have done.

'When all theſe Naval Preparations were thus defeated, there arrived
'preſently after Harveſt a mighty Fleet of Danes at Sandwic; and af'ter they were landed they immediately marched to Canterbury, which
'City they would forthwith have deſtroyed, had they not humbly be-'ſought a Peace of them: Upon which all the Eaſt Kentiſh men came 'and clapt up a Peace with the Danes, and purchaſed it at the Price of 'Three thouſand Pounds: But theſe Heathens preſently afterwards
'ſail'd round again, till they came to Wihtland, (i. e. the Iſle of Wight)
'and there, as alſo in Southſeax, Hamtunſcire, and Bearruſcire, they
'plunder'd and burnt Towns as they uſed to do: Hereupon the King
'com-

Anno Dom. MIX. ‘commanded the whole Nation to be ſummoned, that every Province ſhould defend it ſelf againſt them: But for all this, they ſtill marched whereever they pleaſed, without any body's diſturbing them: But one time when the King had hemm'd them in with his whole Army, as they were going to their Ships, and all his Forces were juſt ready to fall upon them, Ædric the Ealdorman hinder'd them, as he always did.

For, as R. Hoveden relates, he over-perſuaded the King by his cunning and plauſible reaſons, not to run the hazard of a Battel, but to let them go off if they would; and ſo they return'd to their Ships with a great deal of joy that they had ſo well got themſelves out of that Toil.

‘Then after Martinmaſs they return'd again into Kent, and took up their Winter-Quarters near the Thames, fetching their Proviſions from Eſſex, and thoſe Provinces that lay neareſt, on each ſide the River; and they frequently threatned the City of London, but (thanks be to God it had hitherto kept it ſelf ſafe), there they met with always but an ill reception.

‘After Chriſtmaſs they made an excurſion through Cyltern, (that is, the Chiltern or Woody Countrey of Bucks, and Oxfordſhire) and ſo to Oxnaford, and burnt that City, and having plunder'd on both ſides the Thames, they return'd to their ſhips; but when they heard that an Army was prepared ready againſt them at London, they again paſſed over the River at Stanes, and thus rambled about the Countrey all this Winter; yet about Spring they came again into Kent, and there refitted their ſhips.

Anno Dom. MX. ‘But preſently after Eaſter the Daniſh Army marched out againſt the Engliſh, and going on ſhore at Gypeſwic (i. e. Ipſwich) went directly thither, where they knew Earl Ulfkitel was encamp'd with his Forces; this happen'd on Aſcenſion-day in the morning; ſo the Eaſt Engliſh preſently fled, and there were on the ſpot ſlain Ethelſtan the King's Son-in Law, as alſo Oſwi and his Son, and Wulfric the Son of Leofwin with many other Noble Thanes, and common Soldiers not to be numbred: One Thurkytel, ſirnamed Myranheafod, (that is, in our preſent Language, Ant's head) firſt began to fly, whereby the Danes kept the field; and having provided themſelves with Horſes, they ſubdued all Eaſt-England, ſpoiling and burning for three Months together, where they went; then marching into the Fens, they there deſtroyed both Men and Cattel, and burnt the Towns of Theodford and Grantabyrig (i. e. Cambridge): Then turning Southward toward the Thames, they rode on Horſeback to their ſhips; and preſently coming out of them again, they marched towards the Weſt into Oxnafordſcire, and from thence into Buckinghamſcire, and ſo along the River Owſe, till they got as far as Bedanford; and thence to Temeſanford (now Temsford), burning all the Towns in their way.

‘Then again they returned to their ſhips with all their Plunder, and there divided it amongſt them. But as for the King's Forces, when they ſhould have ſtopped their paſſage, they e'en returned home; and when the Danes were in the Eaſt, they were taken up in the Weſt; and whilſt they were in the South, the others were in the North.

And Florence farther adds, That in this Expedition into Oxfordſhire, the Danes not only took, but burnt the City of Oxford.

Anno Dom. MX.

All which Deſtructions muſt needs have proceeded from hence, that the Danes making War by Sea as well as by Land, could upon the approach of the King's Army ſail away to any other part of the Kingdom, and from thence march off again before the King's Army could ever come at them; which proves how abſolutely neceſſary it is for an Iſland to maintain a powerful Fleet, if ever they mean to be ſafe. But to return to our Annals.

‘At laſt all the Wiſe Men of the Kingdom were again ſummoned by the King, to conſult how they might better defend the Kingdom; but, it ſeems, whatſoever was there reſolved on, did not continue a month without alteration, till at laſt there were no Commanders that would raiſe any Forces, but every one fled away as faſt as they could, neither would any one Shire help its Neighbours: Inſomuch that before the Feaſt of St. Andrew, the Daniſh Army came to Hamtune, which Sea-Town they burnt, and took what Plunder they pleaſed in the Neighbourhood, and from thence again paſſed over the Thames into Weſt-Seax, and thence into the Marſhes of Kent, all which they wholly burnt and deſtroyed: And when they had thus marched whereever they would, about Midſummer they returned again to their Ships.

Oxford and Cambridge being both burnt this year by the Danes, all Studies ceaſed at each of theſe Places, till long after, as Thomas Rudburn relates, one Robert Bolean began to read his Lectures on the Scriptures, Anno 1133. From which time (ſays he) the Scholars have ſtill continued both at Oxford and Cambridge.

But no wonder that things ſucceeded no better, if what Caxton in his Chronicle relates, were true concerning thoſe Times; That when the Nobles met in the Great Council of the Kingdom, inſtead of conſulting for the good of it, they fell to impeaching one another, and ſpent their whole time in their own private Quarrels; the Church-men ſtanding upon their Privileges, refuſed to aſſiſt the King, or to contribute any thing conſiderable to the Publick Neceſſities: To all which miſchiefs were likewiſe added Robberies, and Scarcity of Bread; which ſtill encouraged the Danes, as they perceived the Kingdom grow weaker and weaker, to demand greater Tribute to buy their Peace; till at laſt the Kingdom was quite exhauſted of all its Treaſure.

Anno Dom. MXI.

‘This year the King and his Wiſe Men ſent again to the Daniſh Army with deſires of Peace, promiſing them both Proviſions and Money; for they had then ſubjected to them all Eaſt-England, Eaſt Seax, Middle-Seax, Oxnaford, Grantebiryge, Heortford, Buckingaham, Bedanford, and Huntandun Scyres, and on the South-ſide of Thames; and all the Kentiſh-men, and South-Saxons, with the Town of Hæſtings; and beſides all theſe, Suthrig, (i. e. Surrey) Bearruc, and Hamtune Scires, and great part of Wiltunſcire; all which miſeries happen'd to us through evil Council, becauſe the Tribute was not paid them time enough, and not till they had done all the miſchiefs they could. Then was a Peace clapp'd up with them: Yet nevertheleſs this League being ſoon broken, they marched about every where in Troops, carrying off a world of Booty with them, either taking theſe poor people Priſoners, or elſe ſlaying them outright.

‘Alſo this year, between the Nativity of the Virgin Mary and Michaelmas, they beſieged Canterbury, and took it by Treachery; for one Ælmer (an Archdeacon) whoſe Life Archbiſhop Ælfeage had for-

Anno Dom. MXI.

'merly ſaved, betrayed it to them (after twenty days Siege); then they took Priſoners Archbiſhop Ælfeage, and Ælfwold the King's Sheriff, and Leofwin the Abbot, and Godwin the Biſhop of Rocheſter; but Ælmer, Abbot of St. Auguſtine's they let go.

'They likewiſe took all in Holy Orders, both Men and Women; nor can it be told how many theſe were; after which they remain'd in the City as long as they pleaſed: But as ſoon as they had plunder'd it, they went back again to their Ships, carrying the Archbiſhop along with them; and he was now become a Captive, who but a little before was the Spiritual Head of the Engliſh Nation: One might there have ſeen Miſery at its full ſtretch, where uſed to be Joy and Proſperity; even in that City from whence was firſt brought to us the joyful Tidings of the Goſpel: But they detain'd the Archbiſhop Priſoner (near Seven Months) till ſuch time as they martyr'd him.

Osbern in his Life of St. Elfeage, relates, That this Archbiſhop ſent to the Danes when they came before the Town, deſiring them to ſpare ſo many innocent Chriſtians lives; but they deſpiſing his requeſt, fell to battering the Walls, and ſo throwing Firebrands into the City, ſet it on fire; ſo that whilſt the Citizens ran to ſave their Houſes, Ælmeric the Archdeacon let the Danes into the City.

Florence here adds, That the Monks and Laity were decimated after a ſtrange manner; ſo that out of every Ten Perſons, only the Tenth was to be kept alive; and that only Four Monks and about Eight hundred Laymen remain'd after this Decimation: And that not long after, above Two thouſand Danes periſhed by divers inward Torments; and the reſt were admoniſh'd to make ſatisfaction to the Biſhop, but yet they obſtinately refuſed it.

Florence of Worceſter, and R. Hoveden alſo relate, That the Danes deſtroyed many of the Priſoners they had taken, with cruel Torments, and various Deaths.

Anno Dom. MXII.

'This year Eadric the Ealdorman (ſirnamed Streon), and all the Wiſe and Chief Men, both Clerks and Laicks of the Engliſh Nation, came to London before Eaſter (which fell out then the day before the Ides of April) and there ſtayed until ſuch time as the above-mentioned Tribute could be paid, which was not done till after Eaſter, and was then Eight thouſand Pounds: In the mean time (being about Six Months after) upon a Saturday the Daniſh Army being highly incenſed againſt Archbiſhop Ælfeage, becauſe he would neither promiſe them Money himſelf, nor yet would ſuffer any body elſe to give them any thing for his Ranſom; for which, as Osbern in his Life relates, they demanded no leſs than Three thouſand Pounds in Silver, (a vaſt Sum in thoſe days); which being denied them, and many of them being got drunk, they laid hold on the Archbiſhop, and led him to their Council on the Saturday after Eaſter, and there knocked him on the head (as the Annals relate) with Stones and Cows Horns, till at laſt one of them ſtriking him with an Axe on the Head, he fell down dead with the Blow.

Florence ſays, that this was done by one Thrum a Dane, whom he had the day before confirmed, being thereunto moved by an Impious Piety. But John of Tinmouth in his Manuſcript Hiſtory of Saints, called Hiſtoria Aurea now in the Library at Lambeth, relates that when Archbiſhop Elfeage was thus killed, the Danes threw his Body into the River, Anno Dom. MXII.

now ~~[illegible]~~ Greenwich

River, which was ſoon taken out again by thoſe Danes whom he had converted.

But our Annals here farther relate, 'That the Biſhops Eadnoth and 'Ælfhune, (the former of Lincoln, and the latter of London) took 'away his ſacred Body early the next morning, and buried it in St. Paul's 'Minſter, (where God now ſhews the power of this Holy Martyr.) 'But as ſoon as the Tribute was paid, and the Peace confirmed by Oath, 'the Daniſh Army was looſely diſperſed abroad, being before cloſely 'compacted together; then Five and forty of their Ships ſubmitted to 'the King, and promiſed him to defend the Kingdom, provided he 'would allow them Victuals and Apparrel.

Anno Dom. MXIII.

'The year after Archbiſhop Ælfeage was thus martyr'd, the King 'made one Lifing Archbiſhop of Canterbury: Alſo the ſame year, be'fore the Month of Auguſt, King Sweyn came with his Fleet to Sand'wich, and ſoon after ſailing about Eaſt-England, arrived in the Mouth 'of Humber; and from thence up the River Trent, till they came to 'Gegnesburgh (now Gainsborough in Lincolnſhire.)

Which miſchief, according to William of Malmesbury, proceeded from Turkil a Dane, who was the great Inciter of the Death of the Archbiſhop, and who had then the Eaſt-Engliſh ſubjected to his will. This man ſent Meſſengers into his own Countrey to King Sweyn, letting him know, that he ſhould come again into England; for the King was given ſo much to Wine and Women, that he minded nothing elſe; wherefore he was hated by his Subjects, and contemned by Strangers; that his Commanders were Cowards, the Natives weak, and who would run away at the firſt ſound of his Trumpets. Though this ſeems not very probable, for Earl Turkil was then of King Ethelred's ſide, as you will ſee by and by.

King Sweyn being prone enough to ſlaughter, needed no great Intreaties to bring him over; he had been here eight years before, and why he ſtayed away ſo long, I wiſh our Authors would have told us: But William of Malmesbury further adds, That one chief end of his coming over, was to revenge the death of his Siſter Gunhildis, who being a Beautiful Young Lady, had come over into England with Palling her Husband, a powerful Daniſh Earl, and receiving the Chriſtian Religion, became her ſelf a Hoſtage of the Peace that had been formerly concluded: But tho the unhappy Fury of Edric had commanded her to be beheaded together with ſome other of her Countreymen, yet ſhe bore her Death with an undaunted Spirit, having ſeen her Husband, and a Son, a Youth of great and promiſing hopes, ſlain before her face. But to come again to our Annals:

'So ſoon as King Sweyn arrived in the North, Earl Vhtred and all the 'Countrey of the Northumbers, with all the people in Lindeſige, and 'the people of the five Burghs or Towns (but what theſe were we now 'know not) lying on the other ſide Wætlingaſtreet, ſubmitted them'ſelves to him. There were alſo Hoſtages given him out of every 'Shire; but when he found that all the people were now become ſub'ject to him, he commanded them to provide his Forces both with 'Horſes and Proviſions, whilſt he in the mean time marched toward the 'South with great expedition; committing the Ships and Hoſtages to 'Knute his Son: And after he had paſſed Wætlingaſtreet, they did as 'much miſchief as any Army could do: Then they turn'd to Oxnaford, Anno Dom. MXIII.

‘ whoſe Citizens preſently ſubmitted themſelves to him; from thence ‘ he went to Winceſter, where the Inhabitants did the ſame; and from ‘ thence they marched Eaſtward towards London, near which many of ‘ his men were drown'd in the Thames, becauſe they would not ſtay to ‘ find a Bridge; but when they came thither, the Citizens would not ‘ ſubmit, but ſallying out, had a ſharp Engagement with them, becauſe ‘ King Ethelred was there, and Earl Turkil with him: Wherefore King ‘ Sweyn departed thence to Wealingaford, and then over Thames Weſtward ‘ to Bathe, and there ſate down with his whole Army, whither came to ‘ him Æthelmar the Ealdorman of Devonſhire, with all the Weſtern ‘ Thanes, who all ſubmitted themſelves to him, and gave him Hoſtages.

‘ When he had ſubdued all theſe places, he marched Northwards to ‘ his Ships, and then almoſt the whole Nation received and acknowledg‘ed him for their real King: And after this the Citizens of Lon‘don became ſubject to him, and gave him Hoſtages, becauſe otherwiſe ‘ they fear'd they ſhould be utterly deſtroy'd; for Sweyn demanded that ‘ they ſhould give full Pay and Victuals to his Army; and that Winter ‘ Thurkil demanded the ſame for King Ethelred's Forces, which lay at ‘ Grenawic, (i. e. Greenwich). But both the Armies refrain'd not a jot ‘ the leſs from plundering where they pleaſed; ſo that the Nation both ‘ as well in the North as in the South, was no longer able to bear it.

‘ After this the King ſtayed ſome time with his Fleet which lay then ‘ in the Thames, whilſt the Queen retired beyond Sea to her Brother Earl ‘ Richard (in Normandy); and Elſige Abbot of Burgh went along ‘ with her; the King alſo ſent thither the Princes Eadward and Ælfred, ‘ with Biſhop Ælfune to be their Governor. Then the King went with ‘ his Fleet about Chriſtmaſs into Wihtland, and there kept the Feſtival; ‘ and afterwards paſſed over to Earl Richard, and there ſtayed with him ‘ till Sweyn died.

‘ There is in the Peterburgh Copy of theſe Annals, this following Re‘lation; That whilſt the Queen thus remained beyond Sea, Elſige Abbot ‘ of Burgh, who was then with her, went to the Monaſtery called ‘ Boneval, where the Body of Saint Florentine lay buried: This place ‘ he found almoſt wholly deſerted, and the poor Abbot and Monks in a ‘ miſerable condition, having been robbed of all they had; then he ‘ bought of the Abbot and Monks the whole Body, except the Head, ‘ for Five thouſand Pounds, and at his return into England dedicated it ‘ to Chriſt and St. Peter, that is, he placed it in the Church of Peter‘burgh, of which he was then Abbot.

In the Saxon it is 500 l.

This was a vaſt Sum of Money in thoſe days, to be given for ~~the~~ ~~Bones of~~ one dead Carkaſs, and that not entire neither; but ſuch was the Superſtition of that Age.

Anno Dom. MXIV.

‘ This year King Sweyn ended his Life about Candlemas: Then all the ‘ Daniſh Fleet and Army choſe Cnute his Son to be their King: But all ‘ the Wiſe or Chief Men of the Engliſh Nation, as well of the Clergy as ‘ Laity, ſent to King Æthelred, to let him know that there was no ‘ Prince dearer to them than their own Natural Lord, provided he would ‘ govern them better than he had hitherto done. Upon this the King ‘ ſent Prince Edward his Son, and ſeveral others, Attendants, into this ‘ Kingdom, with Orders to recommend him to the whole Nation in his ‘ Name, promiſing them to be a faithful and kind Lord to them; and ‘ that he would redreſs whatever Grievances they had ſuffer'd, and would ‘alſo pardon whatſoever had been done againſt him either by Words or Deeds, provided they would all ſincerely return to their Allegiance.

‘Then a full and firm Amity being concluded on both by Words and Deeds, and Hoſtages being given on both ſides, they decreed the Daniſh King for ever baniſhed England: After which King Ethelred return'd about Lent into his own Countrey, and was chearfully received by all men.

The Bodleian Copy of Florence here adds, That Queen Elfgiva (or Emma) with the Two Young Princes her Sons, remained ſtill in Normandy, until ſhe was (after the Death of her Husband) ſent for over by King Cnute, and the Common-Council of the Kingdom, and being married to him, was ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter, in the preſence of all the Biſhops and Great Men of England.

‘After Sweyn was dead, Cnute his Son ſtaid with his Army at Gegnesburgh until Eaſter, and there agreed with the people of Lindeſige, that they ſhould provide his Army with Horſes, and then that all of them ſhould march out together to plunder; but King Ethelred came thither with a ſtrong Army before they were ready to execute their Deſign, and ſpoiled and burnt all places, killing all the men they could meet with; therefore King Cnute departed thence with his Fleet, leaving the poor miſerable people to ſhift for themſelves, and ſail'd Southward till he came to Sandwic, and there put the Hoſtages on ſhore which had been given to his Father, having firſt cut off their Hands and Noſes. But for an addition to all theſe Calamities, the King commanded Twenty one thouſand Pounds to be paid to the Army that then lay at Grenawic.

‘Alſo this year on the Vigil of St. Michael, happen'd a great Inundation of the Sea all along this Coaſt, inſomuch that it ſpread further than ever it had yet done, ſo that it drowned many Towns, and an innumerable company of men.

We have nothing further to add under this year, more than to obſerve the various Relations of our Monkiſh Writers concerning the ſudden death of King Sweyn, which they will needs have to be a Judgment upon him for waſting the Lands belonging to the Monaſtery of Badriceſworth, and for giving opprobrious language againſt the Memory of St. Edmund, who was then enſhrin'd. But becauſe their Relation of this matter is very remarkable, I ſhall give you both Florence of Worceſter, and Simeon of Durham, their Account of it; which is thus, That King Sweyn lying then at Gainsborough, there held a General Aſſembly of his Great Officers; and when it grew toward evening, being encircled with his Armed Men, he caſt out Threats, that he would ſend and ſpoil that Monaſtery; whereupon he preſently thought he ſaw St. Edmund coming all Armed toward him, which made him cry out vehemently, Help, help, Fellow-ſoldiers, look here, King Edmund comes to kill me; and as he uttered theſe words, he received a Mortal Blow by the Saint's hands, and ſo fell from his Horſe, and lying till the dusk of the evening in great torment, he expired on the ſecond of February, and was carried to York, and there buried: So theſe Writers report from the Legend of St. Edmund: Yet John of Tinmouth makes St. Edmund's Ghoſt to have ſtabbed him with his Dagger as he ſate in his Chair. But William of Malmesbury tells us, That St. Edmund appeared to him in his ſleep, and ſmote him whilſt he was in bed, becauſe he anſwered him rudely:

rudely: But they all agree that he died of the Blow which St Edmund had given him: But I do believe that there may be ſo much Truth in this ſtory, that King Sweyn being mortally wounded by ſome unknown hand, who had the good fortune to make his eſcape, gave occaſion to the Monks of St. Edmundsbury to invent this Legend for the Honour of their Saint, and alſo to deter others from daring to violate that place, which was then accounted ſacred.

But it ſeems King Ethelred was not much better'd by Affliction, nor did he long obſerve his Promiſe of governing according to Law; for the next year, Anno Dom. MXV.

‘A Mycel Gemot (or Great Council) being now held at Oxnaford, Earl Eadric there betray'd Sigeferth and Morcar, two (Daniſh) Thanes, of the Seafenburghs (that is, the Seven Towns, but where they lay, we know not) and inviting them all into his Chamber, they were there treacherouſly ſlain: Then the King ſeized upon all their Goods, and commanded the Widow of Sigeferth to be ſecured, and carried to Mealdelnesbyrig, (i. e. Malmesbury): But ſome ſhort time after, Edmund Ætheling coming thither, married this Woman againſt his Father's will: For the Prince going (as William of Malmesbury relates) to ſee her, upon the great fame of her Beauty and Virtue, having ſeen her, and preſently falling in Love with her, he there married her. Florence, and Mat. Weſtminſter, do alſo farther relate, that not only theſe two Noblemen, but alſo divers of the Nobility appeared there, who though they were of Daniſh Blood, yet ſtood firm to King Ethelred's Intereſt; the chief of theſe were Sigefert and Morchar, (above-mentioned) men of great Riches and Power in the Northern Parts, and that perfidious Earl Edric, who gaping after their Eſtates, accuſed them ſecretly of Treaſon to King Ethelred, by whoſe Order the Earl invited them all with great ſhew of kindneſs to a Feaſt, where he cauſed them to be treacherouſly murther'd. But their Dependants, who went about to revenge their Lords death, were repulſed, and forced to fly into the Tower of St. Frideſwide's Church in Oxford, from whence, when they could not eaſily be driven, the Tower was ſet on fire, and they conſumed with it: But preſently after, the King repenting of his Cruelty, cauſed the Church to be cleanſed and repaired.

This year alſo Lhewelyn ap Sitſylt, who was married to Angharat, only Daughter to Meredyth Prince of Wales, (as you have already heard) raiſed great Forces againſt Aedan ap Blegored, the uſurping Prince of North Wales, and fighting a bloody Battel with him, there ſlew him with his four Sons; but the place is not mentioned where this Fight was: After which, Lhewelyn took upon him the Principality of North Wales (for one Kynan, or Conan, then held South-Wales); but though this Lhewelyn was deſcended by his Mother's ſide from Howel Dha, yet notwithſtanding he was not the Lawful Heir of North-Wales, but Jago Son to Prince Edwal above-mentioned, who after the death of this Lhewelyn ſucceeded him. as you will hear in due time.

‘After this, about the Feaſt of the Nativity of the Virgin Mary, Edmund Ætheling marched toward the Five Burghs (places in the North of England to us unknown) and preſently invading the Lands of the ſaid Sigeferth and Morchar, ſubdued all that Countrey. About the ſame time King Cnute arrived at Sandwic, and forthwith ſail'd round about Kent, to the Weſt-Saxons, till he came to the mouth 'of the River Frome, and there landing, plunder'd all about Wiltſhire, Dorſetſcire, and Sumerſetſcire. At the ſame time King Ethelred lay ſick at Coſham (in Wiltſhire) and then Earl Eadric got together an Army, and Edmund Ætheling another in the Northern parts; but when they came near one another, the Ealdorman lay in wait to entrap Prince Edward, and cut him off, but was not able to effect it, (for his Deſign was diſcovered); whereupon they ſhiered off without fighting at all, and by that means yielded the field to their Enemies. Then Eadric having firſt gained over to him Forty of the King's Royal Navy, ſubmitted to Cnute, as did alſo the Weſt Saxons, and gave him Hoſtages, and provided Horſes for his Army, and there he ſtay'd among them till Chriſtmaſs.

Anno Dom. MXVI.

'This year King Cnute came with his Fleet of a Hundred and ſixty Sail, and with him Eadric the Ealdorman, over the Thames into Mercia, as far as Crecilade (on the North-ſide of Wiltſhire); and then towards Chriſtmaſs they turned about to Waringſcire, (i.e. Warwickſhire), where they plunder'd without mercy, burning Towns, and killing all that came in their way. Upon this Ædmund Ætheling began to raiſe an Army againſt them; but when his Forces were got together, they were but of little ſervice to him, becauſe that neither the King was preſent there, nor did the Citizens of London come up to his aſſiſtance; ſo that that Expedition was utterly loſt, and every man went home again about his own buſineſs.

'But after the Holidays were over, another Expedition was appointed, under a great Penalty upon every one that ſhould not appear at the Muſter, though he lived never ſo far off: And a Meſſenger was ſent to the King at London, humbly beſeeching him to come and meet the Prince's Army with all the Forces he could raiſe; but (it ſeems) when they were all got together, they ſignified no more than what they had often done formerly; for it was told the King that ſome in the Army conſpired againſt him, whereupon he diſmiſſed his Forces, and ſo return'd to London.

So that whoever reads this Hiſtory, may perceive that this King through his own Cowardiſe or Ill Fortune, was conſtantly attended with ill ſucceſs where ever he went.

'Then Prince Edmund rode down to the Northumbers to Earl Vhtred, and all men thought they were about to raiſe another Army againſt King Cnute, but they went into Stæford, and Scrobbesbyrig, and Legaceſter ſcires, plundering in all places where they came; whilſt Cnute did the like in his Quarters, marching through Buckingahamſhire, and from thence into Bedafordſhire, and ſo through Huntingtonſhire over the Fens to Stanford, and from thence into Lincolneſcire, and afterwards into Nottinghamſhire, and ſo into Northumberland, towards Eoforwic (i.e. York); which when Vhtred had heard, he deſiſted from ſpoiling the Northern Parts; and ſo being compell'd through neceſſity, ſubmitted himſelf, together with all the Northumbers; and tho he gave Hoſtages, yet he was ſhortly after ſlain (by King Cnute's Orders), as was alſo Thurkytel the Son of Nafan (as Florence relates) by Thorebrand a certain Noble Dane; but, according to Malmesbury, it was done at the Command of Cnute himſelf.

'After this, Cnute appointed Tric to be Earl of the Northumbers, inſtead of Vhtred, and then returned Southward another way by the Weſtern Coaſts, ſo that his whole Army arrived at their Ships before

Anno Dom. MXVI.

'Eaſter; but Edmund Ætheling returned to London to his Father. 'After the Holidays King Cnute with all his Ships ſail'd towards London; but it happened that before the Daniſh Fleet arrived there, King 'Ethelred deceaſed on the Feaſt of St. George, after he had ſuffer'd many 'Afflictions and Miſeries in this life.] And was buried at St. Paul's in London.

This Prince has the Ill Character from William of Malmesbury, and the reſt of our Hiſtorians, of being given to Wine and Women; and that neglecting the Company of the Queen his Wife, he debaſed the Royal Majeſty by frequenting Miſtreſſes of mean Quality, which very much alienated his Conſort's Affections from him; though ſhe had two Children by him, viz. Elfred and Edward. He is alſo ſaid to have been Tyrannical to his own Subjects, taking away their Lives and Eſtates only for pretended Crimes. That he was alſo both Cowardly and Cruel, appears by that Barbarous Maſſacre of the Danes in time of Peace. But William of Malmesbury ſays it was a wretched and miſerable time; for every one was obliged to give up or murther his deareſt Gueſts; nay, thoſe whom a nearer Relation had yet render'd dearer to him. That this King was likewiſe Timerous and Unfortunate in all his Undertakings, appears through the whole courſe of his Reign; from whence he has the Title among our Engliſh Hiſtorians, of Ethelred the Unready, becauſe his Preparations were always either ill-tim'd or unſucceſsful; but as he was a mean-ſpirited Prince ſucceeding a Magnanimous Father, ſo Prince Edmund his Son and Succeſſor equall'd his Grandfather King Edgar in Courage, tho not in good Fortune.

But though King Ethelred was no Great or Worthy Prince in his own Perſon, yet with the Aſſiſtance of his Wites or Wiſe Men of his Great Council, he made divers excellent Laws and Conſtitutions. There are in Bromton's Chronicle four ſeveral Bodies of theſe Laws, made at as many ſeveral times, and in divers places, whereof there are only two extant among the Saxon Laws publiſhed by Mr. Lambard.

The Laws comprized in the firſt Diviſion are Six, there ſaid to have been made at Woodſtock in Mercia, for the reſtoration of Peace according to the Law of England.

The firſt is, That every Freeman ſhall find Sureties to be bound for him, that he ſhall do right in caſe he be accuſed.

The ſecond I ſhall omit, ſince it hath been already mentioned in the Laws of King Edgar; only the latter end of it is very remarkable; to wit, The Lord ſhall anſwer for his whole Family, and be Surety for the appearance of every Perſon in it. And if any of his Servants after they are accuſed, run away, the Lord or Maſter ſhall pay his man's Were to the King: And if the Maſter be accuſed as the Adviſer to, or Promoter of his Eſcape, he ſhall purge himſelf by five Thanes; and if he do it not, he ſhall pay to the King his Were, and his man ſhall be an Outlaw.

The Third ordains, That a Bondman being caſt by the Ordeal, ſhall be marked with a Hot Iron for the firſt Offence; and being caſt in the ſame manner the ſecond time, ſhall be put to Death. Which Law bears ſome reſemblance to our preſent Law or Cuſtom, whereby Clergy is allowed for the firſt Crime committed.

By the fifth the King's Reeve or Officer is obliged to require Sureties for the good behaviour of ſuch as are of ill fame amongſt all men; which which if ſuch a one obſtinately refuſes to give, he is to be put to death, and to be buried in an unhallowed place with Malefactors: And if any uſe force in his behalf to further his Eſcape, he is to undergo the ſame Puniſhment.

As for the next Set of Laws, they are ſaid to have been made at Veneting, or Wanating (now Wantage in Berkſhire), and for the increaſe of common Peace and Happineſs by King Ethelred and his Wiſe Men.

The firſt of them is concerning the keeping of the King's Peace, as it was in the days of his Predeceſſors, and for the puniſhment of the breach of it, in caſe of Manſlaughter: If it were in a Gemot or Aſſembly of five Boroughs, with the forfeiture of five Pounds weight in Silver: If in an Aſſembly of a Borough or Town, by a Mulct of Seven hundred (Shillings). [But how much this was, is not known; for we have not now any true account of the Standard of Money at that time.] If in a Wapentake, by One hundred; and if in an Ale-houſe a man be killed, with ſix half Marks; if he be not killed, with twelve Ores; for the Value of which, Vid. Sir Hen. Spelman's Gloſs.

From hence (but eſpecially from the Laws of King Ina) we may obſerve, how Ancient the Liquor of Ale, and Ale-houſes, have been in England, as alſo (what commonly follows it) quarrelling, and breaking of the Peace in ſuch places.

The fourth commands, That Publick Meetings be obſerved in every Hundred or Wapentake; and that Twelve Thanes, (ſays Bromton) or Twelve Men of free condition, (as Lambard reads it) being Elderly Men, together with their Præpoſitus (or Chief) ſhall ſwear upon the Goſpels or Holy Reliques, That they will neither condemn an Innocent Perſon, nor acquit a Guilty One.

From whence we may obſerve the Antiquity of Trials by a Grand Inqueſt of more than Twelve Men, even in the Engliſh Saxon times, and was not introduced by William the Conqueror, as Polydore Virgil, an Italian, not much skill'd in the Antiquities of this Iſland, hath delivered in his Hiſtory.

And to confirm what we have here ſaid, the Third Chapter of the League betwixt King Alfred, and Guthrun the Dane, very much maketh out, which orders, That if the King's Thane or Servant be accuſed of Homicide, he ſhall purge himſelf (if he dare) by twelve other Thanes: Which you may ſee at large in thoſe Laws themſelves; and beſides theſe the Reader throughout the whole Collection of Saxon Laws may obſerve, there is frequent mention made of clearing and purging by ſo many men ſummoned for that purpoſe, as ſometimes by twelve, ſometimes by fewer, and ſometimes by more.

As for the Trial by Ordeal, it grew more in requeſt in the Reign of King Cnute, and his Succeſſors, being indeed originally a Daniſh Cuſtom.

The reſt of the Laws of King Ethelred made at Wantage, having many of them relation to this way of Trial by Ordeal, and containing many obſcure terms, I omit. But ſince ſeveral of them may very well be referred to other former Laws, I ſhall only ſelect from amongſt them, ſuch as are moſt worthy to be taken notice of here.

The twenty third appoints what Cuſtom ſhould be paid by Ships and Veſſels of all ſorts that unladed at Billinggeſgate; from whence it appears that this was the Ancient Port of London, Wines and all other Commodities being here unladed.

F 2 The

Anno Dom. MXVI.

The twenty ſixth impoſes the ſame Puniſhment upon ſuch as wittingly receive, as well as on thoſe that make Bad Money.

Whereby we may obſerve, That though the Coining of Bad Money was not as yet made Treaſon, yet it was puniſhable at the King's diſcretion, either by Fine or Death, as you will ſee in the following Law.

The twenty eighth puts it into the King's power, whether to fine or put to death ſuch Merchants as import Counterfeit Money: And further impoſeth upon all Port-reeves that ſhall be acceſſary, the ſame Puniſhment as upon thoſe that coin falſe Money, except the King think fit to pardon them.

There are alſo other Laws which we cannot certainly affirm to have been made in his time, though the general Conjecture is that they were. Theſe are compriſed in an Agreement or Act which the Wiſe Men of England and the Counſellors of Wales made, concerning the Inhabitants of the Mountains of that Countrey: But as for the particular Laws made in this Common-Council of both Nations, ſince they only concern Cattel or other Goods taken away on either ſide, or elſe the manner of giving Teſtimony both by Welſh and Engliſh Witneſſes in ſuch caſes, I refer the Reader to the Laws themſelves; and ſhall only deſire him to take notice, That Juſtice was to be equally adminiſtred by Twelve Judges, Six Welſh and Six Engliſh men, much after the ſame manner as the Commiſſion for the Borders of England and Scotland is now executed.

But that we may ſee how great a diſtance there was then between theſe two Nations (which, God be thanked, are now united into one) the ſixth Article of theſe Laws expreſly forbids the Welſh to come into England, or the Engliſh to enter Wales, except received at either Bank by the Borderers, who ſhall take care for their ſafe conduct and return: And in caſe any Borderer be accuſed of falſe dealing herein, and cannot by witneſs diſprove it, he ſhould be fined.

King EDMUND, ſirnamed Ironſide.

AFter the Death of King Ethelred, all the Wiſe and Great Men who were then at London, together with the Citizens of that place, elected Eadmund the Eldeſt Son of that King to reign over them, who held it but a ſhort time, and that with great ifficulty. William of Malmesbury ſays he was born of a Woman whoſe ame ~~he did not know~~; but * Ethelred Abbot de Rievallis, ſaith ſhe was he only Daughter of Toret a Noble Earl, whom the Chronicle of John f Wallingford calls Ethelred's firſt Wife; But Mat. Weſtminſter relates therwiſe, that he was not born of Queen Emma, who was his only Wiſe, but of a certain Ignoble Woman; yet beſides the Obſcurity of is Birth, he was a Man without all exception, both for Strength of Body nd Mind, and therefore called by the Engliſh, Ironſide. He would ave made amends both for his Father's Cowardiſe, and his Mother's want of Birth, had he been but allowed ſome longer time to have lived. So that it appears by theſe Authors, that this King Edmund was born of a Concubine.

But to come to our Hiſtory: When King Edmund was thus declared King at London (as Simeon of Durham tells us) with great Acclamations of Joy, he alſo relates, That many of the Biſhops, Abbots, and Noblemen of England coming to Southampton, abjuring the Progeny of King Ethelred, at the ſame time choſe Cnute for their King; who (according to our Annals) 'immediately came with his Fleet to Grenawic, 'about Lent, and within a ſhort time after marched up to London, where 'they dug a great Trench on the South-ſide of the River, and drew 'their Ships to the Weſt ſide of the Bridge, and beſieged the City, inſo'much that none could go in or out, making ſuch frequent Aſſaults upon 'it; yet the Citizens reſiſted them vigorouſly: But King Eadmund was 'marched out before into Weſt-Saxony, where all that Nation willingly 'ſubmitted themſelves to him. Not long after, he fought with the 'Danes at Peonnan (now Pen) near Gillingam (in Somerſetſhire.)

Anno Dom. MXVI.

But Cnute not being there, they do not tell us who commanded in his ſtead, for he was then with his Fleet at the Siege of London.

'After Midſummer King Eadmund fought another Battel at Sceorſtan (which place is ſuppoſed to be a Stone that now parts the four Counties of Oxfordſhire, Glouceſterſhire, Worceſterſhire, and Warwickſhire): But our Annals do not mention who had the Victory; only, 'That there 'were many kill'd on both ſides, and that the two Armies marched off 'from each other of their own accord; for Eadric the Ealdorman, and 'Ælmer, then ~~joined with~~ the Danes againſt King Edmund.

secretly combined ~~privately assist~~ with & agree

But as William of Malmesbury tells us, Eadric the Traytor was the cauſe of the King's Soldiers running away; for holding up his Sword dipped in the Blood of ſome mean perſon, (or as Simeon ſays, his Head, which was very like King Edmund's) whom he had newly killed, he cried out to the Engliſh, to fly, for their King was dead: Yet R. Hoveden adds, That the Fight was very bloody, and both Parties were forced to leave off, being quite tired.

Our

Anno Dom. MXVI.

Our Annals do then thus proceed, That King Edmund having gathered an Army the third time, march'd to London, and raiſed the Siege, driving the Danes to their Ships, and within two days after the King paſſed over at Brentford, and there fought the Danes, and put them to flight; but many of the Engliſh were drown'd by their own negligence, as they ran before the Army, being greedy of ſpoil.

‘ After this the King marched down toward the Weſt-Saxons, and there reinforced his Army; whilſt in the mean time the Daniſh Forces returned to London, and beſieged that City, aſſaulting it both by Land and Water, but God at that time alſo delivered it; whereupon the Danes departed from London with their Ships into Arwan, and there landing marched up into Mercia, killing and burning all they met with, according to their old cuſtom, and there furniſhed themſelves with Proviſions, and then drew all their Ships with their Spoil up the Medway.

But where this Arwan abovementioned lay, is very uncertain; That it could not be the River Arrow in Warwickſhire (as ſome fancy) is plain, that being no where Navigable: Therefore the Ingenious Editor of theſe Annals, in the explication of the Proper Names of Places at the end of the Book, does very probably gueſs, that this River was either that which we now call Orwell, which divides Eſſex from Suffolk; or elſe that there is an Error in the Saxon Copy, and inſtead of into Arwan, it ſhould be read to Waran, that is, they went up the River Lee as far as Ware: But this I leave to the Reader's Judgment, and ſhall again return to the Annals themſelves.

‘ Then King Eadmund aſſembled the whole Engliſh Nation a fourth time, and paſſed the Thames again at Brentford, and from thence went into Kent, and there put the Daniſh Horſe to flight in Seapige, and killed as many of them as they could meet with: But Eadric the Ealdorman by his ſubtle Artifices perſuaded the King to ſtay at Æglesford, which was the moſt perfidious advice that could be given him.

Florence of Worceſter, and William of Malmesbury are more particular in this Tranſaction; and ſay, That the Traitorous Earl above-mentioned ſo over-perſuaded the King by his plauſible Inſinuations, that he did not purſue the Danes, when almoſt routed, or elſe he might have obtained an abſolute Victory.

‘ Then (according to our Annals) the Danes turned againſt the Weſt-Saxons, and marched into Mercia, killing all before them; but when the King underſtood that the Danes were gone thither, he drew all the Engliſh Forces together the fifth time, and following them himſelf in the Rear, overtook them near a Hill called Aſſandun (now Aſhdown in Eſſex), where they had a very ſharp Engagement; but there Eadric the Ealdorman playing his old pranks, firſt of all began the flight with the Mageſætons, by Cambden ſuppoſed to be the Radnorſhire men; and ſo once more deceived his Natural Lord, and the whole Nation.

But here, though I cannot but admire the wonderful Courage and Conſtancy of this Brave Prince, yet can I not commend his Prudence, who could thus truſt a known Traytor, that had not only betrayed himſelf, but his Father before him: But I need make no long reflections upon this, ſince we find few Princes guilty of the like Eaſineſs in later Ages.

Anno Dom. MXVI.

‘ But this is certain from our Annals, That Cnute now obtained the ‘Victory againſt the greateſt part of the Engliſh Nation; and there ‘were ſlain on the ſpot Eadnoth the Biſhop, and Wilſſige the Abbot, Ælfric ‘and Godwin the Ealdormen, and Wulfkytel Earl of Eaſt-England, and ‘moſt of the Engliſh Nobility.

William of Malmesbury highly commends this Wulfkytel, and ſays that he deſerved perpetual Honour, becauſe he was the firſt in the time of Sweyn, who ſet upon the Daniſh Pyrates, and gave ſome hopes that they might be conquered. But as for Eadnoth Biſhop of Lincoln, and the Abbot above-mentioned, they came not to fight, but as Simeon ſays, to pray to God for thoſe that did; ſo that the Engliſh Nation never yet received a greater Blow.

But King Edmund being left almoſt alone, got to Glouceſter, and there rallied and recruited his ſhatter'd Troops; but thither (according to our Annals) ‘King Cnute with all his Army purſued him: Then Eadric ‘the Ealdorman, and all the Great Men on both ſides adviſed the Two ‘Kings to come to Terms of Peace: Whereupon they both met toge- ‘ther at Olanege (an Iſland in the River Severn, now called the Eighth) ‘and there concluded a League between them (Hoſtages and Oaths ‘being mutually exchanged) and agreed, That the Daniſh Army ‘ſhould be paid.

A Peace being thus concluded, the two Kings parted from each other, Edmund going into Weſt-Saxony, and Cnute to the Mercians.

But ſince other Authors have more particularly related the Cauſe and Manner of making this Peace, I ſhall give you a larger account of it from Simeon of Durham, and R. Hoveden; the firſt of whom ſays, That the Traytor Edric and ſome others, when King Edmund would have fought again with Cnute, would by no means ſuffer him to do it; but adviſed him rather to make a Peace, and divide the Kingdom with him; to whoſe Perſuaſions the King at laſt (though unwillingly) conſented; and Meſſengers paſſing between them, and Hoſtages being interchanged, the two Kings (or rather, their Commiſſioners, as Bromton's Chronicle relates it) met at a place called Deorhurſt, on the Severne, and there concluded a Truce. Then King Edmund with his men being on the Weſt ſide of Severne, and Cnute with his Followers ſitting down on the Eaſt ſide thereof, they paſſed over in Ferry-boats to the Iſland above-mentioned, where they met, and agreed upon the Terms of Peace.

But Ethelred Abbot of Rieval, tells the Story ſomewhat different, viz. That both Armies growing weary of the War at laſt, compelled the Great Men on each ſide to come to a Conference, where one of the moſt Elderly among them is brought in making a long Speech, (I ſuppoſe to ſhew the Wit of thoſe Authors); and therein he very pathe- “tically repreſents the Miſchiefs the Soldiers lay under, in thus expoſing “their Lives and Fortunes for Two Princes of equal Courage; and ſo “adviſed them before it was too late, That ſince King Edmund could not “endure a Superior, nor Cnute an Equal, they ſhould leave it to them “two to fight by themſelves for that Crown which they both ſo much “deſired to wear; leſt by this deſperate way of fighting, the Soldiers “ſhould be all kill'd, and then there would be none left to defend the “Nation againſt Foreign Invaders. Which Speech being highly approved of by all there preſent, both Armies cried out with one voice, Anno Dom. MXVI. Let them either Fight, or Agree: This Sentence of the Chief Commanders and Soldiers being brought to both the Kings, pleaſed them ſ well, that they met in the Iſland above-mentioned, and there fough ſingly in the ſight of both Armies; where having broken their Spears and then drawn their Swords, there follows in theſe Authors a long an Tragical Relation of this mighty Combat, which yet it ſeems happene without any Wounds on either ſide; but Cnute beginning at laſt to b out of breath, and fearing the greater Strength and Youth of King Edmund, propoſed a Peace to be made by diviſion of the Kingdom betwee them; and they give us alſo the fine Speech made by King Cnute upo this Subject; which Propoſal being willingly received by King Edmun they kiſſed and embraced each other, both Armies wondering and weeping for joy at this ſo happy and unexpected agreement. So mutuall changing both their Arms and Apparrel in token of Friendſhip, the each return'd to their own men, and there drew up the Conditions o the League; viz. That King Edmund ſhould enjoy Weſt-Saxony, an Cnute the Kingdom of Mercia; but what was to become of the reſt o England, they do not ſpeak one word.

But tho ſo many of our Writers ſeem pleas'd with this Romantic Story, yet I rather aſſent to the Teſtimony of our Annals, and the Encomium Emmæ, as alſo William of Malmesbury, Florence of Worceſter, and ſevera Manuſcript Authors in the Cottonian Library, who all agree this Peac to have been made at the place aforeſaid, without any Combat at all between the two Kings: Only William of Malmesbury relates, that whe King Edmund had challenged Cnute to fight with him ſingle, to ſave th further Effuſion of their Subjects Blood, this Challenge being carried t King Cnute, he utterly declined it, ſaying, Though he had as great Courage as his Antagoniſt, yet he would not venture his own ſma Body againſt a man of ſo great Strength and Stature; but ſince bot their Fathers had enjoyed a ſhare of the Kingdom, it was more agreeable to prudence to divide it between them: Which Propoſal being joyfully received by both Armies, as a thing moſt juſt and equal in it ſel and which moſt tended to the good of both Nations, now haraſs'd ou by long and cruel Wars, King Edmund accepted of, and agreed (thoug with ſome reluctancy) to a Peace, upon the terms above-mentione Thus we find what a great uncertainty there is in moſt of the Relatio of thoſe times. But to proceed with our Annals:

'The Danes as ſoon as this Peace was concluded, went to their Shi
'with all the Plunder they had taken, and from thence ſail'd to Londo
'and there took up their Winter-Quarters.

For that City, as being part of the Mercian Kingdom, had now ſubmitted it ſelf to them.

'Not long after this, viz. at the Feaſt of St. Andrew, King Eadmu
'departed this life, and was buried with his Grandfather King Eadg
'at Glæſtingabyrig. The ſame year alſo deceaſed Wulfgar in Abbandun
'whereof he was Abbot, and Æthelſige ſucceeded him.

But ſince our Annals tell us only of the ſudden Death of this Princ without relating the manner of it, we ſhall give it you more at larg from other Authors, who almoſt generally agree, that he was murthere by that Traytor Edric, though they differ ſomewhat in the Actors or Inſtruments by whom it was committed; ſome will have him to be take off by Poyſon; others, with an Arrow ſhot by an Image made on pu poſe, which diſcharged it ſelf upon the King as ſoon as he touched it; but this is too improbable to beget any credit: And therefore what William of Malmesbury, and Bromton, relate, is moſt likely to be true, viz. That this Ædric above-mentioned ſuborned two of this King's Servants to lye under the Houſe-of-Office, and to thruſt up a ſharp piece of Iron into his Fundament, as one night he ſate down to eaſe himſelf. Tho the Chronicle laſt-mentioned ſays this Murther was committed at Oxford by one of Edric's Sons, who at the command of his Father ſtabbed him in the Hinder Parts with a long ſharp Knife, and left the Weapon ſticking in his Body. But H. Huntington, and Alred Abbot of Rievalle, ſay that Edric was the firſt who ſaluted Cnute Sole King of all England; to whom when he had told all the matter, the King anſwer'd, Well, for ſo great a Good Turn, I will advance thy Head above all the Lords in England; and thereupon commanding him to be beheaded, order'd his Head to be ſet upon the Tower of London: But this being related by no other Author beſides Mat. Weſtminſter, is not probable; for all others make him to have been alive ſome time after this. But Simeon of Durham and R. Hoveden; do with greater certainty relate, That as ſoon as he received the News of Edmund's Death, he order'd all the Biſhops, Ealdormen, and Chief Men throughout England, to be ſummoned to London, and when they appeared before him, he cunningly asked them, If they were Witneſſes of the Agreement which had been made between him and King Edmund, concerning the Diviſion of the Kingdom; and whether there was any Condition inſerted, That either his Sons or his Brethren ſhould ſucceed him in the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons? Then they all began with one accord to ſay, They did not know that King Edmund had left any part of the Kingdom to his Brethren, either living or dying; but as for his Sons, they knew very well that Edmund would have left him to be the Protector of his Children, till they ſhould come of fitting age to reign: But they likewiſe add, that they bore falſe witneſs, and lied groſly, becauſe they hop'd to make King Cnute the more favourable to them, and ſhould thereby receive the greater Rewards for their pains: But ſome of them had a juſt Recompence for their Perjury, by being not long after put to death. Hereupon King Cnute after he had thus taken their Teſtimonies, received the Oaths of Fidelity from the ſaid Great Men and Biſhops, who all ſwore that they would chuſe him for their King, and willingly raiſe Taxes to pay his Army; and at the ſame time alſo they renounced the Sons of King Edmund, (Edward and Edmund) from ever being Kings of this Nation.

Alfred Edmund
and Edward.

But King Cnute growing jealous of theſe Young Princes, ſent them to the King of Sweden, that they might by him be made away; which he out of compaſſion not only refuſed, but generouſly ſent them to Solomon King of Hungary, to be educated; and being there kindly received for ſome time, Edmund the elder of them died, but Edward the younger marrying Agatha the Queen's Siſter, had by her Edgar, ſirnamed Ætheling, Chriſtina a Nun, and Margaret, afterwards married to Malcolme King of Scotland; of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak further, before we come to the end of this Book.

King CNUTE.

Anno Dom. MXVII.

'THis year (according to our Annals) Cnute King of Denmark 'began to reign over all England, which he divided into four 'Parts or Governments, reſerving Weſt Saxony to himſelf, 'committing Eaſt-England to Earl Thurkyl, Mercia to 'Eadric, and the Northumbers to Tric; but not long after, the ſaid Eadric 'the Ealdorman was killed: The manner of which Bromton's Chronicle thus relates, That at Chriſtmaſs the King being at London, in a certain upper room on the other ſide of the Thames, it happened that the Traytor Eadric upbraided the King with his ſervices, How that for his ſake he had betrayed King Ethelred, and alſo made away Edmund his own King, and yet he had received no very extraordinary advantage or benefit thereby, according to his Merits, (to be ſure, as he himſelf thought); at which Cnute being highly enraged, anſwered, Out of thy own mouth ſhalt thou be judged, who plainly confeſſeſt thy ſelf a Traytor againſt both thy former Kings, therefore thou ſhalt certainly dye: So he immediately commanded him to be tied hand and foot, and flung out of the Window into the River; though ſome other Authors relate that he was firſt ſtrangled: But we cannot find for certain which way it was done; for William of Malmesbury and R. Hoveden only ſay this, That the King commanded Eadric, ſirnamed Streon, to be ſlain in the Palace, becauſe he was afraid of being circumvented by his Treacheries; and ordered likewiſe his Body to be flung over the Wall of the City, and there to lye unburied.

The Annals do here further add, 'That Northman Son to Earl Leofwin, 'and Æthelward Son to Æthelmær the Great, and Brihtric Son to Ælfger Earl of Defenanſcire, were alſo put to death; but their Crimes are not ſet down: Therefore R. Hoveden ſuppoſes them to have been only the King's Jealouſy of their too great Power, being all Engliſh Noblemen, though I ſuſpect they were guilty of ſomewhat more than what we find related.

'The ſame year alſo the King baniſhed Eadwig Ætheling, called 'Ceorles Cyng, (i.e. King of the Clowns) Brother to King Eadmund. But the Annals ſeem to make this Eadwig two perſons, though for what reaſon I know not; but however he was not immediately baniſhed after Cnute came to the Crown, as ſome Writers ſuppoſe; neither yet was he put to death, as Simeon of Durham, and Bromton, relate; for the latter tells us this Story of him, That Cnute not thinking himſelf ſafe ſo long as Edwig was alive, conſulted with Earl Eadric how to have him diſpatched out of the way; by whoſe advice the King ſent for one Ethelward, and tempted him privately with large Rewards; but he abhorring in his heart ſo foul a deed, however promiſed to do it as ſoon as he found a fitting opportunity, and by this means ſtill deferred it. But then the ſame Author adds, That having by the ſaid Eadric's Counſel baniſhed Prince Edwin, the year following, under a feign'd Reconciliation, he was by King Cnute's Order made away; which is contrary to what

William of Malmesbury relates ; for he ſays that this Prince, having been long toſſed about both by Sea and Land, and being broken as well in Body as in Mind, ſecretly return'd into England, and lay conceal'd till he died, and then was buried at Taviſtock.

But the Annals further ſay, 'That before the Kal. of Auguſt, the King commanded Queen Emma, Widow of the late King, his Predeceſſor, to be brought over to him, and ſome time after took her for his Conſort.

Ethelred

This he did to gain the Friendſhip of the Duke of Normandy her Father; but ſhe is highly cenſured for marrying the ſworn Enemy of her Husband and her Children: Though this only lets us ſee that it is no new thing for Princes to prefer the wearing of a Crown even before their own Honour.

Anno Dom. MXVIII.

'Now again (according to our Annals) was paid that Tax or Tribute called Danegelt, throughout all the Engliſh Nation, to wit, Seventy two thouſand Pounds ; beſides that which the Citizens of London paid, viz. Eleven thouſand Pounds more. Which Tax being raiſed when there ſeemed to be no more fear of the Danes, it looks as if King Cnute now took upon him to govern as a Conqueror. From which alſo you may obſerve the flouriſhing Trade and Wealth of that City in thoſe days, ſince it could even at that time pay above a Seventh of this exceſſive Taxation.

'Then alſo a great part of the Daniſh Army return'd into Denmark, and only forty Ships remain'd with King Cnute; the Danes and Engliſh were likewiſe now reconciled and united at Oxnaford: Bromton ſays it was done at a Great Council or Parliament at Oxford, where King Cnute ordained the Laws of King Edgar (i. e. of England) to be obſerved.

'The ſame year alſo Æthelſige, Abbot of Abbandune deceaſed, and Æthelwin ſucceeded him.

Anno Dom. MXIX.

'This year King Cnute returned into Denmark, and there ſtayed all the Winter. Bromton's Chronicle ſays he went over to ſubdue the Vandals, who then made War againſt him, and carried along with him an Army both of Engliſh and Danes ; the former being commanded by Earl Godwin, ſet upon the Enemies by ſurprize, and put them to flight ; after which the King had the Engliſh in as much eſteem as his own Daniſh Subjects. But the year following,

Anno Dom. MXX.

'He returned into England, and then held a Mycel Gemot, or Great Council at Cyrenceſter, where Ethelward the Ealdorman was outlaw'd. The ſame year alſo King Cnute went to Aſſandune (the place where he had before fought the great Battel with King Edmund) and there cauſed a Church to be built of Lime and Stone for the ſouls of thoſe men that had been ſlain there : Which being (as R. Hoveden relates) conſecrated in the King's preſence by Wulſtan Archbiſhop of York, and divers other Biſhops, was committed to the care of his Chaplain, whoſe Name was Stigand.

'Alſo Archbiſhop Living deceaſed, and Ethelnoth a Monk and Dean of Canterbury, was conſecrated Biſhop by Wulſtan Archbiſhop of York.

But before we proceed farther, I will give you ſome account of the Affairs of Wales in theſe times: Where after the death of Kynan, or Conan, the Uſurping Prince of South-Wales above-mentioned, Lewelyn Prince of North-Wales had, according to Caradoc's Chronicle, poſſeſſed himſelf of South-Wales, and had for ſome years governed both thoſe Countries with great Peace and Proſperity, ſo that from the North to the South Sea, there was not a Beggar in the whole Countrey, but every man had ſufficient to live of his own, inſomuch that the Countrey grew daily more and more populous.

But this year produced a notable Impoſtor; for a certain Scot of mean Birth came now into South-Wales, and called himſelf Run, or Reyn, (as the Manuſcript Copies have it) the Son of Meredyth ap Owen, late Prince of Wales, as you have already heard: Upon which the Nobility of that Countrey, who loved not Lewelyn, ſet up this Run, or Reyn, to be their Prince; But Lewelyn hearing of it, aſſembled all the Forces of North-Wales, and marched againſt this Run, who had now alſo got all the ſtrength of South-Wales together; and going as far as Abergwily (i.e. the mouth of the River Gwily) there waited the coming of Lewelyn; but when he arrived, and both Armies were ready to join Battel, Run, full of outward confidence, encouraged his men to fight; yet no ſooner was the Battel begun, but this Impoſtor ſoon diſcovered what he was, by withdrawing himſelf privily out of the fight; whereas on the contrary, Lewelyn like a Couragious Prince ſtanding in the Head of his Army, called out aloud for this baſe Scot, Run, who durſt ſo belye the Blood of the Britiſh Princes: Both Armies then meeting, fought for a while with great Courage, and Malice to each other; but it ſeems the South-Wales men being not ſo reſolute in the Quarrel of this Impoſtor, as thoſe of North-Wales were to defend the Right of their Lawful Prince; the latter being alſo encouraged by the Speeches and Prowes of their Prince, put the former to the Rout, and purſued this Run ſo cloſely, that he had much ado to eſcape; Prince Lewelyn having got thus a great deal of Spoil, return'd home, and for a ſhort time govern'd theſe Countries in Peace. But to return to our Annals;

Anno Dom. MXXI. 8

'This year, about Martinmaſs, King Cnute outlaw'd (i.e. baniſhed) 'Earl Thurkyl:] But they tell us not the Crime. ~~Yet~~ William of Malmesbury makes it a Judgment, for being the principal Promoter of the Murther of Archbiſhop Ælfeage; and that as ſoon as he return'd ~~into~~ Denmark, he was killed by ſome Noblemen of that Nation.

This year alſo, (according to an Old Manuſcript belonging to St. Edmundsbury, ~~and~~ cited by the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke, in the Preface to the 9th Book of his Reports), King Cnute held a Parliament at Wincheſter, wherein were preſent the two Archbiſhops, and all the other Biſhops, as alſo many Ealdormen and Earls, with divers Abbots, together with a great many Knights, and a vaſt multitude of People; and there, in purſuance of the King's deſires, it was decreed, That the Monaſtery of St. Edmund the King ſhould be free and for ever exempt from all Juriſdiction of the Biſhops and Earls of that Country.

But Sir H. Spelman here very well obſerves, that this Manuſcript could be no Ancienter than the Reign of Henry the Third, becauſe th word Parliament was not in uſe before that time.

Though thus much is certain, That King Cnute the year before founded this Monaſtery, afterwards called St. Edmundsbury, (but then known to the Saxons by the name of Beadricheſworth) where there had been Church built before; and King Edward the Elder, in the year 942, ha alſo given ſeveral Lands to it, and upon which Foundation King Cnu had lately built and endowed the ſaid Abby, which was one of the La geſt and Richeſt in all England.

Lewelyn ap Sitſylt, Prince of Wales, but a ſhort time enjoyed the fruits of his late Victory; for this year the Welſh Chronicles tell us, he was ſlain by Howel and Meredyth, the Sons of Prince Edwin, or Owen, above-mentioned, who yet did not ſucceed in the Principality; for Jago, Son to Edwal late Prince of Wales, was now advanced to the Throne as Lawful Heir, having been long debarr'd of his Right: But it ſeems he could not do the like in South-Wales, which one Rytheric ap Juſtin ſeiz'd upon, and held by force.

Anno Dom. MXXII.

'This year King Cnute ſail'd with his Fleet to the Iſle of Wight; (but upon what account, our Annals do not ſhew us) Alſo Archbiſhop Æthelnoth went to Rome, and was there received by Pope Benedict with great Honour, who put on his Pall with his own hands, and being ſo habited, celebrated Maſs, as the Pope commanded him; and then after he had dined with him, return'd home with his Benediction.

'Alſo Leofwin the Abbot, who had been unjuſtly expell'd from the Monaſtery of Elig, was his Companion, and there cleared himſelf of thoſe Crimes of which he had been accuſed, before the Pope: the Archbiſhop and all the Company that were there preſent, teſtifying on his behalf.

Anno Dom. MXXIII.

'Wulſtan Archbiſhop of York deceaſed, and Ælfric ſucceeded, Edelnoth the Archbiſhop conſecrating him at Canterbury. Alſo this year the ſame Archbiſhop tranſlated the Reliques of St. Ælfeage (his Predeceſſor) from London to Canterbury.

The King himſelf, as William of Malmesbury tells us, removed them with his own hands, paying them all due Veneration; and further adds, that his Body remain'd as uncorrupt as if he had been but lately kill'd.

Anno Dom. MXXIV.

'Richard the Second, Duke of Normandy died, and Richard his Son ruled after him one year; and then Rodbert his Brother ſucceeded him, and ruled eight years.

Anno Dom. MXXV.

'This year King Cnute ſail'd with his Fleet into Denmark, to a Plain near the Holy River, but where that was, I know not; and there came againſt him Wulf and Eglaf, with a very powerful Army out of Sweden both by Land and Sea; and many on King Cnute's ſide were there killed, both Danes and Engliſh, the Swedes keeping the field of Battel. After which Cnute returning into England, I find no mention made of any Action here in any Author, for the two ſucceeding years. But then,

Anno Dom. MXXVIII.

'King Cnute ſail'd with fifty Ships of Engliſh Thanes into Norway, and drove King Olaf out of that Countrey, and conquer'd it for himſelf.

Bromton's Chronicle relates, That this Olaf being a Soft and Eaſy Prince, was already in a manner driven out by his own Subjects; and ſo Cnute only went as it were to receive the Kingdom from the Nobility and People, who ſubmitted themſelves preſently to him.

Anno Dom. MXXIX.

'King Cnute came back into England.] And (as R. Hoveden adds) upon his Return baniſhed Hacun a Daniſh Earl, that had married his Niece Gunhilda, who was his Siſter's Daughter, ſending him away under pretence of an Embaſſy; for the King was afraid leſt otherwiſe he might deprive him both of his Kingdom and Life.

'King Olaf return'd ~~again~~ into Norway, to regain his Right; but the 'People riſing up againſt him, he was there ſlain.

This is he who was afterwards canoniz'd under the Title of King Olaf the Martyr.

About this time (as Guil. Gemeticenſis, and John of Walingford, do both relate) Robert Duke of Normandy pitying the long Exile of his Nephews Edward and Alfred, ſent Ambaſſadors to King Cnute, requiring him to reſtore them to their Right; but he not at all valuing his threatning, ſent the Ambaſſadors back with a Repulſe; whereat the Duke conceiving great indignation, aſſembled his Nobles, and by their Advice caus'd a great Navy to be prepar'd, which in a ſhort time came to Anchor at Feſcam; then the Duke with his Army put to Sea, but by Tempeſt was driven into the Iſle of Guernſey, and ſo ſhatter'd, that he was forced to return home, where they were detain'd a long time by contrary Winds, which was an extreme mortification to him.

But not long after, Ambaſſadors came over to him from King Cnute, ſignifying, That he was contented to reſign to the Young Princes half the Kingdom, which they ſhould peaceably enjoy during his life, (and that was not like to be long) for he then laboured under a languiſhing Diſtemper: Wherefore the Duke thought good for ſome time to defer his Expedition till he ſhould be come back from Jeruſalem, whither he had vowed to undertake a Pilgrimage. And when he had recommended to Robert Archbiſhop of Rouen, and other Nobles, his Son William, then a Child of Seven Years old, and received from them Aſſurances of their Fidelity to him, he began the ſaid Voyage; and having perform'd it, as he was returning homewards the next year, he fell ſick, and died about the Alpes. But of this William his Son, by Harlotte his Concubine, he not only ſucceeded his Father, but was alſo afterwards King of England; as you ſhall hear when we come to his Reign. in the enſuing

'This year, as ſoon as King Cnute return'd into England, he gave 'the Port of Sandwic to Chriſt's Church in Canterbury, with all the Iſſues 'and Profits ariſing from thence on both ſides the Haven, according to an Extract from his Charter (preſerved among the * Evidences of that Church); and that as far as, when the Tide of Flood was higheſt, and a Ship lying near the Shore, a man could from thence caſt a little Axe on land, ſo far the Chriſt-Church Officers ſhould receive all Rights and Dues.

This year alſo, according to † Monaſt. Angl. King Cnute founded another Monaſtery for Benedictines in Norfolk, which from its being ſeated in a Woody Place, was called St. Ben.. t's in Holme; the Lands and Scite of which Abby being by King Henry the VIIIth, after the Diſſolution of Monaſteries, exchanged with the Biſhop of Norwich for other Lands; he is the only Biſhop of England who has ſtill the Title of an Abbot.

But when Olave and Onund heard that King Cnute was gone home, they [illegible] in the Autumn proposed to stay in the field & carry on the war during the winter, but the Swedes would by no means agree to this, but fearing the sharpnesse of the winter season returned home, leaving King Olave and his fleet (C.CLXXVI) But whilst he lay at the lake of [illegible] King Cnute took an opportunity by sending to corrupt many of the Norwegian noblemen about King Olave with great presents and promises brought them over to his [illegible] C.CLXXVII [illegible] King [illegible] discovered [illegible] [illegible] too late for [illegible] [illegible] he marched away with a small [illegible] over the [illegible] Norway to Sweden till he arrived at [illegible] where he passed the winter [illegible] But in the mean time King Cnute's [illegible] [illegible] he sent [illegible] privately with great summe of money who corrupted more and bought many of the Norwegian nobility so that the greater part of the Norwegians promised not to fight for King Cnute against Olave who for his great rigidnesse & severity in forcing them to the Christian faith was not at all beloved: so that not thinking himself safe long [illegible] farther into the uplands where Olave finding divers noblemen had been corrupted by [illegible] put them to death: (C.LXXVIII) In the mean time it being told in Norway that [illegible] raising a great army to conquer Norway, the Norwegians being afraid many of them [illegible]

King Cnute having performed theſe great Deeds of Charity and Devotion, not long after (in the ſame year, as our Annals inform us) began his Journey to Rome.

But ſince our Annals do not tell us what he did there, I ſhall give it you in ſhort from his own Letter, as I find it in William of Malmesbury, which upon his return from Rome, he wrote and ſent into England, by Living Abbot of Taviſtock ; and begins thus :

"Cnute, King of Denmark, Norway, and all Swedeland, to Ailnoth (or "Egelnoth, the Metropolitan), and to Alfric of York, with all the Biſhops and Primates, and to the whole Engliſh Nation, as well Noblemen as Plebeians, Health : Wherein he gives an account of his Journey, as alſo the reaſon of his undertaking it ; then how honourably "he was received at Rome, and what he had there negotiated for the "benefit of his Subjects : Then he gives Directions and Commands to "his Officers to do all Juſtice and Right to the People in his Abſence, "a thing which he reſolved on (as he ſays) long before, but never "could till now accompliſh what he had deſigned for the Pardon of his "Sins and the Safety of all his Subjects ; he further ſignifies, that he "was received by all the Princes, who at that time were with Pope John, "ſolemnizing the Feaſt of Eaſter, with extraordinary Reſpect and Honour, but eſpecially by Conrade the German Emperor ; that he had dealt "with them all about the concernments of his people both Engliſh and "Danes, that their Paſſage to Rome might be more free and open ; and "had obtained, that as well Merchants as others ſhould with all ſafety "paſs and repaſs without any Toll or Impoſition : He had alſo complained to the Pope, that his Archbiſhops paid vaſt Sums of Money "before they could obtain their Palls, which Grievance was by the "Pope's Decree taken off. All theſe Immunities procured from the "Pope, the Emperor, Rodolph King of France, and all other Princes "throughout whoſe Territories he travelled, were confirmed by Oath, "under the Teſtimonies of Four Archbiſhops, and Twenty Biſhops, "with an innumerable Company of Dukes and other Noblemen there "preſent. Then follows a Thankſgiving to Almighty God, for giving "him ſuch Succeſs in what he had undertaken. After this, he deſires "it might be publiſhed to all the world, that having devoted his Life to "God's ſervice, he reſolved to govern the People ſubject to him in all "Piety, Juſtice, and Equity ; And in caſe any thing blameworthy had "been done by him in his Youth, by the help of God he was now "ready to make full amends for it. Therefore he charges all his Miniſters whatſoever, as well Sheriffs as others, That for fear of him they "ſhould not pervert Juſtice, becauſe there was no neceſſity that Money "ſhould be raiſed by any unjuſt exactions. And at laſt, after great "Aſſeverations how much he ſtudied the Profit and Conveniency of his "People, he adjures all his Miniſters before he arrived in England that "they ſhould procure all Dues to be paid according to the ancient Cuſtom ; as the Alms of the Plow, the Tythes of all Cattel brought forth "in the ſame year, Peter-Pence in Auguſt, with the Tythes of Corn, "and at Martinmaſs the Firſt fruits of the ſame, called Curceſcot, or

" Cyrceſcot (i.e. Money given to the Church); in caſe this was not paid " before his Return, he threatens ſeverely to animadvert upon every one " according to the Laws.

William of Malmesbury further adds, That at his Return he was as good as his word; for he commanded all the Laws which had been made by former Engliſh Kings, and chiefly by Ethelred his Predeceſſor, " to be obſerved under great Penalties; for the true obſervation where- " of, our Kings (ſays he) are at this very day ſworn under the name " of the Good Laws of King Edward; not that he only ordain'd them, " but becauſe he obſerved them.

So that from hence we may take notice, That Kings who have the leaſt of Hereditary Title, if they mean to reign happily, ought in Policy, as well as Conſcience, to obſerve the Laws of that Kingdom to which they have been advanced without any Right of Blood.

C. S

I suppose he means Macbeth

But to return again to our Annals; they further tell us, 'That upon 'the King's return from Rome (where it ſeems he ſtaid not long ~~after~~) 'he marched into Scotland, and there King Malcolm became ſubject to 'him, with two other Kings (of the Iſles) called Mælbæth and 'Jehmarc. — as is related by Henry of Hunting

'The ſame year alſo Robert Earl of Normandy went to Jeruſalem, and 'there died; and William who was afterwards King of England, began 'to reign, being an Infant.

From whence we may plainly ſee, that the Cottonian Copy of theſe Annals was wrote in the form we have them, after the Conqueſt; and though the other Copies do not expreſly call him King of England, yet they give him the Title of King William, which is all one.

About this time (as the Welſh Chronicles relate) the Iriſh Scots invaded South-Wales, by the means of Howel and Meredyth, the Sons of Edwin above-mentioned, who hired them againſt Rythaerch ap Jeſtyn, the Uſurping Prince of that Countrey, whom by the aſſiſtance of theſe Scots they ſlew in Battel, and by that means got the Government of South-Wales, which they ruled jointly, but with ſmall quiet; for the Sons of Rythaerch gathered together a great number of their Father's Friends, to revenge his death; with whom Prince Howel and Meredyth meeting at Hyarthwy, after a long Fight routed them, and made them fly; but the year following Prince Meredyth himſelf was ſlain by the Sons of Conan ap Sitſylt, Brother to Prince Lewelyn, to revenge their Father's death, whom Meredyth and his Brother Howel had ſlain.

'This year appeared a ſtrange kind of Wild-Fire, ſuch as no man ever 'remembred, and did a great deal of miſchief in divers places. The ſame 'year alſo deceaſed Ælfſige Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Ælfwin the King's 'Chaplain ſucceeded in that See.

Anno Dom. MXXXIV.

'Ætheric the Biſhop died (the Annals tell us not of what See): But Simeon of Durham, and R. Hoveden add, That Malcolm King of Scots died this year, to whom ſucceeded Mactade.

Anno Dom. MXXXV.

The ſame Authors farther tell us, That King Cnute before his Death appointed Swane his Eldeſt Son to be King of Norway; and Hardecnute, his Son by Queen Æmma, to be King of Denmark; and Harold, his Son by Ælgiva, a Hampſhire Lady, to be King of England after himſelf.

‘This year King Cnute deceaſed at Scæfteſbyrig, and was buried at the ‘new Monaſtery at Wincheſter, having been King of England almoſt ‘twenty years.

Anno Dom. MXXXVI.

There is no King that can deſerve a more various Character than this; ſince none who came in ſo roughly, after govern'd more mildly: He was naturally Cruel, and very Ambitious, and ſtuck not at any thing to gain a Kingdom, as appears by his dealing with his Predeceſſor's Children, and Brothers; but more particularly with Olaf King of Norway, whom Simeon of Durham relates to have been turn'd out of it by the ſecret Practices and Bribes which he liberally beſtow'd upon the Great and Factious men of that Kingdom; but however, toward his latter end he reigned both prudently and moderately; and we may ſay of him what a Roman Author does of one of his Emperors, That it had been well for this Kingdom if he had never reign'd at all, or elſe had continued longer; none of his Sons reſembling him either in Valour or Wiſdom.

But to let you ſee that this King was really ſenſible before his death, of the Vanity of Worldly Empire, I ſhall, to divert the Reader, give you this ſtory of him, out of H. Huntington, who thus relates it, viz. That King Cnute being once at Southampton, caus'd his Royal Seat to be plac'd on the ſhore, while the Tide was coming in; and with a Majeſtick Air ſaid thus, “Thou Sea belongeſt to me, and the Land where-“on I ſit is mine; nor hath any one unpuniſhed reſiſted my Commands; “I charge thee therefore come no further upon my Land, neither pre-“ſume to wet the Feet of thy Sovereign Lord. But the Sea, as before, came rowling on, and without any Reverence at all not only wet but daſhed him; whereupon the King quickly riſing up, bade thoſe that were about him to conſider the weak and bounded Power of Kings; and how none indeed deſerved that Title, but He whoſe Eternal Laws both Heaven, and Earth, and Seas obey. A Truth ſo evident of it ſelf, that were it not to ſhame his Court-Flatterers, (who would not elſe be convinced) Cnute needed not to have gone wet-ſhod home. From thenceforth he would never afterwards wear his Crown, but commanded it to be put upon the Head of the Crucifix at Wincheſter.

M.

From whoſe Example, as Petrus Pictavienſis relates, aroſe that cuſtom of hanging up the Armour of Great Men in Churches, as Offerings made to God, by whoſe aſſiſtance they had attained any Honour to themſelves, or Benefit to their Countrey, either by Victory, or an Honourable Death.

I ſhall conclude his Reign with his Laws, which ſince we have not the time when they were made, I have reſerved to this place: They begin thus:

This is the Law (or Decree) which Cnute King of all England, Denmark, and Norway, hath ordained with the Conſent of his Wiſe Men at London, as well for the Maintenance of his own Royal Dignity, as for the Benefit of his People, and were made at Wincheſter in Midwinter, (i.e. at Chriſtmas) which, you muſt note, was one of the ſtated times when all the Great Men of the Kingdom, both Clergy and Laity, uſed of courſe to attend upon the King, whether he ſummoned them, or not.

But ſince theſe Laws are very long, and contain a Repetition and Confirmation of divers Laws formerly made by his Predeceſſors, I ſhall only here extract ſome of them, and refer the Reader to Mr. Lambard for the reſt.

Anno Dom. MXXXVI.

“ The firſt of Civil Concernment commands Juſtice to be faithfully “ and indifferently adminiſtred both to Poor and Rich, and aboliſhes all “ unjuſt Laws.

“ The ſecond requires Mercy to be uſed, and that no man be put to “ death for a ſmall offence.

“ The eighth ordains, that all people keep the Peace; and orders one “ and the ſame good Money to be current, and no man to refuſe it. If “ any one embaſe the Coin, his hands ſhall be cut off without any Redemption: And if a Reeve or Magiſtrate be accuſed that it was done “ by his conſent, he ſhall purge himſelf by a treble Purgation; and if “ he be caſt, incur the ſame Puniſhment with the Offender.

“ The twelfth is remarkable, ſince it comprizes all thoſe Forfeitures “ which the King challenges as due to himſelf, in the Counties of Weſt- “ Saxony, except he pleaſe to confer them upon any other; (viz.) the “ Penalties incurr’d for the breach of the Peace, for breaking into a “ Houſe, ſtopping up a Paſſage, and forſaking a man’s Colours. If alſo “ for any Crime a man be outlaw’d, the Reſtitution of him to his former ſtate belongs to the King. He alſo that poſſeſſeth Bocland (i. e. “ Land convey’d by Deed) forfeits to the King, let his Lord be who he “ will; as alſo whoever relieves or Harbours a Fugitive.

“ The fourteenth Law appoints Mulcts for divers Offences, and particularly, That if any Judge have out of Hatred or Lucre perverted Juſtice, by the Law of the Engliſh he is to pay to the King the value of “ his Head; and alſo to be removed from his Place, or redeem it as the “ King ſhall pleaſe, except he plead that what he did was from Ignorance, and then he muſt confirm this Aſſertion by Oath: And by the “ Law of the Danes he is to incur the Mulct of the breach of that Law, “ except he can plead Ignorance.

“ The nineteenth renews the former Laws of King Alfred, commanding every ~~one of free~~ condition to enter himſelf into ſome Hundred or Tything; that being in a condition to purge himſelf, he may “ alſo be in a capacity to claim from another the value of his Head; “ otherwiſe none that exceeds twelve years of age, in caſe he receive any “ wrong, ſhall be capable of enjoying the ſame privilege with a Freeman; and be he a Maſter of a Family, or a Retainer, he muſt be “ entred into ſome Hundred or other, and muſt find Pledges or Sureties “ for his appearance, in caſe he be accuſed of a Crime. Some Great “ Men (ſays the King) if they can do it, will protect their Servants, “ giving out ſometimes that they are Free, other times that they are “ Slaves; but we not enduring any ſuch unjuſt practiſes, enjoin, That “ every one of twelve years of age ſhall give Security by Oath, that he “ will neither ſteal himſelf, nor be acceſſary to the Theft of any other.

Thus doth he revive what King Alfred had before ordained, That no Freeman ſhould be out of Tything, or live at random, without this moſt efficacious Tye of Suretyſhip; and to what was enacted before, adds this caution of twelve years, beyond which, for the Publick Peace and Security, none were to live without being admitted and received into ſome Hundred and Tything.

“ The twentieth Law of King Cnute ſo far indulges a man unblameable and of good Repute, who never brake his Oath in the Hundred, “ nor was caſt by the Ordeal, that his ſingle Purgation ſhall be accepted. “ But a man of the contrary Reputation, ſhall either be compelled to ta

“ hi

Anno Dom. MXXXVI.

“his ſingle Oath in three Hundreds, or a threefold one, according to the cuſtom of that Court, or be put to the Ordeal; but a ſingle Purgation is to be made with a threefold preparatory Oath.

“By virtue of the fifty fourth Law, whoſoever conſpires againſt the King, or his Lord, ſhall forfeit Life and Fortunes, except he purge himſelf by the threefold Ordeal.

“The ſixty firſt declares breaking down or burning Houſes, as alſo Theft, manifeſt Murthers, and betraying of ones Lord, according to Human Laws, to be Crimes for which there is no Bote or Satisfaction to be made, by way of Mulct or Compenſation: Which is an alteration of the former Laws, by which all theſe Crimes were redeemable by Money.

“The next wills, That Mercy be ſhewn, as much as may be, to ſuch as truly and unfeignedly amend their ways.

“And by that which follows, the King declares he will put a difference betwixt Small and Great, Rich and Poor, Young and Old, Infirm and Healthful; foraſmuch as ſome men may offend out of a kind of neceſſity; and that a diſtinction is to be made betwixt a forced and a voluntary act: Therefore he promiſes to ſuccour where there is moſt need of his help.

“The ſixty ſeventh contains an Act of Grace of the King to his Subjects, whereby he relieves ſuch as were formerly oppreſſed: He alſo enjoins all his Officers, that they make proviſion for his Houſe out of his own Lands and Tillage, and that they compel no man to furniſh him with any Proviſions in this kind, upon pain of paying the value of their heads, if they impoſe any Mulct upon Refuſers.

“The ſixty eighth ordains, That in caſe any man by neglect, or ſudden Death, depart this world inteſtate, his Lord ſhall take nothing of his Goods, except what is due to him as an Herriot; but all is to be diſtributed by his Judgment to the Wife, Children, and next Kindred, juſtly, according to their ſeveral Rights.

“The ſixty ninth ſettles the rates of all Herriots to the King, ordering that the Herriot of every one be according to his dignity; as firſt, That of an Earl eight Horſes, whereof four with Furniture, and four without; four Helmets, as many Corſlets, eight Spears, and as many Shields; four Swords, and two hundred Mancuſes of Gold. That of the King's chief Thane four Horſes, whereof two with Furniture, and two without; two Swords, four Spears, and as many Shields; one Helmet, one Corſlet, and fifty Mancuſes of Gold. The Herriot of an inferior Thane, an Horſe with Furniture and Arms; or amongſt the Weſt-Saxons the Sum of Money that is paid, called Halfſange; in Mercia and Eaſt-England, two Pounds: But amongſt the Danes the Herriot of a King's Thane, who hath free Juriſdiction, is four Pounds; and if he be nearer to the King, his Herriot is two Horſes, whereof the one with Furniture, and the other without; a Sword, two Spears, as many Targets, and fifty Mancuſes of Gold. But the Herriot of a Thane of the loweſt condition, is two Pounds.

This word Herriot, (or as the true Saxon word is written) Heregeate, ſignifies Furniture for War, given by the Vaſſal to his Lord, probably at firſt deſigned for the driving away Thieves and Robbers, which abounded when the Daniſh or Northern Nations ſo frequently invaded the Land: For though the word Here does in the Saxon Language ſignify an Army, yet it is in our Saxon Authors (when without compoſition) generally taken in the worſt ſenſe, for Invaders and Spoilers: A Lawful Army collected by the King for the defence of the Nation being called by the name of Fyrd.

“The ſeventy firſt requires Widows to continue in Widowhood for the ſpace of Twelve Months, and then permits them to marry: If a Woman marry before her Twelve Months be out, ſhe ſhall loſe her Dower, with all that her Husband left her, which is to come in ſuch caſe to the next of kin; and he that marries her, ſhall pay the value of his Head to the King, or to whomſoever he aſſigns it.

“The ſeventy fifth Law deprives him of Life and Eſtate, who either in an Expedition by Land or Sea deſerts his Lord, or his Fellow-Soldier; and in ſuch caſe the Lord is to have back the Land he gave him; or if it was Bocland, it goes to the King. But in caſe any one dye in Fight in the preſence of his Lord, either at home or abroad, his Herriot ſhall be remitted, and his Children ſhall ſucceed both to his Goods and Lands, and equally divide them.

“The ſeventy ſixth gives him liberty that hath defended his Land, and cleared it from all doubts and incumbrances in the Sciregemote, or County-Court, to poſſeſs it quietly whilſt he lives, and to leave it to whom he pleaſes when he dies.

From whence we may obſerve, that before the Conqueſt men might bequeath their Lands by their Laſt Will.

“The ſeventy ſeventh gives liberty to every man to hunt in his own Grounds, but forbids all men under a Penalty to meddle with the King's Game, eſpecially in thoſe places which he had fenced by Privilege.

By thoſe places thus privileged, he means thoſe which afterwards the Normans called Foreſts, being Ground Deſart and Woody, lying open to the King's Deer, not fenced about with any Hedge or Wall, but circumſcribed and privileged, or (as here he words it) fenced with certain Bounds, Laws, and Immunities, under Magiſtrates, Judges, Officers, &c. Concerning theſe Foreſts, the King publiſhed certain Conſtitutions (Thirty four in number), which you may ſee at large in Sir Hen. Spelman's Gloſſary, tit. Foreſta. But becauſe he mentions them not in this nor any other of his Laws, they ſeem to have been made afterwards: But the Thirtieth Article is therein almoſt the very ſame with this Law, forbidding all men to meddle with his Game; and yet permitting them to hunt in their own Grounds, ſine Chaſea; but what that ſignifies, unleſs it be following their Game out of their own Grounds, I will not take upon me to determine.

King Harold, ſirnamed Harefoot.

Anno Dom. MXXXVI.

NOT long after the Death of King Cnute, our Annals relate, 'That there was a great Witena Gemot, or Council of the 'Wiſe Men, held at Oxnaford, where Earl Leofric, and al'moſt all the Thanes on the Eaſt part of Thames, with the 'Seamen of London, choſe Harold for King of all England, whilſt his 'Brother Hardecnute was in Denmark: But Earl Godwin and all the 'Great Men of the Weſt-Saxons, withſtood it as much as they could, 'though they were not able to prevail againſt them. Then was it alſo 'decreed, That Elgiva (or Emma) the Mother of Hardecnute, ſhould 'reſide at Wincheſter, with the Domeſtick Servants of the late King, and 'ſhould poſſeſs all Weſt-Saxony, where Earl Godwin was Governor, or 'Lord Lieutenant. It is ſaid alſo by ſome concerning this King Ha'rold, that he was the Son of King Cnute, and of Ælgiva the Daughter 'of Ælfhelm the Ealdorman; but that ſeems ſcarce probable to many, 'however, he was full (or Real) King of all England.

That which gave cauſe to this ſuſpicion, was (as Florence of Worceſter and Radulph de Diceto relate) That this Ælgiva not being able to have Children by King Cnute, commanded the Son of a certain Shoomaker, then newly born, to be brought to her, and feigning a formal Lying in, to have impoſed upon the credulous King her Husband, that ſhe was really brought to bed of a Son; which, if true, ſhews that it is no new or ſtrange thing for a Queen of England to impoſe a ſuppoſititious Birth upon the King her Husband, and the whole Nation.

But this Contention about the Election of Harold, gives us great reaſon to doubt the Truth of the Relation in Simeon of Durham, and other Authors, of this Harold's being appointed by his Father's Will to ſucceed in the Kingdom of England; ſuch a Nomination or Recommendation ſeldom or never failing to be obſerved by the States of the Kingdom without any diſpute, at the Election of a New King: And beſides, Queen Æmma ~~his Mother~~, who had then the greateſt power with King Cnute, would ſure much rather have had her own Son Hardecnute to have ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of England, than Harold, at beſt ſuppoſed to be her Husband's Son by another Woman: So that if Harold was now choſen King, it is moſt likely that it was not in purſuance of King Cnute's Will, but purely from the prevailing Faction of the Danes and Londoners; who, as William of Malmesbury tells us, were by their long converſation with them, become wholly Daniſh in their Inclinations.

his mother in Law

But if Ingulph may be believed (who lived as well before as after the Conqueſt), there was then ſo great a Diſpute about the Election of a King, that many fearing a Civil War would enſue, it cauſed multitudes of people to quit their Habitations, and betake themſelves into Wateriſh and Fenny Places, where they thought the Enemy could not, or would not eaſily purſue them; and particularly to the Monaſtery of Croyland, where they cauſed ſuch a diſturbance, that the Monks of that place could neither meet in the Church nor in the Refectory: When at laſt, to avoid the Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood, it was agreed at the aforeſaid Council at Oxnaford, That the Kingdom ſhould be divided between the two Brothers, Harold and Hardecnute, ſo that the former ſhould have all the Countries lying Northward from the Thames, together with the City of London, and Hardecnute enjoy all the Southern Provinces. But Hardecnute having received his ſhare of the Kingdom, went into Denmark, where making unneceſſary delays, Harold ſeized the whole Kingdom to himſelf. Which is in part confirmed by an Ancient Manuſcript Chronicle in the * Cottonian Library; which relates, That Harold King of the Northumbrians and Mercians, was elected King of all England; and Hardecnute, becauſe he ſtaid in Denmark, was caſt off. To which may be added certain old †Manuſcript Annals, now in the ſame Library (part of which is ſuppoſed to be written by Henry of Huntington), That Harold was elected by the Chief Men of the Eaſt-Angles (i.e. the Danes of that Countrey) together with the Londoners; ſo that he uſurped the Kingdom of his Brother Hardecnute, being then in Denmark. And Simeon of Durham relates, That by the Conſent of the Great Men of England, Harold began to reign as true and juſt Heir, but not ſo indiſputably as King Cnute his Father had done; becauſe Hardecnute, who was a truer Heir than he, was then expected; yet that in a ſhort time the Kingdom became divided after the ſame manner as Ingulph hath related. But it ſeems very unlikely, that Hardecnute, if he had been choſen King of any part of England, would have left it, and gone over into Denmark, before he was well ſettled at home. It is therefore more likely (what Florence of Worceſter aſſerts), That Harold was at firſt elected King only of the Mercians and Northumbers, Hardecnute being to enjoy all the reſt; but that not coming out of Denmark in due time, Harold got himſelf choſen King of the whole Kingdom the year following.

* Otho, D. 7.

† Julius, D. 4.

But leaving this matter concerning Hardecnute's Succeſſion, which muſt be confeſſed is much in the dark, the Author laſt mentioned does ſay, That Harold after he had obtained the Royal Dignity, ſent his Guards ſpeedily to Wincheſter, and there tyrannically ſeized on the greater part of the Treaſures of the King his Father, which had been bequeathed by Cnute to the Queen his Mother-in-Law.

But I cannot omit taking notice of the moſt Cruel and Bloody Treatment of Prince Alfred (Brother to King Edward) and his Followers; which becauſe many of our Beſt and moſt Ancient Hiſtorians, as well Printed as Manuſcript, refer to this year, and that too not long after King Harold's coming to the Crown, I ſhall here ſet down, ſince it ſeems moſt likely to have happened now, rather than at any other time: For though our Authors differ much about it, yet ſeeing moſt of the Ancient Manuſcript Annals in the Cottonian Library, (as alſo that old Treatiſe called Encomium Emmæ, being a Panegyrick wrote on that Queen by a Monk of her own time) agree in relating the Circumſtances of this horrid Action, I ſhall from thence tranſcribe this following Account of it; viz.

"That King Harold ſeeking by Treachery how to get thoſe two young "Princes, (Sons to the late King Etbelred) into his power, forged a "Letter in the Name of Queen Emma their Mother, inviting them into "England; wherein, perſonating her, ſhe ſeemed to chide them gently "for

“ for their delay, in not coming over to look after their own concerns; “ ſeeing they could not but know that it procured the daily confirming “ of the Uſurper in his power, who omitted no arts or means whatſo- “ ever, to gain the chief Nobility over to his Party; yet alſo aſſures them, “ that the Engliſh Nation had much rather have one of them to be their “ King; and in concluſion, deſires they would come as ſpeedily and as “ privately as they could, to conſult with her, what courſe was beſt to “ be taken.

This Letter was ſent to the Princes, then in Normandy, by an expreſs Meſſenger, with Preſents alſo, as from their Mother; which they joyfully receiving, returned word by the ſame hand, That one of them would be with her ſhortly, naming both the Time and Place. * Alfred who was the younger (for ſo it was thought beſt) at the appointed time, with a few Ships, and ſome ſmall number of Normans about him, appeared on the Coaſt, and no ſooner came aſhore, but fell into the Snare that Earl Godwin had laid for him, being ſent on purpoſe to betray him; and being cajoll’d into a belief that he was ſent for by the King then at London, he was in the way met at Guilford by Earl Godwin, who with all ſeeming Friendſhip at firſt kindly entertained him, but in the night ſurprized the Prince, and made him Priſoner, with all his Company, moſt of whom (in all about Six hundred men) were put to various kinds of cruel deaths, and being twice decimated, every Tenth man ſuffered without mercy. The Prince was brought to London, and by the King ſent bound to Ely, and had his eyes put out as ſoon as he landed there; and being delivered to the Monks to be kept, died ſoon after in their Cuſtody; but whether of the Pain, or Grief, or ſome other Indiſpoſition, is left uncertain.

Yet though this Author makes no mention of Prince Edward his Brother’s coming over with him; but rather aſſerting the contrary, that he never came at all; however, ſeveral other Hiſtorians will have this Prince to have either come over then, or ſome time before; and that being with his Mother when his Brother was thus treated, ſhe immediately ſent him back into Normandy; which I muſt confeſs ſeems very improbable, ſince Harold had it then in his power to deſtroy them both.

But though it is certain that this unfortunate Prince was made away, yet ſince our Annals are wholly ſilent in it, there is nothing about which our Hiſtorians ſo much vary, as concerning the time when it was done. William of Malmesbury and Bromton place it after the death of Harold, and before the coming over of Hardecnute; when they ſay that Prince Alfred arrived, with ſome expectations of the Kingdom; but the former plainly confeſſes, that he related this ſtory only upon common fame; yet becauſe the Chronicles (i. e. the Saxon Annals) are ſilent, he will not affirm it for truth; ſo it ſeems he had never ſeen the abovemention’d Encomium Emmæ. But that Prince Alfred was made away by the means of Earl Godwin, we ſhall further make out when we come to the Reign of King Edward the Confeſſor.

And the reaſon that ſome of our Hiſtorians give for Godwin’s cruel uſage of Prince Alfred, whilſt he let his Brother eſcape, is, that Godwin was afraid of the High Spirit and Wit of this young Prince; becauſe he knew that if ever he came to be King, he would never be governed by him, nor marry his Daughter; both which he hoped for from Edward, in caſe he ſhould be choſen King by his means (as afterwards wards happen'd). This, whether true or not, I will not determine; yet it ſuits well enough with the Intereſt of that Politick Earl. I ſhall ſay no more of this, only we cannot but hence obſerve the great Uncertainty of Traditional Accounts, though of no long ſtanding, ſince this Story, tranſacted not many years before the Conqueſt, is told ſo many ſeveral ways.

Anno Dom. MXXXVII.

'This year (according to our Annals) Ælgiva the Widow of King 'Cnute, and Mother of King Hardecnute and King Edward, was ba'niſhed; but going over to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, he aſſign'd her 'Bricge (i.e. Bruges) for her Retirement, where he protected her, 'and provided for her as long as ſhe ſtaid there.

But the Reader is to take notice, that this Queen, who is here called Ælgiva in the Engliſh-Saxon, is the ſame with Emma in the Norman-French Dialect, and who was now baniſhed England by King Harold, as all Writers agree. But the reaſon why this Queen did not retire into Normandy, her own Countrey, was, that her Father and Brother were both dead; and though William her Nephew then ſucceeded in the Dukedom, yet he was but an Infant, under the Tutelage of the King of France.

This year alſo produced a great Revolution in Wales; for Griffyth ap Lewelyn ap Sitſylt, ſometimes Prince of Wales, raiſed a great Army againſt Prince Jago, who now enjoyed the Principality of North-Wales (as you have already heard); and Jago alſo provided for himſelf as well as he could; but the greater part, and the better Soldiers were of Griffyth's ſide, for the love they bore to his Father, as plainly appeared when it came to a trial; for after the Battel was joined, Jago, his Soldiers deſerting him, was ſoon overthrown and ſlain; and then Griffyth reigned in his ſtead. From whence we may obſerve the ſtrange fickleneſs of the Welſh Nation in thoſe times, who notwithſtanding their ſeeming Affection to this Prince the Right Heir, yet left him as ſoon as ever they met with one of the ſame Race whom they liked better. From which evil cuſtom theſe Countries were never long without Civil Wars, till the total Conqueſt of them by the Engliſh.

But Griffyth ap Lewelyn, after he had thus ſlain Prince Jago, governed North-Wales very well, following his Father's ſteps; and in the very firſt year of his Government he fought with the Engliſhmen and Danes at Crosford upon Severne; and from thence he led his Army to Lhanpadarn vawr in Caerdiganſhire, and deſtroyed that place; and thence paſſing into South-Wales, totally ſubdued it; Howel ap Edwin, at that time Prince thereof, being forced to fly his Countrey; and when he had thus reduced South Wales, he returned home again with Honour. But the next year,

Anno Dom. MXXXVIII.

Howel Prince of South-Wales (as the Engliſh as well as Welſh Chronicles relate) having now procured Edwin the Brother of Leofric Earl of Mercia to aſſiſt him, marched with a great Army of Engliſh and Danes againſt Prince Griffyth, who meeting them in the field, overcame them, and ſlew Edwin at Pencadair, and purſued Howel ſo cloſely, that though he eſcaped himſelf, yet his Wife was taken Priſoner; whom Griffyth liked ſo well, that he kept her for his Miſtreſs.

But though Howel after this made ſeveral Attempts to regain his Countrey, yet he could never ſucceed, for that Prince Griffyth held it all his time. But the Cottonian Chronicle relates, that fighting afterwards wards with Griffyth at a place called Paldiwach, he obtained the Victory, and again made himſelf Prince of South-Wales: But this I leave to the Reader's Judgment. To return again to our Annals:

Anno Dom. MXXXVIII.

'Ethelnoth Archbiſhop of Canterbury deceaſed, and a little after 'Ethelric Biſhop of the South-Saxons; and alſo a little before Chriſtmas 'Bryteh Biſhop of Worceſter; and a little after, Ælfric Biſhop of the 'Eaſt Angles: Then Ædſige was made Archbiſhop, and Grymkytel Biſhop of the South-Saxons; and Living ſucceeded in the Biſhopricks of 'Worceſter and Glouceſter.

Anno Dom. MXXXIX.

'This year King Harold deceaſed at Oxnaford, 16. Kal. April, and 'was buried at Weſtminſter. He governed England Four Years, and 'Sixteen Weeks.] But there is certainly an Error in this Copy of the Annals; for either he deceaſed not till the next year, as the Cambridge Copy and Mat. Weſtminſter place it; or elſe he could reign but Three Years, and perhaps ſo many odd Weeks as theſe Annals mention.

'In his time was again paid a great Tax for the ſetting out Sixteen 'Sail; to wit, Eight Marks to every Rower (which ſhews it conſiſted of only Gallies, and not Ships); and as Florence alſo adds, Twelve Marks more to every Maſter, which he order'd to be rais'd through all England; as was before done in the Reign of King Cnute.

But it ſeems every Port was bound to pay ſuch a proportion, to ſet out theſe Sixteen Sail (as H. Huntington relates) whereby nevertheleſs he ſo much incenſed the minds of the Engliſh againſt him, that the Welſh perceiving it, or elſe for ſome other reaſon, began to be very unruly; inſomuch that ſome Inſurrections happened thereupon, wherein many of the Engliſh Nobility were ſlain; as Eawin, Brother to Earl Leofric; Turketil and Algeat, the Sons of Effi, both of them Great Perſons; and ſeveral others.

And to this time (I ſuppoſe) we may refer what Caradoc in his Welſh Chronicle relates, That Griffyth ap Lewelyn, Prince of North-Wales, in the firſt year of his Reign, fought with the Engliſh and Danes at Croſsford upon Severne, and put them to flight; and from thence he led his Army to Lhanpadan vawr in Caerdiganſhire, and deſtroyed the place utterly; and from thence paſſed all over South-Wales, receiving the people into his ſubjection, for Howel ap Edwin their King fled before him, and forſook the Land.

As for the Character of this King Harold, and the reaſon why he was called Harefoot, they are very uncertain: H. Knighton in his Chronicle writes very oddly, That he had a Body like a Hare, ſure he means hairy like that Creature, and from thence was called Harefoot; which is very improbable. But others with more appearance of truth, derive it from his Swiftneſs of Foot. Bromton gives him this Character, That in all reſpects he degenerated from the Worth of his Father King Cnute (inſomuch that divers ſuſpected him not to have been his Son), for he was altogether careleſs both as to matters of War and Peace; only he would purſue his own Will and Pleaſure, and what was very unbecoming his Royal Eſtate, chuſing rather to go on foot, than ride; whence, for the lightneſs and ſwiftneſs of his Feet, he ſeems to have been called Harefoot.

As for his Laws, we have only this one mentioned by Mr. Selden in his Janus Anglorum, which was, That whatever Welſhman, coming into England without leave, was taken on this ſide Offa's Ditch, ſhould have his Right Hand cut off by the King's Officers.

KING Harold dying thus ſuddenly, the Chief Men of England, with whom alſo the Londoners now joined, ſent Meſſengers to Hardecnute (who was then at Bruges with his Mother) intreating him to come and receive the Crown; whereupon he haſted into Denmark, there to ſettle his Affairs; which when he had done, with Forty (or as ſome ſay, Sixty) Ships, well mann'd with Daniſh Soldiers, according to our Annals, he arrived at Sandwich ſeven ‘days before Midſummer, being joyfully received both by the Danes and ‘Engliſh; (and as H. Huntington relates, was by both of them elected ‘King); though afterwards the Great Men that did it, paid dearly for ‘it; for not long after, it was decreed, That a Tax of Eight Marks ‘ſhould be again paid to the Rowers in Sixty two Sail of Ships. The ‘ſame year alſo a Seſter (i. e. a Horſe-load) of Wheat was ſold for ‘Fifty five Pence, and more.

Anno Dom. MXL.

‘This year Eadſige the Archbiſhop went to Rome; and alſo another ‘Military Tax was paid, of Twenty nine thouſand twenty nine pounds: ‘And after this, was paid Eleven thouſand forty eight pounds for two ‘and thirty Sail of Ships.

But whether theſe Taxes were raiſed by Authority of the Great Council of the Kingdom, our Authors do not mention; but I believe not; for this Danegelt was now by conſtant uſage become a Prerogative.
